WHereas John Lilburn prisoner in the Fleet, by sentence in the Star-Chamber, did this day suffer condign punishment for his several offences, by whipping at a Cart, and standing in the Pillory; and as their Lordships were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the said execution, audaciously and wickedly did not only utter sundry scandalous speeches, but likewise scattered divers copies of seditious Books amongst the people, that beheld the said execution; for which very thing, amongst other offences of like nature, he hath been censured in the said Court, by the afore-said sentence: it is therefore by their Lordships ordered, that the said John Lilburn should be laid alone with irons on his hands and legs, in the Wards of the Fleet, where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners are used to be put; and that the Warden of the Fleet, take special care to hinder the resort of any persons whatsoever unto him; and particularly, that he be not supplied with money from any friend: and that he take special notice of all Letters, Writings, and Books brought unto him, and seize and deliver the same unto their Lordships: and take notice from time to time who they be that resort unto the said prison, to visit the said Lilburn, or to speak with him, and inform the Board thereof. And it was lastly ordered that all persons that shall be hereafter produced to receive corporal punishment, according to sentence of that Court, or by order of the Board, shall have their garments searched before they be brought forth, and neither writing nor other thing suffered to be about them; and their hands likewise to be bound, during the time they are under punishment. Whereof, together with the other premises, the said Warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have especial care, that this their Lordships order be accordingly observed.

Examined per Dudley Carleton.

And the execution of this latter sentence in a most barbarous and inhuman manner, was punctually proved by sufficient witnesses, as followeth; viz. Mr. Higgs his Surgeon again testified, that that night Mr. Lilburn suffered, he was had back to the Fleet, and he repairing to Dr. Grant, to crave his advice, he advised him to let his patient blood, to prevent a fever; and he accordingly came the next morning to the Fleet to let his patient blood, and dress his sores, but he found him locked up close in a room, and was by the Officers of the Fleet, denied access unto him. Whereupon he immediately went to the Warden, being then at Westminster, who denied him access to the said Mr. Lilburn, till the afternoon that he came home; which was a great act of cruelty, and much to the danger of Mr. Lilburn's health, and welfare: and the next day they removed him down to the Common Goal, where they laid him in irons, and several times wounded him, to the extream hazard of his life, and several times denied me access to him in his extremity.

Dr. Hubbard, Justice of the Peace, made Oath to this effect; that when Mr. Lilburn was prisoner in the Fleet, he was desired as a Physician to visit him: and going so to do, he was again and again denied access to him: but upon much importunity to the Warden; he was admitted to him, whom he found in an extream violent fever, lying in Irons upon both hands and legs, to the extream hazard of his life.

Mrs. Mary Dorman further declared, that after Mr. Lilburn had suffered, she went often to visit him, who was laid in irons, and his friends denied access to him; and that the officers of the Fleet strongly endeavoured to starve him: so that many times his friends were forced to bring his meat to the poor mens bag, and give them money to convey it to him through a hole in a wall betwixt them and him. Mr. Thomas Hawes further declared, that after Mr. Lilburn suffered, he often went to visit him, and was beat by the Goalers, and was in danger to have lost his life for so doing; and that they so strongly laboured to starve Mr. Lilburn, that they were forced to convey his diet to him by the poor men that begged at the grate: but the Goalers finding out that Mr. Lilburn got his diet that way, they dealt so cruelly with the poor men, that Mr. Lilburn was deprived of that way of relief, and then his friends got the son of one Archer that was prisoner in the next room to him, for accusing the Deputy of Ireland for murdering one Esmond, to convey his victuals to him: which was done by stealth, through a hole where a board was pull'd up in his floor, when the rest of the prisoners were at the Chapel at service; and, my Lords, divers times the conveying of his meat to him, cost him and his friends, upon the prisoners, &c. more than the meat itself.

Robert Ellis sometime a fellow prisoner with Mr. Lilburn in the Fleet, upon Oath declared before their Lordships, that the Officers of the Fleet after they brought Mr. Lilburn into the Common Wards, used him very barbarously and cruelly, laying him for a long time in irons, keeping his friends from him, and his victuals; and several times had like to have slain and murdered him, and he verily believes had effected it, if he had not help'd him; for which they took his bed from him, and put him off the charity, and kept him five weeks in a dungeon, and had like to have murdered him, and afterwards removed him to the King's-Bench, that so they might the more easily have their wills of Mr. Lilburn, &c.

Their Lordships being satisfied of the Injustice and illegality of the proceedings, Mr. Bradshaw said, that he conceived no man's sufferings in the Kingdom had been so great as his Client's were: for a Gentleman to be so cruelly tortured and whipped, pillory'd, gagged, close imprisoned, ironed, beat and wounded, and that contrary to Law, is a cruelty unheard of, and therefore hoped that for such unparalleled sufferings, and oppressions, the fair hand of their Lordships honourable Justice would give and reach him forth unparalleled damages, and though many of his Judges that did him injustice be dead, yet he hoped the hand of Justice of their Honours, joined with the honourable House of Commons will be so long, as to reach their living and surviving estates, and out of them, &c. make him speedy, large and unparalleled reparations.

Mr. Cook then spoke in the behalf of Mr. Lilburn (and afterwards printed his argument) and said the punishment inflicted upon him may be reduced to four heads.

(1.) Imprisonment, whereby a man is buried alive, loses the comfort and benefit of his five senses, and is made Corpus immobile legis, the unmoveable subject ject of the law, or as a dead carcase. 'Tis true, that in itself it is the easiest of all corporal punishments: but the continuance of it, makes it such a lingering consumption, that it is better to be upon the rack an hour, than to be imprisoned a year: as it is better to be once wet to the skin, than to be subject to a perpetual dropping, especially for an active spirit: there is no such torment as to deprive him of liberty; for active Theseus was condemned only to sit still: there is no end of such a misery, as the Heathen persecuting Tyrant said, Nondum tibi redii in gratiam; to put a man out of his pain, was always counted a favour. But Mr. Lilburn's imprisonment was aggravated by three steps or gradations.

1. A close imprisonment, not the dearest friend to come to him; we do not find that any of the primitive Christians were used so by the Tyrants, for then that heavy charge might be answered in the Scripture, I was in prison, and ye visited me not; extraordinary matters of state and high concerns always excepted: but the Surgeon was not permitted some time to come to Mr. Lilburn to dress him, nor the Physician when he was in a fever; a cruelty unheard of amongst the Turks: for they are careful of their slaves in their sickness, and fatten them, that they may endure their blows; but it is too probable that those which were Mr. Lilburn's malicious enemies, did too much thirst after his blood.

2. The Keepers were ordered to take care that no money be conveyed to him, which argues that they had a desire to starve him: the Prophet saith, it is better to die by the sword, than famine, which is the greatest of all torments; for all punishments may be undergone by patience, but only hunger: which the more any man thinks by patience to overcome, the more violent it is. Undoubtedly had it not been for the pity of some poor resolute fellow-prisoners, Mr. Lilburn had been starved to death: far worse than any of the four Roman punishments, which were lapidatio, combustio, decollatio, strangulatio, stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. How severely, yet most justly, did the same Judges several times punish the intent to poison or destroy another man? The going about to murder, nay the giving of the lye, because it is preparatory to murder, by provoking quarrels, was censurable in that Court, à multo fortiori, much more from the stronger, then in this case used, where there was so much cruelty inflicted, that death might probably have ensued, had not God by his extraordinary mercy supported him, in those sad afflictions, those unjust Judges for transgressing not only the bounds of humanity, but all the rules of their own ordinary Justice, ought to make Mr. Lilburn answerable satisfaction.

3. This imprisonment was for about three years, until he petitioned the Parliament. Many times the first motions of anger are not in a man's own power; because he would not accuse himself as they desired, they might have in a passion committed him, and the Sun might have gone down upon their wrath; nay, the Moon might have made her peragrations, or the summer season might have melted their frozen consciences, or the winter cold have allayed the heat of their malice, or the Sun might have made his revolution, but their malice continued three years; and had not he been delivered by the Justice of the Parliament, in probability might have continued for ever.

(2.) Whipping, a most painful and shameful punishment; Flagellations and Scourgings being for slaves and incorrigible rogues, and hedge-robbers.

In undecimo Elizab. one Cartwright brought a slave from Russia, and would scourge him cruelly, for which he was questioned; and it was resolved, that England was too pure an air for slaves to breathe in, and it was often resolved in the Star-Chamber, that no Gentleman was to be whipp'd for any offence whatsoever: it being well known that John Lilburn's ancestors have been ancient Gentlemen, and that which these Judges could not be ignorant of, especially the Earl-Marshall, who is presumed to know all the ancient Gentry in the Kingdom. But the like whipping was never read of, amongst the Affrians, Persians, Grecians, or Romans. For,

1. It was from the Fleet to Westminster (above a mile distance) a great concourse and confluence of people looking upon him, as if he had been some miserable slave.

2. He received every two or three steps a blow, 500 strokes at the least; for one Mr. Smith, a Merchant that went along with him, testified that so far as he was able to judge, he received 500 or 1000, but of the first he was most certain; and this was with a treble-corded whip, with at least twenty knots upon it.

Amongst the Romans no malefactor had ever above forty stripes, and every stroke stood for three stripes, for the whip was of three thongs; and but one knot at the end of every thong. St. Paul received thirty-nine stripes, which was but thirteen blows. Not long since in Orleans, a Priest was sentenced to be whipp'd for fornication, having abused a poor maid, telling her that their popish St. Francis would come and lie with her such a night, at which time he personated and feigned himself to be St. Francis, and was taken in bed with her; and it was earnestly pressed by the King's Advocates, that he might receive fourteen blows with a three-corded whip, which is constantly used for such castigations, because it was an abominable wickedness: but the Judges would not suffer him to have above thirteen blows, because ampliandi sunt fautores, favours are to be enlarged. And in doubtful matters it must always be presumed for clemency and gentleness; according to which account, Mr. Lilburn received 10000 stripes: for in every blow there was twenty stripes, by reason of the twenty knots, which being multiplied is 10000, and in every stripe there was shame and pain, compression of the flesh, bruising and effusion of blood.

(3.) The Pillory, a punishment something painful, but exceeding shameful, and most terrible to a generous nature, to stand two hours in open view of all men, as if he had been unworthy to tread upon the earth, the sun shining very hot upon him, and not suffered to keep on his hat; and this immediately after his cruel whipping, that so they might put him to all the torture and pain that they could, argues abundance of wrath and malice.

This punishment of standing upon the Pillory, was first invented for Mountebanks and Cheats, that having gotten upon banks and forms, to wound and abuse the people, were exalted in the same kind, to stand conspicuous to the view and open shame of the people; but for a Gentleman to be so served, was never heard of, unless by that cruel Court.

(4.) Gagging, an unmanly and barbarous cruelty, to be exercised upon beasts, not men, for man differs from brutes, both ratione & oratione, in reason and speech; a punishment never heard of in any age: cutting out of tongues, and perforation in cases of blasphemy have been heard of, but never never in a matter of such a nature; and this to continue for above an hour, till the blood gush'd out of his mouth, as if they would have pluck'd his jaws in pieces, and all this for nothing; O insufferable torments!

So that by his imprisonment he was made a stock, a dead trunk, or picture of a man, that hath eyes, and sees not, hands, and handles not, &c. By whipping they endeavoured to make him a rogue, or a slave; by the third punishment of the pillory, to make him a cheater, guilty of forgery and perjury; and by gagging, to make him a beast, and so upon the whole matter to deprive him of his reasonable soul, such cruelties that were never invented but by Tygers and Wolves, in human shapes, feritas Luparum, in humana figura. But then the persons that were so cruel and tyrannical aggravates the offence.

1. This cruelty was commanded to be executed by an eminent Court of Justice, professing Christianity, peissima est injustitia quæ fit sub colore justitiæ: 'tis the greatest injustice to oppress and do injury, under a pretence of Justice. How often was it resolved in that Court, that for a Justice of Peace or Constable to commit a riot, was ten times more severely punishable than in a common person, because it is to use, or rather abuse that sword of authority, to commit or countenance an unlawful action, which was ordained and put into their hands to suppress it.

2. The Eminency of the persons augments the offence, qualitas personæ auget peccatum; for a Gentleman to act against the rule of the Law and Gentility, is more reprehensible than in vulgar persons. It was called the Court of Star-Chamber, from the eminency of the persons, which were Judges: Stars of the greater magnitudes, as being the highest Court of ordinary Justice; but Mr. Lilburn's Judges, instead of putting on the garment of Justice, were clothed from head to feet, and their conscience oiled and moistned, with cruelty and injustice mixed with the most poisoned malice that ever entered into the hearts of any Judges.

And though some of them be dead, yet Justice lives though the party be dead; whatsoever becomes of them, their estates ought to make satisfaction according to their own rules, qui non luet in corpore, solvit in bursa; he that suffers not in his body, must suffer in his purse.

A principal actor in this bloody tragedy, was the Lord-Keeper Coventry, not less eminent in cruelty than in place, Judge of the highest seat of mercy, the Chancery, which abated the edge of the Law, when it is too keen; for the chief Judge of mercy to degenerate into a savage cruelty, not heard of amongst the Barbarians, how heinous is it? Not to speak any thing of the decapitated Archbishop, that monster of cruelty, and subtlety, whose estate we fear is dead with him, and therefore little can be expected from it.

The Bishop of London, then Lord-Treasurer, was a principal sentencer of Mr. Lilburn; by their own Canons, no Bishop ought to have a hand in blood, because they pretend to be mild shepherds, but cruelty was their genius.

The Earl of Arundel was of an imbittered spirit against Mr. Lilburn, nothing but corporal punishment would allay the heat of his malice; who being Earl-Marshal, could not be ignorant that John Lilburn was a Gentleman: for him that by his place was to protect all Gentlemen from injuries, and should scorn to be active in the inflicting such corporal ignominious cruel punishments upon a Gentleman, is a transcendent transgression against the laws of state and honour. It hath been censurable in that Court, to speak contemptuous words of a Gentleman; and how often had he ordered satisfaction, for saying such a one is no Gentleman? And yet the same court and persons not only to say a Gentleman is a rogue, but so to use him, as Mr. Lilburn was, is the greatest scandal to the publick Justice of the Kingdom, that hath been heard of.

The Judges assistants, that are called the Fathers of the Law, and are said to carry Law in their breasts, for them to begin and promote such an unjust and illegal sentence, for them that are set as Centinels to watch over and preserve the peoples liberties, to betray a poor Gentleman into the hands of merciless men, was an offence of an exceeding high nature: for had they declared the illegality of those proceedings, and protested against it, as by virtue of their places (in duty) they ought to have done, it might have prevented the sentence. If the proceeding had been regular by informations, and examinations; or ore tenus, as it was not, unless there had been some direct proof or speaking circumstance or very probable presumption, that Mr. Lilburn had been guilty of some high crime; it had been a grievous thing in them to have assisted in so cruel punishments. But when the pretence was no other, but concerning some of Dr. Bastwick's, Mr. Burton's, or Mr. Prynne's Books, which they knew could not be any breach of the peace, and that in the Star-Chamber, where there was no information, as in Mr. Lilburn's case, to administer an Oath, was all one with the High-Commission, and directly contrary to the petition of right, in 3 Car. and Justice Jones had no reason for inflicting the corporal punishment.

But because Mr. Lilburn was a young man, therefore it was fit he should be punished: is not this to turn Justice into Wormwood? Such Judges have ever been the most dangerous pests to a State and Kingdom, and in former times for less offence, most severely punished in their persons and estates. The Lord Cottington thirsted exceedingly after the blood of this poor Gentleman, and the High-Commissioners had their hands as deep as any of the rest, in regard that by their warrant he was first committed: the most unjust and tyrannical that ever was heard of, to command a poor Gentleman to be sent to prison, without convening him before them, or asking him whether he was guilty of any misdemeanor; a meer usurpation of authority, taking the sword of Justice into their own hands, not caring to destroy a poor Gentleman, so as they might curry favour with the Prelates their grand patrons; those High-Commissioners making themselves Judges, Goalers, and Executioners, and what not, to destroy the innocent.

It is considerable what punishment the Goalers and Executioners of this cruel sentence have deserved: for however if a writ be directed to a Sheriff, commanding him to take the body of one who is a Peer of the Realm, or a privileged person, the Officer is excused by his warrant; yet when punishments are clearly against the Law of God, Nature, and Nations, which prohibit all such cruelties and inhumanities; to make them bleed for the blood of Mr. Lilburn, would be an honourable piece of Justice, and a precedent of much safety to the subjects in after-times, and Officers would not dare to be so unmercifully cruel; as the Sheriffs smarted for the Ship-money, though they had process from the Exchequer.

Mr. Lilburn's sufferings are beyond expression, and no honest heart but is feelingly sensible of every blow that was given him; in his imprisonment, Whipping, Pillory, Gaggings, Beatings, Hunger-bitings, and the Irons laid upon him, every true-hearted Englishman, that stands for the laws and liberties of the subject, was so used, and abused; for it might have been any such man's case, as well as his. His estate quite exhausted by their cruelties, his trade lost, whereby he gained his livelihood, being before that time in a hopeful way of a Merchant, and well known to be very industrious in his calling; a man active for the Publick, and by his merits hath procured the title of Lieutenant-Colonel, in the present wars. What damages the Parliament will be pleased to adjudge and order him, he humbly submits to their great Wifdoms and honourable Justice: certainly not any of them would have suffered so much for ten thousand pounds.

It is the Lord's great mercy that he is yet alive, having conflicted with, and gone through such a sea of punishments and miseries. True it is, that in point of reparations, there is no proportion between money and such corporal punishments, to a generous spirit: yet as there was never more indignity and a greater dishonour to the Justice of the Kingdom, than by this wicked sentence, and the cruel execution thereof; thereby proclaiming it to all the world that an English Gentleman must be made a slave, to satisfy the malicious and virulent humours of a tyrannical Court of Justice:

So it will be a very great honour and reparation to the publick Justice of this Land, to give and adjudge Mr. Lilburn exemplary and proportionable damages, to be levied out of the estates of his unjust and malicious Judges, through whose injustice he not only suffered such cruelties for three years, that not one of them would have suffered the like, nor received one of his stripes for many thousands; but lost his trade and livelihood.

The judicial law was blood for blood, an eye for an eye, tooth for tooth, &c. Daniel's accusers were cast into the den of Lions, with their wives and children, though Daniel had no hurt by a miracle of mercy; by the equity and morality whereof, Mr. Lilburn ought to have good and proportionable reparation out of the estates of his unjust Judges and Tormentors, who sought for his blood: but that God preserved him by his extraordinary love and favour.

That all drooping spirits may chear up and be encouraged, that Justice will run down like a mighty stream, when it shall be executed upon the greatest offenders: as now there is good hopes that Mr. Lilburn shall by ordinance of Parliament have speedily good damages, answerable to his great sufferings, ordered and adjudged him, to be raised out of the estates of his unjust Judges, that may be paid unto him without further expence, who hath been at such extraordinary charges about the same, that so his reparation may be not only just, but seasonable, by which he shall be obliged to venture his life, and all that is dear to him as formerly he hath done, for his honourable Judges in Parliament assembled.

Whereupon the Lords made the following Order.

Die Veneris, 13 Feb. 1645.

"Whereas the cause of John Lilburn, Gent. came this day to a hearing at the Bar by his Counsel,

"being transmitted from the House of Commons, concerning a sentence pronounced against him in the Star-Chamber, 13 Feb. Anno 13. Car. Reg. and after an examination of the whole proceedings, and a due consideration of the said sentence; it is this day adjudged, ordered, and determined by the Lords in Parliament assembled, that the said sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, shall forthwith be for ever totally vacated, obliterated, and taken off the file in all Courts where they are yet remaining, as illegal, and most unjust, against the liberty of the subject, and law of the land and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record: And that the said Lilburn shall be for ever absolutely freed, and totally discharged from the said sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, as fully and amply, as though never any such thing had been. And that all estreat and process in the Court of Exchequer, for levying of any fine, (if any such be) shall be wholly cancelled and made void, any thing to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

Job. Browne, Cleric. Parliamentor.

But not assigning me any reparations in that Decree (the doing of which the House of Commons left unto them, and the Lords according to former custom looked upon to be their right in law to do,) I prayed their assigning me particular reparations according to Law and Justice, out of the estates of my unjust Judges, that had done me so much wrong; upon which new address to them, they did upon the 5th of March, 1645, order and decree, and assigned to be paid unto the said John Lilburn, the sum of 2000*l.* for his reparations, which for many reasons (as their being aiding in the wars to the King, &c.) they fixed upon the Estates real and personal of Francis Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet; and afterwards by another decree for the present levying thereof, out of their lands, at eight years purchase (as they were before the wars,) with the allowance of Interest at 8*l. per centum, per annum*, in case of obstruction; for all or any part of it: and to this purpose caused an ordinance to be drawn up, which fully passed their House the 15, 20, and 27th of April 1646. and afterwards transmitted it to the House of Commons, where by reason of my bloody adversary old Sir Henry Vane's Interests, and of my imprisonment by Manchester's means in the Tower of London, it lay asleep till the 1st of August 1648. at which time 7 or 8000 of my true friends in London, signed and caused to be delivered a Petition to the House of Commons for my liberty, and the passing of the said Ordinance. Whereupon the House made this Order.

Die Martis, 1 Augusti 1648.

Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Lord Carre, Col. Boswel, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Holland, Mr. Copley.

"It is referred to this Committee, or any five of them, to consider how Colonel John Lilburn may have such satisfaction and allowance for his sufferings and losses, as was formerly intended him by this House."

Henry Elfyng, Cler. Parl. Dom. Com.

Upon

Upon which Order, I got the Committee to meet, and preferred a petition to them. Upon which petition, the Parliament having disposed of all that part of the Lord Cottington's estate that I should have had, unto the Lord Say, and also compounded with Sir Francis Windebank's heir; the said Committee were pleased to fix it entirely upon the Lord-Keeper's estate, as the principal guilty man: of which, when the young Lord Coventry, his son and heir, heard thereof in France, he came posting to England as in amaze, fearing what such a precedent might bring upon him, if his Father's estate [then dead] should be compell'd to make me satisfaction; he being so capital in Injustice, that if that course should be taken, his estate left him by his Father [if it were trebled] would not satisfy for his Father's palpable Injustice committed in his lifetime. And Manchester being in the said bryers with his Father, being as unjust as the other, and having a Brother (viz. George Montague) and other considerable Interests in the House of Commons, so plied their friends there, that they put a stop to the second reading of the aforesaid Ordinance. Which I first fully understood by the Speaker's means, then my great pretended friend, who one day began to reason with a Member of the House [and my special Friend] about the unreasonableness to fix my reparations upon the estate of the deceased Lord Coventry; nay, or to give me any reparations at all out of the estates of those persons that did me wrong, for fear the precedent in time might reach to themselves: "For, Sir, said the Speaker, [as the Member told me] if my son and heir should be liable in law, to make satisfaction to all those men [out of that estate I should leave him] that I have in the eye of the law wronged, [by signing warrants, orders and decrees by the command of my superiors] he would soon be a beggar, although I should leave him 5 or 6000*l. per annum*; and therefore desired the said Member's concurrence with him. And for the clamorous importunity [as they called it] of me and my friends, to give me reparations; but yet to do it in such a way, that the precedent might not in future make themselves smart for their Injustice to particular men." Of which, when the said Member told me, he said they were resolved to make the Commonwealth my Pay-master out of the publick Treasury, and colour over the justness of it with this pretence, "That Cottington's estate, &c. formerly assigned me, they had since disposed of for the Commonwealth's use, to the Lord Say; and therefore now it would be no Injustice to the Commonwealth [although in the Star-Chamber it never wronged me] to pay me my reparation." And so finding I was like to be baffled, I delivered the under-written to every individual Member of the honourable House of Commons.

The Humble Remembrance of Lieut. Colonel John Lilburn, Septemb. 4. 1648.

Honoured Sir,

Vouchsafe to take notice and seriously to consider, That the first week this present Parliament sat, which is now almost full eight years ago, I presented an humble petition to the House of Commons, for justice and right against the cruel Judges of the High-Commission Court, and the Star-Chamber; and I had the honour [the same day it was presented] to be one of the first prisoners in England that was set at liberty by this Parliament, and also received a speedy, full, fair, and candid proceeding, in the hearing and examining my tyrannical sufferings: but by reason of multiplicity of publick business, and other great obstructions, I have not as yet been able to attain to the full end of my legal and just expectation and right, viz. reparations for my long, sad and tormenting sufferings by the fore-said unjust and unrighteous Judges.

Be pleased also favourably to take notice, That upon the first of August last, there was an humble Petition presented to the honourable House of Commons, subscribed by many thousands of honest Citizens, &c. humbly to desire you to put me in full possession of all your by-past just votes about my fore-said sufferings: upon reading and debating of which petition, as in answer to that particular of it, your House were pleased to make this ensuing Order.

Lord Carre, Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Col. Boswel, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Copley, Mr. Holland.

"It is referred to this Committee, or any five of them, to consider how Colonel John Lilburn may have such satisfaction and allowance for his sufferings and losses, as was formerly intended him by this House."

Henry Elsyng, Cler. Dom. Com.

Unto which said Committee at their first sitting, I presented a Petition; the copy of which thus followeth.

To the Honourable the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider of Lieut. Col. Lilburn's business, in reference to the Star-Chamber;

The Humble Petition of Lieut. Col. John Lilburn

Sheweth,

THAT besides your Petitioner's sufferings by reason of his banishment into the Low-Countries, he was first committed by Dr. Lamb, Gwyn, Aylet, 1637. and afterwards had three years imprisonment in the common Goal of the Fleet, being whipp'd from Fleet bridge to Westminster, and enduring the cruel torment of above five hundred stripes with knotted cords. Afterwards being set in the Pillory for the space of two hours, and by James Ingram Deputy-Warden of the Fleet gagged, tearing his jaws almost in pieces, without order; which sentence was given by Lord-Keeper Coventry, Earl of Manchester, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Newburgh, Sir Henry Vane, sen. Lord Chief-Justice Brampton, and Judge Jones. And after the barbarous execution of this sentence, being April 18, 1638, the said Lord Coventry, Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop of London, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Arundel, Earl of Salisbury, Lord Cottington, Lord Newburgh, Secretary Cook, and Windebank, passed another sentence, in effect for the starving of your Petitioner, and for the tormenting of him with irons upon hands and legs

both night and day; and by keeping him close in the common Goal of the Fleet, from the speech of any of his friends: all which was executed with the greatest cruelty that could be, for the space of almost three years together, to the apparent hazard of his life, both by starving him [which was with all art and industry several ways attempted;] and also by several assaults made upon him by the said Warden's man [instigated thereunto by the said Deputy-Warden, to the maiming and wounding him, whereby to this day he is totally deprived of the use of two of his fingers:] all which, with much more, too tedious to be here inserted, was fully proved by sufficient witness, before a Committee of your House, whereof Mr. Francis Rouse had the chair; upon whose report made May 4, 1641, your House voted, "That the sentence in the Star-Chamber given against the said John Lilburn, and all the proceedings thereupon, was illegal, and against the liberty of the subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical; and that he ought to have good reparations therefore." Which Votes (by reason of multiplicity of business in your House) cost your Petitioner some years of importunate and chargeable attendance to get them transmitted to the Lords; which was obtained in February 1645, the 13th day of which month, your Petitioner's whole cause was effectually opened at the Lords Bar, by his learned Counsel Mr. John Bradshaw, and Mr. John Cook; and there every particular again proved upon Oath, by testimony of people of very good quality. Whereupon they concurred in all things with the House of Commons, saving in the matter of reparation; but upon the delivery of a true narrative, (which your Petitioner with his own hands in the same month delivered unto every individual Lord) they made a further decree, that your Petitioner should have 2000*l.* reparations out of the estates of the said Lord Cottingham, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, for the reasons alledged in an ordinance which they passed in April 1646, and transmitted to your House; where it hath lain dormant ever since, and is now referred to the consideration of this honourable Committee.

Now, forasmuch as by the judicial laws of God (which are the pure laws of right reason) he that wilfully hurteth his neighbour, is bound to the performance of these five things: First, "If it be a blemish or wound, like for like, or to redeem it with money, thereby to satisfy him for his wound. Secondly, For his pain and torment. Thirdly, For the healing. Fourthly, For his loss of time in his calling. Fifthly, For the shame and disgrace." All which are to be considered according to the quality of the person damaged: which reparations are to be paid out of the best of the goods of him that damaged him, and that without delay.

And as the law of God, so the laws of this Nation do abhor, and have severely punished (above all persons) Judges, many times with the loss of their lives and estates, who under colour of law have violated their Oaths, and destroyed the lives, liberties and properties of the people, whom by law they should have preserved: as may be instanced by the forty-four Judges and Justices hanged in one year by King Alfred; divers of them for less crimes than hath been done in the case of your Petitioner; as may be read in the Law-book, called The Mirrour of Justice, pag, 239, 240, 241, &c. translated and reprinted this very Parliament: and by Justice Thorpe in Edw. III's time, who was condemned to death for the violation of his Oath, for taking small sums of money in causes depending before him; as appears in the third part of Coke's Institutes, fol. 155, 156.

And by the Lord Chief Justice Tresilian, &c. who in full Parliament in Rich. II's time was attached as a Traitor in the forenoon, and had his throat cut at Tyburn in the afternoon, because he had given it under his hand, that the King might create unto himself at his pleasure, another rule to walk by, than the law of the land prescribes him; as appears by the Parliament-Records in the Tower, by many of your own Declarations, and also by the Chronicles of England.

Now forasmuch as your Petitioner's sufferings have been unparalleled, and his prejudice sustained thereby altogether unrepairable; having lost his limbs, &c. And forasmuch as by the law of God, Nature and Nations, reparations for hurts and damages received, ought to be satisfied as far as may be in all persons, though done by accident, and not intentionally, and though through ignorance: much more when the persons offending did it knowingly. and on purpose, in the face, nay, in spite of the fundamental laws of the land, which they were sworn to preserve: and for that the reparations in the said ordinance assigned do scarce amount to what your Petitioner spent in his three years sad captivity, and his now almost eight years chargeable attendance, in suing for it, besides the loss of a rich and profitable trade for eleven years together, and his wounds, torments, smart and disgrace, sustained by his said tyrannical sentences:

He therefore humbly prayeth the favour and justice of this honourable Committee for some considerable augmentation of his said reparations; and the rather because his fellow-sufferer Dr. Bastwick had 4000*l.* reparations allotted him, whose sufferings (he submissively conceiveth) was nothing nigh so great, in torment, pain and shame, as your Petitioner's. And forasmuch as the now Lord Coventry, son and heir to the foresaid Lord Coventry, hath walked in his Father's steps, in enmity to the laws, liberties, and freedom of the Nation: by being in arms at the beginning of the Wars against the Parliament, and made his peace with the Earl of Essex for a small matter, and hath since deserted the Kingdom, living in France privately, receiving the profits of a vast estate which his Father left him: And forasmuch as his said Father (the late Lord Coventry) was the activest man in infringing the laws and liberties of the Nation; although a Lawyer and Judge, sitting on the supreme seat of Justice; and a person (as is groundedly conceived) who got a great estate by corruption, and particularly a man that principally passed, as chief Judge of the Court, both the aforesaid sentences against your Petitioner: and in regard the estates of the said Lord Cottingham, and Sir Francis Windebank, by subsequent orders of both Houses upon urgent occasions, are much intangled and altered from the condition they were in, in 1646, when the Lords ordered your petitioner 2000 Marks out of them; and for that the estate of James Ingram cannot be found, nor at present come by: Your Petitioner therefore most humbly prayeth, that the greatest part, if not all your Petitioner's reparations may be fixed upon the said now Lord Coventry's estate, to be immediately paid your Petitioner; or else that his rents, and the profit of his woods and goods, may be be seized in the respective Counties where they lie, for the satisfying thereof; that your Petitioner may no longer run the hazard of ruin to him and his, by tedious delays, having already contracted the debts of many hundred pounds, occasioned by the chargeable prosecution hereof. And that if you shall think fit to conjoin any other with him, that it may be principally the Judges of the Law; who ought to have been pilots and guides unto the rest of the Judges of that Court, who were Lords, and persons not knowing the Law.

And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

JOHN LILBURN.

After the reading of which, they entred into a serious debate of the whole business, and thereupon passed several Votes to be heads of an Ordinance, to be drawn up and reported to the House, by the Right Honourable the Lord Carr Chairman to the said Committee; who accordingly reported the Proceedings and Votes of the said Committee to your House, who approved of the said Votes, and ordered an ordinance to be presented to the House consonant thereunto, which was accordingly done by the Lord Carr; which ordinance hath been once read in your House: The Copy of which thus follows:

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, for the raising of three thousand pounds, out of the real Estate of the late Thomas Lord Coventry, late Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, for and towards the reparation and damages of John Lilburn, Gent. which he sustained by virtue and colour of two Sentences given and made against him, in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13th of Febr. 1637. the other the 18th of April, 1638.

WHereas the cause of John Lilburn Gent. concerning two sentences pronounced against him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, 13th of February, 13 Car. Regis, and 18th of April, 14 Car. Regis, were voted the 4th of May 1641, by the House of Commons to be illegal, and against the liberty of the subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical, which were transmitted from the said House of Commons unto the House of Lords; who thereupon, by an order or decree, by them made 13th of February 1645, adjudged and declared the said proceedings of the said Star-Chamber, against the said John Lilburn, to be illegal and most unjust, and against the liberty of the subject, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. And by another order or decree, made by them the said Lords the 5th of March 1645, they assigned to be paid unto the said John Lilburn, the sum of two thousand pounds for his reparations; and the said House of Peers then fixed that sum upon the estates real and personal of Francis Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet: and afterwards for the present levying thereof, with allowance of Interest, in case of obstructions, while the same should be in levying, and of such parts as should not be forthwith levied; the said House of Peers did cause an ordinance to be drawn up, and passed the same in their House, the 27th of April 1646, and afterwards transmitted the same to the House of Commons for their concurrence; with whom it yet dependeth. And forasmuch as since that transmission, all, or the greatest, of the estates of the said Lord Cottington, and Sir Francis Windebank, is since by both Houses disposed of to other uses; and the estate of the said James Ingram is so small and weak, and so entangled with former incumbrances, that it can afford little or no part unto the said John Lilburn, of the said reparations: And for that the said late Lord Coventry, was the principal Judge, and chief Actor, in giving of both the said illegal sentences in the said Court of Star-Chamber; and for the barbarous inflicting of punishments thereupon:

Therefore, and for satisfaction of the said 2000 l. and for the increase of reparation unto the said John Lilburn for his extraordinary wrongs, sufferings and losses thereby sustained, and the long time hitherto elapsed without any satisfaction; the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament do ordain, and be it hereby ordained by the said Lords and Commons and by authority of the same; That the said John Lilburn shall receive the sum of 3000 l. out of all, or any the Manors, Messuages, Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, whereof he, the said late Thomas Lord Coventry, or any other person or persons to or for his use, or in trust for him, was or were seized in fee-simple, or fee-tail, or otherwise, at the time of the said sentences or decrees, or of either of them, in the said late Court of Star-Chamber, or since within the Kingdom of England, or Dominion of Wales, any order or ordinance heretofore made by either or both Houses of Parliament, for the employment of the estate of the said late Thomas Lord Coventry to the contrary hereof, in any wise notwithstanding. And for the more speedy levying of the said sum of three thousand pounds, it is further ordered and ordained, that the several and respective Sheriffs, of the several and respective Counties, within England and Wales, wherein any of the said Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments do lie, shall forthwith upon sight, and by virtue of this ordinance, cause an inquisition to be made, and taken by the Oaths of twelve or more lawful men, where the same lands do lie, and what the same are and do contain, and of the clear yearly value thereof, over and above all charges and reprises: and after such inquisition so made and taken, the several and respective Sheriffs shall deliver unto the said John Lilburn true copies in Parchment of the same inquisitions by them taken, and shall then also deliver unto the said John Lilburn the said Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, which shall be so comprised or mentioned in the said inquisitions, to have and to hold, to him the said John Lilburn, and his assigns, without impeachment of waste; and until he shall have received out of the issues and profits thereof (to be estimated according to the yearly values contained in the said inquisitions) the said sum of three thousand pounds; together with all reasonable charges and expences to be sustained from henceforth for obtaining the said sum of three thousand pounds. And all and every the said several and respective Sheriffs, and all other person and persons what-

* But the Lord Roberts, the Lord Wharton, &c. told me several times, if their estates had not been under sequestration by Ordinance of Parliament, they would never have gone about to fix my reparations by Ordinance, (which they must needs then do, to take off the Sequestration) but have issued out a decree and extent under the Great Seal, immediately to have put me in present possession of my 2000 l. which they said was their right by Law to do.

whatsoever, that shall any ways act or assist in obedience to this ordinance, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, shall be therefore defended and kept harmless, by the authority of both Houses of Parliament.

Be pleased to take further notice, that after the foresaid ordinance was once read, it came to a debate in your House for to be read the second time, which was carried in the negative by a majority of voices; and I cannot but apprehend that there were divers in the House unsatisfied in the ordinance itself, in regard the House was divided upon the Debate and Vote, which I cannot but apprehend must flow from one of these two considerations.

First, Either because that the whole reparations is fixed upon the Lord Coventry's estate singly, who had many co-partners in the sentences, and who also it may be supposed hath expiated his crime by his death. Or else, secondly, because in some mens thoughts, some of my late actions are, or have been so evil in themselves, that they may seem to them to over-balance the merits of all my ancient sufferings.

However, on my presenting my reasons to the House for reading it, my Ordinance was called for to be read the second time, which Elfyng the Clerk pretended he had laid ready upon the table before him; but what betwixt his knavery, old Henry Vane's, the Speaker's, and young Montague's, my Ordinance was stol'n, and could never after be found: so that I was sent to out of the House to get another fair copy writ over presently, which being long in doing, my friends went away, not expecting it would any more be meddled with that day, so that when most of them were gone, my adversaries took the advantage to call for it, and in a thin House read it the second time, and upon debate threw it out of doors; and at present to stop my mouth, voted me 300*l.* ready-money (as they pretended) out of Sir Charles Kemisses's composition, to enable me for present subsistence, and to follow my business, and also made this further order.

Die Martis, Septemb. 5, 1648.

Ordere*d* by the Commons assembled in Parliament, that the sum of three thousand pounds be allowed and paid unto Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn, for reparation of his damages sustained by colour of the sentences given against him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, where Lord Carr had the Chair, with the addition of Sir John Danvers, and Colonel Rigby, to consider of, and present to this House an Ordinance for settling of lands to him and his heirs, to the value of 3000*l.* at twelve years purchase, out of the estates of new Delinquents in the Insurrections, not yet sequestred.

Of which when I fully understood, I was troubled, but knew not how to help myself; and having already met with so many difficulties, and received so many baffles, as I had done, I thought it was better (being almost wearied out with struggling) to take half a loaf, than to go away without any bread at all. So after many Petitions and Letters to the Sequestrators, &c. the Committee caused an Ordinance to be drawn up.

But when my Ordinance came to the Lords, they disabled me to cut down any more timber-trees, than what were already fell'd, which I judged fitter for me to content myself with, than to struggle any longer to get it pass, as the House of Commons had sent it up. So the Lords in two or three days dispatched it, and sent it down to the House of Commons for their concurrence, according to those abridgements they had made in it; and taking my opportunity to speak to those in the House of Commons I had interest in, I intreated them to dispute it no more, but pass it as the Lords had gelded it; and accordingly they did, the copy of which thus followeth:

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, for raising of three thousand pounds, out of the sequestred estates and compositions of Sir Henry Gibb, Knight; and Sir Henry Bellingham, Knight and Baronet; and Thomas Bowes, Esquire; lying and being within the County of Durham; to be paid unto Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, by the Committee of Sequestrations of the said County, for and towards the reparation and damages of the said John Lilburn, which he sustained by virtue and colour of two unjust Sentences, or Decrees; given and made against him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13th of February, 1637; the other the 18th of April, 1638.

WHereas the cause of Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, concerning two sentences pronounced against him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the 13th of February, decimo tertio Caroli Regis, and the 18th of April, decimo quarto Caroli Regis, (which were voted the 4th of May, 1641, by the House of Commons to be illegal, and against the liberty of the subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous and tyrannical) were transmitted from the said House of Commons unto the House of Lords; in which the House of Peers concurred in judgment; and the 13th of February 1645, declared the said proceedings of the said Star-Chamber, against the said John Lilburn, to be illegal, most unjust, and against the liberty of the subject, and law of the land, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. The said Lords and Commons taking into their serious consideration, the extraordinary sufferings and barbarous tyranny, that by colour of the said unjust decrees, were inflicted upon the said Lieut. Col. John Lilburn; and the long time hitherto elapsed without any satisfaction, do conceive it most just, equitable and reasonable, to repair him in some considerable manner: and therefore in pursuance of two orders of the House of Commons, one of the 22d of August 1648, and the other of the 5th of September 1648, have ordained; and be it hereby ordained by the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, and by the authority of the same; That the said John Lilburn shall have, and receive the sum of 3000*l.* to be paid unto him of his assigns, by the Committee of Sequestrations for the County of Durham; out of the first profits of the sequestred estates, both lands and goods of Sir Henry Gibb, Knight; Sir Henry Bellingham, Knight and Baronet; and Thomas Bowes Esquire; lying and being in the County of Durham, having all been active in the late Northern Insurrections, and aiding and assisting to the most wicked invasion of Duke Hamilton. And the said Committee are hereby authorised to sell all such woods (except timber-trees now standing) as may conveniently be spared, and now standing upon the said lands (or already felled) or any of them.

And

And if the said Sir Henry Gibb, Sir Henry Bellingham, and Thomas Bowes, or any of them shall compound for their estate, so much of the said three thousand pounds as then shall remain unsatisfied, shall be paid unto the said John Lilburn, or his assignees, out of their, or the first of their compositions. And this Ordinance or Copy thereof attested under the hand or hands of the Clerk, or Clerks, of one or both Houses of Parliament, shall be a sufficient Warrant to the said Committee of Sequestrations in the said County of Durham, to pay the said 3000*l.* as is before expressed, unto the said John Lilburn or his assigns; and likewise to indemnify and save harmless, all, and every person or persons, that shall any way act in the performance of the true intent and meaning of this Ordinance.

XXI. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir John Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, for High-Treason, 1640: 16 Car. I*.

HE House of Commons having secur'd that great Statesman the Earl of Strafford, and that zealous Churchman Archbishop Laud; began to prepare an Impeachment against the great Officer of the Law, the Lord-Keeper Finch, of High-Treason.

December 14th, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Charge against him; of which he having notice, sent to the House of Commons a Letter, desiring to be admitted, to speak for himself, before any Vote past against him. Upon this Letter there arose a great debate in the House, and after some time spent therein, it was granted him; and Monday December the 21st, was appointed for the hearing of him.

On Monday he was admitted in this manner; there was a Chair set for him to make use of if he pleased, and a Stool to lay the Purse upon, a little on the side of the Bar on the left hand as you come in; he himself brought in the Purse, and laid it in the Chair, but would not sit down himself, nor put on his Hat, though he was mov'd to it by Mr. Speaker, but spake all the while bare-headed and standing; the Serjeant at Arms attending on the House, standing by him with the Mace on his shoulder: And spake as follows.

Mr. Speaker,

I Do first present my most humble thanks to this Honourable Assembly, for this favour vouchsafed me, in granting me admittance to their presence, and do humbly beseech them to believe it is no desire to preserve myself or my fortune, but to deserve the good opinions of those that have drawn me hither.

I do profess in the presence of him that knoweth all hearts, that I had rather go from door to door, and crave Da obolum Belizario, &c. with the good opinion of this Assembly, than live and enjoy all the honours and fortunes I am capable of.

I do not come hither with an intention to justify my words, my actions, or my opinions; but to make a plain and clear narration for myself, and then humbly to submit to the wisdom and justice of this House myself, and all that concerns me.

I do well understand (Mr. Speaker) with what disadvantage any man can speak in his own cause; and if I could have told how to have transmitted my thoughts and actions, by a clearer representation of another (I do so much defy my own judgment in working, and my ways in expressing) that I should have been a most humble suitor, another might have done it. But this House will not take words, but with clear and ingenuous dealing; and therefore I shall beseech them to think, I come not hither with a set or studied speech, I come to speak my heart, and to speak it clearly and plainly, and then leave it to your clemency and justice: and I hope if any thing shall slip from me, to work contrary to my meaning, or intention, disorderly or ill-placed, you will be pleased to make a favourable construction, and leave me the liberty of explanation, if there shall be any; but I hope there shall be no cause for it.

I hope, for my affection in Religion no man doubteth me; what my education, what, and under whom for many years, is well known; I lived near thirty years in the Society of Gray's-Inn: and if one that was a reverend Preacher in my time (Dr. Sibbs) were now alive, he were able to give testimony to this House, that when a party ill-affected in Religion sought to weary him, and tire him out, he had his chiefest encouragement from me.

I have

* This Proceeding explains the manner of obtaining the Judges opinions in Mr. Hampden's Case about Ship-Money, Vol. I. pag. 483: as also the Lord-Keeper's Reasons for what he did as Speaker in the Parliament 1629. for which see, anti Page. 217. Else this had not been inserted, his Lordship not putting in any Answer to the Articles exhibited against him.

I have now (Mr. Speaker) been fifteen years of the King's Council; from the first hour to this minute, no man is able to say that ever I was author, adviser, or consentor to any project.

It pleased the King (my gracious Master) after I had served him divers years, to prefer me to two places; to be Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, and then Keeper of his Great-Seal: I say it in the presence of God, I was so far from the thought of the one, and from the ambition of the other, that if my Master's grace and goodness had not been, I had never enjoyed those honours.

I cannot tell (Mr. Speaker) nor I do not know what particulars there are, that may draw me into your disfavour or ill opinion, and therefore I shall come very weakly arm'd; yet to those that either in my own knowledge, or by such a knowledge as is given me, and not from any in this House, I shall speak somewhat, that I hope being truth, and accompanied with clearness and ingenuity, will at last procure some allay of that ill opinion which may perhaps be conceived of me.

Mr. Speaker, I had once the honour to sit in the place that you do: from the first time I came thither, to this unfortunate time, I do appeal to all that were here then, if I served you not with candor. Ill office I never did to any of the House, good offices I have witnessed enough I did many; I was so happy, that upon an occasion which once happened, I received an expression and testimony of the good affection of this House towards me.

For the last unhappy day, I had great share in the unhappiness and sorrow of it. I hope there are enough do remember, no man within the walls of this House did express more symptoms of sorrow, grief, and distraction than I did.

After an adjournment for two or three days, it pleased his Majesty to send for me, to let me know that he could not so resolve of things as he desired, and therefore was desirous that there might be an adjournment for some few days more. I protest I did not then discern in his Majesty, and I believe it was not in his thoughts, to think of the dissolving of this Assembly; but was pleased in the first place, to give me a command to deliver his pleasure to the House for an adjournment for some few days, till the Monday following, as I remember, and commanded me withal to deliver his pleasure, that there should be no further speeches, but forthwith upon the delivery of the message come and wait upon him: he likewise commanded me, if questions were offered to be put, upon my Allegiance I should not dare to do it. How much I did then in all humbleness reason with his Majesty, is not for me here to speak; only thus much let me say, I was no Author of any counsel in it. I was only a person in receiving Commission; I speak not this, as any thing I now produce or do invent, or take up for my own excuse, but that which is known to divers, and some honourable persons in this House, to be most true. All that I will say for that, is humbly to beseech you all to consider, that if it had been any man's case, as it was mine, between the displeasure of a gracious King, and the ill opinion of an honourable Assembly; I beseech you lay all together, lay my first actions and behaviour with the last, I shall submit to your honourable and favourable constructions.

For the Shipping business, my opinion of that cause hath lain heavy upon me; I shall clearly and truly present unto you what every thing is, with this protestation, that if in reckoning up my own opinion what I was of, or what I delivered, any thing of it be displeasing, or contrary to the opinion of this House, that I am far from justifying of it, but submit that and all other my actions to your wisdom and goodness.

Mr. Speaker, the first Writs that were sent out about the Shipping-business, I had no more knowledge of, and was as ignorant as any one Member of this House, or any man in the Kingdom. I was never the Author nor Adviser of it, and will boldly say, from the first to this hour, I did never advise nor counsel the setting forth of any Ship-Writs in my life.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was made Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas some four days before the Ship-Writs went out to the Ports and Maritime Places; as I do remember, the 20th of October 1634, they do bear teste, and I was sworn Justice the 16th of October: so as they went out in that time, but without my knowledge or privity, the God of Heaven knows this to be true.

Mr. Speaker, afterwards his Majesty was pleased to command my Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, that then was, Sir Thomas Richardson, and Chief-Baron of the Exchequer that now is, and myself then Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, to take into consideration the Precedents then brought unto us; which we did, and after returned to his Majesty, what we had found out of those precedents.

It is true, that afterwards his Majesty did take into consideration, that if the whole Kingdom were concerned, that it was not reason to lay the whole burthen upon the Cinque Ports and Maritime Towns.

Thereupon, upon what ground his Majesty took that into his consideration, I do confess I do know nothing of it.

His Majesty did command my Lord Chief-Justice that now is, my Lord Chief-Baron, and myself, to return our opinions; Whether, when the whole Kingdom is in danger, and the Kingdom in general is concerned, it be not according to Law and Reason, that the whole Kingdom, and his Majesty, and all interested therein, should join in defending and preserving thereof?

This was, in time, about 1634.

In Michaelmas-Term following, his Majesty commanded me to go to all the Judges, and require their opinions in particular.

He commanded me to do it to every one, and to charge them upon their duty and allegiance, to keep it secret.

Mr. Speaker, it was never intended by his Majesty (so professed by him) at that time, and so declared to all the Judges, that it was not required by him, to be such a binding opinion to the Subject, as to hinder him from calling it in question, nor be binding to themselves, but that upon better reason and advice they may alter it; but desired their opinions, for his own private reason.

I know very well, that extrajudicial opinions of Judges ought not to be binding.

But I did think, and speak my Heart and Conscience freely; myself, and the rest of the Judges being sworn, and by our Oaths tied to counsel the King, when he should require advice of us, that we were bound by our Oaths and Duties to return our opinions.

I did obey his Majesty's command, and do here before the God of Heaven avow it.

I did never use the least promise of preferment or reward to any, nor did use the least menace; I did leave it freely to their own Consciences and Liberty; for I was left to the liberty of my own by his Majesty, and had reason to leave them the liberty of their own Consciences.

And I beseech you be pleased to have some belief, that I would not say this, but that I know the God of Heaven will make it appear; and I beseech you that extravagant speeches may not move against that which is a positive and clear truth.

Mr. Speaker, in the discourse of this (as is between Judges) some small discourses sometimes arose, yet never was any cause wherein any Judges conferred, that were so little conference as between me and them.

Mr. Speaker, against a Negative, I can say nothing; but I shall affirm nothing unto you, but by the grace of God, as I affirm it to be true, so I make no doubt of making it appear to be so.

This opinion was subscribed without solicitation, there was not any man of us, did make any doubt of subscribing our opinion, but two, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Croke.

Mr. Justice Croke made not a scruple of the thing, but of the introduction; for it was thus:

That whereas the Ports and the Maritime Towns were concerned, there according to the precedents in former times, the charge lay on them.

So when the Kingdom was in danger, of which his Majesty was the sole Judge; whether it was not agreeable to Law and Reason, the whole Kingdom to bear the charge?

I left this case with Judge Croke.

The next Term I spake with him, he could give me no resolution, because he had not seen the Writs in former times; but did give his opinion, that when the whole Kingdom was in danger, the charge of the defence ought to be borne by all.

So of that opinion of his, there was no need of a solicitation.

I speak no more here, than I did openly in my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber.

This is the naked truth: for Mr. Justice Hutton, he did never subscribe at all.

I will only say this, that I was so far from pressing him to give his opinion, because he did ask time to consider of it, that I will boldly say, and make it good, that when his Majesty would have had him sometimes sent for, to give his opinion, I beseeched his Majesty to leave him to himself and his conscience; and that was the ill office I did.

The Judges did subscribe in November or December, 1635.

I had no conference, nor (truly I think) by accident any discourse with any of the Judges touching their opinions: for till February 1636, there was no speech of it, for when they had delivered their opinions, I did return according to my duty to my Master the King, and delivered them to him: in whose custody they be.

In February 1636, upon a command that came from his Majesty, by one of the then Secretaries of State, the Judges all assembled in Gray's-Inn; we did then fall into a debate of the case then sent unto us, and we did then return our opinion unto his Majesty; there was then much discourse and great debate about it.

Mine opinion and conscience at that time was agreeable to that opinion I then delivered.

I did use the best arguments I could, for the maintenance of my opinion; and that was all I did.

It is true, that then at that time, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Croke, did not differ in the main point, which was this:

When the Kingdom was in danger, the charge ought to be borne by the whole Kingdom.

But in this point, whether the King was the sole Judge of the danger, they differed.

So as there was between the first subscription, and this debate, and consultation, some fifteen months difference.

It is true, that all of them did then subscribe, both Justice Hutton, and Justice Croke, which was returned to his Majesty, and after published by my Lord-Keeper (my predecessor) in the Star-Chamber.

For the manner of publishing it, I will say nothing, but leave it to those, whose memories will call to mind what was then done.

The Reason of the subscription of Justice Hutton, and Justice Croke, (though they differed in opinion) grew from this, that was told them, from the rest of the Judges;

That where the greater number did agree in their vote, the rest were involved and included.

And now I have faithfully delivered, what I did in that business, till I came (which was afterwards) to my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber: for the question was, A scire facias issued out of the Exchequer in that case of Mr. Hampden's; of which I can say nothing, for it was there begun, and afterwards re-journed, to have advice of all the Judges.

Mr. Speaker, among the rest (according to my duty) I argued the case.

I shall not trouble you, to tell you what my argument was, I presume there are copies enough of it; only I will tell you there are four things, very briefly, that I then declared.

First, concerning the matter of danger, and necessity of the whole Kingdom.

I profess that there was never a Judge in the Kingdom did deliver an opinion, but that it must be in a case of apparent danger.

When we came to an argument of the case, it was not upon a matter of issue, but it was upon a demurrer;

Whether the danger was sufficiently admitted in pleading, and therefore was not the thing that was in dispute, that was the first degree and step that led unto it.

I did deliver myself as free and as clear as any man did, that the King ought to govern by the positive Laws of the Kingdom, that he could not alter nor change, nor innovate in matters of Law, but by common consent in Parliament.

I did further deliver, that if this were used to make a further revenue or benefit to the King, or in any other way but in case of necessity, and for the preservation of the Kingdom, the judgment did warrant no such thing:

My opinion in this business, I did in my conclusion of my argument submit to the judgment of this House.

I never deliver'd my opinion, that money ought to be raised, but Ships provided for the defence of this Kingdom, and in that the writ was performed.

And that the charge ought not to be in any case, but where the whole Kingdom was in danger.

And

And Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Croke, were of the same opinion with me.

I do humbly submit, having related unto you my whole carriage in this business; humbly submitting myself to your grave and favourable censures, beseeching you not to think that I delivered these things, with the least intention to subvert or subvert the Common Law of the Kingdom, or to bring in or to introduce any new way of Government; it hath been far from my thoughts, as any thing under the Heavens.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard too that there hath been some ill opinion conceived of me about Forest business, which was a thing far out of the way of my study, as any thing I know toward the Law.

But it pleased his Majesty, in the sickness of Mr. Noy, to give some short warning to prepare myself for that employment.

When I came there, I did both the King and Commonwealth acceptable service; for I did and dare be bold to say, with extremest danger to myself and fortune, (some do understand my meaning herein) run through that business, and left the Forest as much as was there.

A thing in my judgment, considerable for the advantage of the Commonwealth, as could be undertaken.

When I went down about that employment, I satisfied myself about the matter of perambulation.

There were great difficulties of opinions, what perambulation was.

I did arm myself as well as I could, before I did any thing in it.

I did acquaint those that were then Judges, in the presence of the noble Lords, with such objections as I thought it my duty to offer unto them.

If they thought they were not objections of such weight, as were fit to stir them, I would not do the King that disservice.

They thought the objections had such answers as might well induce the like upon a conference with the whole Country; admitting me to come and confer with them, the Country did unanimously subscribe.

It fell out afterwards, that the King commanded me, and all this before I was Chief-Justice, to go into Essex, and did then tell me he had been informed, that the bounds of the Forest were narrower, than in truth they ought to be; and I did accordingly to his command.

I will here profess that which is known to many, I had no thought or intention of enlarging the bounds of the Forest, further than H. and that part about it, for which there was a perambulation about 26 Edw. IV.

I desired the Country to confer with me about it, if they were pleased to do it; and then according to my duty, I did produce those Records which I thought fit for his Majesty's service, leaving them to discharge themselves as by Law and Justice they might do.

I did never, in the least kind, go about to overthrow the Charter of the Forest.

And did publish and maintain Charta de Foresta, as a sacred thing, and no man to violate it, and ought to be preserved for the King and Commonwealth.

I do in this humbly submit, and what I have done, to the Goodness and Justice of this House.

[Mr. Rusworth says, many were exceedingly taken with his Eloquence and Carriage, and it was a sad sight to see a Person of his greatness, parts and favour, to appear in such a posture, before such an Assembly, to plead for his Life and Fortunes.]

After his Lordship was retir'd, it was moved that this admission of the Lord-Keeper, might not be drawn into precedent; and in answer to what his Lordship said, Mr. Rigby made this following speech.

Mr. Speaker,

Though my judgment prompts me to sit still and be silent, yet the duty I owe to my King, my Country and my Conscience, move me to stand up and speak.

Mr. Speaker, had not this Syren so sweet a tongue, surely he could never have effected so much mischief to this Kingdom: you know, Sir, optimorum putrefactio pessima, the best things putrefied become the worst: and as it is in the natural, so in the body politic; and what's to be done then, Mr. Speaker, we all know ense recidendum est, the sword, Justice must strike, ne pars sincera trabatur.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the voice, non vox sed votum, not the tongue, but the heart and actions that are to be suspected: for doth not our Saviour say it, Shew me thy faith by thy works, O man? (St. James, not our Saviour, faith it.) Now, Mr. Speaker, hath not this Kingdom seen, (seen, say I?) nay felt and smarted under the cruelty of this man's Justice? So malicious as to record it in every Court of Westminster; as if he had not been contented with inflaming of us all, unless he entailed it to all posterity. Why shall I believe words now, cum factum videam? Shall we be so weak men, as when we have been injured and abused, will be gained again with fair words and compliments? Or, like little Children, when we have been whipt and beaten, be pleased again with sweetmeats? Oh no, there be some birds in the summer of Parliament will sing sweetly, who in the winter of persecution, will for their prey ravenously fly at all, upon our goods, nay seize upon our persons; and hath it not been with this man so, with some in this Assembly?

Mr. Speaker, it hath been objected unto us, that in judgment you should think of mercy, and be ye merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful; now God Almighty grant that we may be so, and that our hearts and judgments may be truly rectified to know truly what is mercy, I say to know what is mercy; for there is the point, Mr. Speaker: I have heard of foolish pity, foolish pity; do we not all know the effects of it? And I have met with this epithet to mercy, crudelis misericordia; and in some kind I think there may be a cruel mercy: I am sure that the Spirit of God said, be not pitiful in judgment, nay it saith, be not pitiful of the poor in judgment; if not of the poor, then a latiori, not of the rich; there's the emphasis. We see by the set and solemn appointment of our Courts of Justice, what provision the wisdom of our ancestors hath made for the preservation, honour, and esteem of Justice, witness our frequent Terms, Sessions, and Assizes, and in what pomp and state the Judges, in their Circuits, by the Sheriffs, Knights and Justices, and all the Country, are attended oft-times for the hanging of a poor Thief for the stealing of a Hog or a Sheep, nay in some cases for the stealing of a penny, and Justice too, in terrorem: and now shall not some of them be hanged that have robb'd us of all our propriety, and sheered at once all our Sheep and and all we have away, and would have made us indeed poor Belizario's to have begged for half-pennies, when they would not have left us one penny that we could have called our own?

Let us therefore now, Mr. Speaker, not be so pitiful as that we become remiss; not so pitiful in judgment, as to have no judgment; but set the deplorable estate of Great-Britain now before our eyes, and consider how our most gracious Sovereign hath been abused, and both his Majesty and all his Subjects injured by these wicked instruments; for which my humble motion is, that with these particulars we become not so merciful, as to the generality (the whole Kingdom) to grow merciless.

Fiat Justitia.

Whereupon he was the same day voted a Traitor, upon the following particulars.

1. For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord-Treasurer Weston, 4 Car. when the Parliament desired it.

2. For soliciting, persuading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their opinion, for the levying of Ship-money*.

3. For several illegal actions in Forest-matters.

4. For ill offices done, in making the King dissolve the last Parliament, and causing his declaration thereupon to be put forth.

Whereupon it was resolved upon the question;

That John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, shall be accus'd in this House, in the name of all the Commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Misdemeanors.

Resolved,

That a message be sent by the Lord Falkland, to accuse John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, in the name of this House, and all the Commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanors; and to desire that he may be forthwith sequestered from Parliament, and be committed; and that in some convenient time, this House will resort to their Lordships, with particular Accusations and Articles against him.

The next morning the 22d, the Lord-Keeper, (considering with what impetuosity and violence every thing was managed) got up early, and escaped in disguise into Holland, from whence he wrote a Letter to the Lord-Chamberlain, dated from the Hague, January 3, 1640.

My most well beloved Lord,

THE Interest your Lordship hath ever had in the best of my fortunes, and affections, gives me the privilege of troubling your Lordship with these few lines, from one that hath nothing left to serve you withal but his prayers; these your Lordship shall never fail of, with an heart as full of true affection to your Lordship as ever any was. My Lord, it was not the loss of my place, and with that of my fortunes, nor being exiled from my dear Country and Friends, though many of them were cause of sorrow, that afflicts me; but that which I most suffer under, is that displeasure of the House of Commons conceived against me. I know a true heart I have ever born towards them, and your Lordship can witness in part, what ways I have gone in: but silence and patience best becomes me, with which I must leave myself and my actions to the favourable constructions of my noble Friends, in which number your Lordship hath a prime place. I am now at the Hague, where I arrived on Thursday the last of the last month, where I purpose to live in a fashion agreeable to the poorness of my fortunes; for my humbling in this World, I have utterly cast off the thoughts of it, and my aim shall be to learn to number my days, that I may apply my heart to wisdom, that wisdom that shall wipe away all tears from my eyes and heart, and lead me by the hand to true happiness, which can never be taken from me. I pray God of Heaven to bless this Parliament both with a happy progress and conclusion; if my ruin may conduce but the least to it, I shall not repine at it. I truly pray for your Lordship and your noble family, that God would give an increase of all wordly blessings, and in the fullness of days to receive you to his Glory; if I were capable of serving any body, I would tell your Lordship, that no man should be readier to make known his devotion and true gratitude to your Lordship, than and most affectionate, poor Kinsman and Servant,

J. FINCH.

Jan. 14. The Committee having prepared Articles of Impeachment against the Lord-Keeper, they were presented to the House, and are as follow.

The Accusation and Impeachment of † John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, by the House of Commons.

Imprimis. THAT the said John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper, &c. hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and established Government of the Realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary tyrannical Government against Law; which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, counsels, opinions, judgments, practices and actions.

II.

* Lord Clarendon in his History, Vol. I. pag. 71. (8vo Edition) says, Undoubtedly my Lord Finch's Speech in the Exchequer-Chamber, made Ship-money much more abhor'd, and formidable, than all the Commitments by the Council-Table, and all the Distresses taken by the Sheriffs in England. And pag. 74. says, he took up Ship-money, where Mr. Noy left it, and being a Judge, carried it up to that Pinnacle, from whence he almost broke his own Neck, having in his Journey thither, had too much influence on his Brethren, to induce them to concur in a Judgment they had all cause to repent. To which his Declaration, after he was Keeper of the Great Seal of England, must be added, upon Demurrer put in to a Bill before him, which had no other equity in it, than an order of the Lords of the Council; "That whilst he was Keeper, no man should be so saucy as to dispute those Orders, but that the wisdom of that Board should be always ground enough for him to make a Decree in Chancery."

† Sir John Finch was a man exceedingly obnoxious to the People, upon the business of Ship-money; and not of reputation and Authority enough to countenance and advance the King's Service. Lord Clarendon's History, Vol. I. pag. 131. in 8vo.

II. That in pursuance of those his traitorous and wicked purposes, he did in the third and fourth year of his Majesty's reign, or one of them, being then Speaker of the Commons House of Parliament, contrary to the commands of the House then assembled and sitting, deny and hinder the reading of some things which the said House of Commons required to be read, for the safety of the King and Kingdom, and preservation of the Religion of this Realm; and did forbid all the Members of the House to speak, and said, that if any did offer to speak, he would rise and go away, and said nothing should be done in the House, and did offer to rise and go away, and did thereby and otherwise, as much as in him lay, endeavour to subvert the ancient and undoubted rights and course of Parliament.

III. That he being of his Majesty's Council at the Justice-seat held for the County of Essex, in the month of October, in the 10th year of his now Majesty's reign, at Stratford-Langton in the same County, being then of his Majesty's Council, in that service did practice by unlawful means to enlarge the Forest of that County, many Miles beyond the known bounds thereof, as they had been enjoyed near 300 years, contrary to the Law, and to the Charter of the liberties of the Forest; and other Charters, and divers Acts of Parliament: and for effecting the same, did unlawfully cause and procure undue return to be made of Jurors, and great numbers of other persons who were unworn, to be joined to them of the Jury, and threatened and awed the said Jurors to give a verdict for the King, and by unlawful means did surprize the County, that they might not make defence, and did use several menacing wicked speeches and actions, to the Jury and others, for obtaining his unjust purpose aforesaid. And after verdict obtained for the King in the month of April following (at which time the said Justice-seat was called by adjournment) the said John Finch, then Lord Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of Common-Pleas, and one of the Judges assistants for them; he continued by farther unlawful and unjust practices, to maintain and confirm the said verdict, and did then and there, being assistant to the Justice in Eyre, advise the refusal of the traverse offered by the County, and all their evidences, but only what they should verbally deliver; which was refused accordingly.

IV. That he about the month of November, 1635, being then Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, and having taken an Oath for due administration of Justice to his Majesty's liege people, according to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, contrived an opinion in hac verba, (when the good and safety, &c. Vide State-Trials, Vol. I.) and did subscribe his name to that opinion, and by persuasions, threats, and false suggestions, did sollicit, and procure Sir John Bramstone, Knight, then and now Lord Chief-Justice of England; Sir Humphrey Davenport, Knight, Lord Chief-Baron of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer; Sir Richard Hutton, Knight, late one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of Common-Pleas; Sir John Denbam, Knight, late one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer; Sir William Jones, Knight, late one of the Justices of the said Court of King's-Bench; Sir George Croke, Knight, then and now one of the Judges of the said Court of King's-Bench; Sir Thomas Trevor, Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the Exchequer; Sir George Vernon, Knight, late one of the Justices of the said Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Robert Berkley, Knight, then and now one of the Justices of the said Court of King's-Bench; Sir Francis Crawley, Knight, then and now one of the Justices of the said Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Richard Weston, Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the said Court of Exchequer; some or one of them to subscribe, with their names, the said opinion presently, and enjoined them severally some or one of them secrecy, upon their Allegiance.

V. That he the fifth day of June, then being Lord Chief-Justice of the said Court of Common-Pleas, subscribed an extrajudicial opinion in answer to questions in a Letter from his Majesty, in hac verba, &c. Vol. I. page 487.

And that he contrived the said questions: and procured the said Letter from his Majesty: and whereas the said Justice Hutton, and Justice Croke, declared to him their opinions to the contrary; yet he required and pressed them to subscribe, upon his promise that he would let his Majesty know the truth of their opinions, notwithstanding such subscriptions; which nevertheless he did not make known to his Majesty, but delivered the same to his Majesty, as the opinion of all the Judges.

VI. That he being Lord Chief-Justice of the said Court of Common-Pleas, delivered his opinion in the Exchequer-Chamber against Mr. Hampden in the case of Ship-money; that he the said Mr. Hampden upon the matter and substance of the case was chargeable with the money then in question; a Copy of which proceedings the Commons will deliver to your Lordships: and did solicit and threaten the said Judges, some or one of them, to deliver their opinions in like manner against Mr. Hampden. And after the said Baron Denbam had delivered his opinion for Mr. Hampden; the said Lord Finch repaired purposely to the said Baron Denbam's chamber in Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-street; and after the said Mr. Baron Denbam had declared and expressed his opinion, urged him to retract the said opinion; which he refusing, was threatened by the said Lord Finch, because he refused.

VII. That he being then Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, declared and published in the Exchequer-Chamber, and Western Circuit where he went Judge; that the King's right to Ship-money, as aforesaid, was so inherent a right to the Crown, as an Act of Parliament could not take it away; and with divers malicious speeches inveighed against, and threatened all such as refused to pay Ship-money: all which opinions contained in the fourth, fifth, and sixth Articles, are against the Law of the Realm, the Subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right: which said resolutions and Petition of Right, were well known to him, resolved and enacted in Parliament, when he was Speaker of the Commons House of Parliament.

VIII. That he being Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, did take the general practice of that Court to his private chamber; and that he sent warrants into all or many Shires of England to several men, as to Francis Giles of the County of Devon, Robert Benson of the County of York, Attorneys of that Court, and to divers others, to release all persons arrested on any outlawry for about forty shillings fees; whereas none by Law so arrested, can be bailed or released without superfeetas under seal, or reversal.

IX.

IX. That he being Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, upon a pretended suit begun in Michaelmas-Term, in the 11th year of his Majesty's reign, although there was no plaint or declaration against him, did notoriously and contrary to all Law and Justice, by threats, menaces, and imprisonment, compel Thomas Laurence, an Executor, to pay nineteen pound, twelve shillings; and likewise caused Richard Bernard, being only Overseer of the last Will of that Testator, to be arrested for the payment of the said money, contrary to the advice of the rest of the Judges of that Court, and against the known and ordinary course of Justice, and his said Oath and Knowledge: and denied his Majesty's subjects, the common and ordinary Justice of this Realm, as to Mr. Limerick, and others; and for his private benefit endamaged and ruined the estates of very many of his Majesty's subjects, contrary to his Oath and Knowledge.

X. That he being Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and sworn one of his Majesty's Privy-Council, did by false and malicious slanders labour to incense his Majesty against Parliaments, and did frame and advise the publishing the declaration after the dissolution of the last Parliament.

All which Treasons and Misdemeanors above-mentioned, were done and committed by the said John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and thereby he the aforesaid Finch hath traitorously, and contrary to his Allegiance laboured to lay imputations and scandals upon his Majesty's Government, and to alienate the hearts of his Majesty's liege People from his Majesty, and to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his Majesty's Realm of England; for which they do impeach him the said Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, of High-Treason against our sovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity, of the Misdemeanors above-mentioned. And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Lord Finch, and also of replying to the answer, that the said John Lord Finch shall make unto the said Articles or to any of them; and of offering proof of the premisses, or any of their impeachments or accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of Parliaments, require; do pray, that the said John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, may be put to answer to all and every of the premisses, and such Proceedings, Examinations, Trials, and Judgments, as may be upon every of them, had and used, as is agreeable to Law and Justice.

After reading these Articles, resolv'd upon the Question,

That these Articles thus read and engross'd shall be sent to the Lords in maintenance of the Commons charge against John Lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England.

Mr. Arthur Goodwin is appointed to go up with a message to the Lords to a conference with their Lordships, by a Committee of both Houses, concerning Articles to be deliver'd in maintenance of the Commons accusation of John Lord Finch of Fordwich, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and concerning the liberty and property of the subject.

VOL. VII.

At the request of the Lord Falkland, Mr. Hyde is appointed to be assistant unto him, for the reading of the Articles to be deliver'd against the late Lord-Keeper.

Mr. Goodwin brought answer, that according to the order of this House, he had deliver'd the message to their Lordships, and their Lordships will give a meeting to-morrow morning, at nine of the Clock, by a Committee of the whole House as is desired.

Accordingly the Articles against the Lord-Keeper were presented to the Lords; and after reading the same, the Lord Falkland spoke as follows.

My Lords,

THESE Articles against my Lord Finch being read, I may be bold to apply that of the Poet, Nil refert tales versus qua voce legantur; and I doubt not but your Lordships must be of the same opinion, of which the House of Commons appears to have been, by the choice they have made of me, that the charge I have brought is such, as needs no assistance from the bringer, leaving not so much as the colour of a colour for any defence, including all possible evidence, and all possible aggravation (that addition alone excepted) which he alone could make, and hath made; I mean, his confession, included in his flight.

Here are many and mighty Crimes, Crimes of Supererogation, (so that High-Treason is but a part of his charge) pursuing him fervently in every several condition, (being a silent Speaker, an unjust Judge, and an unconscionable Keeper.) That his life appears a perpetual warfare, (by mines, and by battery, by battle, and by stratagem,) against our fundamental Laws, which (by his own confession) several Conquests had left untouch'd, against the excellent constitution of this Kingdom, which hath made it appear unto strangers rather an Idea, than a real Commonwealth, and produced the honour and happiness of this to be a wonder of every other Nation; and this with such unfortunate success, that as he always intended to make our ruins a ground of his advancement, so his advancement the means of our further ruin.

After that, contrary to the further end of his place, and the ending of that meeting in which he held his place, he had as it were gagged the Commonwealth, taking away (to his power) all power of speech from that body, of which he ought to have been the mouth, and which alone can perfectly represent the condition of the people, whom they only represent: which if he had not done, in all probability, what so grave and judicious an Assembly might have offered to the consideration of so gracious and just a Prince, had occasioned the redress of the grievances they then suffered, and prevented those which they have since endured, according to the ancient maxim, Odisse quos leseris. He pursued this offence towards the Parliament, by inveighing against the Members, by scandalizing their proceedings, by trampling upon their Acts and Declarations, by usurping and devolving the right, by diminishing and abrogating the power, both of that and other Parliaments, and making them (as much as in him lay) both useless and odious to his Majesty; and pursued his hatred to this fountain of Justice by corrupting the streams of it, the Laws; and perverting the conduit-pipes, the Judges.

He practised the annihilating of ancient and notorious perambulations of particular Forests, the better to prepare himself to annihilate the ancient, and notorious perambulation of the whole Kingdom, the metes and boundaries between the liberties of the subject and sovereign power; he endeavoured to have all tenures durante beneplacito, to bring all Law from his Majesty's Courts, into his Majesty's breast; he gave our goods to the King, our lands to the Deer, our liberties to his Sheriffs; so that there was no way by which we had not been oppressed, and destroyed, if the power of this person had been equal with his will, or that the will of his Majesty had been equal to his power.

He not only by this means made us liable to all the effect of an Invasion from without, (but by destruction of our liberties, which included the destruction of our propriety, which included the destruction of our industry) made us liable to the terriblest of all Invasions, that of want and poverty. So that if what he plotted had taken root, and he made it, as sure as his declaration could make it, (what himself was not, Parliament proof) in this wealthy and happy Kingdom, there could have been left no abundance but of grievances, and discontentment, no satisfaction but amongst the guilty. It is generally observed of the Plague, that the infection of others, is an earnest, and constant desire of all that are seized by it: and as this design resembles that disease, in the ruin, destruction, and desolation it would have wrought, so it seems no less like it in this effect: he having so laboured to make others share in that guilt, that his solicitation, was not only his action, but his works, making use both of his authority, his interest, and importunity, to persuade; and in his Majesty's name (whose Piety is known to give that excellent prerogative to his Person, that the Law gives to his place, not to be able to do wrong) to threaten the rest of the Judges, to sign opinions contrary to Law, to assign answers contrary to their opinions, to give Judgment which they ought not to have given, and to recant Judgment when they had given it as they ought: so that whosoever considers his care of, and concernment, both in the growth and in the immorality of this project, cannot but by the same way, by which the wisest judgment found the true mother of the Child, discover him not only to have been the fosterer, but the father of this most pernicious and envious design.

I shall not need to observe, that this was plotted and pursued by an Englishman against England, (which increaseth the Crime in no less degree than Parricide is beyond Murder) that this was done in the greatest matter joined to the greatest bond, being against the general liberty, and publick propriety, by a sworn Judge (and if that salt itself, because unfavoury, the Gospel hath design'd whither it must be cast) that he poisoned our very antidotes, and turned our guard into a destruction, making Law the ground of illegality; that he used this Law not only against us, but against itself, making it, as I may say, Felo de se, making the pretence (for I can scarce say the appearance of it) so to contribute to the utter ruin of itself.

I shall not need to say, that either this is (or can be) of the highest kind, and in the highest degree of Parliamentary Treason, a Treason which needs not a computation of many several actions, which alone were not Treason, to prove a Treason all together, and by that demonstration of the intention, to make that formally Treason which were materially but a misdemeanor: this is a Treason as well against the King, as against the Kingdom; for whatsoever is against the whole, is undoubtedly against the head, which takes from his Majesty the ground of his rule, the Laws, (for if foundations be destroyed, the pinnacles are most endangered) which takes from his Majesty the principal honour of his rule; the ruling over Freemen, a power as much nobler than that over Villeins, as that is than that over Beasts; which endeavoured to take from his Majesty the principal support of his rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules; (a better and surer strength and wall to the King, than the sea is to the Kingdom;) and by begetting a mutual distrust, and by that a mutual disaffection between them, to hazard the danger even of the destruction of both.

My Lords,

I shall the less need to press this, because as it were unreasonable in any case to suspect your Justice, so here especially, where your interest so nearly unites you; your great share in possessions, giving you an equal concernment in propriety, the care and pains used by your noble Ancestors in the founding and asserting of our common liberties rendring the just defence of them your most proper and peculiar inheritance, and both exciting to oppose and extirpate all such designs as did introduce, and would have settled an arbitrary, that is, an intolerable form of Government, and have made even your Lordships and your posterity but Right Honourable Slaves.

My Lords,

I will spend no more words, luctando cum larva, in accusing the Ghost of a departed person, whom his Crimes accuse more than I can do, and his absence accuseth no less than his Crime. Neither will I excuse the length of what I have said, because I cannot add to an excuse, without adding to the fault, or my own imperfections, either in the matter or manner of it; which I know must appear the greater, by being compared with that learned Gentleman's great ability, who hath preceded me at this time: I will only desire, by the command, and in the behalf of the House of Commons, that these proceedings against the Lord Finch, may be put in so speedy a way of dispatch, as in such cases the course of Parliament will allow.

The same day, the Commons order'd thanks to be returned from the House to Mr. St. John, Mr. Whitlock, the Lord Falkland, and Mr. Hyde, for the great service they have perform'd to the honour of the House, and good of the Commonwealth, in the transferring the Articles against the late Lord-Keeper.

Jan. 30. It was ordered by the Lords, that such Judges as the House of Commons shall desire, are to be examined in the case of the Lord Finch, by the same deputed Lords as were appointed in the Earl of Strafford's case: but the Judges are not to be examin'd upon any thing to accuse themselves.

Feb. 15. The House of Lords thought fit, that a Proclamation do issue out to summon the Lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper, personally to appear before the Lords in Parliament; to answer an Accusation Accusation of High Treason brought against him by the Commons.

But his Lordship never thought fit to surrender himself, and the Civil War soon after breaking out, there was no further proceedings against him, and he endured eight years Banishment, and Compositions amounting to about 7000*l*. But lived to see the horrid Murder of King Charles I. and the happy Restoration of King Charles II.

Die Martis 21 Septemb. 1647.

 Hereas John Brown, Esq; Clerk of the Parliaments, did the 25th of June 1647, exhibit a charge before the Lords in Parliament, against John Morris alias Poyntz, Mary his wife, Isabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris; for forging, framing, and publishing a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, alledged to have been made in the 43 of Elizabeth, and intituled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Essex, and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London, by James Morris Esq; and Gabriel Poyntz Esq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs; and to establish the said Manors upon the said John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the said conveyance: Whereas in truth there neither is, nor ever was any such Act of Parliament. And for forging and counterfeiting his hand-writing, and subscribing to the said Copy, John Brown Cleric. Parliamentorum. And the better to colour their leud practices, have charged the said John Brown with the loss of the said Record, and denying of his own hand. And whereas Sir Adam Littleton Bart. who had good title to part of the said Manors and Lands, as in right of Dame Audery his wife, whose Inheritance thereunto was sought to be impeached by the said Copy of the said pretended Act of Parliament, complained likewise against the said persons before their Lordships, for the said forgery and publication; in that the said John Morris, Leonard Darby, John Harris, and Isabel Smith, did produce the said Copy at Chelmsford, at Lent-Assizes, 1646, for the County of Essex; at a Trial in an Ejectione firme, brought by Thomas Smith, husband of the said Isabel, and lessee of the said John Morris against Josias Clarke, Tenant to the said Sir Adam Littleton, of part of the said Lands contained in the said pretended Act; and did plead and affirm the same to be a true Copy of an Act of Parliament: and the said Darby and Harris did falsly and perjuriously swear in open Court at the said Trial, that they had examined the said Copy, by them produced, with the Record of the said pretended Act, in the Office of the Clerk of the Parliament; and did there also falsly and perjuriously swear, that they did shew that writing to the Clerk of the Parliament, and that he did acknowledge the said writing to be his own hand; whereas in truth the said subscription to the said pretended Act of Parliament is counterfeit, and none of the said Clerk of the Parliament's hand. And the said Sir Adam further complained of an exemplification under the Great Seal of England, for countenancing the said forged Copy of the said pretended Act, by some undue means by the said parties thereunto affixed, of the parties shewing, whereof proof was made before their Lordships.

All which being Crimes of a very high and transcendent nature, and do concern the publick Justice of the Kingdom, and of this honourable House, the supremest Judicatory of this Kingdom; that Acts of Parliament, the highest Records in this Kingdom, should be framed, invented, forged, and given in evidence, and published as true Acts of Parliament; and the hand of the Clerk of the Parliament, a sworn Officer, forged, counterfeited and subscribed to the same; as that if such a bold and audacious act should not be severely punished, no man can be safe in his life, person, or estate: the said John Brown, and Sir Adam Littleton, desired that the persons aforesaid might forthwith answer the said charges; and that their Lordships would inflict such exemplary punishment upon the offenders, as may deter the like attempts and leud practices in others, and give such fitting reparations as their Lordships in their wisdom should think meet.

Whereupon the persons aforesaid put in their answers to the premises, and pleaded Not guilty; and after the case had been divers days fully heard by Counsel on both sides, and witnesses produced at this Bar, and the whole matter after thoroughly weighed, debated, and fully considered of by the House;

House; the Lords in Parliament assembled, being fully satisfied of the guilt of the said persons, for the aforesaid high Crimes charged against them, do award and adjudge,

1. That the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, shall pay as a fine to our sovereign Lord the King, the sum of 1000*l.* Isabel Smith 200*l.* Leonard Darby 400*l.* and John Harris 400*l.*

2. That the said parties shall pay to John Brown Esq; Clerk of the Parliament, for his damages, 500*l.*

3. That all the said parties shall before their enlargement out of prison, be bound to their good behaviour during their lives, before some one of his Majesty's Justices of his Bench at Westminster, with good sureties.

4. That the said Copy of the pretended Act of Parliament, falsely affirmed upon Oath, to have been subscribed with the name of the said Clerk of the Parliament, intituled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance, made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Essex; and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London; by James Morris Esq; Gabriel Poyntz Esq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, and to establish the said Manors upon the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the said conveyance; is hereby declared to be forged and counterfeit; and is by their Lordships adjudged and decreed to be for ever damned and cancelled, and never to be pleaded in any Court or Cause whatsoever; nor to be admitted to be given in evidence; there being no Record of such pretended Act of Parliament to warrant the same.

5. That all the said several persons hereby adjudged guilty of the said crimes, shall ever hereafter be made incapable to be witnesses in any cause whatsoever.

6. That John Brown Esq; Clerk of the Parliament, is in the judgment of this House free, and clear of and from all and every the aspersions, falsities, and charges of the said John Morris alias Poyntz, Isabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris, charged, uttered, divulged, and given out by them against him, concerning the matters herein mentioned. And that this judgment shall be openly read and published in the face of the County of Essex, at the next Assizes to be held for that County.

7. That the said parties shall bring, or cause to be brought into this House by the first day of October next, one exemplification under the Great Seal of England, concerning the Manor of Little Munden, in the County of Hertford; and the aforesaid exemplification of the said counterfeit Act of Parliament, to which the Great Seal of England, is charged to have been unduly and fraudulently affixed, that so the foresaid forged exemplification may be cancelled and vacated.

8. That they shall be imprisoned during the pleasure of this House.

Job. Brown, Cler. Parliamentorum.

Die Martis, 2^{do} Die Novemb. 1647.

Whereas the Lords in Parliament assembled, upon the 21st of September last, gave judgment concerning a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, intituled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance, made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Essex; and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London, by James Morris Esq; Gabriel Poyntz Esq; to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, and to establish the said Manors upon the said John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the said conveyance; and declared the same to be forged and counterfeit, and there to be for ever damned and cancelled, as by the said judgment more at large appeareth.

And whereas Dame Audery Littleton, late wife of Sir Adam Littleton deceased, Sir Folke Grevil Knt. and Maurice Barrow Esq; by their Petition exhibited before the Lords in Parliament complained, that notwithstanding the said judgment, one Isabel Smith, (a person sentenced by their Lordships, and committed to Newgate for the said forgery) having procured the said forged Act of Parliament, and other forged writings, viz. three fines of the Lands contained in the said forged Act, and a forged Pleading, setting forth the uses of the said forged fines, to be written in Parchment; and having by some slight made them to seem as if they had been written long since, did foist and shuffle in the same amongst other evidences, and writings remaining in the Treasury of the late Court of Wards; and pretending the same to be found there, obtained Copies thereof under the hand of Mr. Audely Clerk of the said Court, hoping thereby to gain some credit, and authority to the said forgeries, and further to impeach the titles of the Petitioners.

To which Petition the said Isabel Smith put in her answer, and a day was appointed for hearing the same. At which day the said Isabel Smith, being present at the Bar, and not making good any of the particulars in her said answer, nor giving any satisfaction to such questions as were by their Lordships demanded of her concerning the same: And the said several writings after full examination by hearing of Counsel, and Witnesses produced; and also upon view of the said writings (being by their Lordships order brought into the House) manifestly appearing to their Lordships to be gross forgeries: the Lords in Parliament assembled do declare, and adjudge;

That the said Parchment writings, one whereof purporteth a fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans, a die sancti Martini in quindecim dies, Anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris Esq; and John Morris alias Poyntz his son Plaintiffs, and Gabriel Poyntz Esq; and William Cutts Defendants; of the Manor of Chipping-Onger, and other Lands and Tenements, with the appurtenances in Chipping-Onger in the County of Essex: One other whereof purporteth a fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans, a die sancti Martini in quindecim dies; Anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris Esq; and John Morris alias Poyntz his son Plaintiffs; and Gabriel Poyntz Esq; and William Cutts Defendants; of the Manors of Northokenden, Poyntz and Groves, with the appurtenances, and of divers Messuages, Cottages, Mills, Lands, Meadows, Pastures, and other Hereditaments in Northwokenden alias Northokenden, Southwokenden alias Southokendea, Avely, Upminster alias Upminster, Southweal, Brentwood alias Burntwood, Warley alias Warley Magna, Childerditch, Bulfan, Bownton alias Bunton, East Thorndon, West Thorndon, West Thurrock, Grays Thurrock, Chadwell, Styfford alias Stiford, Horne-church, Basseldon and Cranbam, and of the Rectory of Northwokenden, kenden alias Northokenden, with the appurtenances in the said County of Essex.

One other whereof purporteth a fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans, a die Sancti Martini in quindecim dies, Anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris, Esq; John Morris alias Poyntz, his son, Plaintiffs; and Gabriel Poyntz, Esq; and William Cutts, Esq; Defendants; of four Messuages, six Gardens, and two Acres of Land, with the appurtenances, in the Parish of St. Katherine Cree-Church, London.

One other of the said Parchment writings purporteth a pleading, setting forth the uses of the said fines, and beginning in these words, (viz.) Essex. ff. In memorandum de Banco, Anno tricesimo octavo Elizabeth, viz. inter Record. Termini sancti Trinitatis Rollo xxi. ex parte Recordationum in Ter. manen. inter alia continetur ut sequitur, viz. Memorandum quod nuper invenitur in quodam Rollo extract. de finibus & issuis Banci in Termino Sancti Michaelis annis Regni Domini nostre Elizabethæ, tricesimo sexto & septimo, quod Gabriel Poyntz, Esq; &c.

And one other whereof purporteth a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, intituled, An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance, made of the Manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other Lands in the County of Essex; and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London; by James Morris, Esq; and Gabriel Poyntz, Esq; to John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, and to establish the said Manors upon the said John Morris alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the said conveyance: Are hereby declared to be forged and counterfeit, and are by their Lordships adjudged and decreed to be for ever damned and cancelled, and never to be pleaded, or admitted to be given in evidence in any Court, or Cause whatsoever: there being no Record of any such Fines, Pleading, or Act of Parliament to warrant the same; nor any Term then held at St. Albans, when the said fines were pretended to be levied there.

And it is further ordered by the Lords in Parliament assembled, that the said Isabel Smith shall by the 27th of November next bring, or cause to be brought into this House, the Copies of the said Parchment writings, (pretended to be found in the Treasury of the Court of Wards) subscribed by the said Mr. Awdely, that so the same may be cancelled and vacated.

I have searched the Records of the Common-Pleas, de Termino Sancti Trinitat. Anno tricesimo octavo Reg. Eliz. Rollo vicefimo primo, and do find that there is no inrollment of any such Record there, as is above-mentioned.

I have searched in the Treasurer's Remembrancer's Office in the Exchequer, amongst the Records of Trinity-Term, Anno xxxviii. Regine Elizabeth. Roll. xxi. but do not find that there is any such Record or Inrollment, as is above-mentioned.

6 May, 1647.

Memorandum, that I Francis Blake, Keeper of the Books for the searchers of fines, and of the Records thereof in the Chirographer's Office, have made diligent search in the said Books, and amongst the said Records of Michaelmas-Term, 35 and 36 Eliz. and all the Terms after, till Hillary, 38 Eliz. and I can find no fine at all from Gabriel Poyntz and William Cutts, or either of them, to any person whatsoever, of any Lands in the Counties of Essex or London. And moreover, I find by the said Records, that Michaelmas-Term, 36 and 37 Eliz. was held at the City of Westminster, and not at the Town of St. Albans. All which I do hereby (at the request of Sir Adam Poyntz, alias Littleton, Bart.) certify to all whom it may concern.

F. Blake.

Here ends the Proceedings of the Lords against them.

Soon after a short Breviate of Mr. John Morris's case, was drawn up, and delivered to his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, by divers of the Parliament's Agents.

May it please your Excellency,

BEING deeply oppressed in our spirits, and overburdened in ourselves, at the manifold and doleful outcries and complaints of the people, in all parts of our quarters where we come, uttered against the daily pressures and inroads, that are made by prerogative and arbitrary violence upon their common rights; and in particular, the cry and miserable moan of certain oppressed Commoners, to wit, of John Poyntz, alias Morris, Esq; Isabel Smith, John Harris, and Leonard Darby, coming unto our ears, that we could not, but (as in duty we are bound) deeply represent their miserable condition, as fellow-feelers of their oppressions, and persons liable (when we come into their single capacity of Commons) to the said mischief; and therefore conceiving it our duty to contribute our utmost endeavours for the remedy of the same, we could not but unburden in some measure our spirits unto your Excellency in their behalfs, who in such a horrid and barbarous manner, have been abused and supplanted of their common rights, by acts of violence and force, committed by John Brown, Clerk unto the House of Lords, and his accomplices, under the colour of several orders surreptitiously by misinformations gained from the said House, to the high usurpation and abuse of the name and authority of Parliament, in permitting the image thereof upon his own prerogative, outrage and violence, to the total ruin and supplantation of the just freedoms, and birthright, inheritance of the said persons, as the several papers thereunto subjoined, for the full information of your Excellency lency do demonstrate. And for more certain confirmation of our premises, represented by the same, be pleased to consider, that whereas the abovesaid persons are accused, condemned, and sentenced by the Lords (surprized by Brown's misrepresentations and delusions) to pay 2500 l. fine, and suffer imprisonment, contrary to the regular course of the Laws, during the pleasure of the said House, for forging and framing a copy of an Act of Parliament, touching the estate of the said John Poyntz alias Morris, pretended to be taken out of the Office of the said John Brown, with his hand thereunto; no such original Record as Brown pretendeth is to be found in his Office: that since the said accusation, another original Record of the said Act of Parliament, with other writings and evidences for the said estate, is found in the Court of Wards, and they have gained copies thereof, examined and subscribed by the Master of the said Court and his Clerks, the which, with their hands thereunto are herewith presented; and concerning the truth thereof, three of us can also give it upon Oath, that the wife of one Godfrey Cade, now prisoner in the Fleet, did declare unto us, that the said John Brown went to the Fleet unto her husband, and gave him twenty-five shillings in hand, and promised him five pounds more, and his enlargement, to swear at the Lords Bar, that he forged the copy of the said Act of Parliament, and counterfeited the Clerk's hand unto it; and the said Cade did also confess the same.

Wherefore we humbly implore that your Excellency would be pleased to grant the said distressed persons your letter of request unto the Parliament, according to their Petition, herewith directed to your Excellency, that the said persons and their adversaries, may be left to the free course and trial at Common Law; and that in the mean time till the controversy concerning the estate be decided at Law, the said persons may enjoy their enlargement upon bail, without any further trouble or durance, and the execution of their severe sentence be suspended, and the said Poyntz alias Morris, enjoy peaceable possession of the said estate, like as all his ancestors from the days of Queen Elizabeth have done before him. Which request is so reasonable and just, and their condition so miserable, desperate, and dangerous, and of such concernment to the whole Commonwealth, that no man, if such exorbitances be not stopp'd and curb'd, can have any security in his estate or liberty, that we cannot but promise to ourselves your Excellency's commiseration of their condition, and readily assent unto their just suit. Thus we humbly take our leave, beseeching your favourable construction upon our boldness, and remain

Your Excellency's most humble

XXIII. The Trial of Col. JOHN MORRIS, Governor of Pontefract Castle; at the Assizes at the Castle of Yark, before Mr. John Puleston, and Mr. Baron Thorpe, Justices of Assize, the 16th of August, Anno Dom. 1649. for High-Treason.

OLONEL Morris being demanded to hold up his hand, refused, and the Indictment was read against him for Treason, for levying War against the late King and the Parliament, upon Stat. 25 Ed. III. The Court desired him to plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive this Court hath not power to try me in this case; I being a martial man, I ought to be tried by a Council of War.

Court. Sir, what do you say, Are you guilty or not guilty? This is the second time you have been asked: Sir, if you will not answer the third time, we shall know what to do. Are you guilty or not guilty?

Col.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I still conceive I ought not to be tried here; if I have done any thing worthy of death, I appeal to a martial Court, to my Lord Fairfax, Major-General, or a general Council of War: you have not any precedent for it, either for you to try me in this way, or me to suffer by it.

Court. Are you guilty or not guilty? This is the third time.

Col. Morris. My Lords, if your Honours will force me to plead, I conceive I am not guilty.

Court. How will you be tried?

Col. Morris. My Lords, I was never at any Bar before, I am ignorant herein.

Court. Tell him what to say. [Upon that, some near him, told him, by God and his Country.]

Col. Morris. By God and my Country. (After that, challenge is made for Col. Morris to except against any of the Jury.) [Mr. Brooke, a great man for the cause, comes first returned, to be sworn as Foreman of the Jury.]

Col. Morris. My Lords, I except against this Brooke.

Court. Sir, he is sworn, and you speak too late.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I appeal to himself, whether he be sworn or no.

Mr. Brooke. Sir, I am not to answer you, but the Court. My Lord, I did not kiss the Book.

Court. Sir, that is no matter, it's but a ceremony.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I beseech your Honours that I may except against him; I know him, as well as I know my right hand, to be my enemy.

Clerk of Assize. Sir, he is recorded sworn, there is no disputing against the Record.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I must submit to your Honours. (After that Col. Morris challenged 16 men, and my Lord Puleston, thinking Col. Morris tedious in excepting against so many, answer'd, Sir, keep within your compass, or I will give you such a blow as will strike off your head.)

Col. Morris. My Lords, I desire nothing but Justice; for by the Statute of 14 Hen. VII. fol. 19. I may lawfully challenge thirty-five men, without shewing any cause to the contrary.

Court. It is granted. After a full Jury, the Indictment read, and Evidence for the State very full, that Col. Morris was Governor of Pontefract; which, Morris being very modest and civil, did not contradict any thing, until his time of answer.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I humbly desire a Copy of my Indictment, that I may know what to answer, I conceive I may plead special as well as general.

Court. Sir, you cannot by Law.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I conceive there is a point of Law in it, and I humbly desire to have Counsel; for I conceive by the Law, being attainted for High-Treason, I ought to have Counsel by the Statute 1 Hen. VII. fol. 23.

Court. Sir, I tell you, you cannot have it.

Col. Morris. Then, my Lords, I conceive I am not any way guilty of the Indictment for Treason: my Lords, it is said to be against the King, his Crown, and against his Peace; whereas, my Lords, I can make it appear, I have acted only for the King, and nothing against him, which may appear here by my Commission. The Court looks upon it, and answers.

Court. Sir, you are deceived, this is false, it is from the Prince.

VOL. VII.

Col. Morris. My Lords, it is very well known, my Lord Fairfax hath his Commission derived from the Parliament, and upon that he grants Commission to his Officers, which is all one and the same. The Prince hath his from his Father, and I have mine from the Prince, which is full power, he being Captain-General of his Majesty's Forces.

Court. Sir, have you nothing else to say?

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive it is sufficient; for by the same power, all Judges, Justices of Peace, your Lordships, your Predecessors, and all other officers, did act by the same power, and all process and writs of Law were acted, and executed in his name, and by his authority.

Court. His power was not in him, but the Kingdom, for he was in trust for the Kingdom; the King's Highway, and the King's Coin being so called, is not his own, but his Subjects; and his natural power, and legal power, are different.

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive his legal and personal power, are undivisible, all one, and cannot be separated.

Court. Sir, all is one if the King bid me kill a man, is this a sufficient warrant for me to plead? No Sir, it is unlawful. Sir, have you no more?

Col. Morris. I beseech your Honours give me leave, I am upon my life.

Court. Speak what you will, Sir, you shall be heard.

Col. Morris. Your servant, my Lord; then, my Lords, I conceive I have acted nothing against the Parliament, for that which I acted, it was for the King: and since the abolishing of regal power, I have not meddled with any thing against the Parliament, for that Act was but enacted the 14th of July last, and before that Time and Act of abolishing Kingly-Government, that princely Palace which I kept by his Commission was demolished. My Lords, I beseech your Honours, that my Commission may be read, to give satisfaction to the Court.

Lord Puleston. Sir, it will do you no good, you may as well shew a Commission from the Pope, all is one.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I desire your Lordships to do me that Justice.

Lord Thorpe. For my part, I am willing, if my Brother be not against it.

Lord Puleston. Sir, we hold it for Law to be void, it is to no purpose.

Col. Morris. Then if your Lordships be not pleased to do me that Justice that it may be read, I desire it may be restored me again. [Upon that, Col. Morris received his Commission unread.] My Lords, it seemeth strange, that your Honours should do that which was never done the like before, never any of your Predecessors ever did the like; I wish it may not be to your own and your friends wrong, that you make yourselves precedents of your acting, and my self of suffering. But, my Lords, I do not speak for saving my own life, for (I thank my God) I am prepared, and very willing to part with this lump of clay: I have had a large time of repentance, it being twenty-two weeks since my imprisonment; and I am sorry for those which are like to undergo the same sufferings, if your Lordships take away my life. And though I do not speak any way in glory, indeed at this present there is a cloud hanging over our heads, I desire there may be a fair Sunshine to dispel it. And though there were a world of plots in the Kingdom when I took the Castle, there is not wanting the same now, only the time is not yet come; and as I was to be the fire-brand to Scarborough, so he (meaning Bointon) to Tinmouth, and that to others; and though you take away my life, there will be others which will take up the Lintstock to give fire, though I be gone.

Court. Sir, you have little hopes to talk of any fire to be given here, having received such a total rout in Ireland.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I should have been unwilling to have contradicted your late news concerning Ireland; but since you have given me a hint of it, you must give me leave to let your Honours know, that I received Letters from the Marquis of Ormond dated the 3d of August, and yours is but the 2d; wherein he pleases to let me understand of the great care he hath of me, and that whatsoever shall befall me here, the like shall be to those which he hath prisoners there, which (as he saith) are good store. Therefore if your Lordships did not at all value my person, yet methinks you should have some care of it, for your own friends good.

Court. Sir, have you no more to say?

Col. Morris. My Lords, still I appeal to my Commission, which I conceive is sufficient to defend me withal, in what I have done, notwithstanding your power to the contrary.

Court. It is nothing at all, we have power to try you here.

Col. Morris. Then, my Lords, (under correction) Laymen may as well be tried at a Martial Court: which if granted, those excellent Acts of Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, would be destroyed.

Court. But you are not looked on here as a Soldier, we shall do what in Justice belongs to us.

Col. Morris. My Lords, still (under correction) I have taken the Oath of Allegiance, and I conceive in that I was bound to do as much as I did or have done, though I had not had any Commission at all. And I beseech your Lordships that you will do me Justice, and not incline to the right-hand of affection, or the left to hatred; but to have an ear for the accused as well as for the accuser: neither have I acted any thing contrary to my Allegiance, which Allegiance I was willing to pay to the Son, as well as to the Father. Now for the Allegiance, I owe to any person or authority but to these, I know none.

Lord Thorpe. Sir, if you have any thing else to say, speak for yourself, for this is not much to the purpose.

Col. Morris. My Lord, 'tis true, since you have rejected that authority which I acted by, I might as well have held my tongue at the first, and spake nothing, were it not for the satisfaction of the hearers; but if it must be so, that you will make me a precedent, you must do with me as you did with my dear and honoured Lord, [meaning my Lord of Strafford] making an Act for the future, that this my suffering shall not be a precedent to any Soldiers hereafter. Besides, my Lord, this same Statute which you alledge against me, is, if that any shall act against the King, 'tis Treason; which I have not done; but contrary, for him, and by his authority. And there is an Act of 11 H. VII. cap. 1. That whosoever they are that shall aid or assist the King at home or abroad, shall not be questioned at all.

Lord Thorpe. 'Tis true, Sir, but Hen. VII. then stood in a sickle condition, and being an Usurper, made that Act for his own safety; sometimes the Duke of York ruling, sometimes the Duke of Lancaster, and others contending, therefore it was enacted.

Col. Morris. My Lord, but this same Act of H. VII. was later than that of Ed. III. which you have laid against me; and as yet was never repealed, until this last Act of 14 of July, before which time I had delivered up the place.

Lord Thorpe. Well, Sir, it seems you have not any more to say. After he had answered, the Court commanded Irons to be laid on them. (Cornet Blackston being condemned at the same time.)

Col. Morris. My Lord, I humbly desire that we may not be manacled; if you make any doubt of us, that we may have a greater guard upon us.

Lord Puleston. Sir, you that have made such attempts through such guards, as were of purpose set to receive you, ought to be look'd to now. Yet if Mr. Sheriff please, I am content.

Col. Morris. Mr. Sheriff, I desire that this manacling may be forborn: if you please to clap a guard of an hundred men upon us, I shall pay for it. This is not only a disgrace to me, but in general to all Soldiers; which doth more trouble me than the loss of my life. Mr. Sheriff, what do you say?

Mr. Sheriff. Sir, Irons are the safest guards.

Col. Morris. My Lords, hitherto (I thank God) I have not done any unsoldiery or base act, and to begin now, I will not do it to save my life; and though you look upon me Samson-wise, I vow to God, I would not touch the pillars, though it lay in my power to injure you; therefore I still beg pardon, that I may not be manacled.

Under-Sheriff. Come, Sir, it cannot be help'd, we are commanded.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I beseech you grant me this favour; it is not my life I beg, but to forbear this manacling, which shame and dishonour doth more trouble me, than the loss of my life.

Under-Sheriff. It must be done. And upon that, did it, and carried him away. After dinner the Jury brought in their verdict, guilty of Treason*.

Col.

* Letters from York, "That one Morris, and one Blackston, were arraign'd before Baron Thorpe, and Judge Puleston, for levying War against the Kingdom; they pleaded not guilty, but desired, as they were martial men, that they might be tried by martial Law: which was denied them.

"Morris at last said, He would be tried by God and the Country, and seventeen Witnesses proved foul Crimes against him." He had two sheets of paper written with matters of Law, and Statutes, many of which he pleaded, "and urged the case of the War betwixt the two Houses of York and Lancaster, the difference of which from his case was shewed by the Judges."

Then he produced a Commission from the King when he was Prince; the Judges told him, that the Prince was a Subject as well as he, and must be tried by the same Law.

"He was found guilty of Treason, and manacled with Irons; at which he said, What, a martial Man Ironed? The like precedent was never before known.

"He desired to have a strong Guard, saying, Let me be damned if I escape; but it was denied, so was a Copy of his Indictment, and to have Council, or to be exchanged.

"He and Blackston were both condemn'd." Whitlock's Memorials of the English Affairs, Page 421. Edit. 1732.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I am here found guilty of Treason by that villain Brooke, whom I know to be mine enemy, and the first man that I did except against: in which I conceive I have received hard measure, for none could have found me guilty of Treason, had they gone according to the Letter of the Law, which they did not.

Lord Puleston. Sir, you speak too late, you are not to dispute it now.

Col. Morris. Neither would I, my Lord, if this were a Court of Chancery, but being a Court of Law, bound up in express words and letter, I conceive I ought to dispute it, and my business better weighed.

Lord Puleston. Well Sir, you are found guilty, therefore hold your peace.

Col. Morris. If I must suffer, I receive it with all alacrity and cheerfulness, and I thank God I shall die for a good Cause, and the testimony of a good Conscience; for which, had I as many Lives as there are Stars in the Firmament, I would sacrifice them all for the same.

Court. Sheriff, Goaler take them away.

Col. Morris. Well, I beseech God bless King Charles, and fight for all those that fight for him, or have fought for him.

After he was condemn'd, Colonel Betbel writ to the General and his Council of War, that Morris might be reprieved; but Colonel Pride oppos'd it, urging, That it would not stand with the Justice of the Army, nor the Safety of the Commonwealth, to let such Enemies live, the Parliament having adjudg'd him worthy of Death, and given Instructions to the Judges accordingly.

The Speech of Col. John Morris, Governor of Pontefract-Castle, at the Place of Execution at York, August 23, 1649.

WHEN he was brought out of prison, looking upon the sledge that was there set for him, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, knocking upon his breast, he said, I am as willing to go to my death, as to put off my doublet to go to bed; I despise the shame as well as the Cross; I know I am going to a joyful place: with many like expressions.

When the Post met him about St. James's Church, that was sent to the Parliament to mediate for a reprieve; and told him he could not prevail in it, he said, 'Sir, I pray God reward you for your pains, I hope, and am well assured to find a better pardon than any they can give; my hope is not in man, but in the living God.'

At the place of Execution he made this profession of his faith, his breeding, and the cause he had fought in.

Gentlemen, First I was bred up in the true Protestant Religion, having my education and breeding from that honourable House, my dear Lord and Master Stafford's, which place I dare boldly say, was as well governed and ruled as ever any yet was before it; I much doubt, better than any will be after it, unless it please God to put a period to these distracted times; this Faith and Religion, I say, I have been bred in, and I thank God, I have hitherto lived in, without the least wavering, and now I am resolved by God's assistance to die in.

These pains are nothing, if compared to those dolours and pains, which Jesus Christ our Saviour hath suffered for us; when in a bloody-sweat he endured the wrath of God, the pain of Hell, and the cursed and shameful death which was due to our sins; therefore I praise the Lord that I am not plagued with far more grievous punishment, than the like hath befallen others, who undoubtedly are most glorious and blessed Saints with Christ in Heaven. It is the Lord's affliction, and who will not take any affliction in good part when it comes from the hand of God? And what, Shall we receive good from the hands of God, and not receive evil? And though I desire, as I am carnal, that this Cup may depart from me, yet not my will, but thy will be done. Death brings unto the godly an end of sinning, and of all miseries due unto sin: so that after death there shall be no more sorrow, nor cry, nor pain, for God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes; by death our souls shall be delivered from thralldom; and this corruptible body shall put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality.

Therefore blessed are they that are delivered out of so vile a world, and freed from such a body of bondage and corruption; the soul shall enjoy immediate communion with God in everlasting bliss and glory; it takes us from the miseries of this world, and the society of sinners, to the city of the living God, the celestial Jerusalem.

I bless God I am thought worthy to suffer for his name, and for so good a cause; and if I had a thousand lives, I would willingly lay them down for the cause of my King, the Lord's anointed; the Scripture commands us to fear God and honour the King, to be subject to every Ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether to the King as supreme, or to those that are in authority under him. I have been always faithful to my trust: and, though I have been most basely accused for betraying Liverpool; yet I take God to witness, it is a most false aspersions, for I was then sick in my bed, and knew not of the delivering of it, till the Officers and Soldiers had done it without my consent, and then I was carried prisoner to Sir John Meldrum. Afterwards I came down into the Country, and seeing I could not live quietly at home, I was persuaded by Col. Forbes, Col. Overton, Lieut. Col. Fairfax, whom I took for my good friends, to march in their Troops: which I did, but with intention still to do my King the best service when occasion was, and so I did; and I pray God to turn the hearts of all the Soldiers to their lawful Sovereign, that this Land may enjoy peace, which till then it will never do: and though thou kill me, yet will I put my trust in thee; wherefore I trust in God he will not fail me nor forsake me. Then he took his Bible, and read divers Psalms fit for his own occasion and consolation, and then put up divers prayers, some publicly, and some privately; which being ended, he was executed.

XXIV. The Proceedings, Examination, and Trial of Col. EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, (a Barrister of Gray's-Inn,) before the High-Court of Justice, Aug. 16. 1650. for High-Treason.

Published by Francis Buckley, Gent. who was Assistant to Mr. Andrewe in the time of his Imprisonment, and an Eye-witness of all the bloody and execrable Proceedings.

N Monday the 24th of March 1649. Col. Andrewe was taken prisoner at Gravesend by Major Parker.

The next day, he was convented before the Lord-President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay Knt. and Thomas Scot Esq; three of the Members of State, delegated by the Council for the taking of the examination of him, and of Sir Henry Chicheley Knt. Dr. Henry Edwards, and Mr. Clark, casually found in the same Inn with Mr. Andrewe.

Those Gentlemen examined him so punctually to every action and circumstance that had passed on his part since he took up arms, and especially since the surrender of Worcester, and his return from thence to London; and also concerning his several Lodgings, Names, Acquaintances, Removes, Abodes in the Country, Correspondencies by Letters, and Interest in places and persons, as if they had kept a Diary for him. Which considered, and that Sir John Gell Bart. Major Barnard, Capt. Smith, Capt. Benson, and Capt. Abley, (with whom he had the last and most questionable correspondence) were all in custody, he found himself to be betrayed, but could not at present guess by whom; but well saw that he had better be fair in his confession, than to deny what he saw by the perfectness of his examiners, would be proved against him, by the discovery of some of those formerly secured, and examined before his coming up.

In his Answers, he would have been circumstantial, but was kept close to the Question; at his departure he desired that he might set down his own Narrative, according to his own sense, which was granted him to prepare, and to send or bring to them as there was opportunity. And having totally, as much as in him lay, excused his fellow-prisoners, as to any thing relating to his Delinquency, he was with them committed to the Gatehouse.

Wednesday following, he was re-convented and re-examined.

On Friday, he was again convented, and delivered in his Narrative to the Lord-President, and the House. But business happening, detaining the other two examiners, he was by the President returned.

On Saturday he was re-called, and then, as at all times before, used and treated with civility, and no little pressure to discover some great persons, his supposed confederates: the aim, as he conjectur'd (and that upon strong inference, and some expressions) was at Sir Guy Palmes, Sir John Curson, and Sir Thomas Whitmore, &c. But he accounted it a great blessing in his unhappiness, that his misfortune was not fatal to any of his friends or familiars, who yet knew nothing of the reason of his Imprisonment, more than for what they were beholden to common fame.

On Sunday, he was called out of his bed, and by two Messengers, his Keeper, and his Man, brought into a boat at King's-bridge, at Westminster, and thence carried to the Tower. The warrant which at the Lieutenant's house was read, imported, that he was committed close prisoner for High-Treason, in endeavouring to subvert the present Government, &c. to be kept till delivered by Law.

The Narrative follows.

To the Right Honourable the Council of State;

*The humble Narrative * of Col. Eusebius Andrewe, as to the Questions and Matters of charge, whereupon he was examined before President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scot, Esq; in that behalf delegated by the Council the 27th of March, 1650.*

May it please your Lordships,

BEING unfortunately, and by a treacherous practice seduced into an action which renders me obnoxious to your Lordships Displeasure and Justice, and thereupon convented and brought to examination, I assured your Lordships delegates: that I came with a resolution to deal candidly, and not to preserve my life by framing a lye, or denying a truth. The same purpose I still retain, casting myself wholly at your Lordships feet; humbly praying leave, that while I answer to matter of fact, I may be permitted to cloath it with pertinent circumstances; that while the one lays me liable to your your Justice, the other may bring me within the capacity of your mercy; which in case it be afforded, I shall embrace with all humility and thankfulness. And if denied, I shall find cause within my bosom to justify God Almighty in his permission of my ruin; and I hope Charity enough to forgive whosoever have, or shall be instrumental to it, and bear the gurdon of my folly, with a sober confidence of God's reserved favour.

My engagement for his late Majesty began soon after Hillary-Term 1642, and continued until the surrender of Worcester in July 1645.

I have omitted to make my composition, not having a considerable, and not willing to own an inconsiderable estate.

I have not taken the protestation, solemn league and covenant, negative Oath, nor subscribed the present engagement.

John Barnard, sometimes a Major under me, and by reason of his good parts and sober demeanor, being in my good opinion, at my return to a private practice in my calling for my necessary support, frequently visited me, and imparted to me such occurrences as he met abroad in discourse, and did often intimate the discontent of the Reformades, the factions of the Levellers and Agitators, and the proceeding of a certain Committee, or select Council of Officers, of which Cpl. Cook was chief, and himself their Clerk, upon a printed charge against some for oppression, and against others for conceal'd delinquency; to the penning, promoting or counselling in which, I was originally a stranger, nor did ever interest myself therein further than the hearing his discourse; neither did ever mediately or immediately meddle with any of the persons or actions of the Reformades, Levellers, or Agitators upon any of his discourses.

About Trinity-Term last, Major Barnard obtruded to my acquaintance one Capt. Holmes, who soon after brought with him one John Benson, (who pretended to have had command under Sir John Gell, was anciently his servant, and until this time his dependant,) who uninvited frequently produced to me transcripts of Letters, (with the copying of which he pretended to be entrusted under Mr. Rushworth) which did appear to purport the occurrences in reference to the affairs of State, and their concernments at home and abroad, from their several agents; which I only read in his sight, and immediately delivered them back, he pretending that he was to carry them to Mr. Thomas Bushel to be transmitted over sea.

Capt. Holmes, and John Benson, in their discourses did insinuate that their interest was great in the Reformades, and that by them great advantage would upon any importunity be done for the Royal Party, and magnified Sir John Gell's interest in his Country, his reluctance at what he had done in the Parliament's service, and his willingness to expiate his former fault with a beneficial service to the Prince. And Major Barnard propounded, that a former design in the time of the war laid by me for the taking of the Isle of Ely, might by their help, and the conjuncture of some strength to be raised by Sir John Gell, then to me a stranger, and by Holmes and Benson, pretended to be willing and able to raise considerable numbers, be revived and executed; and thereupon it was concluded, that I should with Benson try who in Cambridgeshire would engage in it, and then ride down to Sir John Gell, to see if his strength and purpose were such as pretended; and this not to be executed but upon the contingency of successes in Ireland, and Scotland, was let fall as soon as conceived.

About the middle of December, Capt. Holmes brought me instructions, to draw a petition for Sir John Gell, for the getting of his arrears, which I drew accordingly, and not long after, I was invited to give him a meeting, till then having not seen or corresponded with him, and received an invitation and instruction to arbitrate between him and his Lady, with Sir Thomas Priestwich. And amongst other discourses, Sir John Gell did take notice of his irrequit of his service, and his losses, and the misapplication of his, and other services, to an end they intended not, and that he desired to be so understood, and when opportunity should be, to be so represented to the Prince; and did intimate, that if ever he took up arms again, it should be for the Prince: and at several other subsequent meetings, the discourses were general, and much to this purpose, but no particular design laid or contrived.

The time limited by the Act for departure, &c. being near expired, and myself being purposed to withdraw into the Country, until the summer voyage into some of the plantations, and to that purpose being in treaty with Sir Edmund Plowden, about the conditions of New Albion plantation, of which he writes himself Count Palatine, and Proprietor; on Saturday 16 Martii, I was unexpectedly visited by Major Barnard, and John Benson, and they enquiring my resolution concerning my leaving the Town in obedience to the Act; I signified my purpose to go to New Albion or to Virginia: upon which they took an opportunity to make a proposal to me in effect, that they had a considerable design laid, and friends and money to set on foot and back it, and that I should have two hundred pounds in hand, and power to draw money by Bills of Exchange, for what more should be necessary for my support, and management of what should concern the said design in Holland, if I would undertake to go over, and promote it to the Prince. And they did then in general terms signify, that it was an easy matter, especially the Cavaliers going out of the Town, by correspondence in all Counties, to surprize the horse of the army in their several quarters; and did intimate, that Major Barnard had a design in draught, which as I remember he produced, and I believe was concerning such surprizal, but was not read, but referred to further time of consideration. My answer was, that if the money were ready, I would divert my former purpose from any Plantation, and entertain the motion.

Sunday morning, they came again and informed me, that several persons of quality and fortune in Kent, Buckingham, and Dorset, were, or would then presently come up near the Town, and would join in an engagement, and advance money; and that Sir John Gell would also engage, and might with a word of his mouth bring in his friends, and Sir Andrew Kniveton, Sir Guy Palmes, and Mr. Fitzbert, and a fourth person, whose name I remember not; and therefore desired me to draw an engagement, (which I did in a loose paper, after the sense by them or one of them, the said Barnard, or Benson, instructed) and to move Sir John Gell to join in such an engagement; but did press me to join in the same at that present, for the encouraging of their before-mentioned friends, amongst whom, whom, I remember only these Surnames Boyes, Thatch, Baker, all to me absolute strangers.

That day I spake with Sir John Gell, and acquainted him with their offer and proposal to me, and desire from him. He answered, that he would not meddle with acting in that design (which he took upon him to be acquainted withal,) for which he was as then in no capacity, nor would be engaged under his hand and seal, to be bound to, by any future action for them; for that Benson was a fellow given to drink, and lavish of his tongue: but entrusted me, that if I went over upon this occasion, to possess the Prince with a good opinion of him, and that he would do nothing against him; and if he were at all in command, he would be so to his advantage, or to that effect.

I returned to them Sir John Gell's answer, with which they were not, or seemed not altogether unsatisfied, and appointed on Monday at five of the clock, that the persons of the Counties of Kent, Buckingham and Dorset, or some of each County from the rest, should give a meeting at the Three Cranes, at the Savoy-Gate, and be all satisfied in the design, and agree their respective portions of money to be paid in present, and raised for the future; desiring me to take care to move, that they might be also provided for, to be able to hold intelligence, and ride about from place to place to lay the design.

At the time I came; and Major Barnard produced two letters, one subscribed by Smith, another by Thatcher, purporting that the Kentish Gentlemen were come as far as Rocheſter, and would that night be within twelve miles of London, and lie there all day, and then in the evening, on Tuesday by eight of the clock, would at any place give meeting to himself, and his Colonel; and that they had sent a special guide to bring Barnard to them that night, whither he was instantly desired to repair, and that they durst come no nearer in fear of the watchfulness of Colonel Blunt; and that the two hundred and fifty pounds were ready to be laid down to perform their undertaking: No man of any County giving any meeting according to the first appointment at the Cranes; but the said Barnard, and Benson, and one who calls himself Captain Ashley, only known in face to me, who pretended to be privy and knowing of the truth of all that their former discourse and these letters tended to; and Barnard pretending to go instantly to horse from Westminster, I brought him and Benson to the water-side, and in the walk they importun'd me again to obtain Sir John Gell's signature and seal to the engagement, which Benson had then ready engrossed, and that I would go presently to Westminster with them about it; which I refused, and told them, that I was able to satisfy any man of quality, discretion, and secrecy, concerning Sir John's reality, though not actually engag'd; and so left them.

That night about eight of the clock, one Smith came to me (till then) an absolute stranger, and Capt. Ashley came to me, and brought me a letter from Major Barnard, highly reproving me, and Sir John Gell of backwardness, in withholding our own hands from the engagement, and that we intended our own honours upon their dangers, without giving them assurance of our secrecy and constancy; and that unless the engagement were subscribed by Sir John Gell, his Kentish friends would not proceed further. I was known to Mr. Smith, who took upon him to come as from them for satisfaction in that point. And in answer, I under a vow of secrecy told him, that I was satisfied concerning Sir John Gell, and presumed, that if any Gentleman of quality in whose judgment the rest would abide, should address to Sir John, that under an Oath of secrecy he would satisfy him, but durst not trust Benson, and Barnard was to him a stranger. With this they departed, assuring me that they thought no more would be expected from Sir John, and that they would, or one of them, away that night to the company; and that the next day being Tuesday, the money should be paid at the Pulgrave's-head.

They broke their time, and my occasions preſt me into London, being next day to be gone by the Act; and about nine of the clock at night, I was sent for by Captain Ashley and Benson, who delivered me a letter from Barnard, pressing me to subscribe the engagement which Benson engrossed; and that being done, he would go with me the next day to Gravesend, and the Gentlemen of Kent should meet there, and there the money to be paid.

The tide being fit for passage on Wednesday, Barnard came not, but Benson pretended him to be at Tottenham-Court with the Buckinghamshire Gentlemen, and that he was well-hors'd, and would come presently, and should follow; and so Captain Ashley and myself, with no more than fifty shillings in my purse, presuming upon the money there, went to Gravesend, and expected till Thursday night, but found no Kentish men, and no one from London coming. Capt. Ashley went that night with the evening-tide for London, to enquire the reason; and on Friday morning early came Major Barnard, and Mr. Smith with a letter from Benson, purporting that if Sir John Gell would not co-engage under his hand and seal, with those whose names were subscribed (of which I only know Barnard, Smith, Benson, and Ashley), they would go over themselves (meaning himself and Barnard) to the Prince, and spoil both mine and Sir John's credit with him, and disappoint all that I intended in his favour: and that he had letters from Sir John, which he could produce, should make him repent his refusal, or to such effect; and therefore desired me to write to Sir John Gell, to let him see his danger, which I did, laying the case before him, and not pressing him, but leaving him to do as God should direct him, and his judgment lead him. With which letter Barnard and Smith went away, with assurance that whether Sir John Gell engaged or not, I should hear next day from them, and if he did engage, they would come down and go for Rocheſter, where their former undertaking should be performed to me; and if he did not, I should be disengag'd, and have my subscription and seal sent me, and the design should fall. I expected till Saturday night, and finding no answer, resolved on Monday to intend my privacy in the Country, upon my first purpose for New Albion; and in the morning early was seized by a party of horse, and brought to London.

My Lords,

In that Narrative you will see a believing nature wrought upon by treacherous men, such who cannot be true to any, whilst false to parties.

The pretended design vanish'd, as never being more than a phantasm, and not worth your regard, the real design effected, so far as they had power or opportunity; that is, to bring the game into the toil, and there leave them to be entangled and made a quarry.

You

You will find me passively active, being prompted and enticed by their insinuation, and not once but hearkening to them.

It lies in your Lordships power to cut me off, by extending which, you can arrive to no honour amongst men; and possibly by an Act of lenity, you may do an office acceptable to God.

Cujus fiat voluntas, modo in ruinâ meâ.

Whosoever shall be present at my Trial, or into whose hands this Narrative shall fall, will easily conclude with me.

Quos vult perdi Deus, hos dementat prius.

EUS. ANDREWE.

On Tuesday the first of April, after his remove to the Tower, he was called to be further examined, and at his return writ back to them some particulars, (viz.) concerning Captain Holmes, by want of memory not before signified. And in case the state should have suffered aught by the said Holmes, it might have made Mr. Andrew incapable of lawful favour, by reason of his tenacity concerning the said Holmes, who (for aught Mr. Andrew knew) was guilty of his being betrayed; and if so, might as well intimate his knowledge of Holmes's purposes, to the end that Mr. Andrew's concealment of them might augment his crime; and also concerning Mr. Thomas Barnard, who being at large and unquestioned, Mr. Andrew had cause to have the like jealousy of.

On Friday sevensnight following, being the 11th of April, he was called again, and was confronted with Sir John Gell, and avowed what he did indeed neither directly deny, nor was troubled that he did aver; freely telling the President, that howbeit he did not remember some things in point, yet he was confident that he would not do him, nor any man wrong: and then declared to the President, that he look'd upon Sir John Gell, as upon himself, as a betrayed man; but as concerning others, he knew not by whom, he had been free in his confessions, though to his own injury.

He then acquainted their Lordships, that he had something to rectify in his former examinations and papers, upon better memory in point of material circumstances. They directed him to put them into writing, and to send them, and they called for his hand to the former examinations and papers; which he gave them, and the same day writ to them as followeth.

To the Right Honourable the Lord-President and Council of State.

May it please your Lordships,

According to the favourable licence by your Lordships to me given, I have digested into writing those matters of circumstance, wherein my Examinations and Narrative are in defect of my memory only uncertain and short; humbly praying, that they may be received and made a part of that relation, which I must abide by at my Trial; and that the former errors may be rectified and defects supplied so far, as by this supplementary account upon my serious re-collections given, may be done. And I shall then be confident, I shall appear not to have wilfully concealed (however guilty) or misfrendred any thing pertinent, whether the same carry with it my condemnation, or excuse.

What passed between myself and Mr. Barnard, before my acquaintance with Holmes and Benson, and which is exprest in my Answers and Narrative, was in time before Easter-Term last, when there was an order for departure of persons in my condition, from this Town; and I in obedience thereunto, did leave this City on Saturday the 6th of May, and came to Mr. Osborn's house at Carleton-Hall in Sussex, on Thursday following; from whence I stirred not at any time more than five miles, until the sixth of August, when I was sent for to make assurances between a Kinswoman and her husband in point of Jointure, by them to me mutually referred: in which business, and in other matters between another Kinswoman, and a Merchant of London, being under reference to arbitrement; as also in endeavouring to get some friend to contract in the behalf of my daughter, for the reversion of a Lease holden of the Dean and Chapter of Ely, in which she is interested for a life in being, I continued in and near the City, until the third day of September; in which time Barnard voluntarily brought to my acquaintance Holmes and Benson, upon the pretences in my Answers and Narrative set forth, to which I humbly refer.

The note which mentions Benson's going with me to Cambridgeshire, and so to Sir John Gell, which in my answers I have expounded, was drawn from me by Barnard's importunity, and written at his request; but what use he made of it, (other than to lay it up, and reserve it for his present purpose) I know not, nor had any account of it, but went away the third of September, there being no conclusion of any thing to be done in substance, or circumstance positive. But Mr. Barnard, who knew how to direct to me, promised by Letter to intimate further to me; from whom after that, I never received any Letter or Message to that, or any other purpose, until my return near Michaelmas-Term; when he told me, that the unsuccessfulness of things in Ireland had been the impediment.

As to the day, viz. the 18th of October, being the Fair-day at Ely, it was only in discourse mentioned to be an opportune time, in case the Isle were (as indeed it was not) garrisoned. Neither any solemn or serious design or conclusion, then-to-fore or then-after made or laid, other than in transient communication; nor any person engaged so much as by word or promise, until this fresh stratagem was set on foot by Barnard.

I drew Sir John Gell's petition before Christmas, and had several complements from him by Holmes, (at least pretended) before I saw him, and I believe after Twelf-tide I was invited to him, and entrusted by him in the composing the differences between him and his Lady: in the last Term I drew his answer, and in the several times of our casual or occasional meetings, the discourses have amounted to what I have before signified, and in your presence and his avowed; and how more exactly to give your Lordships an account in time, I cannot.

As to the matter of the engagement, I abide by what I have formerly said, with this only, that at my engaging, which was late in the night, before my going out of Town, in obedience to the Act, I was promised by Benson, that if Sir John Gell, and their pretended friends of the Country did not engage, I should be disengaged; and in the hour of my going away, Barnard being not ready according to promise, but by Benson pretended to be at

Tottenham-

Tottenham-Court with some Buckinghamshire men, and that he would undoubtedly follow; I told Benson, as I remember, in the presence of Captain Ashley, that whether he came or not, I must for the present remove to Gravesend, not having convenience of horse to go elsewhere so suddenly. And if there were performance on Barnard's part with me, I should be ready on mine; and if not, I desired to be disengaged, and left to pursue my private occasions into Surry. And I did really carry with me deeds of my Clients, to have employed myself upon, in case of their failure with me.

I humbly beg your Lordship's pardon for a favourable interpretation of this trouble, which is a duty to truth, and right to others, and myself; which could not be omitted by

(My Lords)

Your Lordships humble prisoner, and servant,

E. S. ANDREWE.

This, together with a petition for allowance and liberty of friends resorts, being the same day sign'd in the presence of the Lieutenant, were seal'd up, and sent to the Lord President's own hand.

This was his second petition, which with a former to the same effect, (and not of moment to subscribe) did never receive any answer.

At the same time he writ to Sir Henry Mildmay, on the behalf of the Gentlemen who were taken with him.

Mr. Andrewe at several times took upon him to aver to the Committee of State, that they had spies upon him for some years; and particularly Barnard; which the Lord-President did not deny, but justified the State, by the practice of all States to set watches upon persons of ill affections to them.

This day the Lord Grey was with the other three of the State.

His third petition sent about Easter, being by Sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Scot put upon it, to submit himself, with promise of favour if he sought the State in such manner; which for his relations sake he did, but with some caution, in these words.

To the Right Honourable the Lord-President, and Council;

The Humble Petition of Eusebius Andrewe.

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner is seriously sensible, and humbly acknowledgeth, that for his high delinquency against the State, he is become forfeited to their Justice.

That he hath not in the least prevaricated with your Lordships, in the confession of his proper faults and follies, nor hath kept aught reserved concerning himself, or any person, or thing, which may satisfy your Lordships, and more secure the State; and is not hopeless to be look'd upon as capable of your present favour and future mercy, which he now doth, and shall always implore.

That his present deserved condition is made more uncomfortable, by his wants, and the exclusion of his friends and relations; without a supply in which, life itself becomes a punishment.

Your Petitioner casting himself at the feet of your Lordships, humbly prays,

That his being prosecuted before the High Court of Justice, may be suspended.

That by your order, his past and future charge of necessaries may be discharged, whilst he remains your prisoner.

That his friends and kindred may have recourse to him, and that he may have the freedom of his pen.

And in case your Petitioner shall be found in the least to misapply those favours, he shall adjudge himself worthy of a total deprivation of them, and of your future goodness towards him.

And your Petitioner, &c.

This was less than was look'd for, though as much as he could venture on; in which his desire for respect of his Trial was inserted, to prevent only his being the first, and exasperating them by giving others aim in the scrupling the Court.

This petition was solicited thirty-three days, but no answer could be obtained; and his wants growing upon him daily, he put in the Lieutenant's hands this following petition.

The Petition, (with stile as formerly, &c.)

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner hath been twelve weeks close prisoner, his friends neither permitted to visit, nor daring to relieve him, his score for necessaries swoln beyond his ability to discharge, his credit protested, and nothing more visible to him than his immediate perishing.

That he hath not been wanting to pray your favours, having three petitions lodged with your Lordships, constantly solicited, but unanswered.

That he hath in his confessions spared nothing which can more conduce to the State's security, or his own condemnation.

Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays,

That if at all he must, he may speedily receive his Trial, he being ready to submit to the will of God in the issue.

That if mercy be reserved for him, which he hath, and doth implore, your Lordships would please to admit him to sue out his pardon, and to a free conversation in this Commonwealth, upon security given for his future good demeanour.

That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Church and Tower, and the freedom of his friends resort, and that order may be given for the debt incurred there in the time of his close restraint to be discharged.

And your Petitioner, &c.

The Warrant of Commitment, which I could not get a Copy of till the 14th of July, is as followeth.

THESE are to will and require you, herewith to receive into your custody the body of Eusebius Andrewe Esq; and him you are safely to keep in close imprisonment in the Tower of London, in order to his further examination, he being committed unto you for High-Treason, in plotting and endeavouring the subversion and alteration of the present Government. Of this you are not to fail; and for so doing, this shall be your Warrant.

Given at the Council of State sitting at Whitehall, this 30th day of May 1650.

Signed in the name, and by the order of the Council of State appointed by Authority of Parliament.

To the Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

John Bradshaw, President.

This

This warrant is vitious in itself, for two reasons, which make a right warrant of Commitment, Coke's 2d part Instit. fol. 52, 590, 591. allowed by the Parliament.

1. That it is not done by due process of Law.
 2. That it hath not a conclusion, viz. 'And safely to keep until he be delivered by due course of Law.'
- But leaves it indefinite, and is rather a condemnation to perpetual, at least, to arbitrary imprisonment, which is worse.

The close imprisonment is but in order to his further examination, and he had been twice since examined, and signed his examinations before Easter, and did not refuse to answer any question demanded of him.

The Warrant is dated from the Council of State sitting at Whitehall the 30th of May; whereas he was brought to the Tower the 30th of March, being Sunday, by seven in the morning, at the opening of the Gate (no Council sitting) and the Warrant sign'd on Saturday the 29th of March.

Having attended a Month in expectation of an answer to his last Petition, he petitioned the Parliament again.

To the High and Honourable the Parliament of England,

The humble Petition of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq; close Prisoner in the Tower of London:

Sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner hath been by a confederate pack of setters, wrought into actions, which (abstracted from their circumstances) render him liable to your Justice; and this done, not without their further hope, that your Petitioner, as they supposed, had interest to have drawn divers persons of quality and fortune into the same entanglement.

That failing of that part of their aim, the said confederates did betray your Petitioner to the honourable Council of State, by whose Warrant he hath been sixteen weeks a strictly close prisoner, without a fortune of his own, the access of friends, or means of subsistence allowed; and is to perish by his wants, before it be distinguish'd by a publick Trial, whether he be a fitter object for the applying of your Justice, or your Mercy.

That he is hereby disabled to be accountable to the service of God, the duty to his family and friends, and to those who give him credit for bread. And in case he should be call'd from such his close restraint to his Trial, must be destitute and deprived of all fair means of making his reasonable defence; which, however it may suit with policy, will not be consistent with Religion and Honour.

Your Petitioner having for relief in the premises, by all opportune Addresses, and by four Petitions importunately solicited and sought the said Council of State without answer; in the deep sense of his pressing sufferings humbly appealeth to this high Court, casting himself wholly thereupon, and as humbly prayeth,

1. That you would prevent your Justice by your Mercy, and admit him to sue out his pardon, upon security given for his future good demeanor to the State in this Commonwealth,

2. That if that be too great a favour, you would grant him licence to depart the Commonwealth, he engaging not to act, or contrive aught to the disservice of the State.

3. That if he be not thought capable of either, but that he must receive a publick Trial, he may have a convenient time of preparation, after a qualifying of his imprisonment.

4. That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Tower, and resort of his friends; and that by your order, his debt for livelihood, incurred in his close restraint, may be discharged.

In all which your Petitioner is ready to submit to the will of God, whose providence hath put Justice and Mercy into your present dispensing.

And shall ever pray.

Notwithstanding his Petitions and Letters, he was brought before the High Court of Justice (in August) of which John Bradshaw was President, and his own Narrative was urg'd against him as a confession, and Attorney-General Prideaux used him with very ill Language. But he put into Court his answers in writing, which were as follow,

The humble Answer of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq; in his defence to the proceeding against him before the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of Aug. 1650.

THE said Respondent (with the favour of this honourable Court) referring and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further answer, offereth to this honourable Court,

First, That by the Statute or Charter stiled Magna Charta, which is the fundamental Law, and ought to be the standard of the Laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet unrepealed, it is in the 29th Chapter thereof granted and enacted,

1. That no Freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or free custom, or be outlawed, or exiled; or be any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by a lawful judgment of his Peers, and by the Laws of the Land.

2. We shall sell to no man, nor defer to any man Justice or Right.

Secondly, That by the Statute of 42 of Edw. III. chap. 1.

1. The Great Charter is commanded to be kept in all the points. And,

2. It is enacted, that if any Statute be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none; which Statute is unrepealed.

The Respondent observeth, that by an Act of the 26th of March 1650, intituled an Act for establishing an High Court of Justice; power is given to this Court, to try, condemn, and cause execution of Death to be done upon the Freeman of England, according as the major number of any twelve of the Members thereof shall judge to appertain to Justice.

And thereupon the Respondent doth humbly infer and offereth for Law,

That the said Act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconsistent with the said Great Charter, and is therefore by the said recited Statute to be holden for none.

That it can with no more Reason, Equity, or Justice, hold the value and reputation of a Law (the said Statute before recited being in force) than

if,

if, contrary to the second clause in the 29th chap. of Magna Charta, it had been also enacted, that Justice and Right shall be deferred to all Freemen, and sold to all that will buy it.

Thirdly, That upon premising, by the Petition of Right, 3 Car. that contrary to the Great Charter, Trials and Executions had been had and done against the Subjects by commissions martial, &c. it was therefore prayed, and by the commission enacted, That,

1. No commissions of the like nature, might be thenceforth issued, &c. And that done,

2. To prevent, lest any of the Subjects should be put to death contrary to the Laws and Franchise of the Land.

The Respondent humbly observeth and affirmeth, That

This Court is (though under a different stile) in nature, and in the proceedings thereof, directly the same with the commission martial; the Freemen thereby being to be tried for life, and adjudged by the major number of the Commissioners sitting (as in Courts of Commissioners martial was practised, and was agreeable to their constitution) and consequently against the Petition of Right; in which he, and all the Freemen of England (if it be granted there be any such) hath, and have right and interest; and he humbly claims his right accordingly.

Fourthly, That by the Remonstrance of the 15th of December, and the Declaration the 17th of January, 1641, the benefit of the Laws and ordinary Courts of Justice, are the Subjects birth-rights.

By the Declarations of the 12th of July, and 16th of October, 1642, the preservation of the Laws, and the due administration of Justice, are owned to be the justifying cause of the War; and the ends of the Parliament's affairs, managed by their Swords and Councils. And God's curse is by them imprecated, in case they should ever decline those ends.

By the Declaration of the 17th of April 1646, promise was made not to interrupt the course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

By the Ordinance or Votes of Non-Addresses, Jan. 1648, it is assured on the Parliament's behalf, That Though they lay the King aside, yet they will govern by the Laws; and not interrupt the course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

And thereupon the Respondent humbly inferreth and affirmeth, That

The constitution of this Court is a breach of that publick faith of the Parliament, exhibited and pledged in the Declarations and Votes to the Freemen of England.

And upon the whole matter the Respondent (saying as aforesaid) doth humbly affirm for Law, and claim as his right,

1. That this Court, in defect of the validity of the Act, by which it is constituted, hath not power against him, or to press him to a further answer.

2. That by virtue of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and the before-recited Remonstrance and Declarations, he ought not to be proceeded against by this Court, but by an ordinary Court of Justice, and to be tried by his Peers.

And prays, That this present answer and salvo may be accepted, and registred, and that he may be tried by his Peers accordingly.

EVS. ANDREWE.

The farther and second Answer of Eus. Andrewe, Esq; to the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of Aug. 1650.

THE said Respondent (with the favour of this Honourable Court) reserving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further answer (if it shall be adjudged necessary) in all humbleness for present answer, offereth to this honourable Court,

That by the letter and genuine sense of the Act, entitled, An Act for establishing an High Court of Justice, the said Court is not qualified to try a Freeman of England (and such the Respondent averreth to be) for life in case of Treason.

First, For that, 1. The said Court is not constituted a Court of Record, and (but upon Record) cannot at all have that account of their Freemen, which Kings were wont to have of their Ministers of Justice.

2. The Freeman, and such who are and may be concerned in him, can have no Record to resort unto, by which to preserve the rights due to him and them respectively, viz. of

1. A Writ of Error, in case of erroneous judgment, due by the precedents.

2. A Plea of Auterfoys acquit, in case of new question for the same fact; the right to which, and the necessity of such Record, appears by

3. A being enlarged upon acquittal, as is the Freeman's due, by the Stat. 14 Hen. VI. C. 1. and the case thereupon grounded.

4. A Writ of Conspiracy against those who have practised the betraying the Life of the Respondent not to be brought before acquittal, and no acquittal but upon Record, as appeareth by Pascb. 39 Ed. III. fol. of Gaunt's case. 4 Ed. III. Rot. Par. Num. 13. Count de Arundel's case, 42 Ed. III. Rot. Par. Nu. 23. Sir John of Lee's case.

Wetherel and Darley's case, 4 Rep. 35 Eliz. Vaux's case, ibid. 33 Eliz.

The Poulterer's case, 9 Rep. fol. 55.

This Court is to determine at a day, without account of their proceedings, have power to try, judge and cause execution, but not to acquit or to give enlargement: so that the nocent are thereby punishable, the innocent not preservable; the injured and betrayed not vindicable; which are defects incompatible with a Court of Justice, and inconsistent with Justice itself, and with the Honours of a Christian Nation and Commonwealth.

Secondly, For that the Members of this Court are by the Act directed to be sworn,

1. Not in conspectu populi, for the Freemens satisfaction.

2. Not in words of indifferency, and obliging to equality.

3. In words of manifest partiality, viz.

You

You shall swear that you shall well and truly, according to the best of your skill and knowledge, execute the several powers given unto you by this Act.

The Respondent humbly offers, That,

1. The Court in their capacity of Triers ought (in reason) to have been appointed by their constitution, to have been sworn as Triers in full Court, according to the practice in all equal ways of Trial.

2. The Court as Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, (being authorized by the Act to hear and determine) should in like reason be appointed by an Oath, such as is usual for persons so qualified, as provided by 18 Edw. III. viz.

You shall swear, that well and lawfully you shall serve our Lord the King, and his People (mutatis mutandis) in the office of Justice, &c. and that you deny to no man common right, &c.

Or some Oath equivalent at least to that of a Justice of Peace, Dalton, fol. 13.

I A. B. do swear, that I will do equal right; and according to my best wit, cunning, and power, after the Laws and Customs of the land and the Statutes thereof made, &c.

3. The Court in the capacity of Triers should (in reason) be obliged by an Oath, of as equitable sense as that usually administered to Jurors, viz.

You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our Sovereign Lord the King, (mutatis mutandis) and the prisoner at the bar; so help you God.

Whereas when this Court shall (as it is now constituted) have condemned the Freeman, the Respondent, or other, by applying their skill and knowledge, to their power, whether justly or not, the Oath by them taken is not in the letter broken; as to be exactable by man, though God will probably have a better account.

And therefore upon the whole matter premised, the Respondent (having as before) offers for law and reason, that the honourable Court, the High Court of Justice, is not, by the letter and proper sense of the words of the Act, by which it is constituted, qualified in respect of the pre-objected defects to pass upon him for his life, upon a charge or crimination of High-Treason.

And humbly prays, that this his second Answer, and Salvo, may be received, and registered; and that he may be tried, as in his former Answer he prayed.

EUS. ANDREWE.

The farther and third Answer of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq. to the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of Aug. 1650.

THE said Respondent (with the favour of this honourable Court) reserving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further answer, (if it shall be adjudged necessary) in all humbleness for present Answer, offereth to this honourable Court,

That, First, It is his right (if he must admit this Court to be duly and legally established and constituted, as to their being a Court) to be tried by his

VOL. VII.

Peers, men of his own condition, and neighbourhood.

Secondly, It is within the power of the Court by the Letter, and Sense of the Act, or at least as being not repugnant to the Act, to try him by such his Peers, &c.

First, That it is his right to be so, and only so tried, appears by Magna Charta, cap. 29. 25 Edw. I. cap. 1, and 2. 25 Edw. III. cap. 4. 25 Edw. III. cap. 2, and 4. 28 Edw. III. cap. 4. 37 Edw. III. cap. 18. 42 Edw. III. cap. 3.

By all which Statutes made in full Parliament, consisting of the head, and all the members actually, as well as virtually, this the Respondent's right is maintainable, and demandable, and the contrary proceedings thereunto are to be held for none, and redressed, &c. to be held for void, and error, &c.

So that, if the Laws and Courts were not obstructed, (in the cases of some sort of Freeman of England,) the whole proceeding contrary to these Laws, without a Jury of his Peers, were avoidable, and reservable by Writ of Error, as appears also by the precedents vouched by the Respondent in his second Answer.

Secondly, That it is in the Court's power to try the Freeman, and consequently the Respondent, by a Jury of his Equals; the Court is humbly desired to consider the words of qualification.

The Court is,

First, Required to hear and determine; and so, if at all Commissioners, then Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, and such Commissioners, in their natural constitution and practical execution, do proceed against the Freeman according to Law, by a Jury of his Equals, and not otherwise.

Secondly, Authorized to proceed to trial, condemnation, and execution, &c. But not restrained to the manner of Trial, limitative, as to trial by the Court's opinion as Triers, non exclusivè, as to trial per Parit; but is left in the manner, as in the judgment itself, to the opinion of the major number of twelve; and if they shall think fit to try by a Jury, it will be no offence against the Act, there being no clause or prohibition to the contrary.

And therefore the Respondent humbly claimeth his said Right, as consisting with the said Power.

And the more to induce the Court to grant him such his right, and the benefit thereof, the Respondent humbly representeth the manifest wrong, and multiplied disseverison, done to him, and in him to the Freemasonry of England, in the following particulars of their like just right, (depending upon such trial to be allowed) if denied him, by this honourable Court.

First, The benefit of Challenge to the Triers, thirty-five preeminently, and for Treason sans number.

Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 150.
Tis. Challenge, Poyning's case. 32 Hen. VI. Fitz. fol. 26. Allowed Hill. 1 Jacobi to Sir Wal. Raleigh and Brooks.

Secondly, The liberty of Seeing, hearing, and counter-questioning the witnesses, for clearing the evidence in matter of circumstance, as well as in matter of fact; which appears to be the Respondent's right by

U u 2

Stampf.

Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 1 and 2 Phil. and Mary, 163, 164. the Statute } cap. 10 and 11.
of } 1 Edw. VI. cap. 12.

The Authority of (the Law's Oracle) Coke 2 part Inst. fol. 12. commenting upon the words in 25 Edw. III. cap. 2. Provablement Attaint, because the punishment was heavy, the proof to be punctual, and not upon presumptions, or inferences, or strains of wit, but upon good and sufficient proofs: also by the Statute of 1 Eliz. cap. 6. 13 Eliz. cap. 1.

Thirdly, The being Convinced, or acquitted by a full, free, and fully-consented verdict. For

First, A verdict by a Jury passeth from all, or not at all. In the proceeding by voices, a sentence passeth by way of concurrence, with which the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, and Courts-Martial, were branded, and condemned of Inequality.

Secondly, A verdict passeth upon a Jury before discharged, upon their affairs of Estate, or supplies of Nature, to prevent corruption of money and power; but as this Court proceeds (if it will proceed by voices) a Trial may be had this day, and a sentence may be given at leisure; when the will of those, by whom the Freeman is prosecuted, be first known.

And upon the whole matter,

The Respondent humbly claims the benefit, and right of being tried (if before this honourable Court) per Pares, men of his own condition, and of his neighbourhood, and that he may hear and see all the witnesses produced against him, viva voce & aperto vultu; and may have power, liberty, and time to produce witnesses in his defence.

And (saying as formerly) humbly prays that this his Answer, and Salvo, may be received, and registred.

E. U. S. ANDREWE.

The several Arguments of Col. Andrewe at his Trial.

The First Argument.

My Lords; and you Gentlemen, Members of this Honourable Court,

I Have (as becomes me) been attentive to the charge which has been read against me. It appears in that dress it is put already, (though I presume it shall be clad in other apparel by Mr. Attorney) so specious, and so great, as that my friends (if I have any here) begin to fear, the indifferent to doubt, and the partial to desire, and join in my condemnation; myself (I hope I am not partial to myself) believe, that it will be no more than the mountain's labour, and when it shall come to be dissected, will prove to be inane aliquid; like the Apples of Sodom, that however they take the first sense, the eye, as this the ear, do rather foul the fingers that touch them, than satisfy the appetite in its expectation upon them.

My Lord,

I am at an unusual bar, and engaged in a great cause of a far extendable concernment, my fee is life, and my duty is self-preservation; which in itself were less considerable, if by a precedent of my suffering, the consequence would not prove mischievously epidemical.

I do not wilfully refuse to plead to the charge, but humbly crave leave to offer my reasons for the suspending of my Plea. And if I be importunate (yet within the bounds of civility) I beg your pardon, and that I may have a full, free, and an uninterrupted hearing.

My Lord,

When the Jews press'd Pilate to sentence Christ, they obtruded to him that they had a Law, and by that Law he ought to die. What they thought reasonable to claim, when it served their turn to vent their malice, will be I hope warrantable for me to lay hold on in a better sense, for the vindication of Christ, who suffers when Justice is a sufferer. We have a Law too, and by that Law, I ought not to plead, not to be tried, not to be judged.

The Laws of England were not unknown, but mispractised, when the Barons fought King John into a consent to the (not new making, but) reftorement of the ancient Laws.

And * Magna Charta itself is but a confirmation or restitution of the Common Law, and is become the standard by which Laws are reducible, and is the foundation of all other Acts of Parliament.

It hath been at no time dismembred; no part abrogated by any repeal.

It hath been confirmed above thirty times, and commanded as often to be observed and put in execution.

In the Act call'd Confirmatio † Chartarum, it is directed to be allowed as the Common Law in judgment, in all points, by all the Judges and Dispensers of Law, or which have the Law to guide.

It hath in former ages gained an honourable esteem in the old books: † Charta libertatum communis Libertas Angliae, Charta de Libertatibus, &c. these are the Appellations.

It was a Noli me tangere; and for seeking a reversal or avoidance of it, Hubert de Burgh was sentenced by the Barons, and the sentence confirmed by  King Hen. III.

The great Hugh Spencer in the reign of Edw. II. was banish'd, but for rashly counselling against the †† Encounter la forme de la grande Chartre.

And to draw downwards yet one King's reign, and to the point to which I would apply; I find in the 42d III of Edw. III. this great Charter was not only barely confirmed and commanded to be kept in all the points, for those are the words; but to prevent any alteration of it, it is enacted, That if any Statute be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none.

By this †† Magna Charta it is granted, and enacted too; if my Lord Coke say true, who saith it is a Statute, as well as a Charter, being made by assent and authority of Parliament; That

No Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or be disseised of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs, or be out-law'd, or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him nor condemn him, but but by lawful judgment of his Peers, and by the Law of the Land.

* Coke 1st part inst. fol. 80, 81. † 25 Edw. I. cap. 1. †† Bracton 414, 491. Fleta lib. 2. cap. 48. lib. 3. cap. 3. † Mirror cap. 2. 18. Briton fol. 177.  17 Hen. III. Rot. Cla. mem. 1. 2. Pro utriusq. M. 1. †† 14 Edw. II. †† 42 Edw. III. cap. 1. †† Coke 1st Inst. fol. 81.

We shall sell to no man, nor defer to any man either Justice or Right.

If this be truth and law, which I have in these particulars premised to you; then, my Lords, give me leave to take notice;

That by that Act by which you are constituted a Court of Justice, you are authorized to try the Freemen of England; not per Pares, upon or for offences against Articles, and the punishment to reach to life, as the major part of any twelve of the Commissioners shall judge to appertain to Justice.

Laying these together, a posting rider may read, that these Laws are diametrically opposite, and consequently inconsistent.

The latter hath its doom inherent by its innate contrariety to the former, and is a building, a superstructure so unsuitable to the foundation, that if it had not a double-edged support, it need no help to be demolish'd, but would fall, I know not whether to say, sua mole, or sua penfilitate.

The Constitutors of this Law are Gladiis cincti; and therefore as I am not in opportune place to speak to them, so there is something of danger to speak too freely to them; but, my Lord, your Lordship, as you are in this place, are (I am sure ought to be) like the Escutcheons of Princes, with their adopted supporters, Knowledge and Conscience: and if you are, I am confident you will doubt of your Commission or Warrant to proceed against me, and compel me to preserve an inch of life, by giving away mine and my Countrymens liberty, in condescending to a Plea and Trial, in this contra-legal way, and by power of this Act.

The Second Argument.

My Lord,

I shall further beg leave to call to your memory the Petition of Right; which was made the business of the Parliament, at the time when it was preferred, and received the Royal Assent; must never be forgotten by those who hold in esteem the care of Parliaments, and gracious concessions of Kings.

In the Proem or leading part of that Petition, the Statute of Magna Charta is instanced as to this particular, Trial for life by proper Courts, with other the Laws and Statutes, (some of which I have cited, and the rest shall upon another point in their place.) And as it is complained, that proceedings had been by Commissioners martial, when and where, if by the Laws and Statutes of the Land they had deserved Death, by the same Laws and Statutes also they might, and by no other Laws ought to have been judged; so it is prayed, and accordingly enacted, That no Commissions of like nature may be henceforth issued to any person or persons whatsoever to be executed, &c. and this to prevent, lest by colour of them, any of the subjects should be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the Laws and Franchise of the Land.

My Lord,

1. The Commissioners Martial were not evil in respect of the persons commissioned, being as this power is to you, so those always given to persons of quality and learning; but the evils of them were their proceedings by their own will and opinion, being themselves the Judges and the Jury; offices incompatible and inconsistent with the people's liberties, by the former Laws become their rights. When your Lordships shall read the Act by which you now sit, I am confident you will grant this power to be of the same nature, though not under the same name; and consequently in that Petition complained of, in supposition that such might be, and enacted against in Terminis, that none such should be.

2. For that you are called by the Act, Commissioners, and yet have no Commission, but the Act itself; whereas you should, in regard you are not a Court of Record in yourselves, have Commissions returnable at a day, into some Court of Record, where your proceedings might be extant and visible; and as you are now constituted, you have a day prefixed to determine in; but that being come, you are to vanish, and your vestigia will be as imperceptible to the times and men to come, as the trace of a Swallow in the Air; which is inconsistent with the Honour and Justice of any Kingdom, or of any Christian Commonwealth.

For that you have only by this Act, a bare and single power to adjudge, and cause execution to be done, in case you shall judge it to appertain to Justice; but you have no power, if you think it appertain to Justice, to acquit, and upon acquittal to discharge the person tried, as is the Law expressly in my * Lord Dyer; and in the Year-book of Edw. IV. grounded upon the Statute of † Hen. VI. 14 of his reign, cap. 1. That Justices of Nisi prius (who are Commissionary Justices) shall have power of all the cases of Felony, and of Treason, to give their judgment, as well where a man is acquitted of Felony, and of Treason, as where he is thereof attainted, at the day and place where the Inquisition, Inquest, and Jury shall be taken; and then from thenceforth to award execution to be made by force of the same judgments, which in an acquitted man's case can only be an enlargement.

But, my Lord, you have only power, if you can, to reach my life, if in your opinion deserving it: but not to reach me out of prison; so that if you kill me not here with the sword of Justice, you must leave me in worse hands, to be buried alive in restraint and want.

Which all is against the laws of Nature and Nations, and particularly of this land, that are all so ballanced and poised, as that they have equal regard to the delivery and freeing the Innocent, as to the condemnation of the Nacent.

And Isidore in his Etymologies says of a Law, thus;

Erit autem lex honesta, justa, possibilis, secundum naturam & consuetudinem patrie; loco, temporisque conveniens, necessaria, & utilis; manifesta quoque, ne aliquid incautum per obscuritatem captionis contineat; nullo privato commodo, sed pro communi civium utilitate conscripta.

And as Laws should be, so should Courts and the Dispensers of Laws be.

But, my Lord, if this Court must be granted to be a Court, yourselves can make no more of it than a Court, ex parte, and set up to serve a particular end, with the privation of the common utility and liberty, however ushered in with a preamble of another stile, of preservation of peace, and prevention of war; but Thucydides will tell you, my Lord, in his fourth book, That Turpius est his qui impia tenent insidiare bonesto prætextu, quam insidiosâ malevolentia uti; nam violentia videtur aliquid Juris habere, propter potentiam à fortunâ datam, sed fraus tantum ab injustitiâ oritur.

The Third Argument.

BUT, my Lord, if your Lordship be in your judgment and conscience satisfied, that the Act itself, in and as to its constitution, is good and valuable, and impowereth you sufficiently to proceed against me some way; then Argumenti ergo dato, sed non juris ergo concessio, that it is a Law, or an Act, and that all those Ordinances are out of doors; yet I pray your Lordship's leave, that I may make evident to your Lordship, that you are not hereby constituted a Court capable, in defect of the very letter of the Act, to pass upon any man, and consequently not upon me, in matter of life, or where life may be the concernment.

1. For Reason, you are not constituted a Court of Record, * which is absolutely necessary, having life and forfeiture of lands in your charge.

First, For the State, that they may have an account, (not in their Council-Chamber, but upon Record) what is become of the matter in issue, and of the person put upon his Trial.

2. For the Freeman of England, that in case he be acquitted of the crime wherewith he shall stand charged before this Court, he might at all times resort to the Record, upon any new question for the same fact, in any other Court holding Pleas of that nature, by which Record to plead his Auterfoys Acquitt, and to make his defence, as also to preserve his estate, si non legalem acquittat en le Poulterer's case 9. R. Benegist demant acquittal nul req. si non de Record. as also my benefit, a writ of Conspiracy.

To come nearer our own times, the like cause to complain, and the same redress is given in the Act† for abolishing of the Star-Chamber, upon the grounds and reasons drawn from these Laws; the Innovations and Invasions, upon which (as being fundamentals) was a great part of the substance of the grand remonstrance, committed to the whole World against the late King by the press: The ‖ charges against the Earl of Strafford and the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Interest of the Subject in these Laws, was cryed up to be so precious, as that it had influence even to the absolving of all old Oaths, and the imposing of new, and to bring to adventure estate and life, and soul, rather than to be usurped, or in the least intrenched upon.

Four ‡ several Declarations of the present Parliament have entitled the subject to them, and to the benefit of the ordinary Courts of Justice, as their birth-right. They have owned the preservation of them to be the cause of the War, and the ends of their affairs managed by their Swords or Councils; and God's curse is by them imprecated, in case they should ever decline the ends.

My Lord,

We have the Parliament's word and  promise, not to interrupt the course of Justice in the ordinary Courts.

And in the ordinance of Non-addresses to the late King, they say, Though they lay the King aside, yet they will govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

My Lord,

I am entitled to all these Laws, and these Promises and Declarations: and if this Court proceed against me, those notwithstanding, (the ordinary Courts of Justice being open and unobstructed) I am robb'd, and divested of them all, and in me the Freemanry of England are all despoiled, at the Parliament's will (according to this precedent) despoilable, and may with Mr. Stampsford, in his Pleas of the Crown, take up this saying, it will serve for a lamentation, Miseria servitus est, ubi jus est vagum & incognitum.

Attorney-General Prideaux. Take heed you scandal not the Court.

The Fourth Argument.

Thomas Aquinas (who, though a Papist, is not the less worthy to be vouched, where not Religion, but Policy, is the thing in question) saith, That Lex est regula & mensura actuum agendorum vel omittendorum, not Actorum and Omissorum.

And St. Paul says, Rom. vii. 7. Concupiscentiam nesciebam, nisi lex diceret non concupisces.

My Lord, your authority is in two several places to proceed against, as Traitors, such who have broken articles before they were made; viz.

Whosoever hath, or shall plot, contrive, or endeavour, &c.

Whosoever Officer, &c. hath, or shall desert their trust, &c. shall die without mercy.

And thus, my Lord, the end of Laws and Law-making is perverted; which are not merely to punish offenders, but to prevent offences, which amongst Christian Men was never otherwise done, but by way of premonition; by Laws first interdictory, and then subpenatory.

The Earl of Strafford did (and very reasonably) take it unkindly, and so express'd himself upon his Trial; that a neglected Law should lie moulding amongst old parchments 200 years unused and unexercised, and be at last brought out to measure his past actions by; or to use his own words, To lie like a Coal raked up in the ashes, to be at pleasure blown into a flame, and to make him and his family the first fuel to feed it. Truly if he had seen these articles (as he felt after somewhat like them) he would have cried out, and but modestly enough, that it is not mending of the fault, but the destruction of the person, which is manifestly designed in these Articles of Retrospection.

Disusage of Law, is some excuse for him who falls into a transgression; but the non-existence of a Law, is a justification of the greatest offence.

And, my Lord, as you are to look backward to actions done before the Law made, so you are to take cognizance of offenders against two former Acts, which make the Crimes therein certain in the matters of fact, fault and punishment; and if they be laws, they must be deemed part of the Laws of the land, and desirable and dispensable by the ordinary Courts of the land, in cases criminal: for extraordinary Courts of that kind, have long since (even by the Parliament, of which this is the surviving part) been denied.

And although it is true, that when some particular fact is committed by some one or more particular persons against the Laws criminal, it often falls (and properly enough) that especial Commissions of Oyer and Terminer are for some urgent and expedient reason issued to try the matter and men; yet those Commissions do not restrain the Commissioners to proceed only against those persons, and upon those particular crimes, which the common fame hath rendred hac vice, to be triable; but run in general terms, and with general enablement to try all manner of Treasons, Felonies, &c.

And the Reason is,

1. For that it might possibly fall out, that a grand Jury will not find the bill against John a Stile; and if not, the Commissioners are sent down without their errand, if only directed to try J. S.

2. It may fall out, that where there are Treasons or Felonies committed by J. S., they may be accompanied with misprisions and misdemeanours in J. O. And if the particular crime of Treason, and the particular person of J. S. be only authorized to be enquired of, then the Commissioners can do but half their work; and therefore this commissiary power of yours, my Lord (the ordinary Courts being not obstructed, and you limited to particulars) is so far against the Common Law and Usage, that it is against common and vulgar reason; and (pardon that I must say it) favours more of a Snare, than of a Law; and more of a warrant of arbitrary execution, than of an enablement, to and for a judicial and legal Proceeding or Trial.

The Fifth Argument,

My Lord,

IN all Courts of Justice, as there is supposed to be an equality intended to such as shall fall under their cognizance and inquiry, which is a principle of morality innate, as well as a practical policy; so there have always in this Nation, at least beyond memory, or indeed record to the contrary, been certain Oaths obligatory, and of indifference administered to persons either inquiring of, or passing judgment against, or upon the subjects in all cases whatsoever. And the same thing is but necessary in your Lordships and this Court to be done (if at all you will proceed in so weighty a matter as life) against which I make this exception,

1. If you are at all sworn, you are not sworn in Conspectu; and if you will be my Jury and my Judges also, I ought to have satisfaction that you are so sworn. Had you been only my Judges, and constituted after the ordinary manner, and to ordinary ends, I would have taken your being sworn for granted.

2. If you are sworn, and to no other words of Oath than what are comprized in the Act (which myself and all men else will easily believe you are not) then you are not sworn to any manner of equality.

The words are,

You * shall swear, that you shall well and truly, according to the best of your skill and knowledge, execute the several powers given unto you by this Act.

I beseech your Lordship, † that I may compare these words, with the Oaths of Judges in England, when it was a Kingdom.

The words pertinent are only these,

You ‥ shall swear, that well and lawfully you shall serve our Lord the King, and his People in the office of Justice, &c.

And that you deny to no man common right, by the King's letters, or none other man's, nor for none other cause, &c.

I ‡ A. B. do swear, that I will do equal right, &c. according to my best wit, cunning and power, after the Laws and Customs of the Land, and the Statutes thereof made, &c.

My Lord, these will concern you as my Judges, to consider how little the stiles agree, and how far your Oath is in respect of these unobligatory, and consequently unsatisfactory, to the persons which are or shall be concerned,

1. As to the first, yours contains no such words of equality.

2. As to the second Oath, yours hath such words as skill and knowledge, holding some resemblance with those of wit, cunning and power. But; my Lord, if your words were as well usher'd, and as well paged as those, it were some satisfaction, viz.

To do equal right, according, &c.

After the Laws and Customs of the Land, and the Statutes thereof made.

My Lord, as you are my Triers also, as well as my Judges, I beseech you to observe the Oath of a Juror, and the difference in sense (in letter, I know, for the dignity sake it ought to differ).

You  shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign Lord the King, and the prisoner at the bar, &c. I presume it is still the same (mutatis mutandis).

Truly, my Lord, when I look upon your enablement to try the matters and persons, which, and whom you are to try: you have power to destroy, and not to save; though to spare, yet not to acquit, or discharge; and your obligation by Oath to execute that power, according to your best skill and knowledge. I must needs say, and it is apparent, that when you have destroyed me, you have discharged all the duty that man can exact from you (though God will have a better reckoning) and instead of being tried by sworn Jurors, and adjudged by sworn Justices, myself and all who are or may fall into my condition, are to be tried by our sworn adversaries, I might have said sworn enemies; and we cannot in reason expect more Justice, than when the Son lays the wager, the Mother keeps stakes, and the Father is Judge, in a point of controversy.

More and better you may do, more or better we cannot by any light of reason expect,

The Sixth Argument,

BUT, my Lord, if all this be but a wind against a Rock, and move you to no declining of the exercise of your power, though against my right; yet certainly, my Lord, where your power and my right may be consistent, you will not stretch your power to the taking away my right, but rather by giving me my right, magnify your power.

This

This I may reasonably expect.

It is my right (granting you to be my Judges) to be tried by my Peers, the good men of my neighbourhood, and it is in your power (if your power be not inward) to try me so.

That this is my right, I must revisit * Magna Charta, Nisi per legale Judicium parium suorum.

The Law of Ed. I. having confirmed the great Charter, † faith, 'And we will, that if any judgment hereafter be given contrary to the points of the Charter aforesaid, by the Justices, or by any other our Ministers that hold Plea before them against the points of the Charter, it shall be undone and holden for nought.'

And upon this very Law or Clause, a writ of error was brought by the || Earl of Lancaster, for the misattainder of his brother; whose heir he was; and in that the points were two, and upon them both, judgment given for a reversal.

1. Quod non fuit arantatus & ad responsionem positus tempore pacis, eo quod cancellaria, & alie curie Regis fuerant aperte, in quo lex fiebat unicuique prout fieri consuevit.

Attinctus.

2. Quod condemnatus sive adjudicatus fuit absque aramiento seu responsione, seu legali iudicio parium, contra legem, & contra tenorem Magnæ Chartæ.

The like reversals, and upon the like reasons, have been had,

In the ‡ Count de Arundel's case.

In Sir John of Lee's case.

It is provided, that no man from thenceforth should be attached by any accusation, nor fore-judged of life, nor of limb, nor his lands, &c. against the form of the great Charter, and the Law of the land **.

My Lord,

Our fathers saw a Parliament (and reaped the blessing of it) which was called Benedictum Parliamentum (which hath circumscribed the loose interpreters of Treasons to a standard, and not left it to be Individuum vagum;) and there it is said, that persons guilty of High-Treason (and my charge is not for less) must be provably attaint of open deed, by people of their own condition.

And again it is accorded, assented and established, that from henceforth none shall be taken by petition, or suggestion made to the King, or his Council, unless it be by indictment, or presentment of his good and lawful people of his neighbourhood where such deeds be done, in due manner, or by process made by writ original at the Common Law; Nor †† that none be ousted of his franchises, or of his freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and fore-judged of the same by the course of Law; and if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed, and holden for none.

It is assented and established (for the good governance of the Commons) that no man be put to answer without presentment before Justices, or matter of Record, or by due Process and Writ original, according to the old Law of the land; and if any thing from henceforth be done contrary, it shall be void in Law, and holden for error.

My Lord,

That it is my right to be tried by a Jury of twelve men de vicineto, is evident; and it is as evident, that if you otherwise proceed with me (if Law were not out of fashion) you would but weave Penelope's web, and one day's judgment would be unravel'd by the next day's writ of error.

But after-games for life are dangerous; and for estate, I have no great cause to be solicitous: but my right is my duty to preserve, as in relation to myself, and my honour to keep it, if it may be, from being in my precedent taken also from my Countrymen the freemen (if any such be now) of England, who have equal reason, though they may be wanting (some of them) of the same reasons wherewith to defend it.

That your Lordship may proceed by Jury, for aught is said, or contained in your Act to the contrary;

1. I pray consider the before-recited Laws are all unrepealed; and therefore if this Law intend to oppose those Laws, it should have repealed them, or at least have afforded a slight Non-obstante, or have given the subject the comfort of a hoc vice tantum, that we might not have thought ourselves robb'd of all, but only plundered of a part of our right for necessity and experience sake, or at least have given us the favour of the Earl of Strafford's Act, that it should never be drawn into example: but I am sure in this Act, that proceeding against him is super-exampled.

2. I desire you would consider your qualification; you are made Commissioners, and that of Oyer and Terminer, and those are not proceeders in their own proper natural and habitual constitution and practices, upon and according to their own judgments in matters of fact: you are in these words, viz.

Required to hear and determine, &c. constituted Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer.

3. You are authorized to proceed to Trial, Condemnation and execution, &c. but you are not restrained to the manner of such proceedings to Trial exclusively, as to Trial per pares, but left to do the manner of the Trial, as well as the judgment or execution, as you, or the major part of you, or twelve of you shall judge to appertain to Justice; And if such major part shall think fit to proceed by presentment and Jury, doubtless such your proceeding is no Premunire against the power given you by the Act; but it is justifiable to fall within the letter of the Act, and that without a strained construction,

4. And if when you may lawfully (I mean by your own Law, if, Argumenti ergo, it be granted a Law) try me by a Jury, and will not; then, my Lord, pardon me, that I must aver, that you take from me, and in me from the commonalty of England, three great privileges, franchise and rights; to which I and they are, by the known, ancient, and unabrogated, unrepealed and constantly practised Laws, entitled; which will be neither equitable nor honourable for you to do.

1. You take away the benefit of challenge, which I might make to a Jury or Jurors.

And that is contrary to my right, which is given me by the || Common Law, in favorem vite, to challenge challenge in case of High-Treason (for I go to no less) thirty-five peremptorily, and for reason of challenge fans number.

This was judged in 32 Hen. VI. abridged by * Fitz-Herbert, fol. 26. per challeng. where eight Jurors were sworn, and the rest challenged, a new return made; and those eight returned, and though formerly allowed and sworn, yet challenged, and adjudged good.

The like allowed in Hill, 1 Jac. in the cases of Sir Walter Raleigh and Brook.

If this benefit were allowed me, my Lord, to except or challenge the whole Court, who are in number and quality my Triers, as a Jury are, I should not need to be peremptory in my challenge, being furnished with abundant reason.

(Here he was interrupted by Keeble, who said, those Statutes and Cases were out of date now).

My Lord,

A Jury of Middlesex will be no more, nor less, if what I am accused of, to have endeavoured, should take effect; and therefore are not less concerned: I cannot say the same of the Court (or if I should, I should not be believed) and he that but whispers against † Diana at Ephesus, makes all the Craftsmen his enemies.

2. The second benefit and right, which by denying me a Trial per pares, you take from me, is the benefit of seeing, hearing, and counter-questioning the witnesses produced against me; which in such way of Trials, ought to be viva voce.

That such is the Law, † Mr. Stamford averreth in his Pleas of the Crown. And,

In Treason, two sufficient witnesses by the Statute  of Edw. VI. are requisite; sufficient in relation to their quality, and to the fulness of their testimony.

Sir †† Edward Coke (an Author as authentick as any) puts this for Law in his expositions of the words in the Statutes for Treason, Provably attaint; because the punishment was great, the proof should be punctual, not upon presumptions or inferences, or strains of wit, but upon good and sufficient proofs. And this he makes good by the Authority of †† Stamford, and the several Statutes of Philip and Mary, and of Queen Elizabeth, and of Ed. VI.

Now, my Lord, an evidence either taken in writing; as the person will voluntarily give it, or cautiously taken as the examiner will ask it (who is not sworn to take it indifferently, no more than the framers of the questions are to propound them fairly) may be a seeming fair, apposite, and a full testimony; or concerning the person giving testimony, or concerning the modus, the ubi, the quando, &c. the whole laid together may prove either nothing, or a malicious thing.

The case of Sir Thomas More, Lord-Chancellor, accused for bribery, is common; and I hope, if mine have fair play, it will prove no worse.

3. The third and last right and privilege you take from me, is the main of all the rest, and to the making of which (as it should be made up) all the rest are but conducting, and leading; that is, of a fair verdict.

My Lord,

By a Jury a verdict passeth from all, or not at all; and one knowing and conscientious man, may preserve that innocent man, whom eleven either ignorant or careless men would destroy.

This Court's sentence is to be stated by number of voices, and some of them possibly not judging their own judgments, but concurring where their opinion of another's judgment shall lead them; which, as it was the great evil of the late Court of Star-Chamber, so wheresoever it is used (in Trials of Life especially) it is and can be no other than an evil.

My Lord,

By and from a Jury a verdict passeth before their discharge upon their necessary affairs, nay affairs of nature; and therefore they will give it both the righter, because their evidence is fresh in memory; without the intervention of other matters, as also for that they are without opportunity to be perverted by money, or friendship. If this Court receive the evidence to-day, they may at any time (before the 29th of September next) give their sentence; for verdictum I never expect but from a Jury: and in the meantime, how much their own affairs may put the remembrance of me out of their heads; and how much the State's power may put my safety out of their hearts, I have just cause to suspect. For fear, I will not, being resolved never to be in love with that life, which the Common Law of England cannot protect; and had rather die the Law's Martyr, than live the State's Slave.

The Close.

My Lord,

I have said; and now it only remains that I tell your Lordship, that I desire you to take into consideration what I have said; and that you would not suddenly, but deliberately give your judgment, whether I ought to plead before you as Judges, and to the charge in the Articles, and not in a Presentment or Indictment? whether to be tried without a Jury, and condemn'd upon evidence unseen? which this is (and I desire it may be recorded). As I do not now wilfully refuse to plead or answer, but offer my reasons for the suspension of my Plea, until your judgment in the points be known and pronounced; so, if I be in them over-ruled, I shall then give such answer to the charge, as shall become a man in my condition.

Commissioners of the High Court of Justice to issue their warrant for the beheading him according to his Petition.

Col. Andrewe. If I be over-ruled by the Court, that I must either answer or be sentenced for my wilfulness; then I move that I may have a Copy of my charge, and a day assigned me to deliver my Answer under my hand.

Upon these Reasons:

1. If the Court proceed upon Articles, they cannot in reason conceive that I can plead the general issue to particulars; for in so doing, in case I be convinced of any one Article, I shall receive the doom of all.

2. For that de facto some of the Articles may be true, yet de modo they may not be available against me; and upon the general issue, I shall not be received to qualify fact with circumstance, and so instead of being allowed the freedom of my defence, which is allowed to every Thief in Newgate, I shall be tried and snared by such confession, or proof, as will serve the turn of my prosecutors, and not preserve myself, by making myself and actions understood.

The Articles are of several kinds and crimes; and as one single Plea will not be applicable to them all, so it is but requisite that I have a Copy of them, to give thereby to each one its proper Answer; which though in Indictments is not allowed, yet in this way of proceeding was never denied in the most arbitrary Courts.

The Council-Table gave a charge, and received answer in writing, in cases of Contempt against themselves or commands.

The Star-Chamber afforded the Defendant a Copy of the Bill, and liberty to examine and cross-examine witnesses, in case the fact charged were denied by the Answer.

The High-Commission the like, by their Articles and Proceedings upon them.

My Answer, if not in writing, may either not be understood, or misapprehended, or miss set down by the Clerk, to my prejudice.

If this be denied me, then I must conclude they intend to wipe off my head, with the smooth glazed sword of pretended Justice; and must apply myself to my memory, in reference to the charge, and shall hear it read, which by my own knowledge of what has passed between the State and me, I may conjecture; and therefore prepare these following heads, to help my memory, which in a case of so much concernment, is not totally to be relied upon.

First, As to what may be alleged against me in general terms, as a disaffected person, an oppugner of the State, or otherwise, &c.

There are two things which draw subjection, and oblige persons to a Commonwealth.

(1.) Protection in the State.

(2.) Personal engagement, or fealty in the subject.

(1.) Protection I have received none, but stand in the condition of a proscribed person.

1. Estate (if any) sequestrable, and not permitted by the Laws of the Nation to vindicate it.

3. Calling taken away, which the Turk would not have done, had he been Conqueror.

3. Dwelling not permitted where I can subsist, but where I may be obnoxious to want, and to the State's infliction of punishment, when they shall take occasion to repeat upon me any thing they shall call a crime, in reference to my past actions for the late King, and my Sovereign.

4. Right I can have none, unless I will damn my soul to preserve my estate, or repair my wrong by a contra-legal and contra-evangelical engagement.

This was sufficient reason, owned and justified by the Parliament, for their subtraction of obedience, ὁ Βασιλεὺς ὁ Προτομάρτυρος λαῶν, by their * Declarations, and Ordinances.

(2.) Fealty or personal engagement I have given none, viz.

1. I have not taken the protestation of May 1642.

2. I have not taken the solemn Oath and Covenant; yet if I had, I might have justified my actions by them.

3. I have not taken the negative Oath, because my Oath of Allegiance (from which no man can absolve me) is a negative to that, &c.

4. I have not taken the present engagement, much more against my Oath of Allegiance than the negative Oath.

If I had had so little conscience as to have taken them, I would have had so much as to have kept them; and the State cannot in reason expect from me, or any other, that we should take a second, when we see no conscience made of keeping the first; nor to take a third, the first and second being broken, without other dispensation than power, which like Alexander's sword cuts the Gordian knot which it cannot untie.

Neither hath any man assurance, if he should take the last engagement, that he should have liberty to keep it longer than the fancy of the State held to the now new fashion of Government.

And therefore I stand clear as a down-right subject of England, to stand or fall by the Common Laws of England; and if they will deny me that, they deny my Birth-right, which is equally righteous, and no more just, than to deny me my estate, my calling, my abode, my means of right.

Secondly, As to my action at Linton, I justify myself,

1. By the late King's Commission, which my accuser knows I had, and under which he was by the same King constituted my Major.

2. † What was done, was so done, when he who gave me the Commission was in being, and oppressed by injurious imprisonment; and what I did, was in order to his enlargement from his thralldom, and restorement to his lawful power; which was that to which my duty as a subject by my Oath of Allegiance did bind me in general terms, and the duty of my qualification laid me under a particular obligation.

It was done before the now reputed Parliament were, or pretended to be the supreme authority of the Nation, or had assumed the power of Government, or were framed into a State; and consequently I am not answerable to them for any opposition

* Declar. 17 April, 1646. Ordinance of Non-Addresses, in Jan. 1648.

† 11 Hen. I. cap. I. That the Subjects of this Realm are obliged, by reason of their allegiance, to serve the Prince for the time being, in his Wars for the defence of him and the land against every rebellion or foreign power, within the land or without; and ought not to suffer in life, member, estate or office for so doing.

to them, further than the Common Law binds to Parliaments without their head, and hand, or defective in their members; and as to such offence (if it be one) this Court is not qualified to take any cognizance.

Thirdly, As to the design concerning the surprize of the Isle of Ely, it was but a bare discourse or communication, and no formal design laid, agreed unto, nor person engaged in it, so much as by promise.

And in cases of conspiracy against the Lives of Kings, there were some Statutes made, that very words and communication should be reputed Treason; but all repealed, or expired;

And not thought fit by wisdom of Law-makers (having indisputable power to make Laws) to be revived since the days of Queen Mary, notwithstanding those very many Treasons hatched and designed against Queen Elizabeth, and King James, &c.

If in the highest point of Treason, communication be not Treason against lawful Princes; certainly, an affection where the offence (such as it is) is of a far inferior nature of itself, so it had a far inferior object, or subject, concerning whom such discourse was holden.

Fourthly, As to my supposed corresponding with the King, the Lord Hopton, and the Earl of Cleveland, (if true) it was so long since, as that it falls not within compass of this Court's Commission to try, being confined to infant matters of a year old, and my charge not exhibited to the Court of Justice, before Monday the 15th of July. My last letter received from Lord Hopton, bears date at the Hague, 18th or 28th of June, and was received in two days into Sussex.

Fifthly, As to the drawing, signing, or sealing of the engagement, it consists of several branches.

That de facto I did it, and must not deny it, because I have confessed it, which was more than needed, to them who knew it without enquiry; for I dare aver, that they had their instrument, by them employed, and cherish'd in betraying me to it: And have some years past, had a man in my bosom to watch me and my motions, which I did affirm to the Lord-President, and he not denied it, but said, it was no more than did become any State to do, who had so much cause to hold an active man in suspect, as they had me, having never come in, and laid down the Cudgels, but held to my principles, and was ready upon every occasion to take fire.

And this I will prove, if I have legal (or because that word is worn out of use) fair dealing from the Court. And,

Out of that I may justly infer, what will be visible enough, that it is the State's Act, and but my Consent, and they in no danger of me, but that I should preserve myself from their new Laws; into the lapse of which I was not otherwise, or by any other action fallen.

As to the parts of it,

1. It consists of an Oath of secrecy.
2. An owning of King Charles II. to be such.
3. A resolution to endeavour to make him such.
4. A crimination of the State, under the names of rebels, and opposers, who would not have him to be such.

To these, as they are rank'd.

The Oath of secrecy hath relation only as to the not discovering the co-engagers in that resolution; and the resolution itself being not Treason, the Oath of keeping secret that resolution is not greater than the thing resolved.

1. The thing resolved was to endeavour, but was not an actual endeavouring.

2. If it were an actual endeavouring, yet it can only be supposed, that it must be endeavoured by a war to be levied; and the endeavour to levy a war never actually levied, is not Treason against the King, against whom only, and his relations, by our old Laws, which are Laws, a Treason can be committed; and Petty-Treason I am not accused for.

That a bare intention, resolution, or engagement to levy a war is not Treason, I refer myself to my * Lord Coke; who tells us, (and he is a man of credit) in his Book (printed and allowed for Law by the Houses when they were two) that a conspiracy (and this engagement amounts not to so much, but rather to an intention only to conspire) to raise a war, (as hath been said, and so resolv'd) is no Treason by the † Act of Edw. III. until the War levied; as within, or to be reached by those words in that Law, (Overt Act:) and if it were not Treason in those words in the original, it falls not within the words of the translation of this new-born Law, viz. by any open deed.

As to the first and third branches of the engagement, which are interwoven, I conclude that neither of them, that is to say, neither the Oath, nor the Resolution, are Treasons either within the old, or the new Laws, either in respect of the persons against whom, or the progress made in the thing itself.

2. As to the owning of Charles II. it falls not within your Law; for that it is not a Publishing; Proclaiming, or publicly Declaring his Title. The words of the Act are, [proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote] which promoting is matter of action more than a private owning.

And this by the Oath itself was not to be publish'd, nor could, without publishing the engagement itself, which was contrary to the Oath.

And though it may be objected, that the raising the war could not be done, but by publishing his Title, and the Engagement at last; yet that, if it be granted, was no forwarder than an intendment: no more was this publishing, and being not done, falls not within your Act.

The crimination of the State is but guessed at by implication (for they are not named) to be meant, and I believe your Law reaches only to things literal, and not constructive only; and for the word Rebels, I hope they will not take that to themselves, and the word Opposers is a very innocent expression, and at the worst is all but a scandal.

Lastly, Be this engagement what it will, yet the terms upon which I signed and sealed it were such, as that it was my act not absolute, but upon condition, and to be undone and avoided, in case of the non-co-engaging of others, by the State's decoy assured to be ready to do it; and at whose instance, and for whose satisfaction, it was pretended to be desired at my hands.

If

* Coke 3. Inst. fol. 14, and 38.

25 Edw. III. cap. 2.

If the Court proceeds by way of Indictment, then I shall move, that those persons may be confronted, whom in my Narrative, Examinations and Letters I have named; and that I may demand of them, &c.

As also that Major Parker may be produced to be likewise demanded of, as a person by me lately, and since my papers sent to the State, discovered to be of the Plot to betray me.

If the Court proceed by way of Articles, and upon Examinations taken against me; I desire, and that is but reason, that I may examine my defence, as in all Courts, where such proceedings were used, was allowed.

If it be objected, That it was not used in cases of Treason, I answer, it is true, if they hold the ancient way of Trials, not; but if they proceed this way, it is but just; and otherwise the Court are at liberty to use all means, public or private, to catch me; but I have none to defend myself: so that it appears, that they seek not to do Justice, but Execution.

And whether they be confronted or examined, these questions are to be propounded, either viva voce, or by Interrogatory; and if by Interrogatory, I must stand upon a fair way of examination, viz.

That some one from me, as well as one for the State's behalf, may be present, and set down the examinations or depositions; and that I may have a Copy of them as well against me, as for me, as well taken already by the State, or to be taken upon my motion.

The Questions.

1. Whether he knows Major Barnard, how long? &c. What communication and correspondence concerning me, or my actions held between them? Whether he knew of the supposed design against the Isle of Ely, and of the late engagement? How he knew them, and upon what reason, and to what end discovered to him, and by whom?

2. Whether he did inform the State (or any Member of the Council) of them, and how long he hath so informed?

3. Whether he ever had in his custody the engagement under the hands and seals, and my letter to Sir John Gell? If so, where, and whether not at Gravesend at my being there? Whether he were sent to watch me, and knew of my being there, before my being apprehended?

The same questions (mutatis mutandis) to be propounded to Barnard; and farther to him, and to Benson, Holmes, Ashley, Smith, as they are marked.

4. Whether he did propound in both designs to me, or I to him? Whether I fought him, or he me? In what disposition he found me, upon the time by the Act limited for departure, &c.

5. Whether he were real to me in the particulars of persons, confederates or money, ready to engage and to be advanced; and if not, then to what end he feigned these to me?

6. Whether the letters by him to me produced from Smith; and Thatch or Thatcher, were true, or feigned? And if feigned, to what end, and by whom set on work?

7. Whether he were set upon me, to watch my ways and motions? And whether he were not promised, or did design unto himself profit for the discovering of me, and such whom I should bring in?

8. Whether I fram'd, or ever read the said supposed design? Or was to be de futuro acquainted with it?

9. Whether he brought, or I sought Benson, or Holmes? And whether confederates with him, or designed upon by him?

10. Whether my engagement were absolute, or conditional, and what I signified at my departure, and upon Barnard's not coming; and where Barnard was pretended to be, and where he really was? What promise I had concerning the return of my engagement, in case Sir John Gell did not engage at Gravesend?

11. Whether copies of letters weekly shewed to me, were real or feigned? And if feigned, why pretended to be real?

12. Whether there were really any Kentish, Dorset, or Buckinghamshire men, and who, confederates, &c.

These preparations formerly made in rough notes, were transcribed and put into form, and finished the 8th day of July 1650, by God's good assistance; notwithstanding my abundant disadvantages of close imprisonment, and want of Books, or advice; and I commit and submit the issue to God, whom I beseech to fortify my spirit, and enlarge my understanding, when they shall come to be made use of; myself resolving to be the Law's confessor while I live, and (if called to it) to be the Law's Martyr, when I die by the hand of the impending violence, under the specious name of Justice.

EUS. ANDREWE.

8. 7. 2. 1650. Domini.

His Exceptions to his Triers.

John Hurst, Esq; a man who hath had his hand in blood, viz. Mr. Bartin Hazelrigge in a duel; for which arraigned, &c.

A person trying, viz. a Juror, and in this way of Trial he is such, ought to be a Freeman, viz. not in person, but in his pre-judging opinion; which he is not, having published that the Respondent was the greatest Traitor in England, and that there was enough under his hand to hang him the Respondent.

Sir William Roe, Captain John Stone, two of my Triers, were employed to examine the Respondent, on the 2d of July 1650, and brought with them all the evidence against him; and therefore in their capacity of my Triers, by the rule in challenges, they are challengeable, and incapable to sit.

But no regard was had to any of his Exceptions, or any Answer returned to his Questions; and he was ordered to be beheaded.

The last Speech of Col. Eusebius Andrewe, on the Scaffold on Tower-hill, August 22, 1650.

THE Lieutenant of the Tower delivering the Colonel to the Sheriff, said, he had brought him thus far on his journey. The Colonel replied, I hope I shall neither tire in the way, nor go out of it.

When he came on the Scaffold (kissing the block) he said, I hope there is no more but this block between me and Heaven. After he had been some while while on the Scaffold, he spake to the people as followeth :

Christian Gentlemen and good People,

Your business here this day is to see a sad spectacle, a man brought in a moment to be unmann'd, cut off in the prime of his years, taken from further opportunity of doing service to Himself, his Friends, the Common-wealth, or especially to God. It seldom happens but upon very great cause ; and though, truly, if my general known course of life were enquired into, I may modestly say, there is such a moral honesty, as some may be so forward as to expostulate, why this great judgment is fallen upon me ? But know, I am able to give them and myself an answer ; and out of this breast, to give a better account of my Judgment and Execution, than my Judges themselves, or you. It's God's just displeasure towards me, for my sins long unrepented of ; many judgments withstood, and mercies slighted ; therefore doth my gracious Father chastise me with this correction, that he may not lose me ; and I pray you assist me with your prayers, that this rod may not be fruitless : that when under his rod I have laid down my life, by his staff I may be comforted, and received into Glory.

I am very confident, by what I have heard since my sentence, there are more exceptions made against the proceedings against me, than ever I made ; my Triers had a Law, and the validity of that Law is indisputable for me to say against it, or to make a question of it ; I should but shame myself and my discretion. In the strictness of the Law, something is done by me, that is applicable to some clause therein, by which I stand condemned ; the means by which I was brought under that interpretation, of that which was not in myself intended maliciously, being testimony given by persons whom I pity, so false, yet so positive, that I cannot condemn my Judges for passing sentence against me, according to legal Justice ; for equity lies in higher breasts. For my accusers, or rather betrayers I pity, and am sorry for them ; they have committed Judas's crime, I wish and pray for them St. Peter's tears ; and I wish other people so happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they have drunk more blood of Christian men, possibly, less deserving than myself.

It is true, there have been several addresses made for mercy, and I will lay the obstructions to nothing more than my own sins ; and seeing God sees it fit (I having not glorified him in my life) I shall do it in my death, I am content.

I profess, in the face of God, particular malice to any one of the State or Parliament, to do them a personal injury, I had never ; for the cause in which I had a great while waded, I must say, my engagements and pursuance in it, hath laid no scruple upon my conscience ; it was upon principles of Law, whereof I am a professor, and upon principles of Religion, my judgment rectified, and my conscience satisfied, that I have pursued these ways ; for which (I bless God) I find no blackness upon my conscience, nor have I put this into the bead-roll of my sins.

I presume not to decide controversies, I desire God to glorify himself in prospering that side that hath right with it, and that you may enjoy peace and plenty here, when I shall enjoy my God.

In my conversation in the world, I do not know where I have an enemy with cause, or that there is a person, to whom I have regret ; but if there be any whom I cannot recollect, under the notion of Christian men, I pardon them as freely as if I had named them ; yea, I forgive all the world, as I desire my heavenly Father for his Christ's sake to forgive me.

For the business of Death, it is a sad sentence in itself, if men consult with flesh and blood : But, truly, without boasting I say it, or if I do boast, it is in the Lord, I have not to this minute had one consultation with flesh about the blow of the Axe ; or one thought of it, more than my passport to Glory.

I take it as an honour, and I owe a thankfulness to those under whose power I am, that they have sent me hither to a place, however of punishment, yet of some honour, to die a death somewhat worthy my blood ; and this courtesy of theirs hath much helped towards the satisfaction of my mind.

I shall desire God, that those Gentlemen in that sad bead-roll to be tried by the High Court of Justice, that they may find that really there, that is nominal in the Act, An High Court of Justice, or Court of High Justice ; high in its Righteousness, not in its Severity : no more clouded with the testimony of folks that sell blood for gain. Father, forgive them, and I forgive them, as I desire thee to forgive me.

I desire you now to pray for me, and not give over praying until my last moment ; that as I have a very great load of sins, so I may have the wings of your prayers assisting those Angels that shall convey my soul to Heaven. And I doubt not but I shall there see my blessed Saviour, and my gallant Master the King of England, and another Master which I much honour, my Lord Capel ; hoping this day to see Christ in the presence of the Father, the King in the presence of him, my Lord Capel in the presence of them all, and myself with them, and all Saints to rejoice for evermore.

Dr. Swadling. You have this morning, in the presence of a few, given some account of your Religion, and under general notions or words, have given account of your Faith, Charity and Repentance : (then speaking to the standers-by) if you please to hear the same questions asked here, you shall, that it may be a general testimony to you all, that he dieth in the favour of God.

(To the Colonel.) Now, Sir, I begin to deal with you ; you do acknowledge, that this stroke you are by and by to suffer, is a just punishment laid upon you by God for your former sins.

Col. Andrew. I dare not only not deny it, but date not but confess it. I have no opportunity of glorifying God more, than by taking shame to myself ; and I have a reason of Justice, for justifying God in my own bosom, which I have intrusted to yours.

Dr. You acknowledge you deserve more than this stroke of the Axe, and that a far greater misery is due to you, even the pains and torments of Hell, that the Damned there endure.

Col. I know it is due in righteous judgment ; but I know again, I have a satisfaction made by my elder brother Christ Jesus, and then I say it is not due ; it's due to me, but acquitted by his mediation.

Dr. Do you believe to be saved by that mediation, and no other ?

Col. By that, and that only, renouncing all secondary causes.

Dr. Are you truly and unfeignedly sorry before God, as you appear to us, for all these sins that have brought you hither ?

Col.

Col. I am sorry, and can never be sorrowful enough, and am sorry that I cannot be more sorry.

Dr. If God should by a miracle, not to put you to a vain hope, but if God should, as he did to Hezekiah, renew your days, what life do you resolve to lead hereafter?

Col. It is a question of great length, requires a great time to answer; men in such streights would promise great things; but I would first call some friends to limit how far I should make a vow, that I should not make a rash one, and so offer the sacrifice of fools: but a vow I would make, and by God's help endeavour to keep it.

Dr. Do you wish health and happiness upon all lawful Authority and Government?

Col. I do prize all obedience to lawful Government, and the adventuring against them is sinful; and I do not justify myself (whatever my judgment be) for my thus venturing against the present Government; I leave it to God to judge whether it be righteous; if it be, it must stand.

Dr. Are you now in love and charity with all men? Do you freely forgive them?

Col. With all the World freely; and the Lord forgive them, and forgive me as I freely forgive them.

Dr. You have for some late years laid down the Gown and took up the Sword, and you were a man of note in these parts where you had your residence; I have nothing to accuse you for want of diligence in hindring the doing of injuries; yet possibly there might be some wrong done by your Officers, or those under you, to some particular men; if you had your estate in your hands, would you make restitution?

Col. The wrongs themselves you bring to my mind are not great nor many; some things of no great moment; but such as they are, my desire is to make restitution, but have not wherewithal.

Dr. If you had ability, you would likewise leave a legacy of thankfulness to Almighty God; something to his poor servants, to his lame members, to his deaf members, to his dumb members.

Col. My will hath been always better than my ability that way.

Dr. Sir, I shall trouble you very little farther; I thank you for all those heavenly Colloquies, I have enjoyed by being in your company these three days; and truly I am very sorry I must part with so heavenly an associate: we have known one another heretofore, but never to Christianity before; I have rather been a Scholar to learn from you, than an Instructor.

I wish this stage whereon you are made a spectacle to God, Angels and the World, may be a School to all about you; for though I will not diminish your sins, nor shall conceal or hypocrite my own, for they are great ones between God and myself; but I think there are few here have a lighter load upon them than you have, if we consider things well; and I only wish them your repentance, and that measure of faith God hath given you, and that measure of courage you have attained from God, and that constant perseverance God hath crowned you hitherto with.

Col. His Name be praised.

Here the Doctor prayed with him almost a quarter of an hour, after which the Colonel turning himself again to the people, spake as followeth:

One thing more I desire to be clear in, there lieth a common imputation upon the Cavaliers, that they are Papists, and under that name we are made odious to those of the contrary opinion. I am not a Papist, but renounce the Pope with all his dependencies. When the distractions in Religion first sprung up, I might have been thought apt to turn off from this Church to the Romish, but was utterly unsatisfied in their Doctrine in point of Faith, and very much as to their Discipline. The Religion I profess, is that which passeth under the name of Protestant, though that be rather a name of distinction, than properly essential to Religion: but that Religion found out in the Reformation, purged from all the Errors of Rome, in the Reign of Edw. VI. practised in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles, that blessed Prince deceased; that Religion, before it was defaced, I am of, which I take to be Christ's Catholick, though not the Roman Catholick Religion.

Then he turned himself to the Executioner: I have no reason to quarrel with thee; thou art not the hand that throws the stone: I am not of such estate to be liberal, but here is 3 l. for thee, which is all I have; now tell me what I lack.

Executioner. Your hair to be turned up.

Col. Shew me how to fit myself for the block.

After which, his doublet off, his hair turned up, he turned himself about to the people, and prayed a good while. Before he lay down to the block, he spake to the people as followeth:

There is none that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but hath something of pity in it; and may that mercy that is in your hearts, fall into your own bosoms when you have need of it: and may you never find such a block of sin to stand in the way of your mercy as I have met with.

I beseech you join with me in Prayer. Then he prayed, leaning on the Scaffold, half a quarter of an hour. Having done, he had some private conference with Dr. Swadling; then he taking his leave of the Sheriff and his friends, kissing them, and saluting him next him, he prepared himself for the block, kneeling down, said, let me try the block, which he did. After casting his eyes, and fixing them very intently above, he said, when I say, Lord Jesus receive me, Executioner then do thy office. Then kissing the Axe, he lay down, and with as much undaunted, yet Christian Courage as possibly could be in man, did he expose his Throat to the fatal Axe, his Life to the Executioner, and commended his Soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, through the meritorious passion of a gracious Redeemer. Saying the fore-mentioned words, his Head was stricken off at one blow.

Vera copia exam.

He died very resolutely *.

* Mr. Whitlock in his Memorials, page 473, says, The High Court of Justice (afterwards) proceeded against Sir John Gell, and he was sentenced by the High Court, for Misprision of High-Treason, to forfeit his Estate, and to be imprisoned during his Life.

Page 474. Capt. Ashley was sentenced by the High Court of Justice to have his Head cut off, and one Benson to be hanged, for conspiring against the Commonwealth, in the treasonable engagement of Col. Andrewe.

Mr. Benson was executed at Tyburn (the 7th of October 1650,) according to the Sentence of the High Court of Justice; but in regard that Capt. Ashley only subscribed the engagement, but acted nothing in it, he was pardoned by the Parliament.

XXV. The Trial of RICHARD FAULCONER, at the King's-Bench, in Term. Pasch. 1652. for Perjury.

N the 12th day of July, 1652, an Indictment of Perjury was delivered to the Grand Jury at Guildhall, London; the Copy of which Indictment was as followeth.

London, ff. Be it remembred, that at the general Quarter-Sessions of the publick Peace holden for the City of London, at the Guildball of the same City, on Monday the 12th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand, six hundred and fifty-two, before John Kenrick, Mayor of the City of London, Thomas Atkin, Thomas Andrewes, and Thomas Foot, Aldermen of the same City; and others their Fellow-Justices assigned to keep the publick Peace in the City aforesaid; and also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors committed within the same City; by the Oaths of Robert Dawkes, John Harvey, William Pitcher, Pelham Moore, George Boddington, Thomas Pierfon, Joseph Rustborn, Samuel Coleman, Richard Payn, John Drafgate, Robert Trolaffe, Richard Bartholomew, John Robinson, Robert Alkington, and Thomas Wilmer, good and lawful men of the City of London, then and there sworn, and charged to enquire for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by the authority of Parliament, and the body of the City aforesaid, it is presented that the Bill following is true.

London, ff. The Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, upon their Oath do present, That Richard Faulconer of Westbury, in the County of Southampton, Gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil; and minding and endeavouring to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Craven, Baron of Hampstead-Marshall, in the County of Berks, in danger of the loss of his life, and of the sequestration, confiscation, forfeiture of all his Lands, Goods, and Chattels within this Commonwealth of England; the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God one thousand, six hundred and fifty, at the Parish of Mary-Stainings, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London, before Samuel Moyer, Esq; James Russel, Esq; Edward Winslow, Esq; Josias Barners, Esq; and Arthur Squib, Esq; then being Commissioners for compounding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Estates of Delinquents and Popish Recusants, that the 15th day of April, in the said year of our Lord, one thousand, six hundred and fifty, were, or then after should be under sequestration, did upon the Holy Evangelists, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, swear, and upon his corporal Oath before the Commissioners aforesaid, on the said 10th day of February, in the said year, one thousand, six hundred and fifty, then having power to administer the said Oath, then and there depose concerning the said Lord Craven, in these English words following; That is to say, That about a fortnight before the conclusion of the Treaty at Breda, the Lord Craven, the Queen of Bohemia and her two Daughters came to Breda, to the Scots King Charles, and went not thence till the King went to Honfleur, a house of the Prince of Orange. That during that time, this Informant saw the Lord Craven divers times in presence with the said King; and every day with the said King at the Court there, he being there with the Queen of Bohemia, and her two Daughters, to take their leave (as they said) of the King of Scots, before he went to Scotland. That several Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the said King, to entertain them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, and re-instating him in his Throne; and deputed this Informant and Colonel Drury to present the said Petition, who indeed drew the same. That when this Informant and some other Officers came to the Court at Breda, intending to present the said Petition immediately to the King's hand; but finding the Lord Craven very near to him, likewise the Marquis of Newcastle (who presented his brother Sir Charles Cavendish, to kiss the said King's hand, the evening before the said King's departure, who this Informant saw kiss the King's hand accordingly;) the Lord Wilmot, the Earl of Cleveland, the Queen of Bohemia, the Lord Gerrard, &c. and a great bustle of business: this Informant, with Colonel Drury, applied themselves to the Lord Craven, intreating him to present the Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the King of Scots. The said Lord Craven taking the Petition, and reading the same, cheerfully said to Colonel Drury and this Informant, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you. Upon which they applied themselves to the said Queen, and she presented the Petition; after which, the King of Scots, the Lord Craven, the Marquis of Newcastle, and the Queen of Bohemia, with some other Lords, went into a withdrawing room, where this Informant and company could not enter. But the Lord Craven came forth of the withdrawing Chamber, and told this Informant and company, That they should receive an answer from the Queen

*Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he had spoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf: who afterwards came and told this Informant and company, that she had delivered their Petition, and that the King had taken order for it. The next morning at three of the clock, the King departed, but this Informant and company had their quarters satisfied by the Princess of Orange, according to the said King's order upon their Petition; and thereby to enable them to follow the said King in the prosecution of those wars against the Parliament of England, which was the effect of their aforesaid Petition: That this Informant saw the Lord Craven very often and familiar with the said King, and enter with the said King into the withdrawing Chamber, and staid there, the last night the said King was at Breda, very late: which said Oath was, the said 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand, six hundred and fifty, at the Parish and Ward aforesaid, reduced into writing, and taken before the said Commissioners, then having sufficient and lawful power to administer the said Oath, and to take the testimony and depositions of witnesses upon their Oaths in such cases. Whereas in truth neither did the several Officers, or any Officer make a Petition to the said King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England. Nor did several Officers or any Officer make a Petition to the said King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland; for the recovering of his just rights, or re-instating him on his Throne: nor deputed he the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to present the said Petition, in the said Oath mentioned; nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, apply themselves to the said Lord Craven, intreating him to present the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, intreat him, the said Lord Craven, to present the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did the said Lord Craven take the said Petition, or read the same; nor said unto the said Richard Faulconer and Colonel Drury, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you. Nor did the said Lord Craven tell the said Richard Faulconer and company, in the said deposition mentioned, that they should receive an answer to their said Petition, or that he had spoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf; as the said Richard Faulconer in and by the said deposition hath deposed. And so the Jurors aforesaid, upon their Oaths aforesaid, do say, that the said Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, did commit wilful, false, and corrupt Perjury; to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loss and infamy of the said William Lord Craven, and in contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth; to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the publick peace, &c.*

Sadler.

This Indictment, upon the Testimony then produced upon Oath, was accordingly found by the Grand Jury.

The same day that this Indictment was found, Colonel Drury, who had given evidence to the Grand Jury, repaired to Whiteball, to Captain Bishop (having been formerly examined by him concerning the Lord Craven, and told him, that as he was that morning going down Holborn-hill, he was served with a Subpœna to appear that day at Guildball, London; and that he was examined there concerning the Information given by Faulconer, against the Lord Craven: and that after he was sworn before the Lord-Mayor, he gave the same evidence to the Grand Jury which he had formerly given to Captain Bishop upon his examination. Whereupon the said Captain Bishop took the writ under seal out of his hand, with which he was served to appear, and said to Drury, how durst you be examined against the Commonwealth, and not acquaint me first therewith? And said further, Mr. Mayor (meaning the Lord-Mayor) had better have done something else, than to have suffered that Indictment to be found; and immediately calls for a messenger, and commits the said Drury to the custody of one Middleton, a messenger to the Council of State; who forthwith carried Drury away Prisoner into the Strand, to the house of the said Middleton, where the said Drury was kept by him in strict custody, from Monday that the Indictment was found, and the Sessions begun, till Saturday, that the Sessions was past; by which restraint of Drury, who had Faulconer's own hand-writing to produce against himself; and being otherwise the most material witness against Faulconer, there could be no further prosecution upon that Indictment that Sessions.

In Michael-Term, course was taken to remove the Indictment by a Certiorari into the Upper-bench, to the end the said Faulconer might be outlawed for Perjury. The Record being accordingly removed, a Capias in order to an Out-lawry was taken out against the said Faulconer, who for several Sessions before had refused to appear. At last the said Faulconer was taken upon the said Capias, and carried to Newgate, where he lay for some time, but would not appear, nor plead to the Indictment; whereupon the Prosecutors for the Commonwealth were enforced to move the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring him to the Bar, that he might be enjoined to plead, and accordingly the Court required him to plead; whereupon he pleaded Not guilty to the Indictment.

In Hillary-Term following, a day was appointed for Trial upon the Indictment, at Guildball, London, before the Lord Chief-Justice Rolls, where the said Captain Bishop and Faulconer appeared with their Counsel and Witnesses; and Mr. Rusworth also appeared in behalf of the Commonwealth with Counsel and Witnesses, and had given in the Record to have the Jury called: but it so fell out, that a person of integrity then in Court, who had gotten certain knowledge when and where the said Oath was taken, gave Mr. Rusworth notice, that the Oath given to Faulconer, was administered unto him at Whiteball in Middlesex, and not at Haberdashers-ball in London; and therefore the place being mislaid in the Indictment, a London Jury could not find a fact done in Middlesex: whereupon Mr. Rusworth immediately withdrew the Record for that time, and gave a stop to the Trial.

No time was mispent to recover this mistake : for within two days a new Indictment was drawn, and preferred to the Grand Jury in Middlesex (Sir Henry Blunt being Foreman) where the Indictment was found : and was as followeth.

Hillary-Term 1652.

Middlesex. Before this time, that is to say, upon Tuesday next after the morrow of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, this same Term, before the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, in the Upper-Bench at Westminster, by the Oaths of twelve honest and lawful men, it is presented, That Richard Faulconer, late of Westbury, in the County of Southampton, Gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil ; and minding and endeavouring to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Craven, Baron of Hampstead-Marshal in the County of Berks, in danger of the loss of his life, and of the sequestration, confiscation, and forfeiture of all his Goods, and Chattels, Lands, and Tenements, within this Commonwealth of England ; the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand, six hundred and fifty, at Whitehall, in the Parish of Martins in the Fields, in the County of Middlesex, before Samuel Moyer, Esq; James Russel, Esq; Edward Winslow, Esq; Josias Barners, Esq; and Arthur Squib, Esq; then being Commissioners for compounding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Estates of Delinquents and Popish Recusants, that the 15th day of April, in the said year of our Lord God, one thousand, six hundred and fifty, were, or then-after should be under sequestration, did, upon the Holy Evangelists, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent, and agreement, swear, and upon his corporal Oath, before the Commissioners aforesaid, on the said 10th day of February, in the said year one thousand, six hundred and fifty, then having sufficient and lawful power to administer the said Oath, and to take the testimony and depositions of Witnesses upon their Oaths in such cases, then and there deposed ; That several Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the Scots King Charles, to entertain them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, and re-instating him in his Throne. And did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners, swear, that the said Officers deputed him, the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to present the said Petition ; who, as the said Richard Faulconer, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners did swear, indeed drew the same ; and did also, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners swear, that he the said Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, applied themselves to the Lord Craven (meaning the aforesaid William Lord Craven) intreating him to present the said Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the King of Scots ; and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners swear, that the said Lord Craven taking the said Petition, and reading the same cheerfully, said to Colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you. And that the said Queen of Bohemia did present the said Petition ; and did also, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, before the said Commissioners swear, that the said Lord Craven after told him the said Richard Faulconer, and company, That they should receive an answer from the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he (meaning the said William Lord Craven) had spoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf. Whereas in truth neither did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England. Nor did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland. Nor did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entertain him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, or re-instating him on his Throne. And whereas in truth, the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, were not deputed by the said Officers, to present the said Petition, in the said Oath mentioned ; and whereas in truth, he the said Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, did not apply themselves to the said Lord Craven, intreating him to present the said Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did he the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, intreat him the said Lord Craven, to present the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. And whereas in truth, the said Lord Craven did not take the said Petition, nor read the same ; nor say unto the said Colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, There is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you. And whereas in truth, the said Lord Craven did not tell him the said Richard Faulconer and company, in the said deposition mentioned, that they should receive an answer from the said Queen of Bohemia, to the said Petition, nor that he the said Lord Craven had spoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf ; as the said Richard Faulconer in and by the said deposition hath deposed. And so the Jurors aforesaid, upon their Oaths aforesaid, do say, that the said Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, did commit wilful, false, and corrupt Perjury ; to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loss, and infamy of the said William Lord Craven, and in contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth ; to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the publick peace, &c.

[The reason wherefore this Indictment did not recite the Oath in hæc verba, as in the former Indictment, but assigned the Perjury in the material parts of the Oath ; was by reason it came lately to knowledge, that the original Oath could not be found, and therefore the Oath was to be proved by the Entries in the Book of Parliament, and at Haberdashers hall, and by the testimony of the Persons who administered the Oath.]

The next day after the Indictment was found, the Prosecutors for the Lord Craven moved the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the Bar to plead to the Indictment; who being brought into Court, desired time to plead till the next Term. Whereupon the Court made this order;

That the said Faulconer, having now in Court appeared unto the Indictment, should have time to plead unto the same, until the beginning of the next Term, so that the issue thereupon may be tried at the Bar in open Court the same Term.

Term. Pasch. 1652.

Faulconer having all this vacation neglected to appear, or plead to the Indictment, the Prosecutors for the Lord Craven were enforced again to move for another Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the Bar, to appear, or plead to the Indictment; who appearing, desired longer time to attend his Counsel, which the Court granted accordingly: and the ordinary Rules of Court were given unto him for the peremptory days of pleading, or Judgment to be entered against him; and the very last day, when the last Rule was out, and not before, he pleaded Not Guilty. And the Court ordered, that the issue upon the Indictment of Perjury against the Defendant, be tried at the Bar upon Friday on the morrow of the Ascension of our Lord, and that the Sheriff of Middlesex do attend Andrew Broughton, Esq; with the Book of Freeholders, forthwith; so that an indifferent Jury may be returned between the said Keepers, and the said Defendant, to try the issue aforesaid, by consent of the parties on both sides.

Mr. Broughton accordingly appointed the Sheriff to attend him the next day in the afternoon, with the Book of Freeholders; who accordingly named the Jury, and notice was given by the Sheriff, requiring them to appear at the day of Trial.

Friday, May 20, 1652.

THE Jury appearing according to summons, and Faulconer being brought in custody, the Court proceeded to Trial, and ordered the Indictment to be read; which being afterwards opened by Mr. Boynton, the evidence was managed by Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. Drury: who were of Counsel for the Commonwealth against the said Faulconer.

Before the Counsel for the Commonwealth proceeded to produce any Witnesses, they offered unto the Court and the Jury something in general concerning the Indictment. That the Indictment was for the crime of Perjury, wilfully and corruptly committed; that Faulconer makes an Oath, that there was a Petition delivered, in which there was a very sharp reflection (as he swears) upon the Parliament, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he swears he was deputed to deliver it, being drawn by himself and Drury, and subscribed by thirty Officers; that in order to the delivery thereof, they did require the assistance of the Lord Craven, that he promised to speak for them, and brought them an answer: but they hoped to prove unto the Jury, that this Oath which Faulconer did take, was very false, that it was by design, a design for money; that the consequence of it was very notorious, the ruin of that Gentleman, of his Estate, Fame and Fortune; that Witnesses will be produced to prove, what in truth the Petition was. There was a Petition delivered, but not a Petition to this effect at all, and Faulconer knew the contrary. We shall produce what it was, and that under his own hand, whereby it will appear that there was no such matter in it, as he hath deposed; the Witnesses themselves will best speak the Particulars.

For the opening of some things concerning this Oath of Faulconer, it is to be observed, he took this Oath before the Commissioners of Haberdashers-hall, at Whitehall, and it was there reduced into writing, and a Transcript was made of the original: which Transcript was sent to the Council of State, and they ordered the same to be reported to the Parliament; and being reported there, is entred in the Journal-Book, and there remains a Record in Parliament.

The first thing therefore insisted upon by the Counsel for the Commonwealth, was the proving of a true Copy of Faulconer's deposition, in respect the original was lost, or rather imbezzled by Faulconer. To prove the same,

A Copy thereof was produced in Court, which agreed verbatim with that deposition of his, which was filed upon Record at Haberdashers-hall; (the proper Court where it ought to remain:) and though that upon the file was but a Copy, yet it was filed as evidence of that deposition he was sworn unto by them. But this was opposed by the Counsel for Faulconer, as not sufficient proof; and thereupon a Copy of an Order of the Council of State, of March 6, 1650, was produced unto the Court, whereby it did appear, that the depositions against the Lord Craven, had been transmitted to the Council of State by the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall. And it appeared further by the said order, that Mr. Attorney-General was appointed by the Council of State, to report these depositions to the Parliament, so transmitted to that Council by the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall. And the Attorney-General being sworn in Court, did declare that he reported no other depositions to the Parliament, than what he received from the Council of State; and that the depositions produced to him in Court (whereof the said Faulconer's was one) were endorsed with the hand-writing of the Lord Bradshaw, then Lord-President of the Council of State; and that the Votes of confiscation of the Lord Craven's Estate did pass upon the report of the said depositions, which he presented to the Parliament from the Council of State.

Mr. Fermin, Chief-Clerk to Mr. Scobel, Clerk of the Parliament, did depose in Court, that the very same depositions shewed in Court to Mr. Attorney-General, endorsed with the Lord Bradshaw's hand-writing, were entered in the Journal-Book, as read in Parliament that day, when Mr. Attorney-General did make his Report unto the Parliament; which he knew the better to be true, for that he received the same from the hands of Mr. Scobel, or Mr. Darnel, the Clerk-assistant in Parliament, the same day they were read in Parliament, to be entred in the Journal-Book: and that he did enter the same accordingly with the Votes of confiscation, which passed upon the reading of those depositions. And afterwards he and Mr. Darnel did examine the said depositions, whereof the said Faulconer's was one, after the same were so entred into the Journal-Book.

And

And for the further satisfaction of the Court, he produced the Journal of Parliament, wherein the said depositions (and particularly that of Faulconer) were entered, which were read in Court out of the Journal; whereby it did appear that the depositions of the said Faulconer, Kitchingman and Reyley, were entered into the said Journal, and did agree verbatim with the Copy of Faulconer's, and their depositions remaining at Haberdashers-hall, and with the Copy reported by Mr. Attorney-General from the Council of State to the Parliament.

Mr. Winslow, one of the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, being one before whom the said Faulconer was sworn, did testify upon Oath in Court, that the deposition of Faulconer produced unto him, and whereupon there was an endorsement of the Lord Bradshaw's hand-writing; was, as he did believe, a true Copy of that deposition to which the said Faulconer was sworn at Whiteball, for that he findeth his own hand subscribed thereunto (as examined by him to be a true Copy) and said it was usual with the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, when they take examinations concerning any Person of Quality, to appoint one of themselves to go from the Table to examine the Copy by the Original; but whether when he subscribed his name to the Copy produced unto him, he did examine the same by the original deposition before it was sent for away by the Council of State, or afterwards, or by the Transcript remaining upon the file as a Record at Haberdashers-hall, he could not positively remember; but conceives that the Copy, to which his hand is subscribed, as examined by him, to be a true Copy, was taken when they had the original in custody; but cannot certainly say it.

Mr. Barners, another of the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, before whom also the said Oath was taken, did testify upon Oath, that to the best of his remembrance, the particulars mentioned in Faulconer's depositions then read in Court, were the same to which the said Faulconer was sworn unto by himself and the rest of the Commissioners, though he could not remember every Syllable and Letter.

Mr. Winslow, and Mr. Barners, were again produced to declare what they did remember concerning this clause in the deposition of the said Faulconer's (viz.) That several Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the King of Scots, to entertain them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England, or Scotland, &c. And thereupon Mr. Winslow did declare unto the Court, that he did well remember that clause in Faulconer's deposition when he was sworn thereunto; but whether the number of Officers were thirty or no, he could not tell, but a certain number of Officers were named.

Mr. Barners did declare the like, but whether the word inhuman was in, he could not positively say; but was certain that barbarous Rebels was contained in that clause; and that when Faulconer was sworn unto the same, it was first read unto him, and amended in several places, and then he swore it to be true. And Mr. Barners said, that he did remember his deposition the better, for that himself, and the rest of the Commissioners had several debates upon it at Haberdashers-hall, whether they should thereupon seize, sequester, or secure the Lord Craven's estate.

Having thus traced this Oath of Faulconer's, which was taken at Whiteball, and brought to Haberdashers-hall, afterwards brought from Haberdashers-

ball back again to Whiteball, and from Whiteball to the Parliament, and there entered in the Journal-Book, as the grounds upon which the Votes of confiscation did pass; and having withal proved that particular clause of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c. the Counsel for the Commonwealth concluded as to that point, and left it to the Jury to judge, and to Faulconer to produce the original, which he hath got into his custody, if he can find any variance in it from the deposition recited in the Indictment.

And to prove that Faulconer had got the original Oath into his custody, Mr. Knight, a Witness, was produced, who did testify upon Oath, that being in the company of Faulconer, he did shew him a writing written with Captain Bishop's own hand (so far as he could judge one man's hand to be like another) and that Faulconer's name was subscribed thereunto; and that Faulconer told him the said Knight, that that writing was the original deposition he was sworn unto, against the Lord Craven, and which he kept on purpose to keep Mr. Bishop in awe (Faulconer being then in necessity and want) and that the said Faulconer further said unto him, the said Knight, that he had received 20*l.* for the business of the Lord Craven, and was to have more; but said he deferred 2000*l.* for what he had done.

In the next place, the Counsel for the Commonwealth did apply themselves to prove the falsity of the Oath (viz.) That there was no such thing in the Petition mentioned by Faulconer in his deposition, [as that thirty Officers did petition to be entertained to fight for the King of Scots against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c.] And being to prove a Negative, they applied their proof to a certain time and place, which Faulconer in his own deposition did prove for them; for he swears, that the Petition was delivered the Evening before the King of Scots went from Breda, and that the said King went away the next morning at three a'clock. He swears further, that he and Drury drew the Petition, and were deputed to deliver the same, accordingly they applied their evidence, Proofs, as to the Falsity of Faulconer's Oath.

MR. Horsnel being produced, did testify; that the night before the King of Scots went from Breda, Colonel Drury, Capt. Brisco, and divers others, were with a little short Petition to remember the King of a former Petition which they had delivered, that some course might be taken, that their arrears which they owed in the Town might be paid, that their Landlords where they lodged might not suffer, for they were not able themselves to pay them; that he went along with them to the great window just over the moat, and there he, the said Horsnel, did set his hand unto the same, and that he was in the Chamber when Drury and Brisco came in to deliver the Petition, in which there was not a word that concerned any thing, but only the relief of their present necessities. Being asked by the Court, if there were not a mention of barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he answered, not any thing of that nature was in it. He further said, that this Petition had reference to a former Petition he was not acquainted withal, nor was his hand set to the former Petition.

Captain Brisco being produced, did testify, that there were divers Gentlemen in great distress met together in Colonel Drury's Chamber, at the time of the Treaty of the Scots King with the Commissioners at Breda, and among other things it was agreed to draw a Petition to the King; which was drawn in Colonel Drury's Chamber, expressing their necessities, that the People of the Town might be relieved, and that the Petitioners might not be left to perish: that going to deliver it, they met with Secretary Long by the way, who told them it was to no purpose, for there was no moneys come in. Afterwards the Petitioners had notice the King was to depart from Breda, whereupon they met together again, and went into the further end of the Gallery, to draw a short Petition, to put the King in mind of his Promise to Secretary Long, concerning the People of the Town of Breda, that they might be satisfied, and the Petitioners relieved; which Paper he the said Brisco delivered to the Scots King, who threw it on a Table; and doing so, they stood all amazed, being likely to be left in distress: and unexpectedly came in the Lord Craven, whereupon he, the said Brisco, having long served in the Country, and knowing him to be a lover of Soldiers, he spoke unto him, and said, Sir, we are a company of poor distressed Gentlemen, likely to be left here in misery (he said Well) and the next morning the King went away, without giving any relief unto the Petitioners. The Court demanded of Brisco, whether there were no such matter in it as barbarous and inhuman Rebels; he answered, that he read it, and was sure there was no such thing in it, the whole scope of it being to relieve their necessities, which was the occasion of that Petition. Being demanded again by the Court, if barbarous and inhuman Rebels were not in the Petition; he answered, no, not any such words at all, nor so much as any mention of the Parliament.

Colonel Drury was in the next place produced, who testified, that being at Breda, Lieutenant-Colonel Bardsley, Major Faulconer, Major Hall, Captain Kitchingman, and divers others came to his lodging, and told him that they were in a condition of starving, and desired him that he would assist them to draw a Petition to the King of Scots, to relieve their necessities, or else they must perish; that the said Drury being in their condition, consented unto it, and in his Chamber, in his son's paper-book the Petition was drawn, Major Faulconer writ it with his own hand; which, saith Drury, I have here to shew; and so presented the original under Faulconer's hand unto the Court: in which Petition (said Drury) we desired some relief from his Majesty, shewing how we had served the former King, and in what necessities we were. That they were advised to deliver it to Secretary Long, for that they were told that the King had not a Pistole to relieve himself, and it would be a vain thing, said Long, to deliver it. That they followed Secretary Long, and solicited him daily for three weeks together, and still he put them off; and the day before the King went from Breda, they drew a short Petition to mind the King of his promise to Secretary Long, and to desire that the Inhabitants of Breda that had relieved them, might not be undone; that Brisco was deputed with him to deliver it, and he accordingly delivered it to the King: that the King laid it down upon the Table: in steps the Lord Craven, then Captain Brisco, having trailed a Pike under the Lord Craven, went to him, and told him there were many Gentlemen ready to starve, and desired him to speak a favourable word to the Queen of Bohemia. To which the Lord Craven answered, Well, as Brisco then told him. The next morning the King of Scots went away, and so nothing at all was done for the Petitioners; that original Petition which Drury produced unto the Court, of Faulconer's own hand-writing, and in the presence of Faulconer, was publicly read in Court, and was as followeth, viz.

May it please your Majesty,

THE great sense we have always had of your Majesty's present condition, hath been the prime cause of our long silence; but now our necessities are grown so great and insupportable, that we are enforced either to petition or perish: Most humbly desiring your Majesty, to take into your princely consideration, their extremities, who have been ever ready to prostrate their Lives in your Majesty's Royal Father's service: nor no less willing and ready to prosecute the same in what your Majesty shall command: Most humbly petitioning your Royal Order, that some course may be taken for our present subsistence, that our future endeavours may not be buried in that unavoidable calamity, which our Loyalty hath reduced us unto.

And we shall cordially pray for your Majesty.

The Court demanding of Colonel Drury, if the said Petition was Faulconer's own hand-writing; he said yea, and looking back upon Faulconer, said, he cannot deny it: I did dictate unto him, and Faulconer did write it in my Chamber; and that is the very original that was so drawn, and being fair written, was afterwards delivered to Secretary Long: the other that was delivered was a memorial, to put the King in mind of his promise when money came in. And Drury further said, that when he was examined by Mr. Bishop, he did give in his Examination, the contents of the first and latter Petition; and said, he did express himself at that time of his Examination by Mr. Bishop, to the same effect which he had now done in Court. Being asked by the Court, if the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in that first Petition, the said Drury answered, that Faulconer moved to have barbarous and inhuman Rebels inserted into that Petition so drawn by himself, but was answered by the Petitioners, that as they were Soldiers of fortune, it was uncivil language, and so they would not give way unto it. Being demanded by the Court, who was deputed to deliver the last Petition, he said, Captain Brisco was one, in regard he had many wounds at Cannon-Froom, that the King might commiserate his case the more, and that he, the said Drury, was also deputed with Brisco to deliver the same, because he was known to the Queen of Bohemia, and some other persons of quality, and Faulconer was not at all deputed. Being asked, if the Lord Craven was present at the delivery of the first Petition; he answered no, the Petition was delivered three weeks before: but the Lord Craven was present when the last Petition was delivered, to mind the King of his promise. The said Drury further informed the Court, that afterwards Faulconer being discontented that he got no money, said, as he was going into Town, This is a horrid Thing, that we should be in this case, to follow a thing they call a King (God damn me) I will go into England, and do all the mischief I can.

Proofs as to the Credit of Faulconer.

IN the next place, the Counsel for the Commonwealth did apply themselves to offer proof as to the credit of Faulconer. Mr. Wooldridge of Clements-Inn, Inn, Attorney at the Common Law, being sworn, did testify to this purpose; that being in his chamber at Clement's-Inn, about this time twelve month, Faulconer came to him, asked how some of his Countrymen near Petersfield did? That he asked Faulconer where he had been of so long a time? Who answered, he had been in the Low-Countries; had seen some Lords sit in Council for the King, that he had been sworn against the Lord Craven, which would bring a great deal of advantage to the State, that he had money for the doing of it, and said that he had received already 80*l.* (it was that sum here mentioned, said Mr. Wooldridge, to the best of his remembrance:) but Faulconer said, he did expect a greater reward; that the said Faulconer hath been as wicked a man as any in England; that he spent his Estate, and left the Country, did wicked acts while he was there: that being at Petersfield, he drank an health to the Devil in the middle of the Street, of which information being given, we sent to the Justice of the Peace in the Town, and had him bound over to the Sessions for doing of it; but said, he did not see him drink the health to the Devil.

Mr. Jackson of Petersfield being produced, testified, about five years ago, Faulconer was ranting and drinking of healths, that he did drink a health to the Devil, and said this, I have spent my Brother's Estate and my own; I will never want money, for whilst there is any in the Nation, I will get it one way or other, and I will do something of Infamy to be talked of, that the name of Faulconer shall never die. Being asked in what manner he did drink the health, he answered, in the Street, down upon his knees; that he was present, and thousands can witness it, that he was had before a Justice of Peace for it.

James Graham being sworn, did testify, that in May 1647, after the Siege at Exeter, it was his fortune to fall into the company of Faulconer, and as he was with him in the cellar, he was swearing damn him, blood and wounds; takes a two and twenty shilling piece of Gold, put it into his hand, and said, God damn him, blood and wounds, he would bugger his Soul to Hell, and these words he used frequently to Man, Woman, and Child, bugger, bugger, bugger; and correct him for it, he would say, damn him, blood and wounds, he would do it. Being asked by the Court, if Faulconer did any thing upon him; he answered, no, he was able to deal with as good a man as he.

Mr. Hughes hath often heard Faulconer swear, damn him and sink him, and such wicked expressions.

Mr. Bradley did testify, that he heard Faulconer say, our Saviour Christ was a Bastard, and a Carpenter's Son, and carried a basket of Tools after his Father.

Mr. Dyer being produced, did declare that Faulconer confessed to him, that he had ten pound of a man, by procuring one to personate Captain Bishop; it was thus (as Faulconer told him) that a Citizen, as he remembered Faulconer said, did desire Faulconer to get Captain Bishop to do a business for him, which Citizen did promise him twenty pound, ten in hand, and ten afterwards; whereupon Faulconer said he got one to personate Captain Bishop, and to go along with him to the Citizen; which man so personating Captain Bishop, promised the Citizen upon the account of Major Faulconer's good services for the publick, to afford him his best assistance in the effecting of what was desired in his Petition, which story Faulconer himself told. And Faulconer further said, that Captain Bishop had used him ill, in keeping him so low in money, that he had it one time in his thoughts, as Captain Bishop came from the Committee-chamber, through the Guard-chamber, down the stairs, to have cut his throat. Being asked by the Court, what money Faulconer had of Captain Bishop, he answered, he paid to Faulconer with his own hands, by Captain Bishop's direction, twenty pound at one time, and about thirty pound more at other times, in several portions; that Faulconer confessed to him he had twenty pound afterwards. Being demanded what it was for, he gave that money; he said, I will not speak to that, I cannot speak to that.

Captain Ballard being produced, did testify, that about three or four years ago, he came to Faulconer's lodging, and saw him write a letter in his chamber, and that he writ it as if it had come from Colonel Burgefs from Jersey, and set Burgefs's name to it, and Faulconer would have had him, the said Ballard, to carry this letter to one Captain Bishop that belonged to the Council of State, and to say he had the letter from one of Bristol, and get some money of Bishop for that intelligence mentioned in the letter, of which the said Ballard was to have half: but he, the said Ballard, refused to go with the same, knowing it to be unjust.

Mr. Powel, a Justice of Peace of the County of Middlesex, did testify to the Court, that this Faulconer was brought before him upon suspicion of Felony, and committed, which Mittimus he produced in Court; and that afterwards the Lord Chief-Justice Rolls did send for him out of New-Prison to Newgate; that Faulconer hath a common name for a Robber on the highway.

Mr. Goodman, Goaler of Ailesbury, did testify unto the Court, that the said Faulconer the 20th of March 1648, was committed to Ailesbury Goal, by Sir Thomas Saunders, Mr. Bulstrode, and two other Justices of the Peace, upon suspicion of Felony, Robbery and Murder, and tendered a Certificate thereof in writing unto the Court.

The Defence made on the behalf of Faulconer.

THE evidence being given on the behalf of the Commonwealth, Mr. Windham, Mr. Latch, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Haggat, of Counsel for Faulconer, did offer something to the consideration of the Court, before they did produce their Witnesses; viz. that although it concerns every man that Perjury should be punished; for every man's life, liberty, fortune and estate depends upon an Oath, and in these times it is somewhat dangerous if they should be forsworn; so on the other side, if Faulconer be not forsworn, it is but just he should be acquitted. That the Counsel for the Commonwealth have endeavoured to prove that there was a Petition, but that there was no such words in the Petition as are suggested, and have endeavoured to impeach the credit of Faulconer: that they have produced a copy of Faulconer's Oath, which ought not to be admitted, because it is but a Transcript of a Transcript, a Copy of a Copy, brought from Haberdashers-hall to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and there the Copy is entered in the Journal-book. And the Witnesses that have been produced, do not swear positively to the Oath as it is in writing, and one particle may turn the whole sense of an Oath, and though these words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in it, yet how it is applied, and how the sense of of it falls, it cannot be judged, but by the original writing itself, and it concerns the Counsel for the Keepers to produce it. How it should come into Faulconer's hands, there is no account given, but by one Knight, who saith Faulconer shewed him a thing, which Faulconer said was his [original] deposition against the Lord Craven, but the credit of Knight's testimony is left to the Jury. It is sworn, that that copy produced in Court was examined, but Mr. Winslow doth not positively say it was examined by the original, when in their custody.

That as to the Witnesses produced against the credit of Faulconer, they did hope to counterpoise his life to be, as of a man that might be credited: that in the Petition delivered at Breda, there is something of those words, though there be not barbarous and inhuman Rebels, which was but a nominal thing; yet the prostrating of themselves to prosecute the cause, is desired, may be observed; though the actual words be not there, yet the sense doth bear it: that the case is somewhat hard with Faulconer, who was employed at the Court of Breda as an emissary, as a spy: and at his return in giving an account of his observations at Breda, let something fall concerning the Lord Craven, without any design in him; and that what Faulconer delivered in his deposition was with qualifications, as he did believe, to his best remembrance, and the like.

Hereupon Captain Bishop was produced on the behalf of Faulconer, as a Witness, whose discourse was long, and consisted of three parts.

1. It took notice how the Council of State sent for him from his habitation at Bristol, to be employed in matters of great trust, and afterwards what trust was reposed in him and Mr. Scot, in order to the safety of the Nation.

2. By way of argument on behalf of Faulconer, he did declare what services Faulconer had done for the Commonwealth, and that Faulconer was one by whom this Commonwealth sat safe at this hour, and by whom he enjoyed his life: and what an ill requital this was to be thus proceeded against.

The third part of his discourse was, to declare what particular designs the State formerly had in hand, and what designs the enemy had against the State; and what service he did to countermine the enemy in their designs: the last of the three being not (as was conceived) so advisedly spoken in publick, and which would be more unfit to be in print, shall therefore here be past over in silence, as also what Captain Bishop said at large concerning the two first particulars, in respect they are no proofs pertinently to be applied, as to the perjury in question.

An account only shall be therefore given what Captain Bishop properly spoke as a Witness.

As a Witness, Captain Bishop said, he had never seen Faulconer in drink or misbehave himself, but ever observed him as a sober man; that he drew Faulconer's information [which Faulconer did deliver as the substance] and that he must say, that the words [or to that effect] should have been put in, and that it was his fault they were not in, and he could not tell but that they were in; that the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, were desired to come to Whiteball to administer an Oath to the said Faulconer privately, lest danger should befall the Witnesses if they were discovered.

That Horjnel was formerly an Agent for the Prince, and was to receive orders from Tom Cook in the Tower, and was ordered to be tried by the High Court of Justice: that Colonel Drury was a Papist in arms, and being brought before him to be examined, still had the Lord Craven in his mouth, before he was asked a question.

The like of Brisco. He said, that before Drury and Brisco came from beyond seas, his Agent gave him notice of their coming, and thereupon he laid wait for them, and caught them; that Drury said, when he was examined, that he had not a penny of money; that he did not commit him to prison, but took his parole, and in commiseration gave him two shillings and six pence for his supper. He said further, that Drury did contradict himself in what he had formerly informed the Council of State, and to that end produced in Court the copy of Drury's Information; which being read in Court, agreed with the testimony which Drury then gave to the Jury.

[By way of digression observe, That Drury's and Brisco's Informations, which Captain Bishop had taken above twelve months since, and which tended to clear the Lord Craven, he concealed till this hour that he produced the same in Court, and never transmitted those two mens Examinations to the Parliament; though before the Bill of Sale did pass, he did transmit Bardley's and Kitchingman's Re-Examination taken by himself, and which he apprehended made against the Lord Craven.]

Captain Bishop further said, that whereas it was objected that Faulconer had money; he answered, that it is great reason he should have money, for there was a real effect of the safety of the Commonwealth by his services: that notwithstanding any thing hath been sworn against Faulconer, he believes what he swore was truth.

Captain Bishop speaking again of Faulconer's deposition, that the words [or to that effect] should have been added; the Court asked him whether Faulconer gave any directions to express these words in his Examination: to which Captain Bishop made answer, that the deposition he made, was the substance of things, and he put it in words, and that [or to that effect;] if they were not in, should have been in. The Court again asked him, if Faulconer did direct him to put in these words [or to that effect;] he replied again, he did deliver the whole, as the effect of it.

Captain Bishop being further asked by the Court, if he were present when the Commissioners gave the Oath, and took what Faulconer said in way of Information, he answered, That he prepared it before the Commissioners were sent for, and then they had only the administering the Oath; and said again, I prepared the Information which he made Oath of. Hereupon Mr. Winslow desired leave to inform the Court, that when he and the rest of the Commissioners came to Whiteball to administer this Oath, being sent for to that end, the Information was ready prepared by Captain Bishop, and having no Register with them, they made use of Captain Bishop; being well skilled in the use of his pen, to write over the deposition: for though he had prepared the deposition, the Commissioners did see occasion to alter much of it; and it was writ over again, and then read to Faulconer, and attested by him, and subscribed unto by the hands of all the Commissioners then present; and the Oath which we gave him was this, Whether the deposition thus drawn, and that which he was was examined unto, was the Truth, the whole Truth, and nothing but the Truth; Mr. Barners attested the like: then Captain Bishop sat down.

After this Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce was produced, who likewise spoke of very great designs, and of matters of State, and what discoveries were made by Faulconer; which being not pertinent to the Perjury, shall be here omitted: but as a Witness he said, that Horsnel was formerly an Agent for the Prince.

That Faulconer was a Hampshire man, a Gentleman well-bred, that he was an enemy to himself in spending his Estate, that he was always faithful to the Parliament; that he believes Faulconer hath cuffs some of the Witnesses produced against him for their malignancy, and that nothing could be expected to come from them to the credit of Faulconer: that Faulconer was sent over by him as a spy into Holland, upon account of his faithfulness.

Lieutenant-Colonel Bardsley was produced in the next place, on the behalf of Faulconer, who testified, that he put his hand to the Petition, at Breda; that the Lord Craven was desired to deliver it to the King of Scots; that the Lord Craven said he was no Courtier, but a Servant to the States of Holland; that it was fitter for the Princess Royal to deliver it, than himself, and so returned the Petition again. That the Queen of Bohemia told the Petitioners, the King would do for them what he was able; but about four o'clock in the morning he went away, and they had no other answer: that the contents of it was to put the King in mind of his promise, that some money might be delivered to the Petitioners for discharge of their quarters at Breda. Being asked by the Court, if there were any such expressions in it, as barbarous and inhuman Rebels, he answered no. Being asked, if to that Petition which Faulconer drew, he would have had barbarous and inhuman Rebels added; he answered yea, Faulconer did move to have those words in, but was refused it: that he the said Bardsley read over that Petition, and set his hand to it, and was at the penning of it, and Faulconer wrote it.

Captain Kitchingman being produced, did testify, that a Petition was drawn at Breda, and signed by him, Faulconer, and others, to be presented to the King of Scots; that it was in pursuance of gaining money to discharge their quarters, and to enable them to serve the King, but knows not by whom it was delivered; that Secretary Long was to issue out money unto them, but they never had any; and in order to the gaining of that money, there was another Petition drawn, but by whom delivered, he knew not; only he saw a paper in the Queen of Bohemia's hand, which was told him was the Petition, and after a quarter of an hour's discourse, with the King, she delivered it to the King, but they never received any money upon that neither: that he did not read the last Petition at all, nor heard it read; that it was the first Petition which he signed.

Colonel Dove was produced in Court on the behalf of Faulconer, who said, he knew nothing of his birth, he only knew his Father and Mother, that they lived in good fashion and credit; but how this Faulconer hath been brought up, and where he hath inhabited for these ten or twelve years, he knew not: and that this was as much as he could say.

Michael, an Alehouse-keeper, was then produced, who said he knew nothing of Faulconer, but that he was a very honest man, Faulconer having lain in his house, a year and three quarters; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he was a good Scholar, an honest man, and brought up at the University.

Captain Mowbrey being produced as a Witness, did testify, that Anno 1649, in Amsterdam, he met accidentally with Captain Brisco, who said to him and others, Gentlemen, I see you are in a sad condition, I will set you in a way to get money; here are Dutchmen taking up Men to go to Plantations, and you shall have twelve stivers a-piece a day, but I will warrant you, I will force them to leave you behind; and accordingly they received twelve stivers a day, and Brisco would have had them on ship-board, but one Cburch, an Englishman, bid them take heed what they did, for he served some Englishmen so before, clapt them under decks, and received so many six Dollars a-piece for them, and so left them: that he hath known Faulconer five years, and he hath behaved himself civilly for aught he ever knew.

Mr. Corey did testify something to this purpose, in reference to Brisco's sending men to Plantations; who said further, he had no more to say against Brisco, but that he was a man would drink, and sometimes swear, as well as other men, that are accustomed to it: that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he came to Breda to wait for employment; in the mean time, whilst he was there, he did as other men did, strive to seek for relief.

After the Court had with much patience heard Captain Bishop, and the rest of the Witnesses on the behalf of Faulconer, the Counsel for Faulconer summ'd up the Evidence, and left it to the Jury, with some further observations, viz.

That though the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were not in the Petition, yet there were words of tender of service, as the King should command, and to prosecute his cause, which was the substance of the thing informed by Faulconer; that Captain Bishop, and Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce, who have testified of Faulconer's services, were Witnesses to be preferred before any witnesses produced against Faulconer; that the endeavour is not only to convict this man, but by conviction and disabling of his credit, to undermine that which hath been acted by the Parliament, upon his testimony, and other concurrent testimonies, not only in passing Votes, but in passing an Act of Parliament to sell an Estate.

That there was nothing objected against the credit of this Witness, so long as there was any other stone to turn, though there were other endeavours used in Parliament, to prevent the sale of the Lord Craven's Estate; so that when all other resources fail'd, they then make use of this Indictment of Perjury, and so hope to undermine the Act of Parliament. Though Faulconer might have some extravagance, yet you see what his part was to act, to dissemble that he was not what he was, and it may be, when he was amongst the God-dammes, and such kind of men, it was his part to be what most conduced to his end [like themselves]; for a man, as he was employed, must twine himself into all shapes, and though not drink a health, yet sometimes hold a candle to the Devil; that they acknowledge the charge in part, and would lay it in words, not in substance, and therefore not strictly in the letter true.

That it was proved that the first Petition was to serve the King, as they formerly had served his Father, and they served his Father against the Parliament: so their offer must needs be, to be entertained to serve the King against the Parliament.

That

That it is a sad case, that this man for so many services performed by him for the Commonwealth, and settlements grounded upon his information, must be blasted here by an artificial Indictment a great while after.

And if he shall after all this be convicted of Perjury, it will be a discouragement for all men to undertake the like employment for the future.

And lastly, the Counsel for Faulconer did offer, that if there be a mistake in what he hath sworn, yet it appears not to be maliciously or corruptly done, and that therefore the Jury ought to find for Faulconer.

The Reply by the Counsel, on the behalf of the Commonwealth, against Faulconer, was to this purpose following.

Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the defence that Faulconer hath made; we have charged him, that he did take the Oath that was set down in the Indictment. They say, First, We have not proved it; Secondly, That he did not take it, but did take it in effect; and Thirdly, If he did, it was not maliciously, nor corruptly: but not one of them hath said it is not false, no not one of their own Counsel. The evidence that hath been given, for the most part, hath been to magnify the service of this man, that is now in question before you: we shall admit his services to be true, but this we shall be bold to say, that a man that is employed beyond sea, and gives good return of his service in some kind, that that will not give him license to make a false accusation in another kind: and it is no argument to say, that because this man was a spy beyond the sea, and did good service as a spy, that therefore he did not give a false information; in this he must not take a liberty to ruin any man by a false Oath: his service must not excuse him, if what he hath said be false.

As for what Mr. Bishop said concerning his Oath; Mr. Bishop tells you, it is his fault if the words [or to that effect] were not put down; if it were not, whose fault was it? It was mended by those whose judgments and consciences induced them to it: the Information he took was done by the judgment of the Committee, and not by the direction of him that was a Minister, a Scribe to write, and not a Judge to dictate and correct. You have here two men of unquestionable truth and honesty every way, (meaning Mr. Winslow, and Mr. Barnes) that say positively, he did swear it; and God forbid that we should live to that day, that any man should be ruined upon a deposition, taken by the judgment of a Clerk, to such or such effect. If we should come to such a piece of Justice, that a deposition to such and such effect, and that taken by a Clerk, should come to cast a man, it is beyond an Oath of &c. For it is the Judges that must say, what is the effect of an Oath, and not the Clerk that writes it. If a Clerk shall take an Oath, and he shall come and say, it is to this effect, never shall any man be free from him, that by Perjury will ruin another man. It is proved unto you, it was read over to Faulconer, expressly mended in his sight, and sworn by him, and let the effect go with the &c. that went before it.

They objected to our Witnesses, that Brisco had sold his companions for twelve stivers a-day: that information had no other foundation, than the saying of a Dutchman, that said so, or of an English- man in a Dutch bottom; and what was testified, was what was said, and not what was known or sworn. They objected, that Brisco would swear as well as another; that takes not off his testimony. But what do they say, concerning their own Witness, Bardsey, whom they have produced? He hath sworn in terminis, in effect with Drury, which you will not forget: he swore, that when the first Petition was drawing, it was moved by Faulconer, that the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels should be put in; but it was rejected by them that were there, as a thing uncivil: so their own Witness concurs with Drury.

As for the deposition on record at Haberdsbers-ball, which being filed there, it is proof of itself, which no man may aver against, when it is recorded; we have shewed it there, traced it here, brought a copy of it, endorsed with the Lord Bradshaw's hand; shall it be believed that a man shall be confiscated and lose his estate, and not so much as an Oath taken against him? It is apparent there was an Oath, and it is hoped you will believe that which the Parliament hath recorded, and expressly proved by the Gentlemen of Haberdsbers-ball here present; which you will believe before any imaginations that can be made on the other side.

They have endeavoured to say something touching the conversation of this man, to uphold his credit; but, Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to consider of the man, what damnable blasphemy hath come out of his mouth, you have heard it. If a man will go so high, as to kneel down to drink a health to the Devil, I hope there is no excuse for that; his good services must not plead for him to comply with God-dammes, that will not justify him, he was not sent to do any such thing. But we have not rested there; have we not proved him a personator of other men, a decoy, and things that a man should be ashamed to name: the two and twenty shillings piece he took out, and what base wild words he spake, not fit to be repeated? that will not be palliated by any service whatsoever. And for that which Mr. Bishop hath said, nothing shall be said against him, but what appears to you; that Mr. Bishop hath gone beyond a Witness: for when he hath done his testimony, he acteth and manageth the business, and in that is not equal to others that do not. For his expression, that Faulconer is one of them by which the Commonwealth of England sits safe at this hour; it is God we sit safe by, and not by him: I blame him not for his service, but when we are upon a question of truth, I say truth and righteousness is beyond all the service in the world.

They say my Lord Craven furthered the Petition, and promised to second it. Gentlemen, you must distinguish that which my Lord Craven knew, and that which he knew not: There is not one Witness from beginning to ending, that can ever speak one word, that my Lord Craven knew what the first Petition was. In that Petition was the expression of venturing their Lives, which was three weeks before the latter, which was singly to desire they might have money for their quarters. The first Petition had some expressions relating to their former service, and some expressions of their readiness for the future; but that Petition, my Lord Craven never saw, but was delivered to one Long three weeks before, and Drury did put it down in his deposition, when he was examined by Mr. Bishop, which agrees with that which was read in Court.

But

But the particular time when the latter Petition, or Memorial, was delivered, with which the Lord Craven is charged, was the evening before the King went from Breda.

They say that here is no corruption proved, and a man cannot be guilty without corruption: but certainly he that swears a thing that is false, it must of necessity be corrupt.

Faulconer swears, that thirty Officers did subscribe the Petition: doth he bring any one to confirm his testimony, or the least colour of evidence to what he hath sworn?

It was further pressed by the Council for the Commonwealth, that the Jury would distinguish these two things, between the Petition framed and dictated by Drury, and writ by Faulconer; and that other Petition delivered the night before the King went from Breda; the first is produced, and proved to be Faulconer's own hand: that Petition was three weeks before, which begs for maintenance, and professes service, the copy of which was brought forth before any evidence was given by them; for Drury upon his examination before the Council of State made the same known, and which agrees verbatim with that read in Court. So the dictating of that Petition was by Drury, the writing by Faulconer, the delivery was to Secretary Long, and that was the thing whereof they did expect an account; but that was not the Petition to which the testimony of Faulconer at all goes. That Petition of which this Oath is spoken, and to which it is apply'd, is the Petition which was drawn the evening before the Scots King went from Breda; that is the Petition talked of in the deposition, that is the Petition upon which we pitch; and therefore if in that Petition there be none of these words, that which he hath sworn unto is false: for in that Petition we say there was no such words, as barbarous and inhuman Rebels; nor such words of proffer of service or malignity, but a mere desire of supply; and they have not offered the least proof to the contrary. And secondly, that it was not promoted by the Lord Craven, for the Petition was delivered by them to the Scots King, before such time as the Lord Craven came into the room, so that my Lord Craven was no promoter of the Petition; and had he been a promoter of it, there was no such thing in it, as might give offence: no, nor the least mention of the Parliament, nor any thing that might offend. And whereas they object, that this Oath was not corrupt, the very words of his expression are very considerable, for he doth remarkably fix the words in his deposition, To fight against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels: why would he fix such an emphasis upon it as that was? It could not be a bare mistake: nor the words to this effect, as Mr. Bishop would have had in, could never have served the turn; for to say he would fight against the barbarous and inhuman Rebels, or to that effect, there is no such effect in the one Petition nor in the other. Then a second thing is, that this Faulconer being, as he deposeth, the contriver of the Petition, it could not be a mere oversight and mistake in him; and then when he could not have his desire beyond seas, to get moneys, he said, He would come here, and do what mischief he could.

The Counsel urged further: Gentlemen of the Jury, what is become of the original deposition, it concerns not us to know, no more than the original of depositions taken in the Country: it lies upon them that are for the Oath to make it out. It cannot be presumed that the Parliament would confiscate a Nobleman's estate, and order it to be sold: would they enter it into the Journal-book, and make it a record, should it come and be transmitted from Haberdashers-hall (the proper Judicatory for that business) to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and then not to be a true Oath, or false copy? That is not to be born, that a false Copy should sell a Gentleman's Estate, that a false Copy should be recorded to stand to all Eternity.

After the reply was made, every Judge in Court spoke what they in their judgment thought fit, for the better direction of the Jury: whereupon the Jury withdrew, and the next day brought in their Verdict, That they found the said Faulconer guilty of the Perjury mentioned in the Indictment. The Order following was thereupon made, viz.

By the Court;

The Defendant was this Day brought into Court, under the Custody of the Marshal of this Court, upon an Indictment for Perjury, whereunto he had formerly pleaded not guilty; and the Jury thereupon being impannelled, and sworn, found him guilty of the Perjury in the Indictment mentioned; and thereupon the said Faulconer is committed to the Custody of the said Marshal; there to remain until, &c.

XXVI. The Trial of Mr. JOHN LILBURN, at the Sessions of the Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, upon Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Days of July, 1653, for returning into England, being banish'd by Act of Parliament.

[Written (the chief Part) by the said John Lilburn.]

I Was Counsel or Proctor for my Uncle, George Lilburn, Esq; and one Mr. Jo- siab Primate, &c. about a Colliery taken from them in the County of Dur- ham, by force and violence, by Sir Arthur Hasle- rig; which he by his certificate computes to be worth five thousand pounds Sterling per Annum. About which Colliery the said Mr. Primate preferred a Petition to the Parliament, upon the 23d of December, 1651. in the delivery and manage- ment of which I appeared, as by the declared Law of England, I might justifiably do.

Which Petition being by the Parliament referred to a Committee to examine it, who spent twelve or thirteen large hearings thereupon, and upon the 15th of January, 1651, new stile, the Chairman thereof, Mr. Hill, made his report to the House: but what it was, we never were permitted to see nor to hear read. And as some Members of Par- liament have since told me, he made his report quite contrary to, or short of the evidence which was given in: whereupon the Parliament, the said 15th day of January, voted the foresaid Mr. Primate's Petition to be false, malicious, and scandalous; and that Sir Arthur Haslerig is not guilty either of Oppression or Tyranny, in the Carriage and Prosecution of this business; and that all the Copies of the said Petition (which, relating only to Primate, is not here inserted) should be burnt by the hands of the Common Hangman. And voted Mr. Primate to pay seven thousand pound, or to lie in prison till he pay it; which is all his punish- ment. And then the same day they passed certain votes against me, which as they themselves, by special order of the 17th of January, have printed them, verbatim thus follow.

Resolved,

That the Fine of three thousand pounds be im- posed upon Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, to be paid to the use of the Commonwealth.

That he be fined two thousand pounds more, to be paid to Sir Arthur Haslerig, for his damages; and two thousand pounds more, to be paid to James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molins, and Ar- thur Squib, Esqrs; four of the Commissioners for compounding; that is to say, to each of them five hundred pounds for their damages.

Resolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn be banished out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Islands and Territories thereunto belonging; and not to return into any of them, upon pain of being proceeded against as a Felon, and in case of such return, shall suffer death accordingly.

Resolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn do depart out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Islands and Territories thereof, within thirty days now next coming, and in case the said John Lilburn shall, after the said thirty days, be found within England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the Islands and Territories thereunto belonging, or any of them; the said Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, shall be proceeded against as a Felon, and shall suffer the pains of death, ac- cordingly.

Resolved, &c.

That the Serjeant at Arms attending the Parlia- ment, do apprehend the said Lieut. Col. John Lil- burn, and bring him to the bar of this House, up- on Tuesday morning next, to receive the judgment of Parliament aforesaid, and that Mr. Speaker do direct a warrant to the Serjeant at Arms accord- ingly.

But being myself at the Parliament-door when these Votes past, and understanding what they had done, although they sate (to my remembrance) a good while after candle-light, I staid: and when the Serjeant at Arms came forth with his mace, and the Speaker, I spoke to him in these words, or to this effect: Mr. Serjeant, I understand, the House hath this day passed some Votes against me, in which regard I staid on purpose, to see if you have any thing to say to me. Unto which he replied, No, Sir, I have no warrant yet to meddle with you, and therefore therefore you may go whether you please. Well, Sir, if you have none to-night, I will promise you, to wait upon you to-morrow morning, to see whether then you will have any or no. And being as good as my word, the next day being Friday, January the 16th, he committed me to the custody of his Deputy, Mr. Parsons, where I remained till Tuesday morning next (as it was ordered in the last Vote) which was January the 20th; and coming to the Parliament-door, I was ushered into the Bar by the Serjeant at Arms, having his mace upon his shoulder; where Mr. Speaker, as the mouth of the House, expressed himself in these words, or to this effect:

Lieutenant Colonel Lilburn, you are commanded by this House to kneel: unto which I answered in these words, or to this effect; Sir, with all Submission to this honourable House, I desire first a little liberty to speak. No, Sir, said he, you are not permitted to speak at all, but commanded to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, with all submission, I stoop unto your sentence, that you have already past upon me, but I cannot kneel.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lilburn, said he, the House commands you to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, to be short with you, I neither can kneel, nor will I kneel. Withdraw then, said he; which I did accordingly, making them two or three congees at my going out, the which also I did as I came in. Whereupon, as I was informed, seeing that I would not kneel at their Bar to receive my sentence, they voted to draw up an Act of Parliament to banish me; and passed another Vote by way of punishment, to take off ten days of the time they had formerly given me to depart the land in. Altho' upon the Friday at night before, I with my Keeper went to the Serjeant's House, and spoke to him to this purpose: Mr. Serjeant, I understand the Parliament sits to-morrow, to chuse the Commissioners for regulating the Law, and I know it is their usual manner to command all men that come to their Bar (that they look upon as delinquents or offenders) to receive their sentence at their Bar kneeling. And truly, Sir, I have no desire at all to affront them, or to vex them more than they are, for I believe they are vexed enough already at me. And therefore I beseech you, oblige me so far unto you, as to tell the Speaker, and some other Members, whom you please, from me, That when upon Tuesday I shall come to their Bar, to receive their sentence, I shall not kneel, although they should order you with your mace at their Bar to knock my brains out: and, Sir, if you please to give me leave, I will render you my reason, and it is this. I know when any kneels at your Bar to receive a sentence, the Parliament looks upon that action or gesture of kneeling, as a demonstration of a man's own conviction in his own conscience, that he is guilty, and thereby does deserve such a punishment, as by that sentence is past upon him; the which if I should do, I were in my own understanding the veriest rogue in the world, because my conscience and soul tells me, that I have done no evil, nor broke none of the Parliament's Laws, but followed (as by the Laws of England I may justifiably do) an honest, just and righteous business, in a just and honest way, without using any base or wicked ungodly means to effect my design in it. And whatever Mr. Hill hath reported to the House, I am sure of it, we have fully proved every clause and circumstance contained in our Petition, save only that clause of Sir Arthur Haslerig's private corresponding with some of the Commissioners of Haberdashers-hall. But if we had not proved the Petition, there is no Law extant in England to enable the Parliament in the least to pass such a sentence upon me: and therefore for me in words, actions or gesture, to do the least circumstance, to make the Parliament believe that I in mine own conscience was convinced that they had passed a just sentence upon me; I had rather; Mr. Serjeant, be cut in ten thousand pieces, than be such a rogue and traitor to mine own liberties and the nation's; and therefore I beg of you beforehand to tell them as much from me, that so they may avoid, if they please, their forcing me on Tuesday next to affront them. And he afterwards assured me, that the next day, being Saturday, he told twenty or thirty of the Members of Parliament of it; so that they put the affront upon themselves, and not I. But upon the said Tuesday, after that I was withdrawn out of the House, and set at liberty to be gone as soon as I pleased, there being great store of Citizens, my very good friends, at the door (who were Persons that had always faithfully adhered to the Parliament's cause) with a Petition for the revoking of my banishment; the Petition being called for in, was read and debated, but laid aside, without giving any answer to the Petitioners. The Copy of which Petition, as since it is printed in England, thus followeth.

To the supreme Authority, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England.

The Humble Petition of many well-affected People, inhabiting the City of London, Westminster, Southwark, and parts adjacent, in behalf of the just Liberties of the free People of England, highly concerned in the sentence against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn,*

HUMBLY SHEWETH;

THAT if the manifold services, and extreme sufferings of Lieutenant Col. John Lilburne, in opposition to tyranny and oppression, and how instrumental he hath been in the removal of divers sorts of oppressors, his wonderful deliverances and clear acquittments by legal trials, from all former accusations, without the least stain to his reputation; if all these could be forgotten, and that he stood in our thoughts, but as the meanest of well-affected persons (and such at the least we must allow him, having in all times adhered to Parliaments) yet in your late proceedings towards him, and heavy censure upon him, we apprehend our native rights so much concerned, that we never conceived a greater cause of speedy application to you for redress, than upon this sad occasion.

For certainly it cannot be denied, but if he be really an offender, he is such by the breach of some Law, made and published before the fact, and ought by due process of Law, and verdict of twelve men, to be thereof convicted, and found guilty of such crime; unto which the Law also hath prescribed such a punishment agreeable to that our fundamen-

* This Petition shewing the esteem and veneration Lilburn was in among the People; and the sentiments those times had of his Cause, and the value they set on Trials, by Jury, as the birthright of ENGLISHMEN; is the reason 'tis here inserted.

tal liberty; which enjoineth that no freeman of England should be adjudged of life, limb, liberty, or estate, but by Juries; a freedom which Parliaments in all ages contended to preserve from violation; as the birthright, and chief inheritance of the people, as may appear most remarkably in the Petition of Right, which you have filed, that most excellent Law.

And therefore we trust upon second thoughts (being the Parliament of England) you will be so far from bereaving us (who have never forfeited our right) of this our native right, and way of trials by Juries (for what is done unto any one, may be done unto every one;) that you will preserve them entire to us, and to posterity, from the encroachments of any, that would innovate upon them. And if the original of the unhappy differences between Sir Arthur Haslerig and Mr. Lilburn be duly weighed (being as we are informed) it will appear, that Sir Arthur's stoppage of moneys due to Mr. Lilburn, without legal process, was the first occasion thereof.

And it is believed, that if Mr. Primate's cause [wherein Sir Arthur and Mr. Lilburn have been engaged] had at any time either at first or last been admitted to a trial at Law, and had passed any way by verdict of twelve sworn men; all the trouble and inconveniences arising thereupon had been prevented: the way of determination by major votes of committees, being neither so certain nor so satisfactory in any case as by way of Juries, the benefit of challenges and exceptions, and unanimous consent, being all essential privileges in the latter: whereas committees are tied to no such rules, but are at liberty to be present or absent at pleasure. Besides, Juries being birthright, and the other but new and temporary, men do not, nor [as we humbly conceive] ever will acquiesce in the one as in the other; from whence it is not altogether so much to be wondered at, if upon dissatisfactions, there have been such frequent printing of mens cases, and dealings of committees, as there have been; and such harsh and inordinate heats, and expressions between parties interested, such sudden and importunate appeals to your authority, being indeed all alike out of the true English road, and leading into nothing but trouble and perplexity, breeding hatred and enmities between worthy families, affronts and disgust between persons of the same publick affection and interest, and to the rejoicing of none but publick adversaries. All which, and many more inconveniences, can only be avoided, by referring all such cases to the usual trials and final determinations of Law.

And, whereas you have censured Mr. Lilburn seven thousand pounds fine, and to perpetual banishment, and to die as a felon if he return; we are exceedingly afflicted in our spirits thereby, not only because he hath not had the usual way of trial by Jury, which yet weighs very much with us; nor for that we believe he hath followed Mr. Primate's cause, out of strong persuasion of the justness thereof (the cause in itself, as we have been informed, being very intricate and hard to be understood, and so did not wilfully or intentionally carry it out against his conscience, some of the commissioners wishing to God it had therefore never came before them,) nor for that we believe him innocent of any wilful breach of Parliament privilege, in delivering printed Petitions, before the original was presented unto you [that being never before published, to be a breach] though all these add to our grief, yet the main of our affliction ariseth from the destructiveness of the sentence, as being therein contrary to that other our fundamental native right, which enjoins that fines should have regard to the qualities of the persons; a plowman saving his wainage, and a merchant his merchandise. Whereas this, if relating to his estate, we believe, is so far from preserving him in his quality, as that it leaves himself, his wife, and children, without sustenance; if in relation to his person, his affection to Parliaments, and zeal to publick freedom, renders all foreign Nations so unsafe to him, as that in effect he is banished into a wilderness, and exposed naked to the fury of bears and lions.

The premises duly weigh'd, and for that (as we are informed) the parties accused and censured, have had no means to see what report hath been made by the honourable committee, nor have had the liberty of exceptions thereunto, in like cases granted; and in that many well-affected people that heard the debates, and evidences on both sides, are unsatisfied, both in point of possession, and title to the colliery in question; that the honour of Parliament may stand immaculate, our native fundamental rights inviolable, and all those gentlemen concerned in this cause left without any the least grudging, or just complaint;

We have deemed ourselves bound in conscience in most humble manner to intreat,

I. That you will be pleased to recal your fore-mentioned grievous sentence upon Lieutenant-Col. John Lilburn, and the rest concerned therein.

II. To give free Liberty to Mr. Primate to prosecute his cause, both for title and possession at the common Law; and therein to make use of what counsel he shall think fit.

III. That Sir Arthur Haslerig be referred to take his course at Law, for whatsoever injuries conceived to be done unto him by Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, or any others, as was granted in Mr. Musgrave's case with the said Sir Arthur; and that Mr. Lilburn, or any others, may have the same liberty against Sir Arthur, if they conceive any cause.

After which, the said friends of mine drew up another, as they hoped, much more effectual than that foregoing. And upon the Tuesday after, being January the seven and twentieth, went up with it to the Parliament-house, but could not that day get it read. Upon which I that night supp'd with about two hundred of them, at an house behind the Exchange in London; and the next morning went to the Speaker of the Parliament, and told him, that on the morrow, being Thursday, I intended, by God's assistance, to take my journey for beyond sea, and therefore intreated him to give me his Pass: but he told me he durst not for his hanging give me a Pass. Unto which I replied; Sir, that is very strange, that your house will command me, upon pain of death, to leave England by such a day, [which I am willing to do] and yet you will not enable me by your Pass to be gone. For want of which, it is very probable, when I come at the seaside, your officers of the Custom-house will stop me: and yet, because I am not gone out of England before such a day, I must be hanged. What is this else, but to lay a snare for my life? for you command me upon pain of death to be gone, and yet yet you will not give me your Pass to enable me to go, although it be almost impossible without it for me to get away.

Well, said the Speaker, I dare not for my life give it you. So I was forced to depart without it. And the next morning, being Thursday, January 29th, I took horse at Finsbury-stables by Moor-fields, and rid through London and Southwark, being accompanied with great Store of my friends on horseback, who brought me divers miles on my journey. And the next day I came to Dover.

And being forced at Dover to make use of the Parliament's printed Votes about my banishment, for my Pass, I was by the officers let go, and in a few hours time I arrived safe at Ostend; and upon the 8th of February last, arrived (by God's blessing) at Amsterdam, the place of my desired rest and abode, where, within a few days after, I found a printed Act of Parliament, which thus followeth:

An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn.

WHEREAS, upon the fiftenth day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1651, a Judgment was given in Parliament against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, for bigb Crimes and Misdemeanors by him committed, relating to a false, malicious and scandalous Petition heretofore presented to the Parliament, by one Josiah Primat, of London, Leatherfeller, as by the due proceedings had upon the said Petition, and the Judgment thereupon given at large, appeareth: Be it therefore Enacted by this present Parliament, and by the Authority of the same, That the Fine of three thousand pounds imposed upon the said John Lilburn, to the use of the Commonwealth, by the Judgment aforesaid, shall be forthwith levied by due Process of Law, to the use of the Commonwealth accordingly. And be it further Enacted, That the sum of two thousand pounds imposed by the said Judgment upon the said John Lilburn, to be paid to Sir Arthur Haslerig for damages, and the sum of two thousand pounds likewise imposed by the said Judgment upon the said John Lilburn, to be paid to James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molins and Arthur Squib in the said Judgment named; that is to say, to each of them five hundred pounds for their damages, shall be forthwith paid accordingly: and that the said Sir Arthur Haslerig, James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molins and Arthur Squib, their Executors and Administrators, shall have the like remedy and proceedings at Law respectively against the said John Lilburn, his Heirs, Executors, Administrators and Assigns, for the recovery of the respective sums so given to them by the said Judgment, as if the said respective sums had been due by several Recognizances in the nature of a Statute Staple, acknowledged unto them severally by the said John Lilburn, upon the said 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651. And be it likewise Enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That the said John Lilburn shall, within twenty days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories, and Dominions thereof: And in case the said John Lilburn at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, shall be found, or shall be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof; the said John Lilburn shall be, and is hereby adjudged a Felon, and shall be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy. And it is lastly Enacted, by the Authority aforesaid, That all, and every person, and persons, who shall, after the expiration of the said twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the Territories, Islands, or Dominions thereof, shall be hereby adjudged accessory of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Justices, Mayors, Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well Military as Civil, in their respective places, are hereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburn, and in putting this Act in due execution.

Friday, the 30th of January, 1651. Ordered by the Parliament, That this Act be forthwith printed and published.

Henry Scobell, Cleric. Parliamenti.

But the said John Lilburn returning to his native Country in June, 1653, was apprehended, and committed to Newgate, as appears by the following Mittimus.

The (illegal) Mittimus of the Lord-Mayor.

"Whereas it was enacted by a late Act of Parliament, (entitled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn) That the said John Lilburn should within twenty days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651, depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories, and Dominions thereof: and that in case the said John Lilburn at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof; the said John Lilburn is thereby adjudged a Felon, and to be executed as a Felon, as in the said Act was mention'd: and whereas the said John Lilburn hath been remaining, and found since the expiration of the said twenty days, within the Liberties of the City of London, in the Commonwealth of England, contrary to the said Act: These are therefore, in the name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, to will and require you forthwith, upon receipt hereof, to receive into your custody, the body of the said John Lilburn, whom I send unto you herewith for the Felony aforesaid, and him safely to keep, until he shall be delivered by due course of Law; and this shall be your Warrant. Given under my Hand and Seal, dated this sixteenth day of June, in the Year of our Lord, 1653.

To the Keepers of the Goal of Newgate.

John Fowk, Mayor.

Before the Sessions began, John Lilburn petition'd the Parliament, but they taking no notice of his Petition, he was brought to his Trial, July 13th, as follows.

The

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, against John Lilburn, now Prisoner at the Bar.

MR. Lilburn was brought to the Bar upon Wednesday, the 13th of July, where after silence being made in the Court, the Clerk commanded him to hold up his hand at the Bar: Mr. Lilburn applying his speech to the Lord Chief-Baron Wylde, desired his honour to explain what was meant by holding up the hand at the Bar, that so by doing that Act, Ceremony, or Form, he might not run himself into snares and dangers. And after a large dispute betwixt the Court and him upon that point, he saith, Then, my Lord, my name, I must acknowledge to be John Lilburn, Gent. son of Richard Lilburn of Thickley-Punchardon, in the County of Durham, Esq; and I am here ready to answer any thing any man hath to lay to my charge. And the Indictment being read, Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court, demanded of him whether he was Guilty, or not guilty. But Mr. Lilburn, the Prisoner at the Bar, applied himself to the Court, and said,

My Lord Chief-Baron Wylde,

I humbly desire, as my right by Law, to speak freely against the insufficiency and illegality of the Indictment, before I join issue to it. Which being (with a little struggling) granted him, he said, Well then, my Lord, now is the time, or never, for me to assign my errors against the Indictment, before I plead to it: for if once I should plead to it, it will then be too late to assign the errors; but if I do it before, then of right and justice you ought to grant me a Copy of my Indictment, and assign me learned Counsel in the Law to consult with, and a convenient time to return in my Answer unto the said Indictment: all which (said the Prisoner) is fully declared for good Law by the Lord Coke, in his 3d Institute, fol. 29. 34. 137. 230. which Book was published by two special Orders of the House of Commons in their virginity and purity, in Anno 1641 and 1642, for good Law. The pregnant and pertinent passages of which places were distinctly read by the Prisoner at the Bar, and pressed with all the earnestness and reason he possibly could, to enjoy the benefit thereof. And to the apprehension of the Prisoner, and multitudes of the by-standers, the Court expressly ordered that he should have Counsel assigned, and the Copy of the Indictment; but withal, he was ordered under his hand to send in his Exceptions: upon which the Prisoner was carried into the Garden, on the backside of the Court, to draw them up; where, having remained some space, during the dining of the Court, he writ a Letter, the Copy of which thus followeth:

For the Right Honourable the Lord Chief-Baron Wylde, and the rest of the Honourable Bench, these humbly present.

My Lord, and the Honourable Bench,

SINCE I departed the Court, I have seriously considered, that I cannot legally make any Exceptions concerning the errors in the Indictment, without a true Copy thereof, to compare with the Act against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, and therefore I humbly pray that you would be pleased so far to do me that right in point of life, that I may have a true Copy thereof, and I shall speedily present my Exceptions under my hand, and thankfully remain,

Your Lordship's most humble Servant,

John Lilburn.

Which Letter being delivered by one of the Officers, as the Judge was at dinner; as soon as the Court sat again, the Prisoner, contrary to his expectation, was called to the Bar again, and Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court pressed very hard to him to plead to the Indictment, Guilty, or Not Guilty: but the Prisoner at the Bar applying himself to the Lord Chief-Baron Wylde, very much wondered why he should be called to the Bar any more, before he had enjoyed the Benefit of their own Order, for a Copy of his Indictment, and the assignation of learned Counsel in the Law to consult with. Judge Warburton with some heat falls upon the Prisoner, and undervalues the works of that learned man in the Law of England, Sir Edward Coke, and the Parliament's Orders that had caused his second, third and fourth part of his Institutes to be printed; and highly extols the absoluteness of Parliaments. Upon which, the Prisoner at the Bar replies with a great deal of zeal, earnestness, reason, understanding, and length of time. And after a long and tedious struggling, he could obtain no more that night, but a lame Order to have Counsel assigned him only to one individual point. And taking out the Order by his Friends the next morning, being Thursday, July 14, 1653, he sent a Letter to the Court, the true Copy of which thus followeth:

For the Right Honourable the Lord Chief-Baron Wylde, and the rest of the Honourable Bench, for the Goal delivery of the Old-Bailey.

My Lord,

Vouchsafe me liberty to acquaint you, that immediately upon my getting to my lodging in Newgate, I dispatch'd away this bearer, Mr. Overton, with another Friend, to the Court for their Order, which was given unto them; and by it Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Serjeant Earl, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wylde, Mr. Chute, and Mr. Norbury, should be assigned of Counsel with John Lilburn, Gentleman, to advise with him whether he shall insist upon his Plea in Law, or whether he be the same John Lilburn named in the Act, or not, before ten of the clock to-morrow in the forenoon. Sir, the parties who took the Order, posted away to seek the Counsel, and spent several hours, but could find none of them but Mr. Maynard, who was sick; and Mr. Chute, who was just a going out of Town: and besides, my Lord, give me leave to acquaint your Honour, that in a private way, I have got the opinion of some well versed in the Law, and really, my Lord, when they read the Order of the Court, and are told that I cannot get a Copy of the Indictment, they stand amazed at it, and know not what to advise: Therefore, seeing that really and in seriousness I have done the utmost to get the advice of Counsel according to the said Order, and cannot obtain it to any purpose; neither can those that are willing privately to help me, do me any good (as they say) for want of the Copy of the Indictment, which they say in Law and reason ought not to be denied to me; therefore I humbly continue my suit to your Honour, nour, and the honourable Bench, that you would not require impossibilities from me, that am no Lawyer, in an absolute unprecedented case, wherein I have no footsteps at all to tread in, or any other guide to walk by, but only the natural reason of an ignorant and illiterate Man in the practick part of the Law of England. And therefore do most humbly pray and beseech your Honour, and the honourable Bench, as you are Christians, and men of honour and conscience, to afford me a Copy of my Indictment, and time till the next Sessions, to consult with the Counsel that you have assigned me: for which favour and justice, I shall be very much obliged to remain,

Newgate,
July 14. 1653.

Yours in sincerity and heartiness to serve you,

John Lilburn.

But for all the aforesaid Letter, he was called to the Bar upon Thursday in the forenoon, where he again struggled very earnestly for a Copy of his Indictment, as his right by Law; and the Lord Chief-Baron Wyld sitting upon the Bench, the Recorder and the Prisoner had a long and hot encounter each with other; and about two a-clock in the afternoon the Prisoner was dismissed, with a promise of the Copy of his Indictment, being thereupon ordered to bring in his Exceptions by two a-clock the next day in the afternoon: but the Prisoner, several hours after his dismissal, apprehending himself wronged with those delays or denials (of right and justice) that were put upon him, writ a third Letter, the Copy of which thus followeth.

For the Right Honourable the Lord Chief-Baron Wyld, and the Honourable the Court of Gaol-delivery, sitting in the Old-Bailey, these humbly with speed present.

My Lord,

I stand amazed why I am denied a Copy of my Indictment, which I apprehended the Court granted me at the Bar as my right; I did therefore send my father and father-in-law, with my brother-in-law, and my cousin-german, humbly to desire it as my right, but they returned me your denial of it: in which regard, in all humility, though much of my time be expired, I have by these few lines once again sent my father and brother to wait upon you for a Copy of it (to leave you without excuse) which is my absolute right by Law; and do therefore humbly intreat you it may be sent to me presently, without which I am not bound in Law to draw up a Plea, nor cannot. But if I must be murdered and destroyed without Law, my innocent blood be upon the heads of those that shall be guilty of it; by will to take it from me. So humbly craving your Lordships legal, speedy, and just answer, I rest,

Your Lordship's most humble Servant, so far as you are a maintainer of the People of England's fundamental Laws and Liberties,

John Lilburn.

But receiving no benefit by the said letter, the next morning, being Friday, his father went to the Lord Chief-Baron's Chamber; but he being preparing to go out of Town, he could not be permitted to speak with him. After which, the old Gentleman came back to the Old-Bailey, to complain of his son's hard usage; and from them with a messenger went back again to the Lord Chief-Baron's Chamber, and from thence to Attorney-General Prideaux's Chamber, to get a Warrant from him to enjoy the Copy of the Indictment; and then coming to the Court again; about ten of the clock he received it from the hand of Mr. Lee; the Copy whereof thus followeth.

At the Sessions of Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, now sitting, this present 16th day of July, 1653.

London ff. THE Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, upon their Oaths do present, that in, and by a Statute made in the Parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Westminster, in the County of Middlesex, the 30th of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, intitled, An Act for the execution of a judgment given in Parliament against Lieut. Col. John Lilburn; it was enacted by the said Parliament, and by the authority of the same, that the said John Lilburn should (within twenty days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651) depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories and Dominions thereof. And in case the said John Lilburn, at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories or Dominions thereof; the said John Lilburn should be, and was thereby adjudged a Felon, and should be executed as a Felon without benefit of Clergy. And it was also enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every person and persons, who should, after the expiration of the said twenty days, willingly, relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the Territories, Islands, or Dominions thereof, should be thereby adjudged accessory of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Justices, Mayors, Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well Military as Civil, in their respective places, are thereby required to be aiding and assisting, in apprehending the said John Lilburn, and in putting the said Act in due execution, as in and by the said Act of Parliament appeareth. And that the said John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, the Statute aforesaid not weighing, nor the Punishments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, as aforesaid, to-wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining within England aforesaid; that is to say, at London, to-wit, in the Parish of Giles without Cripplegate, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London aforesaid, against the form of the Statute aforesaid, and against the publick peace, &c.

Sadler,

And bringing it to his son, who, with the best Counsel that he had, reading it, his work was all of new to begin again; so that he was forced first to post away his own father and others, to let the Court know, that although it was their order in Court, that he should have had the Copy of his Indictment

Thursday,
July 14. 1653.
Past 5 a-clock at night.

Indictment the day before, being Thursday, about two a-clock in the afternoon; yet it was ten a-clock upon Friday forenoon, before he could get it. And at two a-clock in the afternoon upon the said Friday, he was to appear at the bar; and all his work, upon the serious viewing the Indictment, was to begin a-new, so that it was impossible that in three or four hours time he could be ready. And therefore his father and Mr. Overton press'd the Court to give him time till the next morning, being Saturday the 16th of July, to make his Exceptions ready, and put them in; but it would no ways be granted, nor no longer time than two hours to be added to the former. At the understanding of which, he intreated his father-in-law, and Mr. Thomas Prince, to go down to the Court again, and tell them that it was altogether impossible that the Prisoner could make his Exceptions ready by four a-clock in the afternoon of the said Friday, it being ten in the forenoon, before he could get the Copy of the Indictment; although it was their order, that he should have had it by two a-clock in the afternoon the day before; and therefore they press'd hard at the Bar to the Court, to have till the next morning being Saturday, for the Prisoner to bring in his Exceptions; but they also returned with a Negative. The Prisoner and such as he had at work, followed his papers as for their lives; and about six or seven at night, came the messengers from the Court for Mr. Lilburn the Prisoner, who being come to the Bar, Mr. Lee, the Clerk, press'd him again to plead guilty or not guilty, to the said Indictment; but the Prisoner little regarding him, address'd himself to the Lord-Mayor, as the then President of the Court, and gave him an exact Narrative of what delays he had had about the getting of the Copy of the Indictment; being delayed from two a-clock in the afternoon upon Thursday, till ten a-clock in the forenoon that present Friday; and that as soon as he had got it, he had taken all the pains, and used all the industry, that it was possible to be expected from an ignorant man in the formalities and niceties of the Law of England. That he had sent several messengers truly to acquaint the Court, that he could not possibly get the said Exceptions deliberately perfected before the morrow morning, being Saturday. That they were weighty things, and the failing in one word, might cost him his life. That he was (when Mr. Brisco came for him) but newly begun to read, examine, and compare the ingrossed copy with the original, to see whether there was any fault in it or no; that he nothing nigh had read over one quarter of it, when he was called away to come to the Court. That he hoped they would not compel him, to put in uncorrected Exceptions for his life, especially seeing the mistake of one word might destroy him, and especially seeing procrastination of time was no part of his fault, but the Court's only and solely, who had causelessly spent so much time, before they would give him that, the Copy of his Indictment, which was in Law (he having already made his verbal Exceptions) so essentially and legally his right, and without which he neither was bound, nor could make legally and formally in Law his Exceptions against the Indictment read unto him in Court. And therefore humbly prayed, that he might enjoy the honourable Court's favour till to-morrow morning, to make them ready, and put them in: which being granted, he the Prisoner departed to his lodging, and posted away to several of his Counsel, some of which coming to him that night, he had a large discourse with them, and they read much of his papers, and very highly approved of his Exceptions; but withal told him, he had fallen far short in demanding his right and due.

So upon Saturday about eight a-clock in the forenoon, he was brought to the Bar again, and he was press'd again by Mr. Lee, to plead, guilty, or not guilty, to the Indictment.

But Mr. Lilburn, the Prisoner at the Bar, regard'd not him, but address'd himself to the Lord-Mayor and the Court, acquainting them where they left off the last night; and that in obedience to their commands, he had brought in his Exceptions against the sufficiency of the Indictment, read unto him in the Court, fairly ingrossed in Parchment according to Law, and humbly prayed that it might be accepted, recorded and read: so handing it into the Court, the Recorder, Mr. Steele, took it in his hand, looked upon it, and said, Mr. Lilburn, this is not under your Counsel's hands.

Mr. Lilburn. No, Sir, it is not, I am sure some of them tell me it needs not; but it is under my own hand, and I must and will justify, and make good those Exceptions with my life.

Recorder. Wherefore did we assign Counsel? one cause was, that they might sign your Exceptions.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, with your favour thus; be pleased to take notice, that in your assigning me Counsel, you have only done it to one individual point; which is not only a snare to me, but also to my Counsel. First, to me, in cooping me up to one plea for my life; whereas the insufficiency of the Indictment, and the illegal contradictory things upon which it is grounded, and my right in Law, leaves me sufficiently at elbow-room, to have plurality of Pleas or Exceptions: and therefore in your assigning me Counsel in one point only; if they should set their hands to any more but that one point alone, they tell me, they run themselves into snares and dangers. But, my Lord, they likewise tell me, if you, and this honourable Court, please to assign them of my Counsel at large, they will not only sign my Exceptions, but will venture their all at the Bar of Justice to maintain them to be good Law. And not only so, but they tell me, and bid me tell the Court, if I pleased, that if they have any understanding in the Law, and that their Law-books speak truth, they are very confident that all the Judges and Lawyers in England put together in one, shall never be able while they breathe, to draw up a legal Indictment upon the Act of Banishment, of the 30th of January, 1651, and the Votes or Judgment (as 'tis called) of the 15th of January, 1651, upon which it is grounded, if these printed copies of them be true copies; because, my Lord, they say, a judgment, and the execution of a judgment, ought to be like a pair of Indentures exactly even in all things, the one neither to be above nor below the other, but even with it in all circumstances; but in the pretended judgment, and the Act for execution thereof, there are these three essential differences.

First, The judgment (as it's called) saith, Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn shall be banished and depart out of England, within thirty days next after the said 15th day of January, 1651; but the Act for executing the said judgment, expressly saith, he shall not stay in England above twenty days next after the said 15th day of January, 1651. So that, my Lord, here is ten days difference betwixt the Judgment Judgment itself, and the Act for the pretended execution thereof; which makes an essential nullity in it, and all proceedings that are founded upon it.

Secondly, The pretended Judgment banisheth one Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Islands and Territories thereunto belonging, but banisheth him not in the least out of their Dominions; so that Wales being stiled, distinguished, and denominated in Law to be a Dominion, the said banished Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, by any words contained in the said banishing Votes or Judgment, might legally and securely have lived in Wales all his days. But then comes the said Act of January 30th, 1651, which is called an Act for the execution of the said Judgment of the 15th of January, 1651, given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, and it banisheth the said Lieutenant-Colonel out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories and Dominions thereof: so that here is a main essential difference betwixt the pretended Judgment, and the Act for the execution thereof.

The third difference betwixt them is this; the pretended Judgment of the 15th of January, 1651, saith, That if the said banish'd Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn shall return into England, &c. at any time after the expiration of the said thirty days, he shall be proceeded against as a Felon, and shall suffer death accordingly.

But the said pretended Act of the 30th of January 1651, made on pretence for the execution thereof, expressly saith, by way of addition, that if the said Lieut. Col. John Lilburn shall return into England, &c. after his banishment, he shall be, and is hereby adjudged a Felon, and shall be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy; so that, my Lord, they say it is impossible to draw up a legal Indictment upon the fore mentioned contradicting Act, Votes, or pretended Judgment.

Mr. Recorder. Well then, Mr. Lilburn, seeing your Counsel are so willing, as you say they are, to sign your Exceptions for good Law, the Court will give you time till six of the clock at night, to get their hands to it, and will assign you Counsel at large. Unto which Mr. Lilburn replied, My Lord, I am put upon a great streight.

First, In that the Sessions are holden a week after they should usually have been held; by means of which length of time, most of the great and chiefest, able, and most learned Counsel of England, are gone out of Town.

Secondly, Your Honour and the Court, hath exhausted and spent from Wednesday morning, till this hour, before you would fully grant me that which is my absolute right by Law; by means of which delay of time, I am afraid, I have by this lost all my Counsel, that you have assigned me, that I can fully rest upon, that were in Town when I named them for my Counsel, and whom, if you pleased to have ordered it so, I could have often conferred with since, though now truly, I am afraid they are all gone out of Town upon the Circuit; and if they be, is it possible that I should get their hands to my Exceptions by six a-clock? And therefore that we may delay no longer time in this Trial, I beseech you without any more ado, accept of my own Exceptions under my own hand: I am sure I am the most concerned in them, and my life must pay for the faults in them, if there be any. And therefore I pray accept of them without any more ado, under my own hand alone: I am sure my Counsel tell me, you ought in Law to do it.

Recorder. Well, Mr. Lilburn, in short, the Court tells you they cannot in Law, nor will not accept them, without your Counsel sign them.

Lilburn. Really, Mr. Recorder, you drive me to very great streights, in delaying me so long my right by Law, before you will fully grant it me; it is an apparent hazard, and a very great probability my Counsel are all already gone out of Town: and then after you have so delayed me, to tie me up to an unnecessary and unrequired in Law Punctilio, for me to get my Counsels hands to my Exceptions in so short a time, when in probability it is impossible it shall or can be done.

Besides, my Lord-Mayor, consider of the inconveniency that Mr. Recorder would tie me to, which is this; I stand here to plead for my life, and I am commanded to put in my Exceptions against the illegality of an Indictment read unto me, and it may be it is evidently seen, known, or at least believed, that I have several of the now present greatest men in England, for my grand and chiefest adversaries; and therefore to tie me up in my case at all, to bring in any thing under my Counsels hands, is a snare and danger to me: for we all know by experience, my Lord, how easy it is for the great men in power, right or wrong, to crush and destroy any man that they in good earnest set themselves against; and it is apparent their Indignation is heated sevenfold against me (but I must avow it, without any the least just ground or cause) and it cannot chuse but burn in a very great degree against my Counsellors, that shall help me in Law to preserve my life, against their intred and big swollen malice. And, my Lord, I am sure, almost all those Counsellors that you have assigned me, are not only men of great estates, but also men of great practice, which is their livelihood; and 'tis possible my condition, before my Trial is done, will compel and necessitate me, to speak that high and yet legal language, that may ruin and destroy my Counsel, either to plead it, or set their hands to it: and for me to expect or desire that from them, that shall apparently tend to the ruin and destruction of them and their families; when I am in such a mean, low, and poor condition, as that I am able in no measure, in the least, to make them any part of amends, for that ruin or loss, they shall or may sustain, by too deep ingaging for my preservation; I were an irrational, unjust, beastly man to do it. My Lord, it is my person at present now at the bar, that is in hazard and jeopardy, and none else. And, my Lord, I am long since robbed of all my estate, by the tyrannical will and arbitrary pleasure of Sir Arthur Haslerig; and have long since nothing left to buy me bread, but what I borrow. And, my Lord, I have now nothing to lose but my Wife and tender Babes, and my skin; and to die to me is gain, so I be not seu de se, a murderer of myself: and therefore I beseech you, my Lord, let me put in my Exceptions under my own hand.

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, if you be so earnest thus to do, wherefore do you so much press for Counsel learned in the Law to be assigned you?

Mr. Lilburn. I will tell you presently, my Lord: in the Italian History of a Nobleman of Italy, and otherwise, I have read and heard of Gustavus Adolphus, that valiant and wise late King of Sweden; that although he was a most expert Soldier, yet in all difficult and knotty enterprizes that he did endeavour to undertake, he would call all his able, discreet and understanding Officers together. And because, as Solomon saith, two is better than one, and a three-fold cord it not easily broken; he would advise and consult with them all: but yet, being he was, and did apprehend himself most concerned, and had the far greatest stock to adventure in the affair he went about, he would not absolutely be tied up in every punctilio to their advice; but being a very wise, righteous, just, and withal valiant man, it is therefore said of him, when he had heard with mature deliberation all their advices, he would after that with a serious consultation with his own reason and understanding, draw his own inferences and conclusions, and with mettle and gallantry put them only in execution. Even so, my Lord, my Life being at stake, although I have a little competency of understanding, and mettle enough to execute a thing; yet being I am ignorant of the punctilios, formalities or practick part of the Law; and being that the Scripture saith, Woe to him that is alone, for two is better than one, and a threefold cord is not easily broken; on those considerations I am desirous to consult with learned Counsel in the Law, especially since it is my right by Law so to do. But I do assure you, my Lord, seeing God hath endowed me with a good proportion of judgment and understanding to discern of things, and seeing my adventure is abundantly the greatest, I will not absolutely be tied up to follow my Counsels advice in all things, neither will I do it, unless I like it very well; but in most knotty, difficult and high cases, that is not safe for them too deeply to engage in, for fear of their own ruin, and my absolute inability in any proportionable measure to requite them; I will therefore draw my inference and conclusions from their advice and counsel, and manage them myself in my own way, for the safety and preservation of my own life. And therefore, my Lord, I pray you again to accept of my Exceptions under my own hand, without any more ado, that so we may speedily come to some issue of this tedious jangling business.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, I tell you again, the Court will not, nor cannot receive your Exceptions without being signed by your Counsel; and therefore to enable you to procure their hands, we will give you an order at large, that so you may fully be ready by six a-clock.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I pray deliver the order speedily to my father there in Court, lest if it be never so little delayed, my Counsel be all gone out of Town: which being by the Court assented unto, the Copy of the order thus followeth;

London. AT the Goal-delivery of Newgate, July 16, 1653. Mr. Serjeant Glynne,
 " Mr. Serjeant Earle, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hale,
 " Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Chute, Mr. Norbury, and Mr. Webb, are by this Court assigned
 " of Counsel, with John Lilburn, Gent. to perfect
 " his Plea in Law, and deliver the same under the " hands of them, or one of them, before six of " the clock this day in the afternoon."

Sadler.

Whereupon the Prisoner withdrew to his lodging, and being brought to the Bar about six a-clock at night, Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court, pressed very hard to him, to answer and plead to the Indictment, guilty or not guilty; besides whom, stepped up another Gentleman in the Court, and he in a mumbling manner preft something, at hard as his slender abilities would enable him. Whereupon Mr. Lilburn demanded to know of the Lord-Mayor, what that newly-come Gentleman was, that was so far afraid to speak out his mind, that he could not understand what he said. Whereupon answer was returned, it was Mr. Hall, the Attorney of the Dutchy, who was come thither to be a Prosecutor for the State or Commonwealth.

But Mr. Lilburn's chiefest business being with the Court, he accordingly applied himself to the Lord-Mayor:

My Lord, I desire to give your honour a true and real account of all my transactions, since I was last before you, which is this: You may remember at my being last at the Bar, I told you, I did verily believe my Counsel were all upon the point of going out of Town; in which regard I earnestly intreated you without more delay to deliver your order to my father, that so he might not fall short of getting to my Counsel before they were gone; but, my Lord, at my departure from the Bar, as soon as I came to my lodging, I all on post-haste dispatched my cousin-germans, George and William Lilburn, to Mr. Norbury, who they found just ready to mount on horseback, to be gone out of Town, and acquaint him by word of mouth, with the order the Court had made, to assign him my Counsel at large: and he was pleased without any delay, in his riding habit, to hasten to me, and seriously read over my Exceptions, and sign them, and so bid me farewell, and is gone out of Town. But, my Lord, that which I desire your honour to take notice of, is, That if I had stay'd till my father came forth of the Court with your order, I had totally lost Mr. Norbury, and he had absolutely been gone out of Town, a good while before he could have got to him.

In the second place, having sent my said kinsmen post-haste before to my Counsel, as soon as my father came with your order, I posted him and my brother-in-law away to Mr. Maynard; with whom speaking at his own chamber, they found him sickly and ill, and altogether unfit and unable to come to me, by reason of that little time he had to stay in Town, those several things he had to do at his chamber during his staying, and the weakness of his body, and the absolute necessity of his being at a place by a fix'd hour, or to run the hazard of losing six hundred pound upon his own score: and if you doubt any thing of this relation, they are here in Court to declare the truth of it upon their Oaths themselves. But, my Lord, though Mr. Maynard could not well come to me, yet he was pleased to stay at his chamber, till my father fetch'd my Paper and Exceptions from me; which with seriousness reading, he hath also signed them, which I have now in my hand. But, my Lords, from both my Counsellors, especially Mr. Maynard, I perceive I am very much blamed for my ignorance and folly, in not, when I demanded the Copy of my Indictment, as my right by Law, demanding Oyer, or bearing in open Court, of the Act of Parliament, the Judgment upon which it is grounded, and the Crimes upon which the Judgment is grounded; which, I understand from them, should be exemplified under the Great Seal of England, and ought so to be here remaining in Court.

Mr.

Mr. Recorder replied, Mr. Lilburn, we know of no such thing, the Records of the Acts of Parliament are at Westminster, in the Clerk of the Parliament's hands, and there you may have them.

Mr. Lilburn. Good Mr. Recorder, interrupt me not, but let me go on; I say, my Counsel tells me, I ought, as my right by Law, to have demanded Oyer of the said Act, Judgment and Crimes, and after I had seen them under the Broad Seal of England, and heard them read in open Court, I ought, as my right by Law, to have demanded copies of them all three, and they ought not to have been denied me; that so I might have been fully enabled all at once to have returned Exceptions at large to the Indictment, the Act upon which it is grounded, the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the Crimes, which is the original of all. And if no legal Act can be produced, they tell me the Indictment, and all proceedings upon it, are void and null. And they also say, if no legal Judgment can be produced, they tell me the Act for the execution of it is null, and falls to the ground. And they also say, if no Crimes in Law can be produced upon which the Judgment is legally founded, all is at an end, because what is not good nor found in its original in Law, can never be made so by tract of time; and what is not found and substantial in its foundation, can never be made so in its fabrick or building. But yet, my Lord, they say it is not too late for me yet to insist upon the Oyer as my right by Law: I confess, my Lord, their time would not permit either of them to stay in the Town, to draw me up the formal draught of such a claim, much less would it permit them to stay in Town till it was ingrossed in Parchment, that so they might set their hands unto it. But, my Lord, according to those legal instructions that I have largely received from my Counsel; I have got such a Paper formally in Law drawn up, and it is here ingrossed in Parchment, and signed with my own hand. And, my Lord, I here tender it unto the Court, with two shillings as the Clerk's fee, to enter it upon Record at his peril. The Copy of which Parchment thus followeth:

At the Sessions of Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, now sitting this present 16th day of July, 1653.

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, against John Lilburn, now Prisoner at the Bar.

THE said John Lilburn, Gent. the now Prisoner at the Bar, supposed to be indicted by that name, brought to the Bar, and now appearing in person, having heard the said Indictment read in these words, to wit.

London ss. The Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament upon their Oaths, do present, that in and by a Statute made in the Parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Westminster in the County of Middlesex, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, intituled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; it was enacted by the said Parliament, and by the authority of the same, That the said John Lilburn, should (within twenty-days) be accounted from the 15th day of January (1651.)

depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories and Dominions thereof. And in case the said John Lilburn, at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof; the said John Lilburn should be, and was thereby adjudged a Felon, and should be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy.

And it was also enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all and every person and persons, who should after the expiration of the said twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburn, he being in England, Scotland, Ireland, or any the Territories, Islands, or Dominions thereof, should be thereby adjudged accessary of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Justices, Mayors, Bayliffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well military as civil, in their respective places, are thereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburn, and in putting the said Act in due execution, as in and by the said Act of Parliament appeareth. And that the said John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, the Statute aforesaid not weighing, nor the punishments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, as aforesaid; to wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining within England aforesaid; that is to say, at London, to wit, in the Parish of Giles without Cripple-gate, in the Ward of Cripple-gate, London aforesaid, against the form of the Statute aforesaid, and against the publick Peace, &c.

Sadler.

Which being heard and read, he saith, that it appears by the said Indictment, that he stands indicted by the name of John Lilburn of London, Gentleman, by virtue of an Act of Parliament made the 30th day of January 1651; grounded upon a supposed Judgment given in Parliament against him the said John, or one Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, for several crimes and misdemeanors therein contained. And therefore he the now Prisoner at the Bar, doth humbly pray Oyer, or hearing of the said Act, Judgment, and supposed Crimes mentioned in the said Act, according to Law, and under the Great Seal of England, to enable him to plead thereunto. And he will ever pray for your Honours and Bench.

John Lilburn.

Which being handed into the Court, Mr. Recorder looked upon it, and said Mr. Lilburn, this is not signed under your Counsel's hand; the thing that we expect is your exceptions signed by your Counsel: what call you this Parchment?

Mr. Lilburn. I know not, Sir, what more properly to call it, than my legal demand of Oyer, or hearing in open Court the Act of Parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the Crimes which is the foundation of all. And, Sir, let me tell you, my Counsel commands me to insist, and dwell upon the demand of Oyer as my right, and as the chiefest shield and buckler I have to defend my life: for they say, if no legal crimes can be produced upon which the Judgment was grounded, all is at an end, and there can be no more proceedings against me. And I am sure, there can be no felonious crimes in Law produced against me, for I never committed any in all my days, never was any legally so much as pretended to be laid unto my charge: therefore, my Lord, as my Birthright, and Inheritance, I demand the benefit of the Law, which is Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes. But the Recorder, the Lord-Mayor, and several others endeavoured to interrupt him.

Whereupon he cried out again and again, My Lord, rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, but let me have Oyer; which again and again, I demand as my right, and inheritance. But four or five in the Court again interrupting him, viz. the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux, and mumbling Mr. Hall; My Lord, rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, nor interrupt me not, but give me free liberty to speak for my life. And, my Lord, if you will be so audacious and unjust in the face of this great auditory of People, to deny me, and rob me of all the rules of Justice, and Right, and will forcibly stop my mouth, and not suffer me freely to speak for my life according to Law, I will cry out and appeal to the People, and do cry out, and appeal to all the People that hear me this day; how that my Lord-Mayor, and this Court, by violence rob me of my Birthright by Law, and will not suffer me to speak for my life. At which the Court being in a great heat and rage, Mr. Recorder sent the Prisoner his parchment, and money out of the Court again; but he would have none of it, but commanded the Clerk again to receive it, and enter it upon Record at his peril.

Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux being very busy to hold the Prisoner to questions to insnare himself, as whether he was that John Lilburn meant, and intended in the Indictment and Act or no, and to stave him off from pursuing his just demand of Oyer; which the Prisoner perceiving, falls upon the said Mr. Prideaux to this effect:

My Lord,

I had thought the other day I had said enough to have silenced that Gentleman at this place; but my Lord, seeing he will still needs be doing, and speaking, I beseech you, my Lord, let me desire to be satisfied, and to know in what capacity that Gentleman is here at this place; for I am sure, my Lord, he is no Judge of the Law, nor no Citizen, and therefore cannot as a Justice of Peace sit upon the Bench, as one of my Judges. And, my Lord, if he be my prosecutor, as he is Attorney-General, he can be no more; and if so, my Lord, it is an amazement to me, that your Lordship and the Court will so dishonour yourselves, as to suffer a bare prosecutor to sit amongst you upon the Bench, as one of the chiefest of you, with his hat on his head. My Lord, do that which becomes you, and thrust him down to the Bar, and there let him (as I do) stand with his hat in his hand, and know his office and duty, and prate there. But, my Lord, whether he sits as my Judge, or my Prosecutor, he is no competent man to be in either place; because, my Lord, he is legally an impeached Traitor, by one Esquire Elliot, now Prisoner in Newgate; who, my Lord, avows to me, that he hath long since before the Lord Chief-Justice Rolls, and the rest of the Judges of the Upper-Bench, legally and formally in Law, exhibited a charge of High-Treason against him; which he avows the Court hath accepted of, and recorded as formal in Law, and required of him to enter into great bonds to prosecute it, and make it good: and, my Lord, here is a duplicate of the said charge of High-Treason, which the Esquire's own hand gave unto me as a true copy. And besides, my Lord, he further vows to me, that the Attorney-General, by reason of his late power and greatness in Parliament; the said Attorney-General stands out in contempt, and scorn of the Law, and neither will, nor dare answer his said charge of High-Treason; in which regard of his contempt of the Law of England, through his own acknowledged guilt thereby, he hath almost brought him at Law, to be out-lawed as a Traitor: which he avows, as soon as it is perfected, whenever he can meet the said Attorney-General, and apprehend him, he will without any more ado execute him as a Traitor.

In all which regards, my Lord, I do avow Mr. Attorney-General, in Law, to be altogether incompetent, either for my Judge, or Prosecutor, or any man's else whatsoever; or so much as to be at liberty, to converse with the honest and untainted People of England, till he hath yielded conformity to the Law, and answered to his said charge of High-Treason. Unto which Mr. Recorder seemed to make some answer in the Attorney-General's behalf, (which the penman hereof not well hearing, cannot set down.)

But Mr. Recorder fell upon the Prisoner, and told him how he had trifled away the time of that Court, and had had more favour than any Prisoner ever had.

Mr. Lilburn endeavouring to reply, the Court over and over, again and again interrupted him; but he would go on, and crying out, said to this effect: Mr. Recorder, I wonder you are not ashamed to tax me with trifling away time, when it is only yourself, and the Court that are truly guilty of it; in making me spend my lungs, and my spirits for two or three days together, to plead and contest with you, before you would grant me that, which is so absolutely my right by Law, as a Copy of my Indictment is: so that, Sir, with your favour, it is you that trifle away time, and not I. And whereas you say, I have had more favour than ever Prisoner had; I wonder, Mr. Recorder, you are not ashamed so to say: for what favour at all have I had, when I have not yet enjoyed so much as the Law allows me? Sir, let me tell you, the learned men of the Law, the Lord Chief-Justice Rolls, and the Judges of the King's or Upper-Bench, allowed the Lord Macguire, that arch bloody Irish Rebel and Traitor, who was indicted before them for his life, a thousand times more favour than you do me: for although his crimes were notoriously wicked, even in the eye of the common or known Law of England, and obvious and perspicuous almost to the sight of every eye; yet when he made, as my information hath often told me, but one single exception in a punctilio, or formality about his Peerage, against his Indictment, the Judges assigned him learned Counsel in the Law to plead it, and time enough for him and them to study and frame their Arguments in Law upon it.

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, you tell us much of the advice your Counsel has given you about the Oyer, can you shew us their advice under their hands?

Lilburn. Yes, Sir, that I can.

Recorder.

Recorder. Well, produce it.

Lilburn. Sir, do ye mean to the point of the Oyer?

Recorder. Yes.

Lilburn. Well then, Sir, it may be as to the punctilio of a word, I have mistaken you, but I am sure I have it under one of their hands, and two Witnesses at the Bar to depose it upon Oath, that the other expressly advised it, as the main essential thing to my life, and well-being.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, for all your pretence of integrity, the auditors may take notice, that you aver a falshood in the open Court, that you are not able to make good.

Mr. Lilburn. In the midst of those many and eager interruptions that I meet with from three or four of you at a time, it is easy for a stronger memory than mine, to let a slip fall in the punctilio of a word; but, Sir, to the utmost of my disparagement, and disadvantage, make the worst of it you can; and see what it can amount unto. For in the first place, I do avow with my life, that I saw Mr. Norbury, with his own hand write these very words, upon the back of the Copy of the Indictment, which is here in my hands, and are as followeth:

Mr. Lilburn ought to see the Certiorari, and the Return of the Certiorari; and if the Act be certified without the Judgment, which is recited therein, all is invalid for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Steele was pleased to spend some time upon cavilling at Mr. Lilburn's mispronouncing the word Certiorari; although he had formerly told the Recorder, he neither understood Latin, nor French, nor could well read either of them. And then he told them, that most Lawyers hands were very ill to read, by persons that were not well acquainted with them; but, Sir, faith he, here is Mr. Norbury's own hand, and I do avow it upon my life for a truth, that my eyes saw his own hand and pen write it.

Secondly, If my memory mistake not, I have Mr. Maynard's hand to the same thing also: in those instructions that Mr. Maynard under his hand sent me, by my father and brother this day, both of whom are here present in Court, upon their Oaths to justify, that if it be not plainly expressed under his hand, that by word of mouth, it was the principal instruction he gave unto them, to give unto me to insist upon, as my right, to demand the Oyer, &c. But, Sir, as for the paper itself, there it is, read it; which paper followeth in these words:

It said, that John Lilburn the 15th of June 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining in England. This is insufficient, for it is not said that he was feloniously found; so that the being found in England is not laid within the Indictment. Secondly, And was feloniously remaining; it should be said, was then and there feloniously remaining. So there is no Felony charged in his being found. There is no time charged of that which is laid as a Felony. John Maynard, the 16th of July 1653.

And by way of postscript in the same hand, there are these words, That the Prisoner at the Bar is to desire, that he may have Counsel to plead his Exceptions. And in the same paper, in somewhat a different hand, there are these very words, I pray the Oyer of the Act of Parliament the Indictment is grounded upon; pray enter it upon Record, accept of no Copy but the fight of the Record under the Broad Seal. Which paper the Recorder reading, and seriously viewing, said, Mr. Lilburn, this paper will not reach your purpose; for those lines that seem to be Mr. Maynard's, are not home to the thing in hand, and those lines that are for your purpose are in a quite different hand.

Mr. Lilburn. Well, Mr. Recorder, it matters not much, for I am sure the paper is not in the least of my writing; for I had it as it is from my brother, that I sent to Mr. Maynard with my father about my business, and I am sure it either all is Mr. Maynard's hand, or my brother's; who writ down from the words of Mr. Maynard's own mouth, those instructions that he gave unto him and my father, for me to dwell and insist upon, and to venture and cast my life upon. There they both are, I pray administer unto them both their Oaths, that they may freely speak before the Court, what Mr. Maynard said unto them in this particular point about the Oyer, &c.

Whereupon old Mr. Richard Lilburn the Prisoner's father, with his son-in-law Mr. Thomas Gore, began to speak, and to justify what the Prisoner had alledged; but the Court interrupted them, and commanded them to be silent, and would not let them go on. But Mr. Recorder, taking liberty to speak as long and as often as he pleased, took the liberty several times to calumniate, and render odious the Prisoner at the Bar, for averring a falshood in the open Court; and so sometimes did the Lord-Mayor also, although his Honour was pleased to shew Mr. Lilburn a printed Petition a day or two before, and did solemnly in the face of all the Court aver, that the Woman, pointing to Mrs. Dormer, then a Prisoner at the Bar, had avowed that she had the said printed Petition, and others of the same kind, from Mr. Lilburn. Upon which the said Mrs. Dormer openly cried out, That's false, my Lord, I never said any such thing in my life.

Upon these furious hurley-burleys, that happened betwixt the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, the Attorney-General, and mumbling Mr. Hall the Attorney of the Dutchy, and Mr. Lilburn Prisoner at the Bar; Mr. Lilburn's father, and his brother-in-law Mr. Gore, and one Mr. Thomas Haws, but especially Mr. Thomas Prince, pressed to speak; but could not be permitted, but were again and again interrupted and silenced.

But Mr. Prince pressed hard on, and told the Lord-Mayor to this purpose; That it was the known Law of England, than any by-stander whatsoever might speak for the Prisoner's benefit at the Bar, especially when they apprehended the Prisoner was like to be wronged, and denied his birthright, the benefit of the Law; and this privilege, my Lord, by order of the Court, you have granted me, and other of Mr. Lilburn's friends as our right by Law, to speak in his behalf, when we see things urged against him, against reason and right; and therefore, my Lord, the thing that Mr. Lilburn demands about his Oyer, or hearing read the Act of Parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the crimes that ought to be the original of all, is so essentially his right, that it is an amazement to me to see it disputed: and also it is a wonder to me, that any man that pretends so much as to know the very first Rudiments, or the very first footsteps of the Law, as Mr. Recorder doth, should endeavour to deny such a thing so commonly practised in every ordinary Court of Justice, in the case of every ordinary Bond and Bill that a suit is commenced upon.

The

The Court with violence and fury interrupting him, and silencing him; and Mr. Recorder commanding the Prisoner at the Bar at his peril to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late to receive them, and Mr. Hall mumblingly pressing again and again to pass sentence of condemnation upon him; and the Attorney-General upon the Bench closely pressing to hold him to the point, and not let the Prisoner have any elbow-room to go from it; and Mr. Lee the Clerk of the Court, (like a most detestable Tyrant) pressing to gag the Prisoner at the Bar, that so he should speak no more, and immediately pass sentence of condemnation upon him, and take him away: the Prisoner clearly perceiving the violence and fury of the Court, with an extream earnest, ardent and fierce, and shrill, loud voice, cried out;

My Lord, will you murder me without right of Law, by robbing me of my Birthright, and denying me of Oyer, which is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins? My Lord, are you afraid, and ashamed to produce that Act of Parliament, upon which you pretend to ground your Indictment; upon which you would take away my life? My Lord, if you thus proceed, you will give me and the people cause to believe, that there never was such an Act of Parliament as you pretend, nor such a Judgment as it pretends to be the executor of; nor no such crime ever committed or acted, as any Judgment of Felony can be imagined to be grounded upon; but that rather all your proceedings against me from first to last, is a malicious pack'd conspiracy against me, to murder me, and without ground or cause to take away my life? for whose life have I feloniously taken away, or endanger'd? And if none of all these things in the least can be laid unto my charge, or never were, where is the act of Felony that I have committed, upon which I am endeavour'd to be hang'd?

But the Officers crying out, Hear the Court, and the said mumbling Mr. Hall still singing his pitiful ill-tuned song of pressing for Judgment against the Prisoner; and so many of the Court fell upon him at once, to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late, as made the proceedings of the Court full of confusion.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I may not part with my Exceptions till my demand of Oyer be read; my Lord, my able and honest Counsel, both of them, in both of whom I have found a great deal of faithfulness and truth to me, have commanded me to dwell upon my demand of Oyer, as upon my life, and as upon a thing that is my undoubted right by Law, that cannot, nor ought not to be denied me. My Lord, the security of my life lies in it; and if it be granted me, I am for ever out of all danger of gunshot, because it is possible you cannot produce one line of a legal Act of Parliament, nor one syllable of a legal Judgment; nor, I am sure of it, so much as any shadow of pretence of a legal crime of Felony to be the foundation of all: and if so, they tell me absolutely all your proceedings against me are at an end, and I am safe and secure. Therefore, my Lord, I again and again press, to leave the Court without excuse, and do demand before all these people Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment and Crimes, upon which your Indictment is grounded, as a thing that is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins: therefore, my Lord, deny it me not.

Mr. Lilburn, saith the Recorder, it is late, and we cannot spend much more time about your business; and the Court hath already told you, they neither will nor can receive in your parchment for Oyer, without your Counsel sign it.

Mr. Lilburn. Alas, Sir, I have dealt faithfully, and truly with you, and told you, that it is drawn up by their instructions: but really and truly they were both gone out of London, before pen could be put to paper to draw the rough draught of it; and therefore it was impossible to get their hands to the ingrossed copy. Wherefore I beseech the Court to give me time but till Monday morning, and I will send after them for their hands; and engage not only to get their hands to the parchment, but to bring one or both of them to this Bar, to justify their instructions to me, and that their instructions are Law. Therefore, my Lord be pleased to grant me but till Monday morning, and I will have them here, although I borrow money to send two Coaches with six horses a-piece to fetch them back.

Lord-Mayor. No, the Court breaks up to-night, and therefore we cannot give you till Monday.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, seeing you insist so stiffly upon it for your Oyer, I will tell you what we will do with you: put in your Exceptions to-night, which you have under your Counsel's hands, and the Court will assure you that in case your Counsel at our next meeting about your business, will avow that your parchment for the demand of Oyer is Law, we will grant it you; and your putting in your Exceptions now, shall be no prejudice to you in any kind.

Mr. Lilburn endeavouring to speak, to close with him, several of his honest and true friends that stood by him, cried out, there was a snare laid for him, and bid him rather die than go an inch from his Counsel's honest, just, and safe instructions. At which the Court grew very angry, and judgment again began to be pressed against the Prisoner at the Bar: and the Court required the Exceptions, without any more ado, to be delivered in.

Mr. Lilburn. Well then, my Lord, seeing I have done my utmost to obtain my right by Law, which is to have the Oyer of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and it will not be granted me, but the Court hath over-ruled me; therefore, my Lord, to let all the world know that I am no baffle, nor procrastinator of time, nor have any thing of guilt, fear, or dread within me, although it be never so much to my wrong, and tend never so much to my apparent disadvantage or my ruin, I will close with Mr. Recorder, and immediately deliver in the Exceptions that I have in my hand already, signed by my Counsel, as a part of my Exceptions; provided he will distinctly repeat over the promise of the Court, and enter it upon record in the Court's Books, and order the Clerk immediately to draw up an order upon it, as large as it is in itself, and give it me legally signed before I stir from the Bar.

No, saith Mr. Recorder Steele, Mr. Lilburn, the doing of that that you require, would take up too much time, and therefore the Court cannot do it: but they will make good what I have said unto you.

Whereupon, Mr. Lilburn repeated what Mr. Recorder, (in the name of the Court) had promised, and said, Sir, is not this that the Court will stand to? Yes, saith the Recorder. Then, Sir, I beseech you, in the audience of all these people, (that they may bear witness) repeat it over again yourself. Which

Which he did: and Mr. Lilburn closed with him, and accordingly delivered in his Exceptions.

And at his coming to his Lodging, some of his friends drew up the promise of the Court in writing, and set their hands to it; which thus followeth:

That if Mr. Lilburn would deliver in the copy of his Exceptions; the not granting at this time his Oyer should be no prejudice to him. And further, That the Court was to consider of a time to have the Exceptions debated by Counsel: and if the Counsel of John Lilburn, Gentleman, when they came to plead to the Exceptions, conceived it necessary and right to have the Oyer, that then it should be granted him, before any proceeding upon the Exceptions should be, as if the Exceptions were not delivered into the Court.

Witness, Richard Lilburn, George Wade, Thomas Webbbe, George Lilburn, jun. William Lilburn.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I here deliver your Lordship and this honourable Court, part of my Exceptions under my own and my Counsellors hands: but, my Lord, I have many more to make, when I shall hear the Oyer, and have copies of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes according to my right, that your Indictment is grounded upon. And then spoke as follows:

My Lord, I have given into the Court my demand for Oyer, fairly ingrossed in parchment under my hand, and part of my Exceptions against the Indictment, which are very difficult points in Law, and beyond my reading and skill fully to argue, and therefore I must depend upon my learned Counsel for that.

It was never denied the worst of Traitors to have copies of their Indictments, and Counsel to argue the points of Law for them. The Lord Macguire, the great bloody Rebel of Ireland, indicted for Treason lately at the Upper Bench, had his Counsel to argue before the learned Judges thereof, when he was indicted for High-Treason, and spent much time only about his title of Baron. Duke Hamilton, Lord Capel of late, and the Lord Castlehaven formerly, were never denied it, nor the Earl of Strafford: yet all these persons were tried for facts that were crimes in the common Law, for treachery, and bloodshed, and foul offences, such as the Law of Nature forbids and abhors, (and had Laws made before their facts to be their guide). But my only crimes are, that my name is John Lilburn, and that I am in England, my native country; and the matter of Law that rose in their cases, was only upon the formality of the Indictment or charges against them, and consequently less need of serious arguments in Law; yet the Law is so tender of blood and life, that it takes away no advantage from any man whose life is in question or danger.

But, my Lord, I beseech you consider the difficulty of my case; the very crimes whereof I am accused, have no foundation in the Common Law, I am only accused for being in my native country; and the pretended Law against me lays no crime to my charge: I have wronged no man in his property; I have designed no evil against my country; I have hurt no man in his liberty, nor life, nor member.

The very crime laid to my charge, may be called a point of Law: it is supposed to arise upon the breach of a pretended Act of Parliament, so that it is not in matter of form, or in the formality, or nicety of proceedings against me, that the point in Law arises in my case: it is about the nature of the crime itself, whereof I am accused, and therefore Counsel learned in the Law is more necessary in my case, deliberately and maturely to argue it before all the learned Judges of the Law in England, than in any case that hath been tried in England this five hundred years; here is no light to lead my Judges in their judgment, but the very light of the Law itself, being a strange kind of single Act made in a strange kind, or unknown and unheard-of manner. Here is no precedent, no example to help them: the like case, I dare avow it, was never tried in England before, and all England, and their posterities, yea the babes in their mother's wombs, are concerned in the event of my Trial. Whatsoever is the issue of my Trial, will hereafter be drawn into a precedent, either for the good or evil of all the people of England. Besides the shedding of my blood without cause or reason, must needs bring guilt, punishment, and misery upon the causers and permitters thereof. Remember righteous Abel's case, Naboth and Uriah: therefore I hope much caution will be used in determining the difficult points of Law in my case. My Lord, not for my own sake, for the sparing of my blood, though I am bound to preserve it, if I can, by the great Law of Nature; yet, my Lord, if my life were only at the stake, I could condemn it, if I saw my contempt of it might serve my Country, and restore it to its liberty and freedom. But when the liberties of millions of persons already in being, and yet un-born, which consist and subsist in being ruled by written Laws and Rules; when these are at the stake, I hope the difficulties of the Law in this case, shall be seriously weighed, and solemnly debated by the most experienced men in the Law in the whole Nation.

The Copy of the fore-recited Exceptions thus followeth:

The Exceptions of John Lilburn, Gent. Prisoner at the Bar, to a Bill of Indictment preferred against him, grounded upon a pretended Act, intituled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; which Judgment is by the said Act supposed to be given the 15th day of January, 1651.

THE said John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, saith, That the said Indictment is insufficient, in the Law, in matter, substance and form. And he humbly offereth these Exceptions following against the same.

Exception 1. For that the said Indictment is grounded only upon an Act intituled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn. And it doth not appear, either by the title of the said Act recited in the Indictment, or by any thing contained in the said Act, that either the said Act itself, is an Act of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or of the Parliament sitting at Westminster; or that the said supposed Judgment, for the execution whereof, the said Act is supposed to provide, was given in the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or in the Parliament sitting at Westminster; nor yet when the said Parliament did commence or end, or whether the same was held by prorogation or otherwise. And it is evident in Law, that no Law could at that time be made, but by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; for by the Law then in being, the power of making Laws was only in those persons which were known and distinguished by that title of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: and in that name only Addresses were made to them, both by the people of England, and by all foreign States and Princes, and all Addresses refused that wanted that title. Now for ought that appears in the said Act, whereupon the said Indictment is grounded, it may be as well an Act of Parliament in France, or Scotland, or Naples, as an Act of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; so that it doth not appear, that the said Indictment is grounded upon any Law of England; or that John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, is indicted for any fact that is a Crime by any Law of England, and then the same is void in Law.

Exception 2. The said Indictment is grounded upon the fore-recited Act, intituled, An Act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and so relates only to some Judgment supposed to be given in Parliament against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and if no such Judgment were given, the Act were void, and the Judgment also. Now it doth not appear, that any judgment for any Crime whatsoever, was given in Parliament against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn. 1. Before any Judgment can be given in Law against any Englishman, for any Crime, there must be either an Indictment, Presentment, or some Information or Accusation against him, to that Court that judgeth him, for some Crime supposed to be committed by him. 2. The party accused must either appear before that Court, or be out-lawed for not appearing. 3. If the party appears, he must either confess the Crimes or Misdemeanors, whereof he is accused, or else plead to the Indictment, Presentment, or Information, or Accusation against him; and come to Trial thereupon. And as some of these ought in Law to precede a Judgment against any Englishman, so also some of these afore-mentioned proceedings, in order to a lawful Judgment, ought to be entered upon such Record, wherein any such Judgment is entered; and unless it doth appear upon the Record, wherein any Judgment is entered against any Englishman for any Crime, that some such proceedings as aforesaid, hath been made before the Judgment passed against him, the Judgment is to be holden for erroneous and void, and ought so to be reputed. Now it doth not appear either by the said pretended Act, as it is recited in the Indictment, nor by any Record of the supposed Judgment produced, nor any otherwise, that there was any Indictment, Presentment, or Information to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; or if there were, it doth not appear, that he ever appeared to the same, nor that he was ever out-lawed for not appearing; neither doth any pleading by the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, to any such Indictment or Information appear, nor any Trial of him for the same. And therefore if any such pretended Judgment be entered, as the said supposed Act, and the Indictment of John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, thereupon doth relate unto, the same is erroneous and void in Law; and by consequence the said Indictment is void.

Exception 3. The said Indictment is erroneous and insufficient in Law, for that it is only grounded upon, and recites an Act, which Act is declared to be made for the execution of a Judgment passed in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, the 15th day of January, 1651; when in truth there was no such Judgment, either in matter or form, passed in Parliament on the said 15th day of January, 1651; as is enacted by the said supposed Act, to be executed against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; and as is also recited in the said Indictment, to be enacted by the said Act, to be put in execution against him. First, There was no Judgment passed in Parliament upon the said 15th of January, 1651; that the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn should depart out of England within twenty days, after the said 15th day of January, 1651, as is mentioned in the said Indictment. Secondly, There was no Judgment passed in Parliament, upon the said 15th day of January, 1651, that the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn should depart out of England, Scotland and Ireland, or the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, within any limited time whatsoever, or under any penalty whatsoever, as is mentioned in the said Indictment. Thirdly, There never was any Judgment passed in Parliament, the said 15th day of January, 1651, that the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn should be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy, in case the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn should be found, or be remaining in England, Scotland, or Ireland, after the expiration of twenty days, or any other time whatsoever, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651. And if no such Judgment doth appear to have been passed against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, as is aforesaid, and as is recited by the said Indictment, to be enacted to be put in execution against him; then the original ground of the said Indictment is null and void. Which is a Judgment supposed to be passed in Parliament against the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, in matter, substance, and form, as aforesaid; upon the 15th day of January, 1651, which is enacted by the said Act, recited in the said Indictment to be put in execution: whereas no such Judgment ever passed; and therefore cannot be supposed or admitted by the Law, to be enacted to be put in execution. And upon these reasons and causes the Prisoner at the Bar, conceives the said Indictment to be insufficient in the Law.

Exception 4. The said John Lilburn further excepts against the said Indictment, as insufficient in the Law, in regard of the uncertainty of the same; the Law requiring all allegations against any man to be certain; for that the said Indictment doth recite and ground itself upon an Act, made for the execution of a Judgment, passed in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn; And then chargeth John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, to have been found in England; that is to say, in London, contrary to the said Act; but averreth not that the said John Lilburn, now Prisoner at the Bar, indicted by the name of John Lilburn, late of London, Gentleman, is one and the self-same person, with the said Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, meant and intended by the said Act; and not other or diverse by reason whereof, and for that these are several persons known and distinguished by the name of John Lilburn, of London, Gentleman. And for that the said John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, doth not acknowledge that he now is, or at the making of the said Act, or passing the said supposed Judgment, was a Lieutenant-Colonel, or that he could be notified and distinguished by that title; he, the said John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, cannot join any certain issue with the Keepers of the Liberties of England, upon the said Indictment. For the said Indictment not averring the said John Lilburn, now Prisoner at the Bar, to be the same person, and not other, or diverse from that John Lilburn, intended and meant in the said Act, and distinguished from all others of the same name, by the title of a Lieutenant-Colonel; if the Prisoner at the Bar should plead the general issue of not guilty, he should confess himself to be the same John Lilburn, intended by the said Act; else he is not concerned to plead to the said Indictment. And by consequence, if the Prisoner at the Bar should plead Not guilty to the said Indictment; the only issue to be tried in point of fact, between the Keepers of the Liberties of England, and the Prisoner, would be, whether John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, was found in England, upon the 15th day of June 1653; and by consequence, the Prisoner at the Bar, though he be not the person intended by the said Act, might be ensnared and condemned as a Felon, only because his name is John Lilburn: and if any other John Lilburn should in like manner plead to the said Indictment, he should suffer, because he is called John Lilburn.

For all which errors and insufficiencies in the Law, in the said Indictment, Act, and supposed Judgment appearing, the said John Lilburn, Prisoner at the Bar, humbly prayeth, that the said indictment may be quashed; and in case the honourable Court be not fully satisfied in the said errors, and insufficiencies of the said Indictment, he prayeth that Counsel learned in the Law may be assigned him, and a competent time given for him to advise with them, and for them to prepare their arguments upon all the said matters of Law. And that the case being of very great difficulty, and much concernment to the liberty of all the people of England; and being a case without any precedent; and the shedding or sparing of innocent blood, depending upon a resolution thereof: he humbly prayeth, that the said difficult points of Law, arising upon the case, may be argued before the reverent Judges of the Law, as hath been accustomed in such cases, that their opinions may be had thereupon.

Signed John Norbury, John Maynard; and presented to, and accepted by the Lord-Mayor, and the honourable Bench, July 16, 1653.

John Lilburn.

But the Court being eager to see the Exceptions, the Crier commanded silence, and to hear the Court, who had commanded their Clerk with a low voice to read them the title of the Exceptions amongst themselves. Whereupon, as soon as the Prisoner at the Bar perceived the Court had heard the title, he desired them to read them all over with an audible voice. But withal, my Lord, said he, I beseech you and the Court to take notice, that they are but part of my Exceptions, which the Court hath forced, and compelled me to deliver in.

VOL. VII.

At which, the Lord-Mayor was very angry, and said, Mr. Lilburn, you are very much to blame; thus to abuse and scandalize the Court, in saying we have compelled you: you may take your Exceptions again, if you are not free to deliver them in. Give him them again.

Lilburn. No, my Lord, I will have none of them; for seeing they are in, they are in; and I will stand to them, and maintain them with my life; and I hope, and doubt not, but my honest and learned Counsel will back them with strong and irresistible arguments of Law. But, my Lord, hereafter I shall endeavour to keep the Court close to their promise, made unto me by their mouth, Mr. Recorder, about the Oyer: for, my Lord, here are witnesses enough of it. But, my Lord, whereas you say I have abused the Court, in declaring that they forced and compelled me to deliver in my Exceptions; my Lord, I absolutely deny it, that that averment is any abuse at all to the Court. You know, my Lord, you have over-ruled me, in point of reading my parchment about the Oyer, and you have ordered me to deliver in my Exceptions to the Indictment, which you know I have averred by Law I ought not to be compelled to, till I have legally the Oyer: so that, my Lord, I must yet aver, that in the eye of the Law, you have committed a force and compulsion upon me. But, my Lord, I have done with it.

They spent some time in reading the beginning of the Exceptions; which (an observant man might easily see) did very much trouble both the Lord-Mayor and the Recorder. But the Prisoner withdrew; and by several of those that sat nigher the Lord-Mayor and Recorder than he stood, he was certainly informed that the Attorney-General Prideaux, who sat upon the Bench, although he would not speak much openly and publickly, yet he constantly, in a whispering or clandestine way, pres'd the Court to keep the Prisoner close to the question, Whether he was the John Lilburn meant in the Act or no? and to give him no elbow-room to let him get off it: And that Mr. Alderman Atkins was in a pitiful frightened condition, when the Prisoner appealed to the people against their injustice. And that the pitiful Alderman most lamentably cried out to Colonel Ok, presently to send for some troops of horse, to secure his worshipful person. And that Mr. Lee, the Clerk, was extreme earnest to have the Prisoner gagged at the Bar, that he should speak no more; and privately pres'd very hard, immediately to have him condemned and taken away. And that the Lord-Mayor, at the reading of the title, in which the Act is called, A pretended Act of Parliament, said unto the Recorder, We are undone, if we receive in this; for we shall be adjudged betrayers of our trust. And at their reading the first Exception, the Recorder was amazed, and said, he wondered how Mr. Lilburn could get learned men in the Law to sign such Exceptions. And the Lord-Mayor asking him, what that Mr. Norbury was, whose hand was first to the Exceptions; the Recorder told him, he had lately been a Judge in Wales. My Lord, I do not so much wonder at his setting his hand to the Exceptions, (for I have known him for many years to be a man of principles something in affinity to Mr. Lilburn;) but for Mr. John Maynard, one of the greatest Lawyers of England, and one of the greatest practitioners of the Nation, for him to set his hand to such Exceptions, is that (my Lord) amazeth me. For if this very first

Exception of Mr. Lilburn's be good in Law, then all the late Acts of Parliament are totally invalidated, as well as that which he speaks against.

Then the Court broke up.

Notwithstanding the strictest enquiry, we can't find that Lilburn, or his friends, or any one else, ever published the remainder of his Trial. Mr. Whitlock, in his Memorials of the English affairs, p. 560, says no more than this;

July 13, 1653, Lieut. Col. Lilburn was arraigned at the Sessions in the Old-Bailey, upon the late Act for his Banishment.

July 14. Lieut. Col. Lilburn was brought again to his Trial, but he urg'd for further time in regard the Counsel assigned him refus'd to appear for him; only Serjeant Maynard, who was sick; and he had an order for a Copy of his Indictment.

July 17, (16) Lilburn was brought to his Trial, but nothing done in his business; and page 563. says, Aug. 11. Lilburn's Trial proceeded at the Sessions-house.

16. Mr. Lilburn's Trial at the Sessions House proceeded.

20. The Jury found Lilburn not guilty, he pleaded long for himself.

Nothing of these three last days Proceedings are printed.

In a Book, entitled, Lieut. Col. John Lilburn Tried and Cast, or his Case and Craft discovered, 4to. 1653. is recited some of his speeches at his Trial, and Animadversions on them; which shews that the Colonel made a notable Defence. His Speeches, as mentioned in that Book, page 125, &c. are as follow;

Concerning the Act whereupon he was indicted, this he said; it was a lye and a falshood: an Act that hath no reason in it, no Law for it; it was done as Pharoah did; resolv'd upon the question, that all the male children should be murdered. That if he died upon this Act, he died upon the same score that Abel did, being murdered by Cain. That the Act was a void Act, a printed thing, there being no one punctilio or clause in it, grounded on the Law of England, and that it was an unjust, unrighteous, and treacherous Act, and that he doubted not to shatter that Act in pieces. That they could not make an Act of Parliament, since the King's Head was cut off.

By the same Law they voted him to death, they might vote his honest twelve Jurymen

He said, The Parliament before the King's head was cut off, and the Members taken out, were in their purity, a gallant Parliament, who were tender of the liberties, and welfare of the Nation, and walked in the steps of their ancestors, and forefathers; then were the days of their virginity, they made good and righteous Laws, and then they had no force upon them. But since 1640, and 1641, there have been no good Laws made.

He affirms, that it was no lawful Parliament, that made that Act. Again, the Parliament that made this Act of Banishment was no Parliament, I will prove it: And the Parliament were rather transgressors than l. Again, admit the Parliament legal, they had no power to send for me. If there were any Judicatory in Parliament, it was the Lords Houle, not the Commons.

As for all Parliaments in general, he said Parliaments were a delegated power, and ought to give a reason of all they do; and that it was not in their power, (as he had proved in his Plea at large, before the Lord Chief Justice Rolls, and Mr. Justice Bacon, May 18, 1647;) nor had they the least jurisdiction, to sentence him, or any of the least free-born Englishmen; unless it be their own Members. That all crimes whatever, were to be heard, determined, and judg'd at the Common-Law, and nowhere else. Acts of Attainder were not lawful.

Speaking to the Lord-Mayor; This is the strangest thing (saith he) that ever I saw, that a man must be cheated of his life. Good, my Lord-Mayor, you have made yourself a party in my case, and taken a wrong John Lilburn; and if you do not make me hang, you are afraid of yourself. You make the land groan under your burthens and oppressions; I desire you will not deny me my right, that I may not lose my life in the resolve of a question, That John Lilburn shall be hanged; which in time may come to murder your posterity, and the posterity of those that hear me this day.

He told the Lord Keeble, that he had nothing to do to judge him, being a party, and had a salary of a thousand pounds per annum from the State.

To Mr. Prideaux, Attorney-General, he said, you are a blood-thirsty man, and you come here to justify your unrighteous Act; and I hope the Jury will take notice of all your violence. It is the admiration of my soul, that he should be a Judge in his own case; to have a man sit as my Judge, that thirsteth after my blood.

He said, that the army (many of them) have been very good instruments, for the good of the Nation, to deliver us from Tyranny: I wish there is not a greater than they delivered us from.

For the Jury, he called them, his honourable Jury, and said, they were the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and will make it appear that the Jury are the Judges of the Law, as well as of the Fact.

Moreover, he charged them to consider whether if I die on the Monday, the Parliament on Tuesday may not pass such a sentence against every one of you twelve; and upon your wives and children, and all your relations; and then upon the rest of this City, and then upon the whole county of Middlesex, and then upon Hertsfordshire; and so by degrees there be no people to inhabit England; but themselves?

I call Jehovah to witness (saith he) and do here protest before God, Angels and Men, I am not the person intended to be banished by that Act; speaking of the Act whereupon he was indicted.

The Jury having acquitted him, were summon'd before the Council of State, on the 23d of August, 1653; in pursuance of an order of Parliament, of the 21st, to answer for their conduct.

The examination of which Jury is printed in State-Trials, Vol. I. page 81, 82. Edit. 1730, after his Trial at Guildhall in 1649, for High-Treason; to which the Reader is referr'd. But for what reason the examination of his Jury in 1653, is there inserted (having no relation to that Trial) would be difficult to tell.

XXVII. The Trial of MILES SINDERCOME, alias FISH, at the Upper-Bench, Westminster, Feb. 9, 1656. for High-Treason.

Before the Lord Chief-Justice Glynn, and Mr. Justice Warburton.

JANUARY 1656. Miles Sindercome was committed close Prisoner to the Tower of London, for High-Treason; and Sir John Barkstead, Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower, gave order to Mr. David Steer, one of the Warders of the Tower, to be his Keeper; with strict orders from the Lieutenant, to be most careful of him. But Mr. Steer perceiving the desperation of his disposition, by many violent and threatening speeches, which he often used, acquainted Sir John Barkstead therewith, and desired more assistance, as well for the security of his own Person, as of the said Prisoner. Wherefore, from that time forward, a guard of a Commission-Officer and Soldiers, were ordered to assist the said Keeper, and secure the Prisoner; so that Sindercome finding no means possible for him to make an escape by force, endeavoured afterwards to corrupt his Keeper, offering him two hundred pounds, or so much as his place should be worth, to assist him in making his escape; and desired him, if he would undertake the matter, to furnish him with a black suit of clothes, a peruke, and a short dagger, to pass him through the water-gate, within the Tower, and said, that then he would trouble him no further, but kill any man that should oppose him in going. But his Keeper faithfully discharging his trust, not only refused this proffer, but acquainted the Lieutenant therewith; who was therefore more vigilant and careful for his security. The Officers and Soldiers that daily attended in his chamber with him, would often advise him to make his peace with God, and to look after the eternal concerns of his Soul; which discourse he would always divert by the speaking of his own valour and courage, and how many he had slain, while he was a Soldier, boasting greatly therein, and of his knowledge in the Law of this Nation: And would often say, That he doubted not to make a very good defence, if he might be tried by a Jury, according to the ancient Law of England, and to come off as well as John Lilburn.

February 6, 1656. Miles Sindercome had notice of his Trial, to be the next Monday following, and had liberty given to prepare himself for it; and for that purpose to send for, and converse with, what persons he would; and to have the use of pen, ink, and paper, and to write as he pleased; which he had, and did use accordingly.

February 9, 1656. Sindercome was brought to his Trial at the Upper-Bench Bar in Westminster-hall, the particulars whereof are as follow.

The Indictment was for High-Treason, to this effect, viz.

THAT Miles Sindercome, *alias Fish, and one William Boyes, with divers other Rebels and Traitors, against the Lord Protector, and Government of the Commonwealth; not having the fear of God in their hearts, but moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil; on the 17th of September, 1656, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at Westminster, and divers other places in the County of Middlesex, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did conspire, compass, and imagine the death of the said Lord Protector; and to subvert and alter the Government of the Commonwealth, and to raise War within the same.

For effecting whereof,

1. They took a room in the house of one Edward Hilton, and divers rooms in the house of one James Midhope, in Westminster; whither they brought Guns, Harquebusses and Pistols, charged with leaden Bullets, and iron Slugs, to shoot, kill and murder him.
2. January 1, 1656. They provided Horses and Weapons of War; and,
3. Took a house and banquetting-house at Hammer-smith, of one Henry Busby, for the same purpose.
4. January 9, 1656. They conspired to burn Whitehall, where his Highness was in his own person;

* The principal Person employ'd in the traitorous design, for the destruction of his Highness's Person, was a notable desperate Fellow, named Sindercome, one who heretofore had been a Quarter-Master under Sir John Reynolds in the Army, and was about two years ago cashier'd by General Monke, among others in Scotland. He associated to himself one Cecil, and many others were engag'd in the Business. For the carrying on their work, they held correspondence with some in Flanders, received directions thence from time to time, and for their encouragement, Don Alonso, the late Ambassador of Spain in England, return'd them over Sums of Money, with which they were enabled to proceed. See a Brief Relation of the late dangerous Plot. Printed in a further Narrative of the Passages of these Times in the Commonwealth of England, pag. 7.

son; and to that end brought a basket filled with Match, Brimstone, Gunpowder, and other combustible Stuff and Materials, and set the same on fire in the Chapel there; to the great danger and disquietment of his Highness, and ill example of others, in contempt of the Law, against their due obedience to his Highness and Government, against the peace, and form of the Statute, &c.

Thus far the Indictment.

Whereupon being arraigned, he pleaded Not Guilty, and for his Trial, put himself upon his Country, and the issue being joined, there was immediately impannell'd a Jury of Gentlemen of worth and quality, to pass upon his Life and Death: he challenged several of them; and twelve being sworn (with his own consent) his Highness's Attorney-General (the Indictment being opened) proceeded to the Evidence, which was very full and clear, and two Witnesses at the least to all the points of the Indictment, with many aggravating circumstances: the particulars whereof are herein after mentioned.

The Evidence to prove the Indictment.

THERE was one Toope of his Highness's Lifeguard, who was drawn into the business; and he proved fully, 1. What person Sindercome is; how he inveigled him, the said Toope, with money in hand, and promises of more, and great preferment, to join with him to murder his Highness; saying, Spain could never obtain a peace with us, till he were taken out of the way. 2. The circumstances of time, place, means and manner designed for this murder. 3. That he, the said Toope, was to give notice when his Highness went forth; and at what end of the Coach he sat. 4. Their buying and keeping of fleet horses. 5. Their intent to fire Whiteball, the fire-work placed in the Chapel; and other circumstances. 6. Sindercome's resolution, if the fire did not take, to kill the Protector, whatever came of it.

Also one John Cecil proved the whole design of Sindercome, and Boyes, how long it was in hand; that Sindercome engaged him, the said Cecil, in it; what words were used, how it should be done; what the consequence of the murder would be; the money provided, and that when it should have been done, he, the said Cecil, was designed to go to Col. Sexby, and to share with Sindercome in his honour and profit. That the first thing agreed on, was to provide good horses. What moneys were paid by Sindercome; Sindercome's resolution to assassinate his Highness when he went abroad; and the manner how. That they were upon the road five or six times on purpose; and in Hyde-park with swords, and pistols charged, and had notice given them by Toope of his Highness's coming. That the hinges of Hyde-park Gate were filed off, in order to their escape. That they took an house with a banqueting-house at Hammer-smith, to shoot him with Guns, made on purpose to carry ten or twelve bullets at a time. That Toope was to give notice of his Highness's passing that way; and at which end of the Coach he sat. That he, the said Cecil, saw one of the Guns provided, which would carry twelve carbine bullets and a slug. He spake fully to the design of firing Whiteball; described the firework prepared, and the nature and intention of it, and other circumstances. Moreover, that Boyes assur'd them, that when the Protector should be dispatched, forces would come from Spain and Flanders; and a great part of the Fleet would fall off. And that he believed Sexby to be the main agent herein at *Brussels. He proved also the discourse Boyes had about seizing Portsmouth, or some other port in the West, and of a great sum for that purpose. That thirty or forty are engaged in this design to kill the Protector, and it was so ordered, that not above two should know each other, until the matter should be ripe for execution; and that Boyes knew the whole number.

He spoke fully to that design to kill his Highness the first day of the Parliament; and their taking houses for that purpose at Westminster; and bringing arms thither, and other circumstances†.

That Boyes goes by several names, and in several habits; sometimes as a poor Priest in ragged clothes: sometimes well clad as a Gentleman.

It was further proved by the said John Cecil, and Col. James Midbope, that in order to the destroying of his Highness, he, the said Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, took the said Midbope's house near the Abbey at Westminster; and when they took it, Sindercome called himself John Fish, Clerk to one Mr. Havers, a pretended Gentleman of Norfolk; and Cecil went by the name of Mr. Havers's Coachman.

It was proved likewise, that the first day of the Parliament, after they had taken Midbope's house, he being there; Sindercome and Cecil went thither to him, from one Edward Hilton, a Sempster's house in King-street, Westminster, where they left a great trunk full of arms, brought from Flanders; and carried with them in a viol-case, one harquebuss, and some pistols, charged with leaden bullets, and slugs, about Sermon-time, to Midbope's house; which they found very convenient for their purpose, and resolved to buy it, and to build a room in the yard next the street; there being several back-yards and doors: and resolved also to secure Midbope, or otherwise to deal with him that he might not discover them, nor hinder their design‡.

It was proved moreover, by Cecil and Midbope, that Sermon being ended, all three of them, viz. he, the said Cecil, Sindercome, and Boyes, went into the yard of the house next the Abbey, to shoot his Highness, as he passed from the Abbey to meet the Parliament in the painted Chamber; and to that end

* In Col. Edward Sexby's Narrative, which he delivered to Sir John Barkstead, Lieutenant of the Tower, Oct. 12, 1657. printed in A further Narrative of the Passages of these Times in the Commonwealth of England, pag. 21. he says, "Sir John, I sent to you to tell you, that I am guilty of the whole business of Sindercome, as to the design of killing the Lord Protector, &c. and to that purpose I furnish'd Sindercome with about 500 l. in Money, and also with Arms, and tied him to an Engagement, that he should not reveal the design." And further he said, "The Letters they have of mine, they could not prove them to be mine; but by my own Confession, which I now confess, and acknowledge that they are mine. And that I was with Charles Stuart, and acquainted him, that I was an enemy to the Lord Protector; and I also declare that I received a large sum of Money from the Spaniard, to carry on my said design, and to make what Confusion I could in England, by endeavouring the killing of the Lord Protector, and by what other ways I had in design; and to that end, the better to effect it, I came into England in a disguised Habit, and was the principal in putting on others in the said design." And Page 22. he says, "That he was the only Man, that set on Sindercome to kill the Lord Protector; and that Book, called Killing no Murder, he owned: and said, he was still of that Judgment; yet said, it was both foolishly and knavishly done in that Book to charge the Lieutenant of the Tower touching Sindercome's Death." This Col. Sexby died a Prisoner in the Tower, Jan. 13, 1657.

† This Sindercome had engaged to kill General Monk in Scotland, and would have engaged the said Mr. Cecil therein also.

end, he, the said Cecil, stood on the wall with his pistol charged, and Sindercome walked in the yard; but other company coming in thither, they were prevented, and Boyes went out of the yard into the throng of people.

It was further proved by Cecil, that this enterprise not succeeding, they resolved to murder his Highness some other way, to-wit, to furnish themselves with fleet horses, to kill him as he rode forth. That Sindercome engaged Toope, who constantly gave him notice of the Life-guards going abroad, or of the saddling of the Pad Nags.

That the first time they rode forth to kill him, was the latter end of September last (viz.) the Saturday after he had left going to Hampton-court.

That the second time was when he rode to Kensington, and thence, the back way to London.

The third time, when he went to Hyde-park in his Coach.

The fourth time, when he went to Turnham-Green, and so by Alton home; at which time they rode forth to kill him, and resolved to break through all difficulties to effect it.

The fifth time when he rode into Hyde-park, where his Highness alighting, asked him, the said Cecil, whose horse that was he rode one, Sindercome being then on the out-side of the Park; and then Cecil was ready to have done it, but doubted his horse, having at that time got a cold.

That Sindercome rode forth once himself to kill his Highness, and told Cecil of it.

That all proving ineffectual, they resolved to desist till the Spring, and in the mean time to fire Whiteball.

That the said Cecil put on a thin holland shirt, and thin clothes, for his better escape, when he rode forth to kill his Highness; and prepared his horse as if he had been to run a race.

To prove the taking of the house and banqueting-house at Hammer-smith, of Henry Busby, Coachman to the Earl of Salisbury; there was beside Cecil, the testimony of Henry Busby himself, William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's servant.

To prove the basket of stuff for firing the Chapel, there was the testimony of Cecil and Toope, and others who were persons of quality.

To prove the buying and keeping of the horses, there was the testimony of Henry Busby, who sold them one horse for fourscore pounds; also of William Page, and William Neal, Sindercome's servant.

To prove the hinges of Hyde-park gate being filed off, and the pales cut, there was the testimony of John Cecil and Thomas Shell.

The Prisoner seeing the Evidence so clear against him, had nothing material to say for himself by way of defence, yet carried himself very insolent at the Bar; and when the Court asked him touching any of the matters proved against him, he would confidently deny what was laid to his charge. And after all the Evidence given, and the Prisoner heard what he had to say for himself; the Court sum'd up the whole to the Jury of Life and Death, and declared, that by the Common Law, to compass or imagine the death of the chief Magistrate of the Land, by what name soever he was called, whether Lord-Protector or otherwise, is High-Treason; he being the chief Magistrate, and the Spring of Justice, in whose name all Writs run, all Commissions and Grants are made: and that the Statutes of Treason made 25 Ed. III. as to this, did only declare what the Common Law was, before the making of that Statute, and was not introductive of a new Law*: and more to that effect; and then proceeded to Judgment against the Prisoner, in this manner.

The SENTENCE.

IT is considered by the Court, that the said Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, be sent from hence to the Prison in the Tower of London, from whence he came, and from thence be drawn upon a burdle through the streets of London to Tyburn; there to be hanged on the Gallows until he be half dead, and then to be cut down, and his intrails and bowels taken out; and burnt in his own sight, and his body divided into four quarters, and be disposed of as his Highness the Lord Protector shall think fit.

The same day, after he was brought back again to the Tower, he was much enraged, and in a great passion; his Keeper, and Elizabeth Herring, one of his Sisters, being in the chamber with him, he did swear, That they should never have his life; and then desired his Keeper to help him to some poison, that he might make away himself: which he refusing, Sindercome then desired his Sister to buy him some, for the same purpose. But she crying at that present, gave him no answer; but taking her opportunity (when the Keeper did not so much mind them) had some private discourse with him (which cannot be known what it was about). Presently after, his said Sister left him, and before her going, spake to his Keeper, saying, Lord, what shall I do? Did you hear what my Brother said of the Poison? Thereupon, the Keeper charged her not to bring him any, telling her, if her Brother were poisoned in his house, he would accuse her for assisting him in it.

The Lieutenant of the Tower then being fully acquainted with the desperation of Sindercome, commanded a file of Soldiers to watch in the room below his chamber, and a Guard of Officers to be with him in his chamber, that all means for the making his escape might be prevented.

Sindercome the same day endeavoured to corrupt his Keeper, as formerly, and with much earnestness prest him to be helpful to him in his greatest distress; and asked, if it were not possible for him to make an escape, telling him, if he would assist him in it, he would make good to him two hundred pounds that night: and if he would go along with him, he would make that two hundred pounds, seven hundred pounds, or what more he should desire; farther requesting him to furnish him with a black suit, peruke, and dagger, for that purpose. But by reason that the Officers aforesaid, were in the chamber with him, he had not liberty so freely to discourse with his Keeper about this business as he desired, and therefore earnestly desired the said Guard of Officers, and all in the chamber with him, to withdraw; in which time he wrote and delivered privately to his Keeper a note, whereof the next following words is a copy,

Mr.

* Mr. Whitlock, in his Memorials, Page 654. Feb. 9, 1656. Sindercome was tried at the Upper-Bench Bar, found guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: The Court declared, That by the Common Law, to compass or imagine the Death of the Chief Magistrate, by what name soever he was called, whether Lord Protector, or otherwise, is High-Treason, and that the Statute 25 Edw. III. was only declaratory of the Common Law.

Mr. Steer,
 YOU see my condition, it is no time to dally with it; I have already provided two hundred pounds for you; and if you will let me make my escape, and that you will go with me, or set me forth, I shall give you, were it five hundred pounds more, I do not care: if you will do any thing, let me know your mind; I hope God will work my deliverance by your means; let me hear your judgment, that we may conclude; for if you and I do conclude, I will have other clothes brought into the room below, with a peruke, and I will take up a board (meaning, as is conceived, one of the boards of his chamber, to go down into the room below it, where his black clothes should lie; though therein he would have been frustrated, by reason of the file of Soldiers, which the Lieutenant had commanded to watch there) and I do judge that must be the way. For God's sake do what you can, and do not distrust my not performing to give you the money; for I can this night order you two hundred pounds to any body that you shall appoint: but if you should—

You may observe, that the reason of his breaking off so abruptly, was, that the Guard of Officers whom he had for that time desired to withdraw, finding that he made them stay somewhat longer than ordinary, prest in upon him, so that he had not time to write further. His Keeper for answer, endeavoured to take him off from those thoughts, telling him the impossibility of it, and desired him to consider his present condition, and prepare himself for another world; whereupon Sindercome finding he could no ways prevail, moved these things no more afterwards.

From which time, several pious and able Divines, some of which were appointed by his Highness, and others that were desired by the Lieutenant of the Tower, daily came to him; as Mr. George Griffith, Mr. Thomas Brooks, Mr. John Hodges, Mr. Slater, Mr. Barker, and others. But before they or any others entered into discourse with him, he would wave all questioning of him about the business for which he was condemned: they laboured much with him for his soul's good, but with no satisfaction to the greatest part, and with very little to others of them; he having before declared his judgment, or rather opinion, by reason of his unconquancy and unsettledness in them, sometimes owning the universal point of redemption; at other times, that the soul died with the body, or slept with the body till the Resurrection, and then it may be it should rise; that by the grave Hell was meant; with several other detestable tenets. And indeed there is scarce any erroneous opinion known in our times, that he had not a general notion of, and would pretend unto. In several of his discourses with those Ministers, he would not hear but that Judas was in as good a condition as Peter; and of that in the 17th of John, v. 12. where Christ saith, While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost but the Son of Perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled: he would say, it was meant to all men, who as they were sinners, were Sons of destruction and perdition. And as to that Text, speaking of the disciples, which saith, one of them was a Devil; he would startle and say, it was a rugged and harsh saying. He would often put it as a case to them, whether for any person to contrive the death of another, and not to act it, were punishable by man? and being as often resolved, and told of the Laws made in that case; he would answer, that which they alledged was but the Law of man, and that Thoughts were not to be punished by man, but God who alone knew them.

Friday 13th of February.

Afterwards he had notice given him, that the next day was appointed for his Execution; and about eight o'clock that night, the Guard of Officers in his chamber were Captain Henry Sharp, Captain-Lieutenant William Foster, Ensign Philip Brown, Serjeant Nicholas Stock, and his said Keeper. And presently after they came into the chamber, three Women came to him, two whereof were Sindercome's Sisters, and the other one said to be his Sweetheart, who expressed trouble and sorrow, lamenting his condition. And one of his said Sisters, named Elizabeth Herring, told him, She had rather see him die before she went from him, than he should die so barbarous a death as was intended him, or to that effect: whereupon the Officers minding her expressions, took what care they could to prevent her, in giving him any thing; and as soon as the said women were gone carefully searched the room. Then Sindercome desired the Officers and his Keeper to withdraw, that he might be private; in which privacy, he continued about a quarter of an hour, then came to the chamber-door, saying to the said Officers that stood without, They might come in, for he had now done; which words being not usual with him, were observed by most of them. The first that went in, found him rubbing his hands with his handkerchief, and wiping his nose and mouth therewith; and he walked a turn or two about the room, and then took the Bible, and sat down reading therein. A while after, he started up suddenly, saying, he must go to bed: and therewithal he undrest himself, and went into his bed. The said Guard of Officers in his chamber, being then discoursing together, Sindercome (a quarter of an hour after he had lain still) discoursed very freely with them, of what they were talking. About which instant of time, orders were sent from Sir John Barkstead, to the said Officers, to be careful that he should not make away himself * by poison, in regard it was the last night he was to be there; and they should diligently search all places of his chamber, and about his bed to prevent it. But presently after, Sindercome fell asleep (as was thought) and snorting somewhat unusually, one of the Officers desired his Keeper to take a candle and look upon him; which he did, and found him almost dead there, which prevented their further search. Whereupon a Surgeon was immediately sent for, who applied medicines to him; notwithstanding which, after he had continued in that condition speechless about two hours, he died †.

* Sindercome had been an Apprentice to a Chirurgeon, near St. Catherine's at the Tower, and so it was probable had more than ordinary knowledge of Poisons.

† Lord Clarendon in his History of the Rebellion, Vol. III. Part 2. (8vo. Edition) Page 646, 647. says, Sindercome was a very stout Man, and one who had been much in his (Cromwell's) favour, and who had twice or thrice, by wonderful and unexpected Accidents, been disappointed in the minute he made sure to kill him, and (that Cromwell) had caus'd him to be apprehended; his behaviour was so resolute in his Examination and Trial, as if he thought he should still be able to do it; and it was manifest that he had more

The Coroner's Inquest, consisting of Merchants, and other substantial Housekeepers of the Tower Liberty, had in charge to inquire of the manner of Sindercome's death, which they diligently attended; and all such witnesses as could speak materially thereunto, were examined by the Coroner. And although there were then very strong presumptions that he had poisoned himself; yet in regard the Surgeons, who had then only opened his body, and finding no usual symptoms accompanying the taking of sharp poisons, could not positively deliver their opinions, otherwise than hereafter is expressed, the Jury deferred the giving up their verdict till Monday following.

The same day afterwards, at the desire of the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Richard Napier, Doctor of Physick, and Doctor Fern, Reader of Anatomy at Gresham College; opened Sindercome's head, and gave their opinions thereof also. Which was likewise afterward viewed by Mr. Charles Stamford, Mr. Nicholas Brethers, Wardens to the Company of Surgeons; and Mr. Laurence Loe; all able and knowing persons in their profession, which remain with the said Coroner under their hands.

Being then desired by Sir John Barkstead, Knt. Lieutenant of the Tower, to be the head of Miles Sindercome opened, his body having been opened before our coming, by the Surgeons, and to give him our observations and sense thereof:

WE found the Brain much inflamed, red, and distended with Blood, swollen as full as the Skull could well hold; besides much grumous and clotted Blood out of the Veins, which must be the effect of some very violent and preternatural cause. Yet are we not able positively to determine what that is, or whence it did proceed, the motion being much more sudden and violent than that of Apoplexies, and other known diseases of the Brain, except when caused by contusion and other the like extraordinary violences.

Richard Napier, Christopher Fern.

WE, whose names are here subscribed, being ordered to open the body of Miles Sindercome, Prisoner in the Tower of London, do hereby declare, according to the best of our judgments and experiences, That we could not find out or discover any, the usual or common symptoms or effects, accompanying the taking of known and sharp poisons, causing sudden death; but by the distention and swelling of the Brain, and Vessels in the Head, with much coagulated blood which we found there, more than in ordinary diseases, our opinions are; that the said Prisoner hath caused the same by some extraordinary means, for the hastening of his death.

Being Sabbath-day, Sindercome's Keeper, with others, having removed the body out of the chamber where he died, into a more airy place, and taken several things out of that chamber, removed the Close-stool, and under it was found a Paper subscribed with his own hand, as followeth;

GOD knoweth my heart, I do take this course, because I would not have all the open shame of the World executed upon my body: I desire all good people not to judge amiss of me; for I do not fear my Life, but do trust God with my Soul. I did this thing without the privity of any person in the world: I do, before God and the world, clear my Keeper, my Sisters, Mother, or Brother, or any other of my Relations, but it was done alone by myself. I say by me,

The 13th day, 1656.

Miles Sindercome.

February 16, 1656.

The Jury sat again according to adjournment, to whom the aforesaid testimonies of the Physicians and Surgeons, and also Sindercome's own note were apparent; so that they did then unanimously resolve and agree, that he, by some extraordinary means, had caused his own death, and that they verily believed the same to be by poison. But for their further direction, as to the formal part of their verdict, they at that time deferred the giving of it, and adjourned till seven o'clock the next morning, at the Lord Chief-Justice's house, where they accordingly met; and having received his Lordship's direction, touching matter of form, did all unanimously agree on, and give up their verdict, to the effect following;

February 17, 1656.

Middlesex J. WE find that upon the 13th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1656, about the hour of nine in the night, Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fife, late of the Parish of Peter in Bonds, in the County of Middlesex; God not having before his eyes, but by the instigation of the Devil being moved and seduced, at the Tower of London, in the Parish and County aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforesought, as a Felon against himself, then and there feloniously upon himself did make an assault. And that the said Miles Sindercome more Associates, who were undiscover'd and as resolute as himself; and though he (Cromwell) had got him condemn'd to die, the Fellow's carriage and words were such, as if he knew well how to avoid the Judgment; which made Cromwell believe that a Party in the Army would attempt his rescue. Whereupon he gave strict charge that he should be carefully look'd to in the Tower, and three or four of the Guard always with him day and night. At the day appointed for his Execution, those troops Cromwell was most confident of, were placed upon the Tower hill, where the Gallows was erected. But when the Guard call'd Sindercome to arise in the Morning, they found him dead in his bed, which gave trouble exceedingly to Cromwell: for besides that he hoped, that, at his Death, to avoid the utmost rigour of it, he would have confess'd many of his Confederates; he now found himself under the reproach of having caus'd him to be poison'd, as not daring to bring him to public Justice; nor could he suppress that scandal. It appear'd upon Examination, that the night before, when he was going to bed in the presence of his Guard, his Sister came to take her leave of him; and upon her going away, he put off his clothes, and leap'd into his bed, and said, "This was the last bed he should ever go into." His body was drawn by a horse to the gallows where he should have been hang'd, and buried under it, with a stake driven thro' him, as is usual in the case of Self-murder: yet this accident perplex'd Cromwell very much, and though he was without the particular discovery which he expected, he made a general discovery by it, that he himself was more odious in his army than he believed he had been.

dercome, otherwise Fish, then and there, certain poisoned powder, through the nose of him the said Miles, into the head of him the said Miles, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a Felon of himself, feloniously did snuff and draw. By reason of which snuffing and drawing of the poison afore said, so as afore said, into the head of him the said Miles Sindercome; he the said Miles Sindercome, by the strength and operation of the poison afore said, himself did mortally poison; of which said mortal poisoning, he the said Miles Sindercome otherwise Fish, within three hours after died. And so we find that the afore said Miles Sindercome otherwise Fish, the said 13th day of Februry, in the year afore said; at the Tower of London afore said, in the Parish and County afore said, in manner and form afore said, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a Felon against himself, feloniously himself did kill and murder. We find no Goods or Chattels, that the said Miles Sindercome otherwise Fish had, at the time of the felony and murder afore said, in manner and form afore said, upon himself done and committed. In witness hereof, we have hereunto set our hand, this 17th day of February, 1656, &c.

And thereupon the said Coroner issued forth his Warrant for the burial of Sindercome, the Copy whereof followeth;

Middlesex ff. WHereas the Jury impanel'd and sworn to inquire of the death of Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, did present upon their Oaths, that the said Miles the 13th of this instant February, did feloniously poison himself: These are therefore in the name of his Highness, the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to require you to bury the Corps of the said Miles Sindercome, according to Law, in the next common Highway. Hereof you are not to fail, as you will answer the contrary at your perils, dated the 17th day of February, 1656.

Thomas Evans, Coroner.

To the Constables and Headboroughs within the Liberty of the Tower of London.

On the same day, February 17. Miles Sindercome afore said, being found to have murdered himself, his body was according to Law drawn to the open place upon Tower-bill, at a horse's tail, with his head forward, and there under the Scaffold of common execution a hole being digg'd, he was turned in stark naked, and a stake spiked with Iron, was driven through him into the earth; that part of the stake which remained above ground, being all plated with Iron.

The Examination of Elizabeth Herring, the Wife of William Herring, of the Precinct of St. Katherine's, Mariner; taken upon Oath, the 14th of February, 1656.

SHE saith, that Miles Sindercome now dead was her brother, and that he was a Prisoner in the Tower of London, the space of three weeks last past or thereabouts to her knowledge; and that for the space of a fortnight she was at the Tower several times to see the said Miles, and could be admitted but once to see him, until the 5th day of February, she this Informant was sent for to come to the said Miles. When she came to the said Miles, she found two Gentlemen in the room with him; who, as soon as this Informant came in, did say unto the said Miles Sindercome, that he was not to speak any thing in private to this Informant; then this Informant came away. And that she came several times after to the said Miles; that on Monday the 9th of this instant February, she came to the said Miles after he had received sentence to die; and lamenting his condition, she said, that he would bring his Mother's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, and what an open shame it would be to him and all his friends. The said Miles Sindercome then did answer, saying, that before they should have his life so shamefully (meaning his Highness the Lord Protector, as this Informant believeth) he would poison himself first, and desired her, this Informant, to buy him some poison, which she refused. And that at times when this Informant hath been with the said Miles, she did see some strange faces which she did not know, and that she came every day since Monday, once a day or more, to the said Miles: and saith, that he the said Miles, did not speak any more words to her of any poison, or any other words of discontent, as if he intended to destroy himself; and that he never did complain to this Informant of any sickness or diseases that he was troubled withal. And that on Friday the 13th of this instant February, she being alone with the said Miles Sindercome, did persuade him to confess who had a hand with him in the plot against his Highness the Lord Protector; that if he would confess, his Highness would grant him his life, and wished him to trust to God and man; and the said Miles answered, he would have it under black and white, and that he would trust no man. And that about eight of the clock at night she parted from the said Miles, and left him in good health, being prepared to die, as she thought; and that he found in his own conscience he had made his peace with the Lord: and this Informant denieth that she ever brought him any poison, or did buy any other thing to destroy him; yet confesseth that on Friday night she did say unto the said Miles, that she desired with all her heart, to see him die a natural death in that chamber. And further saith not.

The Mark of 2 Elizabeth Herring.

The Information of Martha Wickham, Spinster, taken upon Oath, as afore said.

SHE saith, that she hath known Miles Sindercome for the space of four years last past, and that he lodged at the house of Daniel Stockwel, Haberdasher of Hats on London-Bridge, where this Informant lived; and that the night before he was taken into custody, and imprisoned, he lay at his lodging in the said house. And this Informant denieth, and saith, that she doth not know any of the company that used to come to the said Miles, while he lodged there; and saith, that she hath been several times to see the said Miles at the Tower of London, while he remained there; and saith, that she doth not know of any poison, or any other violent thing, which was brought or sent to the said Miles Sindercome, to destroy himself; and further saith not.

Martha Wickham.

The Information of Anne Pierce, the Wife of Stephen Pierce, of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Mariner, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

SHE saith, that she was several times to see Miles Sindercome, the time he was in the Tower; saith, that she doth not know of any poison, or any other violent thing that was brought to the said Miles to destroy himself; and she did never hear the said Miles speak any words, as if he intended to destroy himself by poison, or any other way: and further saith not.

HE saith, that on Friday the 13th of February, about nine of the clock at night, he was in the chamber where Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, lodged, within the Tower of London; saith that the said Miles Sindercome did desire this Informant and four more that were with him, that they would withdraw out of the chamber whilst he went to prayers; and within less than a quarter of an hour after, he called in this Informant, and those that were with him, into the chamber again; and a quarter of an hour after that, the said Miles did take a Book into his hands to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last night he should go into a bed, and the last bed he should go into. And then he lay down in his bed, and, to this Informant's thinking, fell asleep, and snored. And this Informant desired Daniel Steer, Miles Sindercome's Keeper, to take a candle, and to see how the said Miles did lie in his bed; and the said Daniel Steer did tell this Informant, that the said Miles Sindercome alias Fish was almost dead as he lay in the bed; but the said Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition speechless the space of two hours, and then died.

The Mark of F William Foster.

The Information of Philip Brown, taken upon Oath as aforesaid.

HE saith, that on Friday the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock in the forenoon, he was with Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, in his chamber, and staid there at dinner; and in the same time, while that they were at dinner, the said Miles Sindercome did say these words, that that was the last meal's meat that ever he should eat, as he thought. And after, two of the said Miles's sisters, a cousin, and another gentlewoman with them, came to see the said Miles, and did then persuade him the said Miles, to confesse to them, and to declare whom they were, who had brought him into those troubles and sorrows that he was like to undergo. And he answered them saying, to whom should he confesse, he could not expect mercy from him, who was resolved to give him none; saying, that Cromwell said to him, when he was taken and brought before him, Sindercome, have I caught you? you that have sought many ways to take away my life, I will have no consideration at all of thy life. And when he had uttered these words, he was in a great passion, and said, that he might go and declare against the Lord Fleetwood, the Lord Lambert, Sir John Barkstead, Sir Thomas Pride, or any other member of the army, if he were minded to destroy innocent blood. And about seven of the clock that day, orders were brought to this Informant from the Major, that the said Miles Sindercome might have some time allowed him a-part, to prepare himself, if he desired it. And this Informant went out of the chamber, and left the said Miles alone, and a quarter of an hour after, this Informant standing at the chamber-door, did see the said Miles kneeling on his knees on the ground by the bed-side, and presently after one of the Centinels that stood at his chamber-door, did tell this Informant, that the said Miles did cough and keck, as if he was a vomiting; and this Informant opened the chamber-door and went in, and found the said Miles walking about the chamber. And Capt. Foster, and Capt. Sharp, who were ordered to be there that night, then came into the room; and about nine of the clock at night, the said Miles did desire this Informant, and the other company that were there, to withdraw out of the room, and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them in again; and the said Miles did then take a Book into his hand to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last night he should ever go to bed, and the last bed he should lie in; and then laid him down in his bed. And then Capt. Sharp did desire Daniel Steer, the said Miles's Keeper, to see how he did lie in his bed; and the said Daniel Steer looking upon the said Miles, did say unto this Informant, and the rest there, that the said Miles was almost dead: and yet the said Miles Sindercome did lie in that condition the space of two hours, and then died.

SAith, that about the end of January, Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, being a Prisoner in the Tower of London, under the custody of Sir John Barkstead, Knight, having some discourse with this Informant, who was his Keeper, did then say unto this Informant, that if he would be faithful to him the said Miles, he would give him to the value of his place, what it was worth, were it a hundred or two of pounds; and desired him, this Informant, if he would undertake the business, and accept of his proffer, to provide him the said Miles a black suit of clothes, a peruke, and also a short dagger, and to pass him out of the water-gate, and he would kill any man that should oppose him; and the same day that he was at his Trial, being the 9th of this instant February, after he came back again to the Tower, the said Miles was in a great passion, his sister Elizabeth Herring being then in his company; he the said Miles then did swear, that they should not have their ends (meaning, as this Informant believeth, that the Sentence pronounced against him that day should not be executed). And then the said Miles Sindercome did desire this Informant to help him to some poison, that he might make away himself; and this Informant refusing to do any of those things which he desired, the said Miles then did speak to the said Elizabeth Herring his sister, who was there, to bring him some poison; but she the said Elizabeth crying, gave him no answer. And afterwards the said Miles, and the said Elizabeth, had some private discourse together in the room, which this Informant did not hear. And the said Elizabeth parting from the said

Miles,

Miles, came down stairs, and did speak to this Informant, saying, Lord, what shall I do, did you hear him what he said of the poison? And this Informant answered, that he did hear what he had said, and wished her not to bring him any; and further said to the said Elizabeth Herring, that if the said Miles was poisoned while he continued in this Informant's house; that he this Informant answered, he would charge her the said Elizabeth with helping the said Miles to poison. And then the said Elizabeth went away from this Informant; and this Informant went up into the chamber to the said Miles Sindercome; who asked this Informant, if it was not possible for him to help the said Miles to make an escape now in his great distress; and further said, that if this Informant would do it, he would make good to him 200*l.* this night: and then said, that if he this Informant would go along with the said Miles, when he escaped, he would make that 200*l.* 700*l.* or what more he should desire; further requiring earnestly, this Informant to help him to a black suit, and a peruke. This Informant then said, to the said Miles Sindercome, that it was impossible for him to make an escape, there being such strict guard kept about him; and had no further discourse at that time. And that on Friday the 13th day of February, about ten of the clock at night, this Informant then was with the said Miles in his chamber, together with Captain Henry Sharp, Captain-Lieutenant William Foster, Ensign Philip Browne, Sergeant Nicholas Stock: and the said Miles did desire this Informant and the rest of the company, to withdraw out of the room, which they did; and about a quarter of an hour after, he the said Miles, did desire them to come again into his chamber: he walking a turn or two about the room, did take into his hand a Bible to read in; and a while after, he started up suddenly from the place where he sat, saying, he would go to bed, that that was the last time he should go to bed, and the last bed he should lie in. And when the said Miles had lain a while in his bed, he fell asleep and snorted, and after that he had a rattling in his throat, and this Informant was bid to take a candle and see the said Miles as he lay in his bed; and when this Informant had looked upon the said Miles, he found him almost dead as he lay in his bed. And this Informant being further asked, if he knew of any poison, or other means, which the said Miles did use to take away his life; saith, that he did not see any, neither doth he know any more, touching the said Miles's death, but what he hath already declared in this Information.

Daniel Steer.

The Information of Henry Sharp, Gent. taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

SAith, that between seven and eight of the clock on Friday night, being the 13th day of February, being in the chamber with Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fish, three women, whose names this Informant doth not know, came crying into the chamber to the said Miles, lamenting his condition;

the said Sindercome then reading in a Bible, did so continue reading about half an hour, while the said three women were there. One of the said women said to him the said Miles, that she would be glad to see him dead in the room before she went from thence, rather than to have him die such a barbarous death as was appointed for him to die. And after they were gone out of the room, this Informant caused Daniel Steer, the said Miles's Keeper, to search the bed and the room, lest any thing might be left there for the said Miles to hurt himself withal; and the room being searched, nothing was found. And also upon enquiry of the said Steer, this Informant found that all Instruments were taken from him; only the said Steer brought him up a knife to cut his meat withal, and carried it away when he had done. And that about half an hour after, he the said Miles desired this Informant, and the rest of the company that were with him, to withdraw out of the room; and about a quarter of an hour after, he called them into the chamber again, and took a Book into his hand to read in it, and after a little time, he said he would go to bed, and lie down in his bed; and he hearing this Informant and Capt. Foster talking together, the said Miles talked very freely with them, and in the time of their discourse together, there came a messenger to this Informant, from Sir John Barkstead, requiring this Informant to have a special care of the said Miles Sindercome otherwise Fish, that he did not poison himself. This Informant did declare unto the other that were there, what order he had received for the said Miles; and about a quarter of an hour after, this Informant hearing him the said Miles snore, desired Daniel Steer, the said Miles's Keeper, to see how the said Miles did then. The said Daniel taking a candle to look on the said Miles Sindercome, did tell this Informant that he was almost dead; yet the said Miles did live in that condition, speechless, the space of two hours after, and then died.

Henry Sharp.

The Information of Elizabeth Sindercome of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Widow, taken upon Oath, the 14th of February, 1656.

SHE saith, that she was three several times to see Miles Sindercome her son, while he was Prisoner in the Tower of London; and saith, she doth not know of any violent means or ways, used by the said Miles Sindercome, or any other, to hasten his death; neither did she ever hear him speak any words to that purpose: and that the last time she was with the said Miles, he did then tell her this Informant, that he was prepared to die. And that two Ministers being then in the chamber with him, she had no further discourse with him, or did see him any more, until on Friday night, about twelve of the clock, she did hear she was sent for; and did hear that he was very sick and weak, of which sickness he died presently after; and further saith not.

XXVIII. Proceedings against ARCHIBALD, Marquis of Argyle, 13 Car. II. 1661, for High-Treason.

The Grand Indictment* of High-Treason; exhibited against the Marquis of Argyle, by his Majesty's Advocate, to the Parliament of Scotland.

ARCHIBALD, Marquis of Argyle, you are indicted and accused, and are to answer at the instance of Sir John Fletcher, Knight, his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's Interest, That whereas by the Laws of God, expressed in holy Writ, by the Laws of Nations, by the Common Law, and by the municipal Laws and Practice of this Kingdom; especially by the third Act of the fifth Parliament of King James I, and by the first Act of King James VI. of blessed memory, and by several other Acts of Parliament, all good and loyal Subjects of this Kingdom, are bound and obliged perpetually to acknowledge, obey, maintain, defend and advance the Life, Honour, Safety, Dignity, Sovereign Authority, and Prerogative Royal of their Sovereign Lord and King, their Heirs and Successors, and privilege of their Crown, with their lives, lands and goods; to the utmost of their power, constantly and faithfully to withstand all, and whatsoever persons or estates, who shall presume, press, or intend any ways to impugn, prejudice, or impair the same; and shall no way intend, attempt, engage, act or do any thing to the violation, hurt, derogation, impairing or prejudice of his Highness's sovereignty, prerogative, and privilege of his Crown, or any point or part thereof: and whosoever doth the contrary, to be punished as Traitors, and to forfeit their lives, lands and goods. Likewise by the 25th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II. and by the 75th Act of the 9th Parliament of Queen Mary; all rising in fear of war against the King's Person or Majesty; all attempting to raise any band of men of war, horse or foot, in warlike posture, without special licence of the King's Majesty, and all suppliers of them, in help, redress or counsel, are punishable as Traitors. Likewise by the 43d Act of the 3d Parliament of King James I. and by the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament; and by Act the 10th, of the 10th Parliament; and by the 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that no Subject, of whatsoever function, degree or quality, shall presume to take upon him publicly or privately to declaim, speak or write any purpose of reproach, slander, disdain or contempt of his Majesty's Person, Estate or Government, or tending to the dishonour, hurt or prejudice of his Highness, his Parents or Progenitors; or to meddle in the affairs of his Highness, and his Estate present, bygone, or in time coming; nor to deprave his Laws and Acts of Parliaments, nor misconstrue his proceedings, whereby any misliking may be moved betwixt the King's Majesty, his Nobility and loving Subjects, under the pain of losing their lives, lands and goods, and others therein contained. As also all hearers of any such leavings, slanderous speeches or words, and concealers thereof, without apprehending of the Authors (if it lie in their power) and reveal not the same to his Majesty, or some of his Judges or Officers, and are mentioned in the said Acts, are liable to the like punishment, as the principal offenders.

Likewise by the 130th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that none of his Majesty's Lieges and Subjects do presume or take upon him to impugn the Dignity and Authority of the Estates of Parliament; or to speak or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the same, under the pain of Treason.

Likewise by the last Act of the 3d Parliament of King James V. and by the 33d Act of the first Parliament of King James VI. all burning of houses or corn, and wilful fire-rising, is declared Treason, and the committers thereof are to be punished.

Likewise by the 51st Act of the 11th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that the murder and slaughter of whatsoever his Majesty's Lieges, where the party slain is under the trust, credit, assurance and power of the slayer, all such murder and slaughter shall be Treason, and the persons found culpable shall forfeit life, lands and goods.

Likewise by the 37th Act of the 3d Parliament of King James I. and by the 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. all receivers, suppliers, or inter-commoners with any Traitors, are punishable by forfeiture, as the Traitors themselves.

Likewise by Common Laws and Practice of this Kingdom, all concealers and not revealers of any malicious purpose, of putting any violent hands on the

* This is called The Grand Indictment of High-Treason, because there was another Charge exhibited against the Marquis, at the instance of Sir James Lamond; and there were also printed some short imperfect Answers of the Marquis's to this Grand Indictment, which imperfect Proceedings are inserted in State-Trials, Vol. II. from page 413. to page 418. and page 428, and 439. is inserted Bishop Burnet's Account of his Trial, which is meant of this Trial here inserted; not of that Indictment against the Marquis at the instance of Sir John Lamond. And in page 430, is inserted the Marquis's Speech on the Scaffold, for which reason it is here omitted.

the sacred person of your dread Sovereign the King's Majesty, or purpose of killing or putting him to death; and all advisers, counsellors, siders, abettors or havers of any accession thereto, are punishable as traitors.

Nevertheless, 'tis of verity, that you the said Marquis of Argyle, having laid aside all fear of God, loyalty to his Majesty, and to his royal Father, of ever blessed memory, natural duty and affection to your native Country and Countrymen, and respect and obedience to the Laws of all well-governed Realms, the Common-Law, and the Laws, Statutes, Acts of Parliament, and Practices of this Kingdom, and having traitorously intended and purposed the eradicating and subverting the fundamental Government of this Kingdom; at least the enervating, violating, derogating, or impairing the sovereign Authority, royal Prerogative of his Majesty, and Privilege of the Crown: You, for carrying on of your said wicked purpose, having gathered and convoked together in a hostile manner, a great many of your Friends, Servants, Vassals, Followers and other of his Majesty's Lieges, without any warrant, licence or command from his Majesty; and therewith under pretence of opposing such as by you were then nick-named Anti-Covenanters, and opposing the work of Reformation (but who indeed were faithful assertors of his Majesty's lawful Authority) having marched to the ford of Lyon in Atbol in the month of 1640, there did in your tent, and in presence of a great many Gentlemen and others publicly declare, That it was the opinion and judgment of many Divines and Lawyers, that a King may be deposed for desertions, venditions and invasions: And that howbeit that your words were in abstracto from any King, yet that the sense and meaning thereof might appear to be of the then King's Majesty, your dread Sovereign, you did subjoin and say to the late Mr. John Stuart, of Ladidwel; And Mr. John, you understand Latin.

Likewise considering the condition of the Kingdom, and the oppositions that a great many of the people were in to his Majesty; particularly you the said Marquis, and your three Complices and Followers; it is clear that the said words did not only treasonably reflect upon kingly Government, as being subject to the people, who might in the cause aforesaid depose a King; but also it is clear, that your meaning also and intention thereby was, that the King's Majesty, your dread Sovereign, might be so destroyed: And the said treasonable speeches were so vented by you, of design to usher in your many treasonable actions and practices done by you unto his sacred Person, Dignity, and Authority; which doubtless did occasion, and was mainly instrumental both in his deposition and cruel murder: Which wicked and treasonable speeches, the said Mr. John having thereafter reported, you most cruelly and tyrannously did prosecute him to death, as a Leasing-maker betwixt the King's Majesty and his good Subjects, howbeit you could not but be conscious of the truth of what he had reported.

Secondly, In prosecution of your aforesaid wicked and treasonable purposes, you having marched with the said forces to the house of Airlie, belonging to his Majesty's right trusty and well beloved Cousin and chief Counsellor James Earl of Airlie, which was then kept for his Majesty's service and authority; after you had forced the rendition of the said house, and destroyed the woods and plantings of the same, and wearied and destroyed the said Earl's friends and tenants, his Majesty's good Subjects, you did slight and demolish the said house; and to express your hatred to the said Earl, merely for his loyalty to his Majesty, did seize, or by those under you did seize upon the house of Forther in Glenyla belonging also to the said Earl; and without any colour or pretence of offence did wilfully, most treasonably, and contrary to the aforesaid Acts of Parliament, raise fire in the said house, and thereby burnt and destroyed the same, and all furniture therein.

Thirdly, In further prosecution of your treasonable plots and machinations against his Majesty's Person and Authority, contrary to the aforesaid Laws and Acts of Parliament in Anno 1640; you in an hostile manner, did most treasonably lay siege to his Majesty's Fort and Castle of Dunbarton, then fortified and kept for his Majesty's service by Col. Henderson, having his Majesty's command and commission for that effect, and forced the said Colonel to render the said Castle to you; out of which most treasonably you caused to be transported and carried away a great many of his Majesty's cannon and other ammunition, appointed for defence and security of the said Castle.

Fourthly, Notwithstanding that his then Majesty had in Anno 1641 come himself in person to this Kingdom, and most graciously condescended to all such Acts as were required of him (how unjust soever) for securing and pleasing the people, and settling a peace; and that he had past one Act of Oblivion, to indemnify all such as had formerly been in opposition to his Majesty within this Kingdom, and that he had conferred upon you the title and dignity of Marquis, as a mark of his royal favour, and put you in places of greatest trust in the Kingdom; and that you had sworn and promised in the Abbey of Holyroodhouse, that in case any trouble or commotions should happen to be raised in England, by any of his discontented Subjects against him, you would assist and defend him against all such, to the hazard of your life and fortunes; and that his Majesty had parted from this his ancient Kingdom, as was said and acknowledged by all, a contented Prince from a contented People: yet nevertheless his Majesty being forced and necessitated in anno 1642, to leave his Parliament in England then sitting at Westminster, and his royal Palace of Whitehall, and betake himself to defensive arms, for maintenance of his royal person, dignity and authority, and to protect the same against an army of Sectaries, who maliciously, traitorously, cruelly and treasonably did invade the same; you, contrary to your allegiance, obligations and recent Promise aforesaid, did by yourself and complices, to fortify and strengthen the said Rebels and Sectaries, and in direct opposition to his Majesty's person and dignity, call, or cause to be called a pretended convention of Estates in anno 1643, without any shadow or colour of lawful authority; and you and they so convoked did take upon you the supreme authority of the Kingdom, enter in league with his Majesty's enemies, impose subsidies and excise upon the people, and raise an army of his Majesty's own subjects, and therewith entred his Majesty's Kingdom of England, seized upon his Majesty's Towns and Forts there; and killed, murdered, plundered and destroyed his good subjects, and in open and pitched fields fought for, with and in behalf of the said said Rebels, against his Majesty's forces, which in effect was the rise and cause of all our subsequent ruins and disasters that befel his Majesty or his loyal and good Subjects thereafter.

Fifthly, In anno 1645, after your return from England, to shew your implacable malice and hatred to all such as had any dependance upon, or affection to his Majesty, you by yourself, and others under your command, or at your direction, did most treasonably raise wilful fire, and burn the house of mistress Lysvented, inhabited by the Countess of Sterling, and in her possession, and all the moveables and furniture, they extending to a great value; notwithstanding that the said Countess was an honourable aged woman; and who, and her dearest husband, the Earl of Sterling, by all observances and dutiful respects obliged you, so far as in them lay; thereby adding to the said Act of treason, the height of oppression and ingratitude.

Sixthly, In the year 1646, you by yourself, or those under your command, or for whom you were answerable, or whom you might have stopped or impeded, did take in the house of Taward, belonging to the Laird of Salmond, and the house of Oscoge, belonging to Lamond of Oscoge, and after articles of capitulation drawn and subscribed by the Laird of Ardringlass, and other Officers under your command, did most treasonably in manner aforesaid, under trust and assurance, as is said, burn the said house of Oscoge, cruelly hang, kill and murder a great many of the said Lairds of Salmond and Oscoge's friends and followers; as is more fully expressed in the Summons raised at their instance and mine, for his Majesty's interest against you, and which is repeated in a part of this article.

Seventhly, You having traitorously intended the utter ruin and extirpation of all faithful and loyal subjects, who had given testimony of their faithfulness to his Majesty's dearest Father, of ever-blessed memory; and having with an army of your complices, associates, vassals, servants, tenants and followers in anno 1646, marched to Kentire, where a great many of his Majesty's well-affected subjects of the name of Mac-Donald, Mac-Cow, and others, whose names are not particularly known, to the number of 3 or 400, had fortified themselves for their security, and against your oppression and violence, in the house of Lochebead and Donavertie: And you with the said forces having marched to the said house of Lochebead; the Gentlemen and others therein, without making the least opposition, and declaring that they had refuged themselves to the said place for shelter and protection, did render up the said house and themselves, upon assurance, that they might really and quietly return and live at their own homes; according thereto, they were dismissed and sent home, where they remained in peaceable manner by the space of days. Notwithstanding thereafter, you and the forces aforesaid having besieged the Castle of Donavertie, during the said siege, there were several rendezvous appointed for the said Gentlemen to make their appearance; which frequently they did, and were still dismissed, until such time as those who were within the said house of Donavertie had rendered up the said house and themselves, to be disposed of at the mercy of the Kingdom or pretended Committee of estates: And that notwithstanding thereof, you and your said complices had most perfidiously, treacherously and treasonably, (and for which also you are here indicted) slaughtered and murdered, or caused to be slaughtered and murdered, the number of 260 of them or 300, they being under your trust, assurance, credit, or power; and did dispose of the rest of them at your own hand, without any lawful warrant, to Captains William Hay, and Archibald Campbell, to serve in the French wars. Then and hereafter you caused, and appointed a new rendezvous of the said Gentlemen, who were in the house of Lochebead, and their followers; who having appeared in frequent manner, you caused to be singled out fifteen or sixteen of the said Gentlemen, who were that night sent to the said house of Lochebead, and the next morning brought forth by you, or such as were under your command; and most perfidiously, cruelly and inhumanly, without any order of Law, or form of Process civil or military, hanged and murdered. And to aggravate the said cruel and barbarous crime, 'tis of verity, That one of the said Persons being an old man, and having one son, of age not above sixteen or seventeen years; the father immediately before his death did depone, that his said son had never done any crimes offensive all his lifetime, but that he had still been at Schools; and that some few days before, he had come from Glasgow, the place of his education, to visit his Parents; and therefore did earnestly supplicate, in regard of his innocency, his life might be spared: Notwithstanding you, and the bloody actors of your purposes, were so unmerciful, as not to hearken to the said so just desire of the said dying old man, but forthwith the said young innocent boy was cruelly also hanged to death. Likewise not content with the aforesaid unheard-of horrid Acts of cruelty, you in the month of 1640, or one or other of the months thereof, by your self and followers, or such whom you might have stopt or lett, caused to be transported from the Isle of Ila, to the Isle of Inwa, to the number of two hundred persons of all sexes and ages; where all means of livelihood and subsistence being withdrawn from them, they in a most miserable manner were pined and starved to death by famine, except some very few, who had out-lived the rest, and were relieved and carried out of the said Isle by boats, accidentally coming by: Likewise the person of Macdonald, alias Coalmac Gillespy, or Coawkistocbe, being in anno ordered by the Parliament, or Committee of Estates thereof, to have been brought from prison out of the house of where he then was, and there had been kept by you and others in your time, many years before, to Edinburgb, that the causes for which he had been kept, and so detained in prison, might have been known; and he having for that end been brought in a ship the length of the road of Leith; you, for preventing such Information of your cruelty and oppression exercised towards him, and many of his friends and relations, which he was able to have given and made out; you in manifest contempt and scorn of that committee of Parliament, under which you yourself acted, caused to take the person of the said Coawkistocbe forth of the said ship, and after you had carried him to your own lands and bounds, cruelly caused to hang him to death.

Eighthly, Notwithstanding of the manifold acts of mercy and favour, dignity, honour and trust conferred upon you by your then dread Sovereign, for reclaiming of you from your disloyal and treasonable practices, plots and machinations, against his sacred person, dignity and authority; he being sore pressed and reduced to great straits and extremities by that army of Sectaries before mentioned, with whom you had formerly joined, as is said; and having in that exigence and difficulty rather chosen from an innate principle of affections of his Countrymen, to cast himself over in the hands of the army of his Majesty's subjects of his ancient Kingdom of Scotland, for shelter and preservation of his royal Person; nevertheless, you the said Marquis being the chief ringleader of that factious party, who then swayed the estate and affairs both in council and armies in the said Kingdom, did so contrive and complot, and by your influence so prevail, that after all fair offers made by his Majesty, and his earnest desire to have come and lived in Scotland, until such time as all differences in both Kingdoms had been settled; That a pretended Act of Parliament was made for abandoning and leaving his Majesty in the disposal and mercy of the inveterate enemies of his Majesty and Government, the said armies of Sectaries. And that your acting in, and accessions to the said affair might be the more evident and clear; and to aggravate your eminent and singular guilt therein, you yourself went to London, where you basely, under pretext of satisfaction for the arrears of the said army, raised by the pretended authority of the pretended convention of estates, in anno 1643, as is said, treacherously and treasonably gave up, at least condescended to the up-giving of your dread Sovereign and master, and that as being impowered so to do by the Kingdom of Scotland; and thereby did rub an indelible mark of reproach and infamy upon the whole Nation to all generations, so far as in you lay. And further to clear your aforesaid treasonable dealings, accessions to, and correspondence with that infamous party of the said army, who carried on the said abominable and detestable act, you being at the same time in a pretended joint committee of both Kingdoms, while-as the English therein did call in question whether the Scots army would sincerely concur with them in their said treason and treachery; you, after many arguments used in their favours, earnestly desired them to have patience for a little time, and it would appear by somewhat of the officers of the army, how far they intended to concur and go along with them. Likewise within few days after there was a vindication and declaration emitted in name of the said armies, whereby it was held forth, that in case his Majesty would not condescend to all the desires of both Kingdoms, which was no less than the divesting himself of all regal power, civil, ecclesiastical or military in state, church, or armies, they would deliver him up; which immediately after the payment of 200,000 l. basely and treasonably was done by you and them.

Ninethly, In anno 1648, his Majesty's royal father being, contrary to all Laws, divine and human, most unchristianly, barbarously and treasonably detained and kept prisoner within the castle of Carisbrooke, in the Isle of Wight, by a party of factious, disloyal and rebellious Sectaries; the Estates of Parliament, then convened by his Majesty's authority, having taken the said inhuman, treasonable and cruel usage into serious consideration, they found this Kingdom engaged in honour and duty to resent so horrid and unheard-of cruelty and lese-majesty, and obliged to use their utmost endeavours to relieve him out of the hands of such wicked usurpers, and to restore him to the exercise of his royal authority in freedom, honour and safety; for effecting thereof, after all other fair ways effayed, upon mature consultation had, they found that the only probable means was the raising of an army of his Majesty's good subjects, which was accordingly statute and ordained by Act of the said Parliament. Against the carrying on of which, so just, laudable and necessary a duty, you did most violently and eminently oppose yourself, not only by arguing, voting against, and using all other means in your power to obstruct the same; but also after the same was past into an Act of Parliament, you did most contemptuously and treasonably publickly dissent from and enter a Protestation against the same; and not being therewith content, after the said army in pursuance of their duty and allegiance had marched into the said Kingdom, you shortly after in the month of _____ in contempt of the aforesaid authority, and against the preservation of his Majesty's person and authority, did most treasonably convocate an army of factious, seditious and rebellious subjects, in opposition to the said army, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, murders, slaughters, plunders and vastations upon the persons and estates of divers of his Majesty's good Subjects, and therewith invaded several of the cities and castles, seized thereupon, and upon the magazine with arms and ammunition therein: And at that time the said rebellious army of Sectaries of England, being upon the borders, you fearing and apprehending that the force and power raised by you should not be able to withstand his Majesty's good and loyal subjects who were then risen and ready to rise in arms for asserting and vindicating his Majesty's just authority, you did most basely, treacherously and treasonably call in to your aid and assistance the said armies of Sectaries. Likewise you yourself went in person to the house of Mordington, within a mile of the English borders, to the end aforesaid; and you did meet with the vile usurper Oliver Cromwell, commander of the said army, with whom you had several private meetings and consultations, and thereby persuaded and so prevailed with the said traitor, that he thereafter marched with the said army to Edinburgh and the places thereabout; and which march and in-coming of the said Oliver you might have undoubtedly hindered; in so far as it can be made appear by clear proof and testimonies of famous persons, That it having been complained upon to him at the said house of Mordington, that by reason of his being there with such a great number of Soldiers, the Lord Mordington's tenants would undoubtedly be ruined; he the said Oliver made answer, That he could not help the same, for his staying and going did depend upon you, and that he was ready, if you desired, to march back to England. At least, you did contrive, advise or consent to the raising and convocating of the said seditious, factious, and rebellious armies; at least was one of the number yourself, and with, and assisting to them in arms; at least, did vote, counsel or persuade the incalling of the said army of Sectaries: And they being so brought in, you did countenance, assist, concur and consult with them, or their commanders, or some of them, in publick or in private at Edinburgh, and in the Cannongate, in the house called Lady Home's Lodgings, and in divers other places. As also, you did most villainously and traitorously contrive, counsel or vote for the drawing up of a Letter directed to the traitor and abominable usurper; wherein you and your complices did engage yourselves, in the name of

of the Kingdom of Scotland, to employ your utmost endeavours, that none who have been active in, or consenting to the engagement against the said Sectaries, or had been in arms at Sterling, or elsewhere, in maintenance or pursuance of that engagement, should be employed in any publick place or trust within this Kingdom whatsoever, without advice or consent of the Kingdom of England; as the said Letter dated the 6th day of October, 1648, more fully bears. As also, you did draw up, at least did counsel, advise or vote, to the up-drawing of certain Instructions given to Sir John Chisly, who was sent by you and your complices, as commissioner to the pretended house of Parliament of England, dated October 17, the year aforesaid; wherein you desire, that the noblemen, gentlemen of quality, and considerable officers of the army, that went into England, under the command of Duke Hamilton, and who were then prisoners, might be kept as pledges for the peace of that Kingdom; by which not only have you endeavoured most unnaturally to enslave your fellow-subjects and countrymen to the power of strangers, but most treacherously and treasonably, as an unworthy, ungrate patriot, done what in you lay to destroy the life of your own dread Sovereign, and the Royal Authority in him and his succession, and to subject the honour, liberty, power and government of this his Majesty's ancient and free Kingdom, to the command, lust and tyranny of foreign traitors and usurpers. As also, you upon the 4th day of May thereafter, having taken upon you most treasonably the supreme authority of this Kingdom, gave warrant under your hand for issuing out a Proclamation, declaring that the wives, children and families of James Lord Ogilvy, Lord Rea, Lewis Marquis of Huntley therein designant, Lewis Gordon, son to the Marquis of Huntley, John now Earl of Middleton, therein designant, John Middleton of sometime designant General-Major, should be no longer under the protection of this Kingdom, and that such course should be taken for transporting them out of their country to foreign parts, as the Estates of Parliament or their Committee should think fit.

Tenthly, after his Majesty's dearest and most royal father, of eternal and most blessed memory, had been most unchristianly, inhumanly, horridly and barbarously murdered, by the said abominable traitor and usurper Oliver Cromwel, and his wicked complices, the devilish and treasonable courses, plots, contrivings and actings of yours did not yet terminate: For there being some motions for address to be made to his Majesty, by some of his good subjects of this his ancient Kingdom, as undoubted and rightful successor to his deceased royal father in the imperial crown thereof, that his Majesty might come to his said ancient Kingdom, for exercising his royal power and authority; the said motion and purpose being so just and lawful, you, notwithstanding of your great impudence, and daring, always fearing, that a direct opposing thereof would prove altogether ineffectual; you, in a most indirect way, procured the application made for inviting his Majesty, to be so clogged with limitations, restrictions and conditions, to have been condescended to by his Majesty, before his admission to the exercise of his royal Government, as were most destructive to his Majesty's dignity and authority, and most derogatory to monarchical Government; as are more fully express'd in the several commissions, instructions and addresses sent and made to his Majesty to that effect, and publick proclamation of his Majesty at the mercat-cross of Edinburgh, by you and your complices, commissioners at Breda; all which are here repeated as a part of the Libel brevitatis causa. And his Majesty upon consideration, that the said unreasonable, unlawful and treasonable conditions were exacted of his Majesty by you, and a few number of factious subjects, who had by the assistance of the usurper and tyrant Oliver Cromwel, thrust yourself into the government of his Majesty's ancient Kingdom; and trusting to the fidelity, the loyalty and good affection of his other good subjects, having, notwithstanding the said hard and unjust conditions, resolved to cast himself upon the loyalty and affections of his other good and faithful subjects; you, to obstruct his Majesty's purpose and resolution, yea, and, so far as in you lay, to fright and terrify him therefrom by you and your complices cruel execution upon the Marquis of Montrose, his Majesty's commissioner, and who represented his person in his said ancient Kingdom; caused to be most horridly and inhumanly murdered the said Marquis, at the Mercat-cross, upon the 21st day of May, 1650, with all the circumstances of disgrace and dishonour: which so much reflected upon his Majesty's person, dignity and authority, and upon the honour of all true nobility; and is so recent and fresh, with detestation, in the memories of all good subjects and generous spirits at home and abroad, that it is not fit to be mentioned or repeated here. But his Majesty still continuing in his former purpose and resolution, and after a most tedious and dangerous voyage at sea, having, by the providence of Almighty God, happily and safely arrived in his said ancient Kingdom; shortly thereafter, the cruel bloody murderer and usurper Oliver Cromwel, in pursuance of his Majesty, with a powerful army of Sectaries, by sea and land, invaded his said Majesty's ancient Kingdom. For opposing of whom, an army being raised, while both the said armies were in the field, you most treacherously and treasonably kept correspondency, and had intelligence with the said usurper, by writing to, and receiving letters from him, without his Majesty's private consent or warrant; at least, by sending to, and receiving messages from him by word of mouth. And further, to advance the designs of that abominable Regicide, after you had by your indirect means, plots, advices or contrivances, gotten his Majesty removed from his army at Leith; you by your influence upon a few number of the commissioners of the general Assembly, yourself being one of the number, then met at St. Cuthbert's church, commonly called the West-Kirk, prevailed so, that for the weakening of the hands of friends, and strengthening the enemies, there was in a most clandestine and surreptitious manner an Act, as of the said commission of the Kirk, made, printed and published; wherein besides many reproachful and slanderous expressions of his Majesty and his royal ancestors, more fully express'd in the said pretended Act, bearing date August 13, 1650; it was declared; that you disclaimed, and would not own his Majesty's interest, because of his refusal to subscribe and emit a declaration offered to him; and which declaration was contrived and drawn up by you, and contains many scandalous, seditious, imperious, reproachful and treasonable expressions, not only against his his Majesty's authority and government, but also against his royal father and mother, and others his royal progenitors, as is more at large express'd in the aforesaid Act of the date above-written, and declaration bearing date the day the same year: of which declaration there needs no more be said, than that the circumstances by which his Majesty was enforced to sign the same, are enough known to the world; and that the worthiest and greatest part of his Majesty's ancient Kingdom did even detest and abhor the evil usage of his Majesty in that particular, when the same tyranny was exercised there by the power of you and a few evil men your complices, which at that time had spread it self over his Majesty's Kingdom of England, at least you and your complices did ratify and approve the said Act of the West-Kirk, and consent thereto; and at least you did deal with, and press and force his Majesty to sign and subscribe the declaration aforesaid; at least you were author, or contriver, adviser or counsellor, persuader or voter, or assenter, assister, aider or abettor of the aforesaid restrictions, limitations and conditions, and of the aforesaid murder of his said Majesty's commissioner and manner thereof, and of the keeping of the said correspondence with the said invader and usurper, and of the said Act and Declarations, or any or other of them, or all or part thereof, or one or other of them.

Eleventhly, After it had pleased God to suffer that monster of men and cruel Regicide Oliver Cromwel so far to prevail against all his Majesty's endeavours for recovering his just right and interest in this and in his other Kingdoms, and over all the armies and forces raised by him for that end, so that he was necessitated to refugeat himself with foreign Princes and Estates: howbeit, at his Majesty's coronation, you in the presence of God, and a great many of the nobility of this Kingdom, and others therein convened at Schoon, the 1st of January, 1651, did swear to be faithful to the crown, and true-liege-men to his Majesty: yet nevertheless contrary to the said oath, and notwithstanding the many favours, honours, benefits and acts of indemnity conferred upon you, and contrary to the Laws and Acts of Parliament, as is express'd; you did most perfidiously, ungratefully and treasonably in anno 1653, or 1654, not only according to your bounden duty, not rise in arms, and join with the Earls of Glencairn and Middleton, who were commissioned from his Majesty for hindring the further progress of the usurpers, and expelling them forth of this Kingdom; but did in open hostility join with the said usurpers their forces; especially with the Colonels Overton, Cobbet and Twisleton; at least with the said Colonels Cobbet and Twisleton; at least with Colonel Twisleton when he was in the Highlands in opposition to the said Earl of Glencairn; at least joined with one or other of them in counsel; did take and relieve prisoners, did furnish several pieces of great cannon, to the number of fourteen, in anno 1653, or 1654, to Colonel Aldred then governor of Air: which cannon, or a great many of them, were taken out by you of his Majesty's castle of Dunbarton, at the time and in the manner above express'd. And likewise you did take pay from the said usurpers for a company of foot under them and in their service, thereby openly and clearly making it appear what you did intend by all your more covered and private machinations, plottings and treasonable actings against his Majesty's dearest father and himself. Likewise to make it appear what intimacy and power you had with the usurper, you not only did term and call the actings of his Majesty's forces against you and the usurpers, rebellion, but also you in anno 1654, did take upon you power to bring off such as were in that service, and to give remissions therefore under your own hand; particularly to John Mac-Dougaw of Dunolick, as the same under your hand the said John will verify.

Twelfthly, The said Oliver Cromwel, that monster of men, vilest of traitors, most cruel murderer, bloody tyrant and usurper, having reached, as he thought, the end of all his devilish plots and treasonable machinations, by usurping the dominion and authority of his Majesty's three Kingdoms, and settling the same, so far as in him lay, upon him and his family; you conceiving the same so fixed and riveted, that in human probability it was not possible to be removed or shaken; that you might avowedly reap the fruits of your former more covered vile and damnable plottings, contrivings and actings for the said arch-tyrant and traitor, you then pulled off and laid aside the mask of pretended loyalty and religion, under which you had all along formerly lurked, thereby having deceived and cheated a great many of his Majesty's good subjects from their due allegiance and loyalty under hypocritical fair pretences of your affection and zeal for Religion, Prince, and Country, to the utter ruin (if not of souls) of many of their bodies, estates and fortunes; and did openly in face of the world, discover yourself in your own colours, appearing in a thing professedly and publicly in behalf of the said usurper against his Majesty's person and authority: in so far as in the month of the same owned only in the said usurper's person, as a member of the said pretended house of Commons, to the high indignity and contempt of his Majesty's sacred person and authority, the utter destruction of monarchical government, the dishonour of this Kingdom, and the great disgrace of your own family and posterity.

1657, after the decease of the said usurper, the succeeding usurper his son, being most treasonably and tyrannically proclaimed chief magistrate and sole protector of all his Majesty's dominions and territories thereto belonging, at the mercat-cross of his Majesty's cities of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, you having apparently, for such like services done or to be done, received from the said usurper Oliver one precept due upon the Exchequer of Scotland for payment to you of 12000 l. sterling, or thereabout, did with your personal presence countenance the said tyrannical and treasonable Proclamation; thereby so far as in you lay, divesting his Majesty of his just and royal interest and right, and establishing the same on the persons and families of the said usurpers. Likewise not long after the said usurper, the more to establish himself in his usurped government, having called a pretended Parliament, consisting of a pretended new-coined house of Peers, and certain persons of his Majesty's three Kingdoms as a house of Commons to sit in Westminster; you did procure yourself elected commissioner for the shire of Aberdeen, at least did accept of a commission from them; albeit both by the nobility of your birth, and your non-residence within the said shire, you was in law incapable to be so elected; at least ought and might have refused to accept any commission. Nevertheless having voluntarily, and of your own accord, embraced the said charge and employment; you thereupon took journey, and went to London, and most basely, perfidiously and treasonably, sate, voted, and otherwise acted in the said usurper's pretended Parliament, by whom his Majesty's right and interest was disclaimed and abjured, and the

Thirteenthly, You the said Marquis, to make it further appear to the world, that it was always your purpose and intention to destroy his Majesty's authority and government, and to oppose his restoration to his just right and interest to his three Kingdoms, at a provincial assembly holden at Inverary, a little after the defeat of his Majesty's army at Worcester, the ministers praying for his Majesty after the accustomed manner, you did most villainously and treasonably rebuke them, saying, That they were but fools to pray for a malignant and wicked King, whom God had rejected, and would never restore him again; or some such-like words to that purpose. And also, you being at London, in the time of the usurper Oliver, you said in presence of divers persons of quality, That you wondered how people could be so mad, as to call home a family whom God had rejected, or such words to that purpose: Likewise after your home-coming to Scotland, yea, openly in a publick meeting at James Maufertonne's in Niddres wind, in presence of several noblemen and gentlemen, you boasted, That you would own any thing you had done in these things by-gone; and that if it were to do, you would do it again; howbeit you had known that all that bad, would have come: Thereby presumptuously taking upon you, by outward success, to give judgment upon the hidden and secret counsels and determinations of Almighty God, and thereby to alienate the affections, duties and allegiance of his Majesty's good subjects, and to harden and confirm others, such as are otherways disposed in their wicked courses towards his Majesty's Person and Authority.

Lastly, That your monstrous and execrable Treason may appear to all the world, it is of verity, that in the year 1648, at a private conference betwixt you, Oliver Cromwel, and Col. Ireton, the said Oliver complaining of the many difficulties that attended their affairs, by reason of the divers designs which his Majesty had on foot from time to time against them; you the said Marquis made answer, That their danger was great indeed, in regard, that if any of these designs should take effect, they were all ruined. And thereupon gave your positive advice, that they should proceed to the questioning of the King for his life; assuring them, that they could never be safe until they had taken away his Majesty's life. At least, you did know of the horrible and treasonable design of murdering his said Majesty; and did most treasonably conceal, and not reveal the same till after the said horrid deed was committed, and so past prevention or remedy. At which time, in anno 1649, publickly in the face of the pretended Parliament then sitting, you said, that the Usurper Cromwel had told you, That England and Scotland would never be at peace, until the King were put to death. By all which particulars respectively, above rehearsed, it is clearly evinced, that you were, and are Author, Contriver, Deviser, Consulter, Adviser, of all or part of all the aforesaid crimes of Treason, and other above libelled, or other of them, in manner above declared. And thereby has incurred the pains and punishments of High-Treason, and others contained in the Laws and Acts of Parliament above-written: which must and should be inflicted upon you with all rigour, in example to others in all time coming.

Sic subscrib.

Ordered, that the above-written Dittay be given to the Marquis of Argyle, by a Herald or Pursuivant, and he to answer thereto, upon the 13th day of February, next to come.

The Marquis of Argyle's Petition, to the Parliament of Scotland, craving a Precognition of his Case; containing many weighty Reasons urging the necessity thereof. Presented to the Parliament, February 12, 1661.

To my Lord Commissioner his Grace, and Honourable Estates of Parliament,

The humble Petition of Archibald Marquis of Argyle;

Humbly sheweth,

THAT for as much as the Petitioner can with a safe conscience affirm, and solemnly protest, that whatever his actings or accession has been in relation to public business since the beginning of the troubles, till his Majesty's departure hence in the year 1651, though he will not purge himself of errors, failings, and mistakes, both in judgment and practice incident to human frailty, and common to him, if not with the whole, at least with the greatest part of the Nation; yet in one thing, though he were to die, he would still avouch and retain his innocency, that he never intended any thing treasonably, out of any pernicious design against his Majesty's late royal father of ever-glorious memory, or his present Majesty (whom God may long preserve) their Persons or Government; but endeavoured always to his uttermost for settling the differences betwixt their Majesties and the people. And as to any actings before the year 1641, or from the said year, till his Majesty's being in the Parliament at Perth and Sterling; your Petitioner did with a full assurance rely upon his gracious Majesty, and his royal father, their treaties, approbation, oblivion, and indemnity for what was past, and firmly believed that the same should never have risen in judgment, or that the Petitioner should have been drawn in question therefore. And during his Majesty's absence, and being forced from the exercise of his Royal Government by the late Usurpers, and long after that the Nation by their Deputies had accepted of their Authority and Government, and they in possession, the Petitioner was forced to capitulation with them, being in their hands, and under sickness, and the same was, after all endeavours used, according to the duty of a good Subject: and upon the Petitioner's part, so innocent and necessary for self-preservation, without the least intention, action, or effect to his Majesty's prejudice: that albeit upon mis-information (as the Petitioner humbly conceives) has actings and compliance both in their designs and quality have been mis-represented, as particularly singular and personal, stating the Petitioner in a degree of guilt beyond others, and incapable of pardon; the same have so far prevailed upon his Majesty, as to cloud and damp the propitious and comfortable rays of his Royal Grace and Favour, and have strained his gracious inclination beyond its natural disposition of clemency express'd to his other Subjects, to commit the Petitioner's person, and give way to the trial of his carriage and actings. Yet so firmly rooted is the Petitioner's persuasion of his Majesty's Justice and Clemency, and that he intends the reclaiming, and not the ruin of the meanest of his Subjects, who retain their loyalty, duty, and good affection to his Person and Government; that upon true and right representation of the Petitioner's carriage and actings, he shall be able to vindicate himself of these aspersions, and shall give his Majesty satisfaction; at least so far to extenuate his guilt, as may render him a fit object of that Royal Clemency, which is of that depth, that having swallowed and past by, not only personal but national guiltiness, of much more a deeper dye, than any the Petitioner can be charged with, or made out against him; and so will not strain to pass by and pardon the faults and failings of a person, who never acted but in a publick joint way, without any sinister or treasonable design against his Majesty or his Royal Father; and against which he can defend himself either by acts of approbation and oblivion in verbo principis, which he conceives to be the supreme, sacred, and inviolable security, or which he was forced to, much against his inclination, by an insuperable necessity. And albeit, his Majesty's grace and favour is strictly tied to no other rule but his royal will and pleasure; yet his Majesty's so innate, essential, and inseparable a quality of his royal nature, that the Petitioner is persuaded in all human certainty, that the leaving and committing to his Parliament (as is express'd in his Majesty's Declaration of October 12th last by-past) the trying and judging of the carriage of his subjects during the late troubles, as indeed it is in its own nature, and ought to be so accepted of all, as an undoubted evidence of his Majesty's affection to, and confidence in his people; so no other trial or judging is therein meant, but a fair, just, legal and usual Trial, without any prejudice, passion, or prelimitation, or precipitation; like as by the said Declaration there was a freedom for all the people interested, to make their application to the Parliament, or in the mean time to the Committee, from whom only his Majesty is pleased to declare he would receive address and information. And seeing it was the Petitioner's misfortune, during the sitting of the said Committee, to be prisoner in England; whereas if he had been prisoner here in Scotland, he would have made application to them, and would have craved, and in justice expected that precognition might have been taken by them, to whom the preparing and ordering of that affair (to-wit, anent the Trial of the Subjects carriage during the troubles) was recommended, that the Petitioner's absence, which was his punishment, not his fault, may not be prejudicial, seeing the Petitioner has lately received two several Dittays, wherein there be many crimes grossly false, with all the aspersions and aggravations imaginable laid to his charge; importing no less than the loss of his life, fame, and estate, and the ruin of him and his posterity; which he is confident is not intended by his Majesty. And that by the Law and Practice of this Kingdom, consonant to all reason and equity, the Petitioner ought to have upon his desire a precognition, for taking the deposition of certain persons, which being frequently and usually practiced in this country, when any person is defamed for any crime, and therefore incarcerate before he was brought to a Trial, at his desire, precognition was taken in all business relating thereto; which the Petitioner in all humility conceives, ought much more not to be denied to him, not only by reason of respect to his quality, and of the importance and consequence thereof, to all his Majesty's Subjects of all quality in all time coming; but also in regard it has been so meant and intended by his Majesty's Declaration aforesaid; like as the manner of the crimes objected, being actings in times of wars and troubles, the guilt thereof was not personal and particular, but rather national and universal, and veiled and covered with acts of indemnity and oblivion; and so tender and ticklish, that if duly pondered, after a hearing allowed to the Petitioner, in prudence and policy, will not be found expedient to be tossed in publick, or touched with every hand, but rather to be precognosed upon by some wise, sober, noble, and judicious persons, for thir and several other reasons in the paper hereto annexed. Nor does the Petitioner desire the same animo protelandi, nor needs the same breed any longer delay; nor is it sought without an end of zeal to his Majesty's power, and vindication of the Petitioner's innocency, as to many particulars wherewith he is asperfed; and it would be seriously pondered, that seeing Cunctatio nulla longa ubi agitur de vita hominis, far less can this small delay, which is usual, and in this case most expedient, if not absolutely necessary, be refused, ubi agitur non solum de vita, sed de fama; and of all wordly interests, that can be dear or of value to any man.

Upon consideration of the premises, it is humbly craved, That your Grace, and the Honourable Estates of Parliament, may grant the Petitioner's desire, and to give Warrant to cite persons to depone before your Grace, and the Estates of Parliament, upon such interrogatories as your Petitioner shall give in, for clearing of several things concerning his intention and loyalty during the troubles. And for such as are out of the Country, and Strangers, residents in England, Commissions may be directed to such as your Grace and the Parliament shall think fit, to take their depositions upon Oath, and to return the same.

And your Petition shall ever pray, &c.

Edinburgh, February 12, 1661.

This Petition being read, was refused.

Edinburgh, at the Parliament-House, February 13, 1661.

THE Marquis of Argyle (being accused of High-Treason, at the instance of Sir John Fletcher, his Majesty's Advocate for his Interest) was brought to the Bar. His Lordship humbly desired but to speak a few words before reading the Indictment;

Indictment; assuring to speak nothing in the cause itself. Whereupon he was removed a little, and after some debate, the House resolved that the said Indictment should be first read. Then his Lordship desired that a Bill which he had caused his Advocates to give in to the Lords of the Articles, (desiring a precognition, with many reasons urging the necessity of it) to which he had received no answer, might be read before the said Indictment: which being likewise refused, the said Indictment was first read; and after the reading thereof, the Marquis (being put off his first thoughts) was compelled to this extemporary discourse following, as it was faithfully writ when his Lordship spoke.

May it please your Grace,

MY Lord-Chancellor, before I speak any thing, I shall humbly protest my words may not be wrested, but that I may have charity to be believed; and I shall with God's assistance, speak truth from my heart.

I shall, my Lord, resume Mephibosheth's answer to David, (after a great Rebellion, and himself evil reported of) saith he, Yea, let him take all, for as much as my Lord the King is come home again in peace into his own house; 2 Sam. xix. 30. So say I, since it has pleased God Almighty graciously to return his sacred Majesty to the Royal Exercise of his Government over these Nations, to which he has undoubted right, and was most unjustly and violently thrust therefrom, by the late tyrannizing Usurpers.

It is, my Lord, exceeding matter of joy to us all, that the iron yoke of Usurpation (under which we have these many years sadly groaned) is now broke, and with much freedom this High and Honourable Court of Parliament are meeting together, under the refreshing warm beams of his Majesty's Royal Government: (so much longed for by our almost starved expectations,) and I do earnestly wish his Royal Presence upon his Royal Throne amongst us. But since at this time that great happiness cannot probably be expected, I am glad that his Majesty's prudence has singled out such a qualified and worthy person (as my Lord-Commissioner his Grace) to represent himself; whose unspotted loyalty to his Majesty we can all witness.

I cannot, my Lord, but acknowledge that these two grand mercies, which comfortably attends my present condition; one is, the high thoughts I deservedly entertain, of that transcendent and princely clemency wherewith his sacred Majesty is so admirably delighted; abundantly evidenced by many noted and signal testimonies in all the steps of his Majesty's carriage; as those most gracious Letters, Declarations, and that free and most ample Act of Indemnity, granted to all his Majesty's Subjects, (excepting some of the immediate murderers of his Royal Father) to eradicate any timorous jealousies of his Majesty's gracious pardon, (which might happily arise by serious reflections) convincing them forcibly of their own miscarriages, in these unhappy times of distraction. The effects, my Lord, of which princely deportment (I am confidently hopeful) his Majesty has experimentally and shall find, prove one effectual cement to conciliate the most anti-monarchick and disaffected persons (excepting some of those barbarous phanatics) in all his Majesty's Dominions, most willingly to the subjection of his Majesty's Royal Scepter; and with a perfect hatred abominate all disloyal practices in themselves or others, in all time coming.

The second is, my Lord, when I consider that my Judges are not such as we had of late, strangers, but my own countrymen; both which jointly (together with the real sense and solid convictions I have of my innocency of those calumnies most unjustly charged upon me) encourages my hopes the rather, to expect such dealing, as will most sympathize with that clement humour (to which his sacred Majesty has a natural propensity) and such equal administration of Justice (void of all biasing prejudices) as will be most suitable to such a high and honourable meeting.

I shall therefore, my Lord, desire to use Paul's answer for himself, (being accused of his Countrymen) he having a learned Orator, Tertullus, accusing him, as I have in my Lord-Advocate; Paul's was heresy, mine of another nature; but I must say with him, that the things they alledge against me cannot be proved: but this I confess, in the way allowed by solemn Oaths and Covenants, I have served God, my King, and Country (as he said) which they themselves also allow.

I shall, my Lord, remember (not with repining, but for information) my hard usage, never having had my hearing, nor allowance of pen, ink, nor paper, nor the comfort of seeing my friends freely, until I received this summons, which was in effect a load above a burden; enemies, both Scots and English, out of malice calumniating me for all the same things, excepting what relates to his Majesty's most Royal Father of ever-glorious memory.

Therefore, my Lord, I beg charity and patient hearing, not doubting but the wisdom and goodness of the Parliament will be so favourable, and not as the inconsiderate multitude (as a learned and able man writes, Sir Walter Raleigh, in his Preface to the History of the World.) As we see in experience, that dogs always bark at them they know not; and that is their nature, to accompany one another in those clamours; so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who wanting that virtue which we call honesty in all men, and that special gift of God, which we call charity in Christian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given, led thereunto by uncertain Report only; which his Majesty King James only acknowledges to be the father of lyes. I shall not desire to be in the least mistaken by any that hear me; but sure I am, it is pertinently applicable to my case.

I intreat your Lordship likewise to consider the words of another notable man, (Speed, in his History;) who says, As the tongues of Parasites are ill ballances to weigh the virtues of Princes and great men; so neither should theirs, nor other mens blemishes be looked upon as they are drawn with the deformed pencil of envy or rancour; which do always attend eminency, whether in place or virtue. I shall not, my Lord, be so presumptuous as to arrogate any thing to myself in this, only I want not the two companions, for I am but a weak man, subject to many failings and infirmities, (whereof I do not purge myself) for as we must confess to God Almighty, if he should mark iniquity, who can stand? neither shall I say, that there cannot a hole be discovered (as the Proverb is) in my coat; and it cannot but be so with any, specially such as have labour'd in such times and business. But I bless the Lord, that in these things which have been, and are here cast upon me, I am able to make the falsehood and misconstruction of them palpably appear.

My Lord, before I mention any thing in particular, I must shew this honourable meeting of Parliament, and all that hear me (who doubtless have various apprehensions of my being present in this condition) that I am here rather as my misfortune, not my injury; wherein I desire to explain the difference, as Plato and Aristotle do very well; calling injuries such things as are done purposely with a wicked mind; and misfortunes, such things as are done with a good mind, though the events prove bad, yet we could not foresee them.

So, my Lord, I shall take God to record (who must judge me one day) upon my Conscience, that what I did, flowed not from any injurious principle to any, though I acknowledge the events were not still so successful (which was my misfortune) indeed; but it has been my lot often in these times (wherein I and many others have been inevitably involved) to be by the malicious tongues of my calumniating enemies, misconstrued for the worst; yea, even in many things that the Lord was pleased to make successful. For the truth of this, I may, I hope, safely appeal to many in this honourable House, who can abundantly witness, my faithful and loyal endeavours, for both my King and native Country: whereof I should be very sparing to be an Herald myself, were not the contrary so impudently affirmed. There are five main calumnies that I desire, my Lord, to satisfy all that hear me a little in; to the end that the rest of less moment may be likewise in their own due time heard, afterward abstracted more from personal prejudice.

The first calumny is, my Lord, concerning that horrid and unparalleled murder of his late Royal Majesty of eternally blessed memory. I do here publicly declare, that I neither desire, nor deserve the least countenance or favour, if I was either accessory to it, or on the counsel or knowledge of it: which to make clearly appear, is under oath in the Parliament-Books 1649; whereof I was the first starter myself, to the intent that we might both vindicate ourselves, and endeavour a discovery, if any amongst us had any accession to that horrid and villainous crime; as also in my latter Will, which I made going to England, in Anno 1655, or 1656, fearing what possibly might hereafter be obtruded by any upon me or my family upon that account, I set it down to clear my posterity; that I was altogether free of that detestable and execrable crime, or of any prejudice to his Majesty, in either Person or Government. I left this with a very worthy Gentleman, I believe well known to your Lordship, and never saw it since; so your Lordship may be pleased if ye will to call for it, and try the truth. Whatsoever other thing may be in it, I hope, my Lord, this opportunity is a mercy to me, to have that vile calumny (amongst many others) against me to be cleared.

And, my Lord, to make this particular yet more evident, I did still, and do positively assert, that I never saw that monstrous Usurper Oliver Cromwel in the face, nor ever had the least correspondence with him, or any of that Sectarian Army, until the commands of the Committee of Estates sent me, with some other Noblemen and Gentlemen to the border in anno 1648, to stop his march into Scotland, after those who retired from Preston fight; neither after he left the border, in the year 1648, did I ever correspond with him, or any of that Sectarian Army; so unsatisfied was I with their way, after the wicked and sinister courses he and they were upon, afforded evident presumptions for us to apprehend, that he and they intended prejudice to his Royal Majesty. Only one letter I received from Sir Arthur Hesslerig, to which I returned answer, that he might spare his pains in writing to me, for I blessed the Lord, who had taught me by his word, to fear God, and honour the King, and not to meddle with them that were given to change. Though Sir Arthur be now dead, yet he acknowledged to several in the Tower, that he still had my letter: and when I was there, I often desired he might be posed and examined about it; which I can presently instruct. And during, my Lord, my being in England, neither in London nor Newcastle, in anno 1647, there was not any thing so much as mentioned concerning his late Majesty's Person; all that ever I heard of, was in publick Parliament 1647. The Commissioners Papers at London, and Committee-Books at Newcastle, will clear this fully.

The second calumny is anent the inhuman murder of Duke James Hamilton: my Lord, it's well known my great respect to that truly noble and worthy Person, whereof (upon all occasions) I gave ample testimonies, and can yet convince any of his friends with the reality of it; and evidenced my true sorrow for the wicked cruelty committed upon him. But indeed I cannot deny I refused to compliment Cromwel on his behalf, (he having, my Lord, been immediately preceding, so instrumental, and so very active in that most horrid and lamentable murder of his late sacred Majesty;) and if I had done otherwise, undoubtedly it had been a more black Article in that Libel now read, than any that is in it.

The third calumny is, that which breeds a great part of these groundless clamours, (though it be not in the Indictment) is my Lord Marquis of Huntley's death; wherein I may truly say, I was as earnest to preserve him, as possibly I could, (which is very well known to many in this honourable house) and my not prevailing may sufficiently evidence I had not so great a stroke nor power in the Parliament as is libelled. And, my Lord, for his Estate, I had nothing in that, but for my own absolutely necessary relief, and was ever most willing to part with any interest I had therein, (getting his friends, who professed much zeal for the standing of the Family) engaged for warrandize to me, of any portion that should happen to fall to my satisfaction. And to evidence that I was no means to harm the Family, I stood with my right betwixt all fines and forfeitures of Bonds, and accounted for any thing I could receive. And to manifest yet further, that the burden of that Family was not from any extrinsick cause to themselves, I have under the old Marquis's own hand, and his Son, George Lord Gordon, (who was a very worthy young Nobleman) the just Inventory of their debts, amounting to about one million of marks, in anno 1640. It would, I fear, my Lord, consume too much of the Parliament's precious time, to hear many other circumstances, to make this particular more clear, which I shall at this time forbear.

The fourth calumny is, the death of the Marquis of Montrose; there are many in this house, my Lord, who know very well, I refused to meddle either in the matter or manner of it: and so far were were we from having any particular quarrels at one another, that in anno 1645, he and I were fully agreed upon Articles and Conditions contained in a Treaty past betwixt us: the Gentleman is yet alive who carried the messages both by word and writing betwixt us; and it was neither his fault nor mine that the business did not end at that time, which ('tis known to all) proved very obnoxious to the Kingdom thereafter.

The fifth calumny, is concerning my dealing with the English after Worcester fight. It is well known, my Lord, to many, that myself, and the Gentlemen of Argyleshire (my Kinsmen, Vassals, and Tenants) endeavoured cordially to engage all their neighbours about them on all hands, against the English, (which they did not prevail in,) but was most unhappily made known to the English Commanders for the time; which they caused immediately to be published (as a very notable discovery) in their News-books; which occasioned two sad disadvantages to us. For they not only crushed our attempts in the infancy, but also determined the severer resolutions against us; whereby two strong Regiments of Foot, (Overton's and Read's) and very near the number of one of Horse (under the command of one Blackamoor) were sent to Argyle; and when Dean came there, it pleased God to visit me with a great distemper of sickness, (as Dr. Cunningham, and many others who were with me, can witness.) What, my Lord, I was prest to, when I was violently in their hands, may be instructed by the paper itself (written by Dean's man's own hand, yet extant to shew) which I did absolutely refuse, upon all the hazard of the uttermost of their malice; as also what I was necessitated to do, is likewise ready to be shewn, whereby I was still continued their Prisoner upon demand.

I shall, my Lord, add one reason more to clear this (besides many other weighty publick reasons and considerations, which I shall forbear to mention at this time, it being more natural to bring them in by way of defences afterward) my own Interest, and of all Noblemen and Superiors in Scotland. It may rationally be presumed, that I had been a very senseless fool, if ever I had been for promoting such an Authority and Interest over me, as levelled all, and was so totally destructive to all that differenced myself and other Noblemen, from their own Vassals, (which many say I was too earnest in) yea, it being absurdly derogative to all true Nobility; and my Ancestors and I (as it is said in that libel) having had so many titles of honour, dignity, and eminent places of trust, conferred upon us by his Majesty's Royal Predecessors and himself; (all for our constant Loyalty and Adherence to the Crown on all occasions) as the Records and Histories of this ancient Kingdom hold forth, besides the narratives of all our grants, and asserting the just privileges thereof, against all opposers. I did, my Lord, ever (even when the English were at the intolerable height of Usurpation) declare my true abhorrence to a Commonwealth Government, which was well known to them all. I was not indeed, my Lord, very dissatisfied, when there were rumours spread abroad of Cromwel's being made a King, (as some here present can witness;) for I told them it was a most probable way for his Majesty; and the more it were encouraged, would tend the more to Cromwel's, and their deformed Commonwealth's Government's ruin, and promote his Majesty's just Interest the more. My Lord, I shall not much blame my Lord-Advocate for doing his endeavour, (it being an essential part of his function to accuse) but I must say, that it is very hard measure; that so able a man has taken near as many months, in taking pains to prompt as many enemies as his persuasions could possibly invite, to vent out the highest notes of their malice; and laying out search by them for, and collecting all the bad reports, or rather (to give them their genuine term) I may call them a confused mass of the common clashes of the Country, thereby to advise misconstructions of all the publick actings of both Parliaments and Committees, during the late troubles: and with strange and remote inferences to adduce all those to the channel of my particular actings; he has taken, I say, my Lord, as many months, as I have had days to answer them, being an exceeding disadvantage. But, my Lord, that's not all, I am likewise extremely troubled, that he labours in that libel all along to draw an obscure veil of perpetual oblivion over all my good services; and specially my faithful and loyal endeavours, in restoring of his sacred Majesty to the Crown of this his most ancient Kingdom of Scotland; and the exercise of his Majesty's royal authority therein; with my cordial endeavours for his Majesty's restitution to the rest of his Dominions also: which his Majesty both knows, and has been pleased often to acknowledge it to have been good service. Yea, and many present in this honourable house know, that I extended both my zeal and affection to the utmost of my power for his Majesty's service in that particular; which I willingly acknowledge nothing, my Lord, but my duty, whereunto I was tied both by natural, civil, and christian bands to my Sovereign; and specially such a King, of whom I may say well, (as I have often affirmed) That he is a King in whom the Lord has been pleased to take such pleasure, as to possess his Majesty with so many superlative degrees of excellency, that will certainly exalt his Majesty's fame, both in our age, and to subsequent posterity, above all the Monarchs in the world. So that, my Lord, we may consequently discover a high demonstration of the Lord's singular kindness and special providential care for us his Majesty's Subjects, in preserving such a rich blessing as his sacred Majesty, (in whom the happiness of these Nations is wrapt up) under the safe wings of his divine Protection; I may say, even when the extravagant malice of men would have swallowed him up.

After my Lord had ended this discourse (being heard by all very attentively, without any interruptions) thus the Lord Advocate spoke to my Lord Chancellor:

My Lord, What can the Marquis of Argyle say to the opposition at Sterling, in anno 1648?

The Marquis replied, that he found my Lord Advocate endeavoured to bring him to debate the particulars, (which he hoped should be cleared at another more convenient time) and waved answering the thing it self, but insisted thus:

My Lord Chancellor,

I have, (informativè only) hinted a little at the main things which I am often charged with, my memory cannot fully reach all, neither will time permit to circumstantiate these particulars, which I have only touched in the general; nor is it my purpose at present to fall on the debate of any of that Libel (not having yet consulted the process)

by

by reason these advocates your Lordship was pleased to allow me, have not yet all embraced, and the excuses of my ordinary advocates (in whom I had confidence) being admitted as relevant. And these Gentlemen, that have been pleased, (in obedience to your Lordship's command) to come here with me, not being much acquainted with matters of this weight, and not having unbraced till within these two or three days, so that they are strangers altogether to my case; I shall therefore, my Lord, humbly desire, that a competent time may be allowed me, that I may prepare my defences, and I shall, (God willing) abundantly clear every particular in that Libel. And also my Lord, I humbly desire that these other advocates, who were ordained by your Lordships to assist me (and after the honourable Lords of Articles had heard them, rejected their excuses) may be now re-ordained to consult and appear for me.

The Marquis's advocates entered a protestation, that what should happen to escape them in pleading (either by word or writ) for the life, honour, and estate of the said noble Marquis, their client, might not thereafter be obtruded to them as treasonable; whereupon they took instruments.

The Marquis assured my Lord Chancellor, that he knew not of any such protestation to be presented, and that it flowed simply of themselves: Whereupon the Lord Chancellor desired the Marquis and his advocates to remove, till the house should consider both of my Lord's desire, and the advocates protestation.

The Marquis and his advocates being removed, the house, (after some small debate) resolved, as to my Lord Marquis's desires, his Lordship should have till the 26th of February to give in his defences in writ, and ordained Mr. Andrew Ker to be one of his advocates.

As to the advocates protestation, the house resolved, that they could not be allowed to speak in cases of treason either by word or writ, but upon their peril; only allowed them in the general, as much as in such cases was indulged to any.

The Marquis and his advocates being called in, my Lord Chancellor intimated the aforesaid resolutions of the house, both in reference to my Lord Marquis, and to the advocates protestation.

When my Lord Chancellor had done, the Marquis spoke as followeth:

My Lord Chancellor,

There is one thing that had almost escaped me, anent that opposition at Sterling, 1648, that my Lord advocate was speaking of; that it may not stick with any of this honourable meeting, I shall ingenuously declare, That after the defeat at Preston, I was desired to come and meet with the committee of estates (meaning those who were in the then engagement) and being come with some of my friends to Sterling, fearing no harm and suspecting nothing, I was invaded by Sir George Munro, where several of my friends were killed, and myself hardly escaped, which is all that can be said I acted in arms, as many here know.

My Lord, not that I am any ways diffident, but I shall in due time clear every particular of that Libel; yet I am not a little troubled that some who have heard the calumnies therein, may let them have such an impression (being asserted with such confidence) as to conceive a possibility, if not a probability of their being true; I shall therefore desire so much charity from this honourable meeting, that there be no hard thoughts entertained till I be fully heard.

The Marquis therefore, with the joint concurrence of his advocates, humbly desired, That the Bill (containing many pungent reasons) for a precognition of his process, given to the honourable Lords of articles, might be read and considered, in plain Parliament.

To which my Lord Chancellor replied, That it had been formerly refused at the Articles, and that it would not be granted.

So his Lordship was carried back to the Castle.

Edinburgh, March 5, 1661, at the Parliament House.

The Marquis of Argyle being called in, gave in a Bill, containing several weighty Reasons, desiring a continuation till the meeting of Parliament to-morrow. His Lordship being removed, after long debate it was carried against him by two or three votes; and his Lordship being called in, my Lord Chancellor told him it was refused, and ordered his Lordship to produce his defences, whereupon he spoke as followeth.

May it please your Grace,

MY Lord Chancellor, this business is of very great concernment to me, and not small in the preparative of it to the whole Nation; yea, it may concern many of your Lordships who are sitting here, and your posterity: and therefore I desire to have your Grace (my Lord Commissioner) and the remanent members of this honourable meeting, your patience to hear me a few words without prejudice or mis-construction, which any thing I can say is often obnoxious to.

I shall, my Lord, begin with the words of that godly King Jehosaphat, that good King of Judah, (after he was come back in peace to Jerusalem;) in his instructions to his judges, he desires them to take heed what they do, for they judge not for men, but for the Lord, who is with them in the judgment.

My Lord, I shall speak another word to many young men, who were either not born, or so young that it is impossible they could know the beginning of these businesses, which are contained in the Libel against me, (being all that hath been done since the year 1638) so that they might have heard by report what was done; but not why, or upon what grounds; and what some have suffered, but not what they have deserved. — Therefore I desire your Lordship's charity, until all the particulars and several circumstances of every particular be heard, without which no man can judge rightly of any action: For as it is well observed by that incomparable Grotius, that Aristotle asserts, That there is more certainty in the mathematicks than morals; for as Grotius has it, the mathematicks separates forms from matters, as betwixt straight and crooked there is no midst, but in morals, even the least circumstances vary the matter, so that they are wont to have something betwixt them, with such latitudes, that the access is near sometime to this, sometime to that extremity; so that betwixt that which ought to be done, and that which ought not to be done, is interposed that which may be done, but is nearer now to this than to the other extremity, or part, whence ambiguity often often ariseth. The particular circumstances are so obvious to every understanding man, that I need only to mention them.

Polybius, my Lord, makes much of his history depend upon these three, concilia, causa, & eventus; and there are likewise other three, tempus, locus, & persona, the change whereof makes that which is lawful duty, unlawful, and on the contrary: So likewise in speaking or repeating words, the adding or paring from them will quite alter the sense and meaning; as also in writing, the placing of commas or points, will change the sentence to a quite other purpose than it was intended.

There is, my Lord, another maxim, which I do not mention as always undeniable; but when there is no lawful magistrate exercising power and authority in a Nation, but an invading usurper in possession, esteeming former laws crimes; in such a case, I say, the safety of the people is the supreme Law.

There is another maxim which is not questioned by any, and it is, Necessity has no law; for even the moral law of God yields to it, and Christ's disciples, in David's example: For this Seneca says, Necessity (the defence of human imbecility) breaks every law; Nam necessitas legum irridet vincula, necessity scorns the fetters of laws. So he that answers that Libel, The long Parliament revived, speaking of this last Parliament (which his Majesty calls a blessed healing Parliament) he says the necessity to have it, may dispense with some formalities: So Ravenella (so much esteemed in matters of Scripture) after he has divided necessity into absolute and hypothetick, makes that of submitting to Powers of absolute necessity. Josephus also, my Lord, that famous historian, when he mentioned David's speech to his children, after he had made Solomon (being but younger Brother) King, he exhorts them to unity among themselves, and submission to him and his authority; for if it should please God to bring a foreign sword amongst you, you must submit to them; much more then to him who is your brother, and one of your own Nation.

There is another maxim, my Lord, Inter arma silent leges; and it is well known, that divers retours and other things in Scotland were done in consideration of times of peace, and times of war.

Another maxim, Ex duobus malis minimum eligendum est, cum unum eorum non potest evitari; says Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian, cum diversa mala inter se comparantur, minimum eorum locum boni occupat.

There is another maxim, No man's intention must be judged by the event of any action, there being oftentimes so wide a difference betwixt the condition of a work, and the intention of the worker.

I shall only add another maxim, It cannot be esteemed virtue to abstain from vice, but where it is in our power to commit the vice, and we meet with a temptation.

As I have named shortly some few maxims, my Lord, I shall humbly tender some weighty considerations to your Lordship's thoughts.

The first consideration is, That there are different considerations to be had of subjects actions when their lawful magistrate is in the exercise of his authority by himself, or others lawfully constituted by him, and when there is no King in Israel.

The second is, That there is a different consideration betwixt the subject's actions when the lawful magistrate is in the Nation, and when he is put from it, and so forced to leave the people to the prevalent power of a foreign sword, and the invader in possession of authority.

Thirdly, That there is a difference betwixt subjects actions, even with the invading usurper, after the representatives of a Nation have submitted to, and accepted of their authority and government, and they in possession several years; the Nation acknowledging their constitutions, and all the lawyers pressing and pleading them as laws.

Fourthly, The actions of subjects are to be considered, when assisting the lawful magistrate to their power, and never submitting to the invading usurper until they were prisoners, and could do no better.

Fifthly, That there is likewise consideration to be had of the actions of such subjects, being still prisoners upon demand under articles to that purpose.

Sixthly, It is to be considered likewise of the actions of such a subject, who was particularly noticed and persecuted by the invaders, for his affection to the lawful magistrate and his government.

Seventhly, It is to be considered, that there is a great difference betwixt actions done ad lucrum captandum, and those done ad damnum evitandum; that is to say, actions to procure benefit, and actions to shun detriment.

Eighthly, It is to be considered, that there hath ever been a favourable consideration had, by any Prince, of any person coming voluntarily, and casting himself upon a Prince's clemency.

Ninthly, It is to be considered, that his Majesty himself hath a gracious natural inclination unto clemency and mercy, which hath been so abundantly manifested to his subjects in England, even to all (except to some of the immediate murderers of his royal father) that it cannot be doubted, that the same will be wanting to his people in Scotland, who suffered by them (whom his Majesty hath graciously pardoned) even for their dutiful service, and affection to his Majesty.

Therefore without thought of any prejudice to the Parliament, or this honourable meeting, I must make use of my Lord Chancellor of England his words, though in another case, saying, There cannot too much evil befall those who do the best they can to corrupt his Majesty's good-nature, and to extinguish his clemency: For his Majesty's self declared his natural inclination to clemency, in his speech to both his houses of Parliament in England, whom he hath, with all his people, conjured, desired, and commanded, to abolish all notes of discord, separations, and difference of parties, and to lay aside all other animosities, and the memory of past provocations, and to return to a perfect unity amongst themselves under his Majesty's protection; which is hoped all your Lordship's will concur in, having so worthy a pattern to follow: And as these are his Majesty's inclinations express'd, so it is suitable to the arms he bears as King of Scotland, which is the Lion, whose motto is known to all;

— Nobilis est ira Leonis, Parcere subjectis, & debellare superbos.

Which is to say, to vanquish and subdue the proud, and spare such as are submissive; of the which number I am one, and for that effect, in all humility, present this humble submission to his Majesty, and your Grace, my Lord Commissioner, in his Majesty's name.

To my Lord Commissioner his Grace, and High Court of Parliament, March 5, 1661.

FArasmuch as I Archibald Marquis of Argyle, am accused of treason, at the instance of his Majesty's advocate, before the high Court of Parliament; and being altogether unwilling to appear any way in opposition to his sacred Majesty; considering also that this is the first Parliament called by his Majesty after his happy return to his Kingdom and Government, for healing and repairing the distempers and breaches made by the late and long troubles: I have therefore resolved that their consultations and debates about the great affairs and concernment of his Majesty and this Kingdom shall have no interruption upon occasion of any process against me. I will not represent the fatality and contagion of those times, wherein I, with many others in these three Kingdoms, have been involved; which have produced many sad consequences and effects, far contrary to our intentions. Nor will I insist upon the defence of our actings in this Kingdom before the prevailing of the late usurpers, which, if examined according to the strictest interpretation, and severest censure of Law, may be esteemed a trespass of his Majesty's royal commands, and a transgression of the Law: But, notwithstanding thereof, are by his Majesty's clemency covered with the veil of oblivion by divers Acts of Parliament, and others, to that purpose, for the safety and security of his Majesty's subjects: And that my actings since, and any compliances with so prevalent a power (which had wholly subdued this, and all his Majesty's other dominions, and was universally acknowledged) may be looked upon as acts of meer necessity, which hath no law; and it is known, that during that time I had no favour from these usurpers.

It was inconsistent with, and repugnant to my Interest, and cannot be thought (unless I had been demented and void of reason) that I should have had freedom or affection to be for them, who being conspired enemies to monarchy, could never be expected to befriend or tolerate Nobility. And whereas that most horrid and abominable crime of taking away the precious life of the late King of ever-glorious memory, is most maliciously and falsely charged upon me; if I had the least accession to that most vile and heinous crime, I would esteem myself unworthy to live, and that all highest punishments should be inflicted upon me: but my witness is in heaven, and my record on high, that no such wicked or disloyal thought ever entered in my heart. But chusing to shun all debate, rather than to use any words or arguments to reason with his Majesty, whom though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but would make my supplication to my judge. And therefore (without any excuse or vindication) I do, in all humility, throw myself down at his Majesty's feet (and before his Grace his Majesty's Commissioner, and the honourable Estates of Parliament) and do submit and betake myself to his Majesty's mercy; and though it be the great unhappiness of these times (the distempers and failings of these Kingdoms being so epidemick and universal) that his Majesty should have had so much occasion and subject of his royal clemency; yet it is our great happiness, and his Majesty's high honour, that he has express'd and given so ample testimony thereof, even to those who did invade his Majesty and this Nation, for no other cause than for their faithful and loyal adherence to his Majesty, and his just royal interests: which renders his Majesty's goodness incomparable, and without parallel, and gives me confidence, that his Grace his Majesty's Commissioner, and the honourable Parliament, of their own goodness, and in imitation of so great and excellent a pattern, will compassionate my condition. And seeing it is a special part of his Majesty's sovereignty and royal prerogative, to dispense with the severity of the Laws, and that it is a part of the just liberty and privilege of the subjects, that in cases of greatest extremity and danger, they may have recourse to his Majesty, as to a sanctuary and refuge:

It is in all humility supplicated, that the Lord Commissioner's Grace, and the honourable Parliament, would be pleased favourably to represent my case to his Majesty, and that the door of his royal mercy and bounty, which is so large and patent to many, may not be shut upon one, whose ancestors for many ages (without the least stain) have had the honour, by many signal proofs of their loyalty to be reputed serviceable to his Majesty's royal progenitors in the defence of the Crown, and this his ancient Kingdom. And if his Majesty shall deign to hold out the golden scepter of his clemency, as an indelible character of his Majesty's royal favour, it will lay a perpetual obligation of all possible gratitude upon me and my posterity, and will ever engage and devote us entirely to his Majesty's service. And the intercession of this honourable Parliament on my behalf to his gracious Majesty, will be a real evidence of their moderation, and they shall be truly called a healing Parliament; and God, whose mercy is above all his works, shall have the honour and glory which is due to his great name, when mercy triumphs over justice.

The aforesaid submission being read, the Lords of Articles would give him no present answer; but resolved to report the same to the Parliament the morrow.

Edinburgh, Martii 6, 1661; at the Parliament.

MY Lord Chancellor having reported what had been done the former day before the Lords of Articles anent the Marquis of Argyle's process, presented his submission, which was immediately read; and after a long debate, the first question was stated;

If it was satisfactory, or should be accepted or not?

The second question was, Whether they should proceed presently in his process; without regard to his submission or not?

Both which were carried in the negative against him. Then he was brought to the bar, and the Lord Chancellor told him, that his submission was rejected, and that notwithstanding thereof, the Parliament commanded him to give in his defences.

He replied, That his case was very hard, to be debarred from that which was his just privilege, and of all subjects, in such extremities to refuge themselves at his Majesty's mercy and clemency; and that as it was the undeniable privilege of the subject, so also it was a special prerogative of his Majesty, and the grandeur of it consisted much in the the eminency of the subject, whom his Majesty should graciously be pleased to extend his mercy unto: And besides many other strong persuasions that encouraged his submission, his Majesty's own proclamation (which he acquiesces in) wherein his Majesty is graciously pleased to declare, That his just interest and royal prerogative being first asserted, and trial only taken of his subjects carriages, then he is most willing to pass an Act of indemnity to secure them. And the like being already done in our neighbouring Nation, and his Majesty having performed his royal promise there already, he desired that their study might be to imitate his royal pattern; considering, that as it was a practice most agreeable to his Majesty's clement inclination, so also, that as Solomon that wise King said, That the King's throne is established by righteousness and mercy: He entreated therefore their Lordships seriously to consider his condition, and not to single him out, and aim at his ruin; and not only his, but also, he feared, both his family and name, their ruins also.

As for giving in his defences presently, he said, That the confidence and firm hope he had that his humble submission should have been accepted, and so cut off totally all further trouble either to their Lordships or himself, made him the more secure and slack, not resolving to lean to them, or any way (as he had expres'd in his submission) make use of them, though he were altogether innocent: and if he were necessitated to make use of his defences (as he declared he was most unwilling to do) it should be simply in obedience to their Lordships commands, and no otherwise.

Not having fully ended,

The Chancellor told him, if his Lordship had them not in readiness at that time, to have them ready to give in to the Lords of Articles the morrow.

So he was returned to the castle.

March 7, 1661, at the Lords of Articles.

THE Marquis being called before the Lords of Articles to give in his defences,

He declared, that he had seen their Lordships Order, that he might forbear his coming, if he would produce his defences; therefore he told their Lordships ingenuously, that if he had them in readiness, he would neither have troubled their Lordships nor himself; for having a petition ready to desire a delay, he thought it rather his duty to come and propose it himself, hoping their Lordships would consider that his presenting his defences either lame and wanting something, or blotted so as they could not well be read, was a very great prejudice to him; but a delay of a few days was no prejudice at all to any thing my Lord Advocate could say; and therefore hoped their Lordships would not refuse him some competent time, whereby he might have them in readiness.

Upon the which he was removed; and after some debate, being called in again, my Lord Chancellor told his Lordship, That he was ordered to give in his defences before Monday at ten o'clock to my Lord Advocate, otherwise the Lords of Articles would take the whole business to their consideration, without regard to any thing he could say.

The Advocate told his Lordship, that he must give in his whole defences:

To which he answered,

VOL. VII.

That that was a new form to give in peremptory defences before the discussing of relevances.

Whereupon Sir John Bychmore did rise up, and told his Lordship, That he was commanded to inform him, that there was a different way betwixt a process in writ, and the ordinary way before the Session, or Chief-Justice.

To which his Lordship answered, That he was very ill yoked with so able men; but he must tell them, that he had once the honour to sit as Chief-Justice in this city, and he knew the process before them was in writ, and yet the relevance was always first answered, before any peremptor proposed; for relevance is most to be considered in criminals.

Sir John Threster said, and so did the Advocate, That it was his Lordship's advantage to give in as strongly his defences as he could, otherwise the Advocate might refer the whole business to the Judge, and make no other answer.

His Lordship replied, That he would do in that by advice of his lawyers, and hoped any Order of their Lordships at present, was without prejudice to his giving in more defences afterwards, since he was so straitned with time, and commanded to give in what was ready: His Lordship likewise added, if their Lordships and the Parliament had been pleased to grant his desire of a Precognition, which was agreeable, as he humbly conceived, both to Law and Practice, and his Majesty's Proclamation, which he acquiesced in, it could not but have been the readiest way for trying his carriage during the late troubles; where now of necessity he must in the process, which he hopes will not be refused, crave one way for exculpation in many particulars; for he both was resolved, and is resolved to deal very ingenuously, as to matter of fact. And if that had been first tried, which he was most desirous of, both from the Committee, and since from the Parliament, he is hopeful there would not remain so much prejudice against him in the most part of things of greatest concernment in this Libel; and for his own part, he desired nothing more than the truth to have place, and to do with his person what they pleased; for by the course of nature he could not expect a long time to live, and he should not think his life ill bestowed, to be sacrificed for all that had been done in these Nations, if that were all.

Thereafter he was returned to the castle.

The Marquis of Argyle's defences against the grand Indictment of High-Treason exhibited against him to the Parliament in Scotland.

THE defender professes his sense of the mercy and happiness of the land, that we are delivered from the lawless arbitrary power of the armed force of cruel usurpers, and have restored to us our only lawful sovereign Lord, and in his sacred person, the authority of law, the order of legal judgment, and in them the liberty of legal defences: thereupon depend the great security of the liberties, lives and estates of the subject; this gives the defender confidence to appear in judgment, nothing doubting of a fair procedure and full hearing, compleat time being allowed in all the dyets of the process, and all things therein so ordered, as may be suitable to the justice and gravity of this high and honourable court, and the importance of the cause; justice, not only as to the defender, but justice as to the preparative and consequence. And he with much confidence expects all justice from his most gracious Sovereign, the justest of Princes, and who is represented and acting by so truly noble a person as my Lord Commissioner's Grace, also hoping the honourable court of Parliament will without all prejudice impartially consider his legal and just defences; and that they will proceed so far without all ground of suspicion therein; that any who is within degrees to persons against whom he is libelled to have committed any of the deeds which are made the ground of his ditty; or if any are conscious to themselves of capital enmity, or has been any ways informer against the defender, or have predetermined by uttering the judgment already of his cause, conscience and honour will make them abstain sitting and voting therein: so much the more, that they see how unwilling he is to propound any recusatory against any member of the house upon these or other grounds in law; so confident is he of the vindication of his own carriage, so much he defers to the ingenuity or generosity, and so high is the honour he bears to this honourable court.

First, it is alledged, that there be no process, nor is the defender holden to answer, till the whole Libel and all the parts thereof be given him up to see: also it is the Commissioner's instructions and addresses sent and made to his Majesty by the defender, as is alledged, and the commissioners at Breda are expressly repeated, as a part of the libel brevitatis causa, in the tenth article, and yet the same has not been produced nor given to the defender to see and advise with; till which be done, he cannot be held in to answer: like as where points of the ditty are founded upon writ, the defender craves that he may have up the writs whereupon the same are founded, to see before he be holden to answer to the ditty, which is very consonant to law, l. 1. Sect. 3. F. de edendo ubi edenda sunt omnia que actor editurus est, apud indicem, & l. 3. cod. eodem. Whereby the pursuer is ordained to show to the defender all that he will use against the defender before the judge. Otherwise the defender cannot prepare himself for his defence, which is the reason given in these laws; Paulus, lib. 5. cent. 16. and the doctors throughout the said laws, & l. unius, Sect. 9. F. de quest. post alios to l. 2. Mun. 3. 4. 5. 6. eo dedendo Bart. ad leg. ubi min. 8. F. de quest. But so it is, there are several articles in this ditty founded upon writ, not produced; as in the first articles in the prosecution of Mr. John Steward to death, as a leasing-maker between the King and his subjects libelled, and yet neither libel nor sentence against Mr. John produced.

Item, Colonel Henderson's commission for keeping Dunbarton castle is libelled, and the commission not produced.

Item, In the sixth article a capitulation alledged, made and subscribed by the Laird of Arkinglas and other officers, under the defender's command with the Laird of Lamond and Escog.

Item, The assurance alledged given to the persons within the house of Lochbead, mentioned in the seventh article, the defender craves ante omnia, it may be produced.

Item, That ordinance of Parliament or committee of estates, whereby it is libelled in the same seventh article that Cailkitoch was ordained to be brought from the prison where he was for the time, &c. to the town of Edinburgh.

Item, In the ninth article the defender's protestation, Parliam. anno 1648.

Item, In the same article the letter written to Cromwell, libelled as being dated the 6th of October, 1648; whereby it is libelled, that the defender and his complices wrote to Cromwell, &c.

Item, In the same article Sir John Cheesly's instructions libelled, as being dated the 17th of October, 1648, desiring the persons taken in the engagement to be detained as pledges of that Kingdom's peace.

Item, Eod. art. the warrant alledged to be under the defender's hand for a proclamation against the families of Ogilvie and Rea.

Item, Art. 10. the letter alledged written to Cromwell, anno 1650, after his invasion.

Item, Eod. art. the act of the West-Kirk, with the declaration whereunto it relates.

Item, Art. 11. the remission alledged given to John Mac-Dogal of Dimolich, under the defender's hand.

All which the defender humbly alledges ought to be given up to see, before he be held in to answer; especially post tanti temporis intervallum, so long a time having intervened between the intention of this pursuit, and the dates of the said Act and papers aforesaid libelled on; some of them being twenty years ago, some fifteen, and the latest ten or eleven years; as has always been the practice in such cases, and may be instanced in my Lord Balmerino's process, and was found by this honourable court in Mr. James Guthrie's process.

Second, Under protestation that the former exceptionation may be first discussed, that the papers therein mentioned ante omnia be given up to the defender to see; it is alledged, that it has been always the princely care of his Majesty's royal ancestors, to keep the Laws of this Realm certain, Ne dum incerto utemur jure, fluctuaret respublica: and lest Law, which is introduced for the lieges security, should become their snare: Therefore by King James I. (that illustrious Prince) Parliament 7, cap. 107. all the interpretation of his Majesty's statutes, otherwise than the same bear, is forbidden; and if forbidden, can be no ground of ditty: and in effect to found a ditty upon Statutes otherwise than they bear, were to found it upon such Statutes we have not; but so it is in the proposition of this libel. The Acts of Parliament whereupon the same is founded, are otherwise repeated than they bear: for, 1. The first part of the proposition of the ditty founded upon the two first Acts of Parliament libelled, viz. the third Act of the 5th Parliament of King James I. and the first Act of King James VI. doth upon the said Acts conclude the pain of Forfeiture and Treason. The same is most irrelevant, because in the said Acts, there is no mention made of any crimes of the nature and quality libelled; the said third Act of the 5th Parliament of King James I. being anent the fees of Craftsmen, and the price of the work; and the first Act of King James VI. being anent the constitution of the Earl of Murray, Regent; and in neither of the said Acts is there any pain or punishment inferred, and so far less can the pain of Forfeiture or Treason be from the said Acts concluded against the defender. And if it should be said, the 5th Parliament of King James I. is mistaken in the writing for the first Parliament; and in citing the first Act of King James VI. the citation of the number of the Parliament is also omitted, viz. the number 18: The ditty dittay repeats these two Acts otherways than they bear, for the words of the said 3d Act of the first Parliament of King James I. statutes and ordains, That no man openly or notoriously rebel against the King's person, under the pain and forfeiting of life, lands and goods; which is not at all in the libel repeated. And as to the said 1st Act of the 18th Parliament of King James VI. the words thereof are cited, yet with some difference and transposition libelled; but thereto is added the sanction and pain, That whosoever doth in the contrary, they are to be punished as Traitors, and to forfeit their life, lands and goods; whereas there is no sanction or pain in the said Act, only it is declarative of his Majesty's prerogative, and of his three Estates to maintain the same.

Item, In the second part of the proposition of the dittay, founded upon the 25th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II. and 75th Act of the 9th Parliament of Queen Mary; is not repeated as it bears as to punishment, for therein they who attempt to do, or raise any bands of men of war, horse or foot, without any special licence of his Majesty, and his Successors, are only declared punishable by death; whereas they are libelled to be punishable as Traitors, while it is the pain only of the said 25th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II.

Item, In the next part of the proposition of the dittay founded upon the 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament, and the 10th Act of the 10th Parliament, and 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. none of these Acts are repeated as they bear, but confounded, both as to the crimes and pains therein contained, to a very far different sense (as is humbly conceived) from that which the said Acts severally propose; transferring the pains of the said several Acts and Crimes therein contained from one to another, as may appear by what follows. For the first of these Acts, being the 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. is only of leasing-makers and tellers of them, which may engender strife between the King and his People; and the pain of the Act is tinsel of life and goods to the King, as is clear both by the title and body of the Act. The second Act, viz. the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is also the same crime, viz. against those that utter false, slanderous and untrue speeches, to the disdain, reproach or contempt of his Majesty, his Council or Proceedings, or to the dishonour of his Majesty's parents and progenitors: adding also those that meddle in the affairs of his Majesty, and his Estates, and the pain is the pain contained in the Acts of Parliament, made against Leasing-makers and tellers of them. The third is the 10th Act of the 10th Parliament of King James VI. against those who speak or write any purpose of reproach or slander against his Majesty's Person, Estates or Government, or deprave his Laws or Acts of Parliament, or misconstrue his Majesty's proceedings, whereby any misbelieving may be moved between his Majesty and Nobility, and his loving Subjects: And the pain thereof is only the pain of death. And by the 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. those that hear the said words Leasings, and do not apprehend and reveal the Authors thereof, shall incur the like punishment with the principal offenders; and yet Leasing-making, and telling, which is the crime punishable by the first of these Acts, viz. the 43d Act of the 2d

Parliament of King James I. is punishable, but the loss of life and goods to the King is omitted: And false slanders, which is the crime contained in the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. and only speaking to the dishonour of his Majesty's Parents and Progenitors, and meddling with the affairs of his Highness's estate, is repeated out of the said 134th Act; and joined to the crime contained in the said Acts; 10th Parliament, 10 James VI. And to both, the pains added of losing life, lands and goods, whereas the pain of the said 10th Act, is only of death. And the pain of the said 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is only the pain contained in the Acts against Leasing-makers, which in the said 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. is only the loss of life and goods, and not of life, lands and goods: but allanerly the escheats of goods moveable: as may appear, First, Because whenever the pain of tinsel of life and goods, is found either in the Acts of Parliament or old Laws, goods are understood moveable, as is clear from the crimes that are ordained to be so punished: As man-slaughter; by the 42d Statute of Robert III. is prohibited under the pain of tinsel of life and goods; where Skein explains, that the goods are to be understood of moveables. And by the 90th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James I. the receipt of him who is fugitive for slaughter, is forbidden under the pain of tinsel of life and goods. (Where Skein expounds goods to be goods moveable, in his Treatise of Crimes, tit. 2. cap. 6. Parl. 4.) And so it is clear in the other Acts of Parliament, that their whole pains are distinct, viz. tinsel of life and goods alike, is only extended to moveables; and tinsel of life, lands and goods, which latter pain in the stile of our Acts of Parliament is commonly thus expressed; That he who incurs it, shall die, and forfeit life, lands and goods, as the 31st Act of the 7th Parliament of King James II. & passim alibi forfeiture properly relating to lands; and in the common signification of our said goods, to be understood of goods moveable.

More especially it may appear, that the pain of the said 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. given to the said 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. is only the pain of escheat of moveables, because the pain of forfeiting of life, lands and goods, is the proper pain of the crimes that by our laws are declared Treason. And therefore Skein, both in his Index of the Acts of Parliament on the word Treason, refers the crimes that are so punishable to the head of Treason, as also in his tract upon crimes in the end of Reg. Maj. but doth not at all mention therein the crime of the said 43d Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. nor of the 134th Act of the 8th Parliament of King James VI. nor of the other Acts whereupon this part of the proposition is founded. But in his Index has the crime of Leasing-making between the King and his people under a head by itself, and therein expressly mentions both the said 43d Act of King James I. and 134th Act of King James VI. like as in the said tract of crimes after the chapters of Treason and points thereof, cap. 1. and pain of the same, which, cap. 2. he expressly says, is the tinsel of life, lands and goods; and declares, that he understands by goods, moveable goods. And anent the Process and Judge of the crime of Treason, cap. 3. when he comes to other crimes capital, of all which the pains are either the tinsel of life and moveable goods, or life only, or of some less pain in body or goods, but never of life, lands and goods, as is clear through the whole tract that follows. And in his 12 cap. anent the crime of falsity, he has the crime of Leafing-making between the King and his people. And the same Acts of Parliament, viz. Act 43d of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and the 205th Act of the 14th of King James VI. and in his 25th cap. has the crime of infamous and seditious libels; and the said 10th Act of the 10th Parliament of King James VI. cited therefore.

Item, In the last two Acts of Parliament whereupon the proposition of the dittay is founded, viz. the 37th Act of the 2d Parliament of King James I. and 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. it is libelled, That all receptors, suppliers, or intercommoners with any Traitors, are punishable by forfeiture, as the Traitors themselves; which is not as the Act bears, for both the crime and pain libelled out of the said 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. the Act is not simply against those who intercommon with Traitors and Rebels, but with such as are declared Rebels and Traitors. From all which it follows, that the proposition of the libel founded upon the Acts as they are libelled, is not relevant. And therefore the Defendant ought to be assolized in hoc libello.

Tertio, As to the last part of the proposition of the dittay, the Defendant abhors so much the crime therein mentioned, that he thinks any person who will conceal any malicious purpose, wronging in the least, far more in putting violent hands on the inviolable sacred person of his Sovereign Lord, were unworthy to breathe in common air, let alone to be defended; and is so conscious to himself of his own innocency in any such things, that he needs no other defence, but the confident denial of any guiltiness therein, either less or more. But before a practice pass in this honourable Court of Parliament of founding a dittay of Treason upon common Law and Practice; it is under protestation aforesaid, and with all humility alledged against the relevancy of that part of the proposition, as founded upon the said Common Law and Practice, That it is not relevantly founded thereon, in so far as by the 28th Act of Parliament 1640, it is expressly found and declared Traitors, but after Trial by the Parliament or Judges ordinary; and finding that the said persons have contravened a Law and Act of Parliament, made under the pain of Treason; and therefore a person cannot be declared guilty of Treason on a Dittay founded on Common Law and Practice. 2. Pæna being legis sanctio; and the Common Law is known with us, to have only vim rationis, non legis; and therefore no pain, but especially the highest of pains cannot be founded thereupon. And 3. specially as the practice beside the reason aforesaid; because L. f. 4. fad. Senat. Consult. Turpilianum, facti quidem questio in arbitrio est judicantis, pæne vero persecutio non ejus voluntati mandatur, sed legis auctoritati asservatur. Whence Menochius lib. 5. Presumpt. capt. 29: in principio saith expressly, pæna indici non potest nisi expresso jure sit cautum per l. at si quis divus fad. reli. Et sumptibus funerum. And it is the common opinion of the Doctors, That ever when punishment is not expressly defin'd in the Law, but is permitted arbitrio judicis, it cannot be extended to death, far less to the pain of Treason. And the foresaid Act of Parliament, 28th Act anno 1640, takes away the relevancy of founding Treason upon Common Law and Practice, as said is.

If a Dittay to infer the crime of Treason might be founded on practice, either of the Justice Court, or Parliament, which are two Courts, before which crimes of Treason are judged; yet our practice is consuetudo rerum ita judicatarum, as Craig defines it, lib. 1. de feudis dig. 8. And therefore to it, as to the introducing of all other consuetudes, there must be actuum frequentia, reiterated acts and practices, per l. de quibus ff. de legibus Et Cart. Jason, and other Doctors, on that Law; Et per l. Cod. quæ sit longa consuetudo, Et L. Et in totum 3. c. de cres. dif. privat. 2. illud explorandum, an contradictio aliquo judicio sit firmata; that is, it would be tried if decrees in foro contradictorio have been given thereupon. As also saith Craig dicta dig. 8. in fine; and if in any case, that ought to be far more in crimes; and if in crimes, yet more in the highest of crimes; and in all concerns of one of the most eminent Peers of the land, which is clear. For in matters civil (how small soever) before the session, a practice will never be founded on some decrees given either for non-compearance, or on compearance where there is little or no dispute, or it may be great inequality in Advocates of the two parties. And if in civils where the interest is only pecuniary, this ought to be much more in libels of Treason, as hath been said; but so it is, neither in Justice-Court, nor Parliament will be found, that it hath been frequently judged, nor in foro contradictorio, on a dispute where this defence hath been propounded. Yea, it may be well alledged, that there can be no practice shewed of either of these Courts, that any hath been found guilty of Treason but on some Act of Parliament under the pain of Treason, as is said; but however the said 28th Act of Parliament 1640, is most clear, which is most agreeable to reason, and the Law of England very laudable in that point; as Coke has it in his chapter of Treason, and therefore the libel as founded on practice is no ways relevant, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom.

Quarto, Every libel both of civil Law and our Law, ought to be clear, distinct and special; but especially criminal libels, because of the great importance of them, ought to be most clear, distinct and special, jure libellus in criminalibus debet esse clarissimus, saith Dambaud, prax. crim. 3. num. 3. And therefore, Libellus Criminalis obscurus parte etiam non excipiente extenditur favore rei, Baldus in lege addita, num. 10. c. de edendo, Alex. Confil. 72. col. versit. Et licet volum. 1. bip. Confil. 49. Et Bat-tander prax. Cran. Reg. 6. f. 3. Et 4. nec enim debet accusator cum exsimationis alienæ jactura, Et dis-crimine vagari licet. L. si in rem. ff. de rei unum. So that any obscure criminal libel is inept, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom, though he did not oppose his defence for that effect. But so it is, this Dittay is most unclear and undistinct, in so far as in the proposition of the Dittay, there are many Acts of Parliament libelled on, being Statutes anent diverse crimes of very different natures, and inferring different punishments, according to the article of the crimes, and in the subsumption, the Pannel is indicted for several crimes alledged committed by him, contrary to the said Laws and Acts of Parliament in general, without condescending on the particuler Acts of Parliament that that the Pannel has contravened by committing the particular deeds libelled, and so leaving him to great uncertainty. Whereas in all Law, Reason, and form of process, the defendant ought to be certified what Acts and Laws he has contravened, by committing such deeds that are in a multiplicity of crimes. After proposing all the Statutes relating to the same crimes, all the deeds immediately ought to be subsumed, falling under the compass of such Statutes, and thereafter the Acts relating to another indifferent crime ought to be proposed, and the deeds falling under the compass of these Acts immediately subsumed, and throughout the libel, which is no way done here; but first, by many different acts accumulated together in the proposition, and then the most different facts accumulated together indistinctly in the subsumption, not condescending on the acts by them contravened: and therefore the libel is inept, and the defendant ought to be assolized therefrom.

This defence is further confirmed in law; 2. Because a libel being sylogismus quidem practicus, Jason and the Doct. instit. de act. in criminal dittays the proposition consists in jure constitutionis, in the laws whereupon the libel is founded: The manner is in the subsumption of the facts or crimes under these laws, and the conclusion inferring the pain: Because of such a crime, as falling under the law libelled, on a very essential part of every libel, is quo jure petatur; and a libel being uncertain in this, is unclear and uncertain in a very essential point, and inept. 3. In law, a libel ought so to be conceived as the defender may know actionis speciem, otherwise it is inept. 1. f. de edendo, l. 3. c. eodem. and may also know actionis jus, and that he may deliberate how to defend; but in our case, that arises from the distinct application of the laws to the facts, ex quibus jus oritur. 4. If such uncertain libel were admitted, the defender, because of the obscurity and uncertainty of the libel, should be prejudged of a certain defence he could make against the relevancy of the same, because the relevancy of it consists in the subsumption of the facts and crimes libelled under some certain law: which being condescended on by a distinct subsumption, under each law, of the crimes that were libelled properly to fall under the same; the defendant would alledge why such crimes cannot be subsumed relevantly under such laws and acts, which he otherwise cannot do in such multiplicity both of different acts and crimes as are libelled in this dittay: there being not only in divers articles, but even in every article, a great diversity of the crimes therein libelled, and yet the defender left in uncertainty under which of all the acts libelled on, the pursuer intends the subsumption thereof; and so in uncertainty altogether how to conceive his defence. And if this be not maxime vagari, cum maximo alienæ vitæ et fortunæ periculo; it is hoped, as it will be found very evident, so it was never the practice heretofore used in criminal libels; and which, that it should not be now sustained, is of universal concernment: and if sustained, might prove of very dangerous consequence. And the libel, as it is now conceived, is inept, and the defender ought to be assolized therefrom.

BEFORE the defender come to his particular answer to the several articles of the dittay, to the effect the defender's case, in his accession to the publick actings of this kingdom, during the unhappy troubles till the treaty of Breda; and his Majesty's home coming, may be truly stated; it is humbly craved that the Commissioner's Grace and honourable Estates of Parliament may be pleased to remember, that the Kirk and whole body of this Kingdom entred at first into the national covenant, for defence of religion and his Majesty's person and authority, and mutual defence one of another in maintaining the same; wherein, and in what followed in prosecution thereof till the treaty with his late Majesty, and act of oblivion, set down at length and ratified in the 6th act of the 2d Parliament, anno 1641; his late Majesty did so far acknowledge and approve their loyalty, that in the seventh article of the said large treaty his Majesty was pleased to appoint, that at the close of that treaty, their said loyalty should be made known at the time of publick thanksgiving in all places particularly in the parish-churches of his Majesty's dominions. And in the said act of pacification and oblivion, is pleased to declare, that their constant loyalty in their intentions and proceedings, should not be hereafter called in question; and that whatsoever fell forth in those tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, to the laws and liberty of the church, or the particular interest of the subject, might be buried in perpetual oblivion; and whatever had ensued thereon, no mention should be made thereof in judgment or without: like as his Majesty for himself and his successors promises in verbo principis, never to come in contrary to the said statute, nor any thing therein contained; but to hold the same firm and stable, and to cause it to be truly observed, and these presents to have the full force and strength of a perfect and true security. Like as thereafter in anno 1643, the league and covenant was entred in, with the two houses of Parliament, upon the ground of the large treaty, by the church and whole body of this Kingdom, purporting the same ends of the covenant, for maintenance of Religion, King and Kingdom; which was thereafter approved by the Parliament, 1644, and fifth act thereof, and prosecuted by wars both within and without the Kingdom, by the authority of divers succeeding Parliaments; church and state going unanimously along together, without any apparent publick difference till the year 1648. And even then that Parliament, 1648, so highly homologate the said league and covenant, that they declare the breaches thereof to be the grounds of their resolutions of that war, act 4, 7 and 8; and their desires for preventing thereof to be the fulfilling of the same; Ibidem. The necessary qualification required in all with whom they would join either in their armies or committees, is, that they be such who were of known faithfulness to the cause and covenant in the said act 7, and that they would oppose, and endeavour to suppress the enemies to the cause and covenant on all hands, Ibid. Witnessing to the world that they swerved not from the principles contained in the national covenant, and league and covenant; and that they resolved closely and constantly to adhere thereunto, and to all the ends thereof. So that at that time there was still no difference as to the cause and covenant, any difference being only in the manner, and not in the matter of that engagement.

Thereafter what straits this poor Kingdom was reduced to, by the defeat of that engagement, and how unable it was to make resistance to that English army, who, in prosecution of their victory, came to the borders and entered the same, is notorious to all; wherewith the whole Kingdom being surprized with amazement, and in evident hazard, it was hard in that juncture of affairs to resolve upon any course for preventing the same, or rather incumbent hazard of the Kingdom. Whereupon a Quorum of the committee of estates appointed by the said Parliament, 1648, were necessitated to take upon them the managing of affairs, and to sue for conditions of peace, not being able to resist by force (the flower and strength of the Nation being broke by the said defeat) and to accept the same upon the easiest terms that could be had for the time; which as it was endeavoured upon no other intention, or for any other end but that which they were constrained to by inevitable necessity; so at that time it was generally looked upon as good service, and which at that time was most necessary to evite very great, and otherwise inevitable evils, being either necessitate to condescend to their demands at that time, or otherwise to have delivered the persons of all that did prosecute the said engagements, according to the oblesment of the large treaty, together with the forts and strength of the Kingdom. The succeeding Parliament for the time, in the year 1649, after proclamation of his present Majesty, did send commissioners to Holland, and afterwards, according to his Majesty's desire, to Breda, where there was a treaty concluded by his sacred Majesty; wherein he was graciously pleased to approve of the said Parliament, in anno 1644, and remanent Parliaments, and their proceedings from the year 1641, preceding the said treaty, which was thereafter ratified by his sacred Majesty and his Parliament at Pertb and Sterling; and, after the royal example of his ever-glorious father, an act of oblivion was indulged, whereby all that might be ground of question was buried in oblivion, and pardoned by a general act of oblivion in a most full and ample form.

This being the state of publick affairs during the time aforesaid, albeit by the first ten articles of the dittay, the defender is charged with deeds and publick actings, coming within the compass of the said approbation and oblivion aforesaid; yet such firm reliance hath he of his Majesty's persisting in his gracious clemency, which does in his royal heart so much abound, that albeit his Majesty by his proclamation, dated the 12th of October, 1660, is pleased graciously to declare, that he has remitted to his Parliament, the trial of the carriage of his subjects in Scotland during the late troubles: That the late troubles have only respect to the time during the usurper's possession, and that trial should be taken during that time of the subject's carriage: The defender in all humility conceiving, that it is no ways to be supposed, that his gracious Majesty did thereby intend to rip up or revive, or to institute any new trial of old offences, forgotten and forgiven, as is said; especially seeing it is not to be supposed that the bowels of his mercies should be so straitned to this his ancient Kingdom, to which he has upon all occasions given so many signal and recent testimonies of his superabundant favour, than they are, and have been to his subjects of his other dominions; to whom, according to his Majesty's declarations, he hath granted a full and free pardon, from which few, and these only the unpardonable murderers of his royal father, are excluded; for whom, or any guilty thereof, no punishment can be sufficient. And therefore the defender in all humility conceives the said articles, though libelled, are not to be insisted on.

The solemnity of the oaths, both of covenant and league, will be, as the defender hopes, pregnant presumptions to put an end to all controversy, anent the sincerity of his (as of the Church and Kingdom) their loyal intentions for the maintenance of the person and authority of our dread Sovereign, whereunto they were thereby so religiously engaged; and the constant tenour of his acting still by virtue of publick orders and warrants of Parliament, and their committees, wherein his faithfulness in the execution was also in the like manner approved, will witness, that what he did was not for any private interest, but for the publick ends; whereunto he conceived himself engaged in manner aforesaid. Nor was the defender for continuing of these unnatural civil discords, as he did witness by his inclination to an accommodation with Montross, in the year 1645, mentioned after in answer to the tenth article; which albeit fully agreed to betwixt him and the defender, yet he could not obtain the committee's approbation thereof: which is an evidence, that the defender had not the chief sway of affairs, and was always inclinable to peace, religion being secured; like as the carrying on the engagement in the year 1648, though the defender differed in his judgment as to the way and manner, upon the grounds and reasons thereafter expressed in answer to the ninth article, doth clearly evince, that he had not the chief sway in publick actings. And what power and interest he had in the year 1649, he did faithfully, according to his bond duty, improve the same for removing these differences betwixt his Majesty and his subjects, wherein he was passionately earnest, as shall be made appear in answer to the said tenth article. And after his Majesty's homecoming, and during his being in this Kingdom; and thereafter, till the enemy had fully prevailed, and that by his articles of agreement he was there prisoner, he faithfully served his Majesty, and even during his Majesty's absence, did always, and still shall, return loyal duty and good affection to his person, government, and posterity.

And whatever these who are grown up may judge, who only see the unhappy and accidental events that are the effects of the corruption of men, but have not known the counsels and causes which are the two parts of these things necessary to be known to all who would judge of human actions aright; events being for the most part uncertain, and the worst of events of times, through the corruption of agents, or other extrinsecal circumstances following upon the best of actions, yet had they been intimately acquainted with the grounds, causes, and nature of the actings while a doing, the defender is confident that they would have concurred and been of the same judgment, as being clear, that these proceedings had no native connexion with the sad and unexpected consequences that have ensued.

And now to come to the particular defences to the several points of the subsumption of the dittay. And first as to the article of the subsumption, anent the words alledged, spoken at the ford of Lions, which are libelled to have been, That it was the opinion and judgment of many lawyers and divines, that a King might be deposed for desertion, vendition, or invasion; and which is alledged to have been meant by the pannel of the then King's Majesty; and the presumptions adduced for inforcing that to have been the defender's meaning, are some words words alledged subjoin'd, to-wit, Mr. John, you understand Latin. It is alledged for the defender, no ways acknowledging to the best of his memory, that he uttered any such words; 1. All criminal dittays should contain in them at least, year, month and place, otherwise they are inept; Bartol. & D. D. ad L. libellorum ff. de accusatione, because amongst other reasons, diversitas loci varia argueret facinora, saith Baltand. Reg. 6. prax. cum postangel. &c. But so it is, there is no month condescended on, when the defender should have spoken these words, and therefore the dittay in this article is inept. 2. There is no particular act of Parliament in the act libelled upon in the proposition condescended on, which is contravened by the words libelled; therefore the libel in this article of the subsumption is general and obscure, and till the particular law contravened be condescended on, one can receive no answer. 3. The speeches as they are libelled, fall not under the compass of the acts libelled on in the proposition of the Libel, to infer any of the pains therein contained; because they are but libelled as the narration of the opinion of others, which is not relevant to infer so much, that the narrator is of the same opinion, except it were also libelled, that he did declare his homologation, and that he was of the same judgment, which neither is, nor can be libelled; far less then is it relevant to infer a crime, and so high a crime as treason. For suppose the defender had said, that they are very learned both divines and lawyers, whose opinion it is, that the Pope is the head of the church, and that he has power to dispense with the article of faith, to depose Kings, a horrid opinion, &c. and that it is their opinion also we may merit heaven by good works, and that all Hugonots or Protestants are damnable hereticks, and that he had related their words in Latin, as the Latin of that verse of the gloss of the common law, cap. sicut de excess. prelat.

And had said to Mr. John Stewart thereupon, Mr. John, you understand Latin; albeit these opinions of these divines and lawyers be execrably heretical, yet no body will say, that the defender's relation of them would have inferred him to have been guilty of the same; no more in our case can the relation libelled infer him to have been of that opinion with these divines and lawyers, or in any way thereby to have contravened any act of Parliament libelled. 2. The aforesaid opinion is libelled only to have been related in abstracto, (nothing of our King's Majesty who then was). And whereas it is libelled, that it appears the sense and meaning thereof appeared to have been of the then King's Majesty, in so far as the defender subjoined to Mr. John Stewart, the words aforesaid, that he understood Latin: 1. The libel in this part is ambiguous; for this may be interpreted, either that it was the meaning of the opinion of these divines which he related, (this seems to be most consonant to the words) or else that his own meaning was, That it was the judgment that the then King's Majesty our Sovereign might be so dealt with, as is libelled in the latter part of this article, and so the article in this part thereof is ambiguous and inept, and there ought to be no process thereupon. Nam libellus (in criminalibus præsertim) nihil ambiguitatis vel obscuritatis continere debet, per cap. Constitut. 6. extr. derig. don.

Bet. 3. If it be understood in the former sense, it is but still relative of the opinion of others; and if in this latter sense, to-wit, that it was his own judgment, the presumption libelled of what he spake to Mr. John Stewart, is no way relevant to infer it. 1. Because they held a more obvious meaning, viz. That it might have been, the opinion of these divines and lawyers was related in Latin; and indeed Grotius and Barclaius, who writ of that subject, are both in Latin, and that he had subjoined to Mr. John Stewart, Mr. John, you understand Latin. 2. That such opinions being rather the fancy of notional schoolmen, (otherwise not unlearned in their own art) or of such as are Doctors notional in the law, if there be any of such opinions, rather than of solid juriconsults, who for most part do not so much as move these questions, not to be moved. 3. If any such words had been spoken to Mr. John Stewart, they might have had this more proverbial sense: some lawyers and divines are of that opinion, but the subtilty of these questions or opinions is Latin to me, that is, I understand it not; as we say commonly of things we understand not, It is Latin to me. But, Mr. John, you are a Scholar, and you understand it. Now it is a Rule in law, that where the meaning is doubtful or obscure, that which is the most favourable sense should be followed. L. 9. ff. de reg. juris and Matheus de offitibus, decisione 265. n. 68, 69. & decis. 307. n. 15. And when these words are ambiguous, the declaration of him who uttered them should be acquiesced unto, Menochius, consilio 197. And the defender is ready to declare, that if ever he had spoken such words, he was very far from any such meaning as is libelled against him. Nor 4. is it any way presumable, that any rational man, who had the honour to know his late Majesty, could have made application of any of these three causes to so worthy and illustrious a Prince, seeing the said Grotius, Barclay, and others that write upon that subject, acknowledge, yea, it is obvious to common sense, that hardly can they fall out in the worst of Princes, if he be but compos mentis. And as to the presumption that follows, that the defender meant by the late King's Majesty, because of the condition wherein the Kingdom was for the time; 1. It is far more presumable that the Kingdom was in such a condition of affection to his Majesty's sacred person and authority, as at that time none durst have uttered what might reflect thereupon, seeing it is libelled to have been shortly after the subscribing of the covenant, wherein they had solemnly bound themselves by the oath of God to maintain his Majesty's person and authority. 2. His Majesty by his royal judgment in the act of oblivion, 1641, has presumed the loyalty of his subjects, both in their intentions and proceedings in these times, which is presumptio juris, & de pre. As for the defender's prosecuting of Mr. John Stewart, 1. It was a judicial process and legal act, and so can be no imputation to him wherein the process was laid in so fair a course of law, that he was condemned not only upon clear probation, but his own confession: and yet the words whereupon he was indicted and convicted, were far different from these words, as they are here libelled, otherwise the defender would never have pursued it.

Ultimo, Adhering always to the alledgance above propounded, humbly protesting, that they may be first discuss'd; and whereupon it is craved, he may be assilized in hoc libello, because by act of Parliament, ment in anno 1641, amongst the imprinted acts anno 70. the same service is approved, and he exonerated. It is alledged, that the Defender ought to be assailed from the whole crimes in the first article, because after the time libelled of, the alledged committing of the same, his late Majesty of glorious memory granted that never-to-be-forgotten Act of Indempnity and Oblivion in anno 1641. Which did proceed upon the preceding Treaty with his Majesty, and which is solemnly confirmed by his Majesty himself in Person, and his three Estates in his Parliament 1641, 6th Act thereof; wherein his Majesty, for himself and his successors, does promise in verbo principis, never to come in the contrary of that Statute and sanction, or any thing therein contained; but to hold the same in all points firm and stable, yea, and to cause it to be truly observed by all his Majesty's lieges for ever. Hereupon the Defender doth confidently rely, for all that is libelled as committed by him in this article, or any other preceding that time, as being confident it is the greatest imaginable security, that he and the rest of the lieges of the land can have.

As to the second article, and whole head thereof, 1. Neither day, month, nor year of God are condescended on; and therefore so general, that it is inept. Nam generalitas parit obscuritatem, Marent. part. 6. spec. & de libel. oblat. quomodo Concip. & per textus ibi citatos. 2. It is not condescended which of the Acts of Parliament libelled, this article and the several heads thereof contravenes, which is a general ineptitude and nullity in this libel. 3. As to the first point; if that article anent the intaking of the house of Airly, cutting and destroying the planting, and demolishing the houses; 1. It is not relevantly libelled, in so far as it was libelled that the house was kept for his Majesty's service, but doth not condescend that service now. 2. Is it libelled that there was any in it had a commission from his Majesty, without which it has not any colour of relevance? 4. The Defender never had any private quarrel, nor personal prejudice against the noble Lord James Earl of Airly. But if his marching to that house be meant of that which was in anno 1640, it was by virtue of, and in obedience to a commission put upon him by the Committee of Estates for the time: nor was the said house, at his arrival thereat, kept for his Majesty's service, as is (though wrongfully) libelled. But before that time was surrendered to the Earl of Montross, who had put Col. Sibbald to keep the same for the King and Country's use, and which Col. Sibbald, upon sight of the Defender's commission, did abandon the said house. And if there was any planting cut, it was allanerly some few shrubs and bushes, which the Defender could not hinder, for hutting to the soldiery; and though the Defender's commission bare power and warrant to demolish the house, he was so far from stretching, or fully executing the same, that he did not only slight the house, and delayed a long time to do the same, in expectation that the Lord Ogilvy should have procured a countermend from the Committee, and did slight it till he was past all hope of obtaining the same; and this as is hoped, will be acknowledged by the said noble Earl; neither did, so far as the Defender knew or could hinder, the Earl, his friends and followers sustain any other prejudice than what was usual, and what all places are ordinarily obnoxious to, where armies or parties of soldiers come: but however it is not relevant, as said is.

Tertio, That part of the said article, though it were true (as it is not) is no ways relevant to infer the conclusion of the Dittay, there being no Law nor Statute libelled on; that for cutting of timber, or demolishing the houses of private persons (though done upon private quarrels, as this was not) infers the pain of Treason.

As to that part of the article, anent the burning of the house of Forther, beside the exceptions against both the points thereof, alledged before in the beginning, it is not relevant to say, that the Defender seized thereupon to infer any crime, except it were libelled he seized by force, for he might have entered in vacuam possessionem. 2. Non relevat to libel, that those under him did seize thereupon, or raise fire therein, except it were libelled that the Defender had given express order or warrant to raise that wilful fire; who, as he gave not order therefore, so he was not present nor near the place, nor knew any thing thereof, till after the house was burnt, and noxia caput sequitur. 3. In the Acts of Parliament, libelled on, anent burning and wilful fire-raising, the same can only be understood of burning and raising of fire on private feuds, and for particular revenge in time of peace, and is not be extended to such deeds done in the heat and fury of wars, seeing inter arma silent leges.

And as to the aggravation of the Defender's hatred against the Earl, merely for his loyalty to his Majesty, it is gratis dictum, and against that presumption, qua unusquisque presumitur bonus, and against that loyalty to his Majesty, that is hoped shall more and more appear in the Defender.

Lastly, The Defender ought to be assailed from the said article, and all deeds therein mentioned. Because the same preceded the Act of oblivion in anno 1641, whereby all things that did fall forth in these tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and safety or to the Laws and Practices of the Church and Kingdom, or to the particular interests of the subject, are buried in perpetual oblivion, as more fully is contained in the said Act.

3. As to the third article, anent the besieging of Dumbarton Castle, and transporting Cannon and Ammunition out thereof:

It is alledged for the Defender, that the assaulding of the said Castle, is not relevant to infer the conclusion of the Dittay, because, as is before alledged, none can be declared Traitors, but those who have contravened a special Act made under the pain of Treason. But so it is, that none of the particular Acts of Parliament, whereupon the proposition is founded, mentions any thing against those who assault the King's Castle, nor does any of them infer the pain of Treason therefore. But only the 25th Act of Parliament, 6 Jac. VI. intitled sundry points of Treason, by the which Acts they only are to be punished as Traitors, who assault the Castle or places where the King's person is, and that without warrant of Estates; but it is neither libelled, nor was the King's person in the said Castle at the time of the alledged assaults thereof; nor did the Defender assault and lay siege to the same without warrant from the Estates, but by their express order and commission. And the truth is, the Defender himself did not appear before the said house, till the said Sir John Henderson being straitened with the siege, sent for the Defender, and offered to surrender the house upon honourable conditions, which the Defender suffered him to make himself, and which which were accordingly kept, not without some difficulty, the inhabitants of the town, by reason of prejudice done to them, being highly incensed against the said Colonel.

As to that part of the said article, anent the transporting of the King's Cannon and Ammunition, not relevant to infer the Conclusion, none of the Acts libelled on, concluding against any such fact, the said crime of Treason; and the truth is, the Defender did never transport any Cannon or Ammunition out of the said Castle, but two Cannons, which the Duke of Richmond, heritable keeper thereof, gifted to the Defender, and which he would never have gifted, if they had not been his own, and not the King's. 2. The Defender ought to be affoizled from the said article, and all deeds therein contained, the same having also preceded the said Act of oblivion, in anno 1641.

4. And as to the fourth article of the Dittay, anent the Defender's calling, or causing to be called a convention of Estates in anno 1643, entring in league with his Majesty's enemies, imposing excise and subsidies on the Kingdom, raising an army, entring England therewith, fighting for and with the Rebels there; it is answered, that the whole points of this article of the Dittay, are charged personally on the Defender, so contrary to the notoriety of the matter of the fact known to both Kingdoms, and to his Majesty's Commissioner's Grace, and to the whole Parliament; yea, to the fifth Act of Parliament 1644, relating and approving all the Acts that are made points of this article; that there needs no more but proposed as known to all, and to repeat out of the said publick Law and Act of Parliament, what is therein libelled, to evince that they are not the Defender's personal deeds: but the Committees (commissioners established by his Majesty) convention of Estates, and of the whole Church and Kingdom of Scotland, and approved by Parliament 1644, in the said fifth Act thereof. First then as it is notorious, so it is clear by that Act, that the said convention of Estates, was called not by the Defender, as is libelled, but by his Majesty's Privy-Council, Commissioners for conserving the articles of the Treaty therein mentioned, and Commissioners of common burdens, all establish'd by his Majesty's authority in anno 1641, which conservators concerning that article in the large Treaty, bearing the Kingdom of Scotland their desire for unity in Religion, and conformity in Church-Government, as a special means for conserving of peace betwixt the two Kingdoms; in answer thereto his Majesty, with advice of both houses of Parliament in England, doth declare his approbation of their affection in their desire of having conformity of Church-Government between the Nations; and as the Parliament had already taken to consideration the reformation of Church-Government; so they would proceed therein in due time: and this was one of the main grounds whereupon both houses entred the said league. (2.) That the enacting and entring the League and Covenant, was an Act of that convention of estates, not the Defender's personal act. (3.) That the League and Covenant was entred in with the two houses of the long Parliament, and assistance given to them in fighting with or for their army, or otherwise, which is libelled fighting with Rebels. The point of fact being thus cleared in opposition to the Dittay. 2. It is alledged, that the first two members of this article are subsumed under none of the Acts of Parliament, libelled on in the proposition; there being no Act of Parliament libelled against meetings, bands or leagues in general; or in special betwixt the two Nations or Estates thereof. 3. As to the remanent members of the article, they can no ways be relevant (with all submission) except it were qualified, that the two houses of the long Parliament, to whom the assistance libelled was given, that they were Enemies and Rebels; but that the Defender is confident it will not be said, because by his Majesty's Act of Oblivion, 25 April, 1660, his Majesty, after his happy Restoration, declares that what was acted even against his Majesty, and his Royal Father, by his Subjects in England, during these times, thereafter shall not be called in question at all, so much as to the prejudice of their reputation, in manner at length contained in that gracious Act. And how loyal the long Parliament was, did appear in that the Usurper durst never attempt any thing against his late Majesty's person, till they were broken; as also what loyalty the secluded members of that Parliament have (as became them) shewed to his Majesty in his just and glorious Restoration, is known to all Europe, to their eternal commendation and renown: No doubt as from conscience of their oath of duty and allegiance, so of the oath of God whereunto they bound themselves to maintain his Majesty's person, authority and greatness, as well as Religion in that Covenant. 4. All the foresaid deeds, which are the members of this article, viz. The calling the foresaid convention of estates, as being the act of the foresaid Council and Commissioners, the entring in the League and Covenant, raising of the army for assisting the two houses of Parliament of England, imposing Excise, &c. as all being acts of the said convention of Estates, together with the same convention of Estates, are all approved by the said 5th Act of Parliament, 1644. In respect whereof the Defender ought to be affoizled from this whole article, and all the crimes contained therein. 5. Not only is the said calling of the said convention of Estates, and the said convention entring in the League and Covenant, imposing of Excise, raising of Forces for the Parliament of England, and remanent acts of the said convention approved by the said 5th Act of Parliament of 1644; but by his Majesty's Treaty of Brada, and the Act of Oblivion, in the Parliament holden at St. Johnston and Sterling, in anno 1650, and 1651, or either of them, all things done during these tumultuous times, intervening betwixt the said Act of Oblivion 1641, and his Majesty's home-coming 1650, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, or to the Laws and Liberties of the Church and Kingdom, or to the particular interest of the subject, are buried in perpetual oblivion. And by the said Treaty, and Act of Ratification of the said Parliament, or one or other of them, the said Parliament 1644, and all acts thereof are ratified; and so amongst the rest, this which is the 5th Act, which approves all the acts, whereupon this fourth article of the Dittay is founded, and therefore the Defendant ought to be affoizled therefrom.

5. As to the fifth article, anent the burning of the house of Menstrie, in anno 1645, the Defender is so innocent thereof, that if it were libelled relevantly, he needed no other defence but a simple denial: but the truth is, that it hath been burnt by some of the soldiers, commanded by Major-General

ral Bailey, for the time, upon the greatest provocations that could be; two parishes, viz. Muckart and Doller, having been burnt the night before; and several, both men, women and children, cruelly killed by the concurrence of those that were in that house. But it is no way relevantly libelled, in so far, as it is libelled, that the Defender or others under his command burnt it: 1. Because there is no Act of Parliament, of all the Acts libelled upon in the proposition, whereupon this can be subsumed; especially the Acts anent the raising of fire, upon which (if upon any) it seems it is particularly founded, there is no such odd extension of that so high a crime, as to make any guilty of it, by committing of it by others, who are under their command. And this were a very universal, terrible concernment; and in the present case were most dangerous and unjust, that a Commander should be holden to answer for all the illegal deeds done by his soldiers. 2. It is against common reason, the Common Law, by which this therefore is well established, that delicta proprios tenent auctores, & noxa caput sequitur; and therefore is not relevant that the Defender burnt it by himself, or others by his special direction or particular order for that effect.

4. Though it were made relevant in manner foresaid, yet the Dittay is inept as to this article, and the Defender ought yet to be affoizled therefrom, because the year of God is only libelled, to-wit, the year 1645; whereas not only the month, as in all criminal libels, per L. libellorum ff. de accusationibus, and the Doctors treating thereupon, but the very day ought to be condescended on; for the omission of the day prejudices the Defender of his defence; specially his alibi, which he might and would propone, if the day were condescended on; that being required, the day ought to be condescended on, otherwise the libel is inept. Nam Libellus debet continere non tantum annum & mensem, sed & diem si reus id requisierit cum probaturus suum alibi. Damhaud, cap. 3. num. 4. 5. & Battander Reg. 6. num. 4. Maranta in spec. de bel. Obl. 3. num. 12. per bark. in L. Si quis reus Colum. 3. in fin. de publ. judic. & Jason. in L. Ubitraria 2 sect. Si quis occisi ff. de eo quod Crito loco. But so it is, as that if the day were condescended on of the said burning, the Defender might, and if need were, would offer to prove, that he was that day, during all the time of the burning, alibi, at a considerable distance from the same place.

3. Absolvitur, because Lieutenant-General Bailey, at that time when the house was burnt, had the command of the said forces, (adhering always to the former defences against the aptitude and relevancy of this part of the Dittay, and expressing the same that may be discuss'd ante omnia). In respect whereof the Defender ought to be affoizled ab hoc libello, at least there can be no process upon that part of the Dittay, as it is now libelled. 4. Albeit the Defender had burnt, or given direction only to burn the said house, as he had not; yet by special act and commission of Lieutenantancy, granted him by the Parliament 1644, he was impowered to to pursue the Macdonalds, and their adherents and accessaries, with all kind of hostility, by fire and sword, (with a dispensation) with slaughter, mutilations, raisings of fire, assailing of houses, taking of prisoners, and other inconveniences whatsoever, that should fall out in the execution of that Commission in pursuing of them; as the said Act and Commission may at length bear, and which Commission is ratified by his Majesty in the Treaty at Breda, his ratification of that Session of Parliament 1644, among the other Parliaments and Sessions thereof ratified by his Majesty; all after 1641, and preceding his return. But so it is, that the said Macdonalds were at that time, at the burning of the said house, joined with Montrofs; and it was in pursuance of both, that the said house was burnt, as is notorious, (and, if need be, the Defender will prove) and therefore though he had burnt, or given direction for the burning thereof, he ought to be affoizled.

5. By Act of Parliament 30th Act, 22 March 1647, it is statute and ordained, that all his Majesty's good Subjects shall be altogether freed, and liberate in all time coming, from being any ways called, convened, pursued, troubled or molested in judgment, civil or criminal, or out with the same, for any deed done, or to be done by them, against the persons, lands or goods of such as have, or shall be in the rebellion; (by which it is notorious, that the said armed opposition, made by the deceased Marquis of Montrofs, and the said Macdonald, and others under his command, to the Estates, is understood) during the time of their being in the said rebellion, or have been, or shall be guilty with the rebels in their wicked courses, or of any of them, who came under the first or second Classes of delinquents contained in the 5th Act of the 5th Session of that Parliament holden at St. Andrew's, in the month of January, 1646. But so it is, the Defender offers to prove, if need be, that a son of the Earl of Sterling, named Charles or John Alexander, who had, or either of them had right to Menstrie, had joined with Montrofs and those under him; and so came under the second Class of the said 5th Act of the 5th Session of Parliament, 1646. Or at least, went or sent into their leaguer, or without compulsion entertained them in the said house; and therefore the Defender ought not to be pursued, even though he had burnt, or given direction to burn the said house (as he no ways did) and being pursued, ought to be affoizled from this article; like as it is conjunctim alledged for the Defender in fortification of the said Act, That the same is ratified by his Majesty's large Treaty at Breda, as being one of the Acts of that Session of Parliament 1647, which amongst the other Sessions of Parliament, and Acts thereof, since the year 1641, and preceding his Majesty's return, in anno 1650, are ratified by the said Treaty, as also by the Act of ratification, at St. Johnston's or Sterling, in anno 1650, and 1651. By which ratification (or ratification of his Majesty by the Treaty aforesaid) the said Act of Parliament 30, in anno 1647, comes (as a most solemn remission granted by his Majesty, and whole Estates of Parliament, to the persons therein contained;) and so like as if every one of them had got a particular remission so solemn, it had been an uncontroversable remission for what were therein contained; so must it now be, being in effect of the same nature and virtue, albeit many be included in one.

6. By the Act of Oblivion at St. Johnston's or Sterling, in the year 1650, or 1651, all acts of hostility, whether between the King and his Subjects, or between Subject and Subject, and what things fell out in these times, betwixt the year 1641, and his Majesty's return, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, or to the Laws of the the Kingdom, or the particular interest of his Subjects, are buried in oblivion. In respect whereof, though the Defender were accessary to the said burning, as he is not, yet he ought to be assilized.

As to the sixth article, anent the taking of the house of Towart, belonging to the Laird of Lamond, and the house of Oscog, belonging to Oscog; and after articles of capitulation drawn and subscribed by Ardkinglas, and others under his command, trust and assurance; murdering a great many of Lamond's and Oscog's friends: As this is no way true, (the Defender being altogether innocent thereof) so it is no ways relevantly libelled. For, 1. Neither day nor month of these deeds are condescended on. 2. The alternity, by others under his command, not relevant to infer a crime, far less Treason against the Defender, for the reason contained in the first answer to the former article, viz. That there is neither Act of Parliament libelled, nor Common Law, ordaining a man to be liable to a pain, far less the highest of pains, for deeds or crimes by those under his command, except he gave them special direction. But every one is to suffer for his own fault, as more at length is contained in the said answer, which is here repeated. 3. Non relevat those for whom he is answerable, for the same reasons, because every one is answerable for his own fault and crime. 4. Non relevat, that others whom he might stop, did it; because there is neither any Act of Parliament libelled on, ordaining any to be answerable for all the deeds of those he might stop, (especially the act against murder under trust, bearing no such thing). Nor is there any Law nor reason for the same, but delicta proprios tenent authores, as hath been said; and no ways granting the Defender could have stopped them: for the truth is, he could not, and was not near them, when what is libelled was done; and albeit indeed, it be contra officium charitatis, not to stop any doing of mischief, if any one may safely do it, yet that it comes under the compass of Law to infer a crime, especially Treason, cannot be affirmed. 5. Taking of the house of Towart and Oscog, is not subsumed upon any of the Acts of Parliament libelled, there being none of them, anent the taking in of houses belonging to the lieges, and so is not relevant to infer any of the crimes contained therein. 6. The alledged killing a great many of Lamond's and Oscog's friends, after the assurance given by Ardkinglas, is no ways relevantly libelled, to infer the crime of slaughter under trust, because by the Act of Parliament, Jac. VI. par. 11. cap. 51. of slaughter under trust, upon the which it is founded, slaughter under trust, is only when the party slain is under the trust and assurance of the slayer, which is no way here libelled; but that the persons who are libelled to have been slain by the Defender, were under the trust of another, to-wit, Ardkinglas; who if he, or any other under the Defender's command, have done any thing against their own assurance, they are to answer for it.

7. The Defender adhering to these defences, and craving that they being against the relevancy be first discuss'd, repeats his former answer founded upon his Commission of Lieutenancy therein mentioned; for they who are designed Lamond's and Oscog's friends, were the Macdonalds, or their adherents and accessaries, (as is notorious, and the Defender, if need shall be, offers to prove it) whom by the foresaid Commission he had power to prosecute with fire and sword, with dispensation of slaughter, and raisings of fire, in manner at length contained in the Commission; which amongst the other Acts of Parliament, 1644, is ratified by his Majesty in his Treaty at Breda, as is alledged in the said answer, which is holden herein repeated; and therefore the Defender ought to be assilized from this article. And truly what cruelty was exercised, was by the Laird of Lamond himself, against the heritors and other inhabitants in the Sheriffdom of Argyle; for the which, upon a supplication given in to the King's Majesty and Committee of Estates at Sterling, in August 1651, he was imprisoned within the Castle of Sterling; till after Trial, Justice should have been done upon him: but was released by the Englisb when they took the Castle, with the other prisoners. However, the Defender is confident, as it is known, so he shall make it appear, if need be, in the other process whereunto this relates, and wherein it will be more pertinent; and yet the day and time of the committing of the deeds mentioned in this article not being condescended on, as it ought to be when required by the Defender, that he may propone his alibi, he offers to prove, if need be, that he was alibi the time of the committing of the said deeds, at a very great distance, to-wit, in England. Like as his Majesty, by his Treaty at Breda, hath ratified and approved the Acts of Parliament; and his Majesty, and Estates of Parliament, have ratified the said Treaty, and past an Act of Oblivion, of all former deeds done by the Subjects, which secures and indemnifies them for any former actings, in respect whereof he ought to be assilized.

As to the seventh article made up of several members or parts; as, 1. Anent the men alledged murdered at Lockbead and Dunnaverly. 2. Anent the aggravation added thereto; anent an old man begging his son's life, and denied him. 3. Anent the sending two hundred men from Ila to starve in Jura. 4. Anent the taking of the person of Col. Kittach, out of a Ship in Leith road, wherein it is libelled, that he had been brought by order of Parliament.

It is alledged against the seventh article, that, 1. The first part thereof (anent the men alledged murdered at Lockbead and Dunnaverly) is no ways relevant, not only in respect that the particular month and days whereupon the same should have been done, are not condescended upon, but also in respect there is not one particular person by name, and surname, whereby he might be known, condescended upon, against whom the deeds libelled should have been committed; without the which, this part of the article cannot be sustained as relevant: it being contrary to all Law and Practice, that murder in general, without naming the persons murdered, should be sustained as a relevant Dittay against any. 2. The slaughter alledged, committed upon those in the house of Lockbead, is not relevantly subsumed upon the Acts of Parliament libelled, in so far, as there is no assurance libelled to have been given to them, to bring it under the act of murder under trust, and there is no other Act libelled under which it can fall. 3. It is alledged, that the Defender cannot be charged with any of the deeds libelled in the said first part of the article (though they were true and relevantly libelled, as they are not) because the expedition made against the

Rebels

Rebels in Kintyre, in the year libelled, was by David Lesley, and those under his command, against each, who, contrary to his Majesty's order sent to them at that time, commanding them to lay down arms, and contrary to their own engagements, not to join with Alister Macdonald, did notwithstanding continue in arms rebelliously, (as was then declared by the Estates of Parliament) resisted David Lesley in the execution of his said commission against them; who therefore after defeating of them in the field, who took them out of the said houses of Lockhead and Dunnaverty without any capitulation; and disposed of them, as the Council of War then present with him thought fit, (which is notorious, and the Defender offers to prove, if need be;) for which, and other his services, the said David Lesley got the Parliament's approbation in anno 1648, as the said approbation and exoneration bears date: which will clearly prove any thing that is herein alledged. And therefore the Defender, nor any in his company at that time, cannot be charged with any deeds libelled in the first part of this article, but ought to be absolved therefrom. 4. The Defender repeats his third defence made to the fifth article founded upon his Commission of Lieutenancy; the persons mentioned in this article, against whom the deeds are libelled to have been committed, having been the Macdonalds, or the Adherents and Accessaries, which is notorious, (and the Defender offers to prove, if need be) to prosecute whom he had the Commission containing dispensation, and which was ratified in manner mentioned in the said answer; like as he repeats the fourth and fifth answer made to the said article, in respect whereof he ought to be absolved therefrom.

It is alledged against the second, third and fourth members of this seventh article, that they are no ways subsumed, nor cannot be subsumed under any of the Acts of Parliament libelled, and therefore the Dittay herein is inept, and the Defender ought to be absolved therefrom, (and yet in point of fact they are but meer calumnies). As to the second part (anent the said old man and his son) it is no ways relevant, not condescending on the persons names, and therefore can receive no other answer, but that it is a mere fiction to make the Defender more odious, who ingenuously professes, that he never heard of such a thing till he saw it in the libel. The third part of this article hath no better ground than the second; and the Defender desires, that for clearing his innocency of the fact libelled therein (anent the sending of two hundred men from Ila to starve in Jura) that the Gentlemen in the said Isles may be examined upon the truth of the matter. It is alledged, that the fourth part of this article, anent Col. Kittob, is of the same nature with the former two, and therefore the simple relation of the truth is sufficient to refute the falshood thereof; which is shortly this, viz. That Col. Kittob was not brought to Leith, either by order of the committee of Estates or Parliament; but being taken prisoner in Ila, by the forces under the command of David Lesley, and delivered to the Defender, the Defender put him aboard in Captain Brown's ship, who undertook to deliver him at Dunstaffnage. But Captain Brown finding the opportunity of a fair wind to Leith, to which he intended, and not willing to lose the same, did not go to Dunstaffnage, but came streight to Leith road; and immediately gave the Defender notice, that he had his prisoner aboard; whom therefore the Defender received from him, and sent him to Dunstaffnage. And the Defender desires that Captain Brown, who lives at Weems, may be examined upon the truth of this matter; by whom he offers to prove this, if need were.

And whereas it is libelled, that Col. Kittob was hanged, it is true; but it is also true, that he was condemned to die in a Justice or Lieutenant-Court judicially, which is notorious, and the Defender offers to prove, if need shall be: so that this can be a ground of no Crime nor Dittay whatsoever; but however the Defender ought to be absolved therefrom.

8. To the first member of the eighth article, that notwithstanding the manifold acts of dignity, favour and honour conferred upon him, by his then dread Sovereign; his Majesty being reduced to great straits by that army of Sectaries, and having cast himself over in the hands of the army of his Scots Subjects for shelter and preservation of his royal person; nevertheless, the said Marquis being chiet ring-leader of that factious party, who then swayed the estate of affairs both in Council and Army, did so contrive and complot, and by his influence so prevail, that after all fair offers made by his Majesty, and his desire to have come and lived in Scotland, till all differences in both Kingdoms had been settled, an Act of Parliament was made, for abandoning his Majesty to the mercy of his inveterate enemies, the said army of Sectaries.

It is answered, that as he must continually acknowledge the late King's and his present Majesty's acts of favour, honour and trust; so must he still deny (as he safely may in the presence of God, who is the searcher of all hearts, and of all men) that he never entertained any disloyal thought, or contrived any treasonable plot or machination against the sacred person, dignity or authority of his late sovereign, or of his present most sacred Majesty; and therefore with a clear conscience may answer this Dittay,

1. That the same is not special nor clear, but very obscure and general, how and in what manner he was chief ring-leader of any factious party.

2. Who that factious party were; nor,

3. By what deeds, and how he swayed the state of affairs; nor,

4. Those means, by which, and upon whom, he procured his influence to prevail.

5. The alledged offers, made by his Majesty are not express'd; and therefore the said articles are altogether general and inept.

The Act of Parliament, which the Defendant is alledged to have procured to have been made, is not produced, nor indicated by number or rubrick, nor does the Defender know any act of the tenor and title libelled.

And the Defender in humility conceives, that it is not consistent with the act libelled on, in the opposition of the Dittay, discharging persons to impugn the authority of the Estates of Parliament, to term the members thereof, especially in making an act (which being carried by plurality of voices, as the deed of the whole, and especially such an act, as is mentioned in the libel, where there were none, or very few of a contrary judgment) a factious party.

13. The cause of the first member of the said eighth article, anent the pretended act of Parliament, as is libelled, for abandoning and leaving his Majesty to the disposal and mercy of his enemies, the Sectarian army, does arise from the acts of Parliament (as clearly appears) and can be subsumed on under none of the acts of Parliament libelled: For if the tenth act of Parliament, 1647, be understood and meaned, as the act libelled, that being an act of Parliament; the defender humbly alledges, That an Act of an acknowledged lawful Parliament should be made a crime of accession, whereunto a member of Parliament shall be indicted, especially for so high a crime as treason, is without ground of law or practice, and is hoped the honourable Parliament will no ways sustain it; and therefore, that he needs say no more now in confirmation hereof.

14. Likewise, all that is in that act and substance thereof, being the Estates of Parliament their declaring their concurrence for his Majesty's going to Holmby-house, or some other of his houses in and about London; and that expressly to satisfy the desire both of his Majesty himself, and of his two houses of Parliament in England; and there to remain, not under the power of Sectaries, but with such attendance about him as both houses should think fit to appoint, with respect also had to the safety and preservation of his royal person: And the Estates therein do also declare against all harm and prejudice, violence or injury to be done to the same (as indeed it was horrid to think that any on earth should have done) or prejudice to his Majesty's posterity: But thereafter it is clear from the fourth and seventh acts of the Parliament, 1648, that the Sectarian army disobeyed, and threatened the houses of Parliament, imprisoned and banished faithful members, and by a sudden surprize, violently seized upon the person of the King's Majesty, carried him from his house at Holmby, against his own will, and declared resolutions of both Kingdoms, and kept him under their guards; till at length, by their power and prevalency, he was committed, and kept close prisoner at the Isle of Wight: this being the true case out of the express words of the acts before cited.

As to that declaration, Act 10. Parl. 1647, the defender alledges, 1. The act bears express, that it was to satisfy his Majesty's own desire. 2. That it is homologate and approved by the Parliament, 1648, in so far, as by their fourth act, intitled, Anent their resolutions concerning the breaches of covenant and treaties betwixt the Kingdom of Scotland and England, and demands for reparation thereof; finds the violent seizing on his sacred Majesty's person, and taking him away from Holmby-house, (as appears by Act 7.) by that army, against the resolutions of both Kingdoms, a breach: And amongst the Reparations, they desire expressly, that conform to the former desires of this Kingdom, the King's Majesty may come with honour, freedom and safety to some of his houses in or near London, that the Parliaments of both Kingdoms may make applications to him. And in their seventh Act, intitled, A declaration of the Parliament of Scotland, to all his Majesty's good subjects of this Kingdom, concerning their resolutions for Religion, King and Kingdom, &c. after they declare, that violently seizing on his Majesty's person, and carrying him away by that army, against the resolutions of both Kingdoms, to be a breach: And they declare, they intend to send to the two houses of the Parliament of England, the desires following; which they call necessary and just desires for Religion, his Majesty's good, and peace of these Kingdoms: whereof this is one, That conform to the former desires of this Kingdom, the King's Majesty may come with honour, freedom and safety to some of his houses in or near London; and declares, that thereafter they will endeavour it: And Act 8. in their desires to both houses of Parliament in England, the same desire is repeated, conform to the former desires of this Kingdom. By all which it is clear, that the seizing upon his sacred Majesty's person, was the violent deed of that wicked army, done with a violent surprisal against the declared resolutions of both Kingdoms. And that his Majesty's coming to some of his houses in or about London, where both Kingdoms might make application to him, conform to his Kingdom's desire; which is, that wherein the Estates declare their concurrence with his Majesty and both houses of Parliament in England's desire in the said tenth Act, is approved as a just and necessary desire for his Majesty, and accordingly enacted among that Parliament, 1648, their desires to the said houses; and declare it should be endeavoured, if refused: so highly it is approved by the said Parliament. In respect whereof, especially of the standing Acts of Parliament, 1648, the defender humbly craves, That albeit the article was relevantly, distinctly and clearly libelled and subsumed on some of the Acts of Parliament in the proposition condescended on, (as he humbly conceives it is not) yet he ought to be absolved therefrom.

And for further clearing what was the ground and occasion of that Act, and the reasons inducing the defender and the Parliament at that time to go along therein, and how little ground there is for challenging him thereon, it would be considered, That when the late King came to the army before Newcastle, the defender was in Ireland, by commission from the Parliament, 1646; and that his Majesty's declarations anent the grounds of his resolution in coming to the Scots, was sent both to the Committee of Estates in Scotland, and to the Parliament of England; so that the same being printed before the defender came to Newcastle, he neither did, nor could know, any other ground of his coming, nor what was contained in his declaration, viz. his gracious resolution to comply with his Parliaments in both Nations, and those entrusted by them, in every thing, for settling of truth and peace; and that he would totally commit himself to their councils and advices. Upon which terms, both the Committee of Scotland, and Officers of the army, declared to his Majesty, and to the Parliament of England, that they received him, and all this before the defender came from Ireland to Newcastle; from whence his Majesty sent him with instructions to the Commissioners at London, (of which Commissioners the defender was one also) to hasten the Propositions, and privately commanded the defender to take the advice of the Duke of Richmond, and Marquis of Hertford, anent what might concern his Majesty; and particularly, if it was fit that the Scots army should declare for his Majesty; whose judgment and opinion was (which they conjured him to tell his Majesty) that such a course was the only way at present to ruin his Majesty: For that he himself knew, that neither the Nobility nor Gentry of England who attended him at Oxford, wished him to prevail over his Parliament by the sword, and much less would they endure the Scots army to do it; and that it would make all England as one man against him. And that it was their earnest request to his Majesty, by any means to give way to the Propositions. Which advice he not only faithfully told to his Majesty at Newcastle, and many others there, and to our gracious Sovereign who now is, when he was in Scotland; but also being in the Tower, he intreated the Lieutenant thereof to propose for him, that the Marquis of Hertford, who was then alive, might be examined in this matter; which was put off from time to time, because of his Majesty's great affairs. And as it is most certain, that neither Independent nor Sectary was able to carry one vote in the house at that time; so it is notorious, that they who tendered his Majesty most in England, were for disbanding the Scots army, and his Majesty's staying in England: wherein the defender appeals to the particular knowledge of the Earl of Lauderdale, London, Sir Charles Erskin, and the rest of the Commissioners then there. And it is of truth, which all know, that so little fear, suspicion and jealousy, there was of what follow'd, that the great fear of his Majesty's friends in both Kingdoms, was, that if he fixed on his subjects in Scotland, all England would be against him, and probably cast off his Government and Interest for ever: So that under what representation soever the matter may now appear, because of the sad sequels, yet to them who know the matter, as it was there stated, what declarations and assurances there were from the Parliament of England, and how little fear of the prevalency of Sectaries; it did appear to be an act, if not of necessity, at least an act very expedient and convenient for the time, otherwise many who did dissent thereto, would never have condescended; and consequently the defender's concurring therein, upon such probable grounds, can be no such crime as is libelled; nor is it relevant to answer the conclusion of the dittay.

To the second member of this article, bearing, that under pretext for satisfaction for the arrears of the army, he went to London; and there treasonably gave up, at least condescended to the up-giving of his dread Sovereign and Master, as being impowered so to do by the Kingdom of Scotland:

It is answered, 1. This member is not relevant, because neither the time of his going to London, nor of his being there, or the persons to whom he condescended to give up, are particularly mentioned and set down.

By which generality he is precluded from several defences which might arise to him if the dittay were clear; and it is a principle in common law, and of constant practice, That non est vagandum in crimine, sed debet certum & speciatim dici: for that dolus & error versantur in generalibus.

2. No ways acknowledging the relevancy of the subsumption herein, upon any of the acts of the Proposition, till the same be clearly condescended on; and craving the same may be first done, opposes the Act of Parliament: And the truth is, while the defender was at London, there was nothing spoken at all by him of leaving his Majesty in England, except what he was expressly commanded by his Majesty to speak to Richmond and Hertford, as aforesaid.

To the third member of the eighth Article, bearing, That in a joint Committee of both Kingdoms, where the English questioned, whether the Scots army would concur with them in their said treason and treachery; the defender after many arguments used in their favour, earnestly requested them to have patience for a little time, and that it would appear how far they intended to concur. And that within few days thereafter there was a declaration and vindication emitted in name of the said army, holding forth, That in case his Majesty did not condescend to all the desires of both Kingdoms, which were no less than divesting himself of all regal power, civil, ecclesiastical and military, they would deliver him up, which immediately upon the receipt of two hundred thousand pounds the defender and they did:

It is answered, That adhering to the former defences anent the subsumption, and repeating it here, this member, although it were rightly subsumed, as it is not, is most irrelevant and general in time, place, person and speeches; mention being made of many arguments, and never a one produced, and of a question and answer, out of which (even as libelled) treason cannot be inferred, viz. That the defender requested them to have patience a while, and it would appear how far the army intended to concur; but within few days after, the army declared themselves in manner as aforesaid: seeing these alledged words of the defender, as they are indefinite and general, so the most they could infer is, That in a short time it would appear whether the army would concur or not. And what can from thence be inferred, as to any thing the army did? If they have outshot their duty, as it was in regard of him, with the speaking of these words, a future contingent, wherein the defender had no casualty; so they must answer for themselves, and not the defender.

And for aught he knows, there never was any such declaration emitted; neither should there be any captious use made of words, if there had been any such words spoken, as there never was, especially to infer his treason; for that lubricum lingue is oftner a frailty than a fault; and that by all Doctors of both Laws it is constantly held, that verba debent intelligi ne sonent in delictum. And that in dubio they should be interpreted à proferenti. And therefore no ways acknowledging the words and deeds libelled, except in so far as concerns the defender's vote to the declaration, and as the circumstance libelled, That the delivery of his Majesty was immediately after the payment of 200,000 l. it is clear that there was no respect to that money in what was done therein, by the Act of 7 Parl. 1648, wherein the Estates there declare, That money was never the cause nor motive of any of our undertakings and resolutions, whatever our enemies had falsely suggested of that kind. And lastly, adhering to his former defences, opposes to this whole Article, the treaty at Breda, and the Acts of Parliament of oblivion and ratification.

As to the ninth Article, and whole first member thereof, bearing, That the defender opposed the proceedings of Parliament, 1648, by arguing, voting, and after the resolutions of Parliament were pass'd in an Act, in protesting against the same:

It is alledged for the defender, 1. It is not condescended, under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on in the Proposition, this Article is subsumed; and therefore the libel, as to that member of the Article, for arguing, voting and protesting, is inept, and the defender hath just reason in such an incertitude to deny, that it can be relevantly subsumed on any of the said Acts of Parliament.

2. Arguing,

2. Arguing and voting is no ways relevant to infer the conclusion of the dittay; because by divine law, law of Nations, statutes and practices of this Kingdom, in deliberando, a Member of Parliament or other Council, should give advice or suffrage, according to his persuasion of the good or ill of the subject debated on, and under consideration; wherein if his reason cannot bring him up, nor his conscience admit him the length of others in such public counsels, he ought to have charity for the one, and excuse for the other.

Like as by the 5th Act, Parl. 2. K. Charles I. it is expressly statute, That every Member of Parliament shall faithfully and freely speak, answer and express themselves upon all and every thing which is propounded, in so far as they think in their conscience may conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the Church and State, and employ their best endeavours to promote the same. Under which oath, (read in the audience of the late King, and by him approved in the Parliament, 1641) the defender, as a Peer of that Parliament, in anno 1648, was solemnly tied to the dictates of his reason, and prescripts of his conscience; and cannot be called in question as a Member, having freedom therein; and conform thereto, is the oath of this present Parliament; bearing, that every Member shall faithfully and freely, according to their best judgment, give their advice and vote in Parliament.

To the second part of the first member of the said Article, anent the defender's protesting and dissenting from the said Act, 1648; it is alledged for the defender, The protestation is not produced as it ought to be, whereby it will appear, that if any was, the same was before the Act of Parliament pass'd; and that they did only protest and enter their dissent against proceeding to the determination of the question then in hand, which evinces the same to have been before the Act was made. Like as the defender offers himself to prove by the Members of Parliament then present, That being asked if they would renew the protestation after the Act, they shunned to do the same, the Act being now pass'd.

2. Absolvitur, (though the same were produced) because it is offered to be proved, that the same was ratified in the fourth Act, Parl. 2. Sess. 2. Cha. 2. which was approved at the treaty at Breda, and confirmed at Pertb and Sterling, as is said. But for the honourable Parliament, their more full clearing, anent the defender's carriage in the said particular, it is offered to be proved, if need be, That the defender (before the Commissioner's return from the said Isle of Wight, in the said year) when he heard that his Majesty had satisfied his people's desires concerning religion, in presence of divers persons of honour, he express'd himself passionately earnest to engage for his Majesty's freedom. Like as the only difference of the opinion anent the engagement was in the manner the grounds of those that were dissatisfied; being as they are express'd in the said protestation, viz. That the Parliament should not proceed till the commission of the Church were consulted, and adding also, (which is not therein express'd) till advertisement and three month's warning were given, conform to the large treaty; until all means of peace had been first essay'd, and while first the lawfulness and necessity of that war should be found by the Parliament, conform to the 7th Act thereof. And it is humbly conceived, that many in this present Parliament do remember, how unanimous all were, that his Majesty should be brought out of the hands of the Sectaries, to some of his houses in or about London: And all they differed in was, that the Church should be consulted anent the securing of Religion, all means of peace should first have been essay'd, and warning given in manner aforesaid, conform to the large Treaty; the breach whereof was made one of the grounds of that declaration, Act 7. And it cannot be refuted, but that at several meetings, the dissenters debated the dangerousness of that war (especially if the army should be defeated) from the sad consequences that might thereupon ensue to the King, Kingdom and Religion; as immediately thereafter fell out. Whereas had the Nation been intire and whole in their power and force, that army of Sectaries, in probability, would not have dared to have attempted those matters which afterwards they did. So that the case being truly stated, there will appear no malice against his Majesty's person, authority, and restitution thereof; but an uncleanness to enter into a war of such danger and hazard, and the respect they had to the security of Religion (as all then professed) according to the covenant.

To the second member of the ninth Article, whereby it is alledged, That in contempt of the authority of that Parliament, and against the preservation of his Majesty's person and authority, that the defender convoked an army of rebellious Subjects, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, slaughters and vastations, upon the persons and estates of his Majesty's Subjects; invaded cities and castles, seized upon magazines, arms and ammunition, and called in an army of Sectaries to his assistance:

It is answered, first, That the same is not relevantly subsumed upon any act of the proposition; at least till the Advocate condescend upon which act thereof the same is founded, the defender is not bound to make answer.

Secondly, the defender denies that he did convocate these forces, or gave counsel or command therefore: And as to his being with them, he must be affolized,

1. Because by a treaty at Sterling, betwixt the chief Officers of the army then alive, and out of prison; and a Quorum of Members of the Committee by authority of Parliament, 1648; who had power to order the incident affairs of the Nation, the said meeting, and all acts of hostility, and others thereby committed, are expressly discharged, binc inde, and a mutual oblivion and indemnity therefore.

2. Any meeting he had with them, was by a call of those of the Committee of Estates, who joined with those forces, and who in the Treaty is acknowledged the Committee of Estates.

3. The said meeting and acting thereof, together with the Treaty and Articles thereof, is ratified and approved by the third Act, 2 Parl. 2 Sess. Cha. 2.

The third member of the ninth Article, bearing, That apprehending his power was not able to withstand his Majesty's good subjects, the defender called in to his assistance the army of Sectaries; and that he went into Mordington, and met with the commander of that army, had private consultations with him, and prevailed with him to come to Edinburgh burgh with his army, whose coming he might have hindered; because Oliver said, That he could not help his lying upon the tenants of Mordington, for that his staying and going depended upon the defender: and that he did countenance and consult with the Sectaries and their commanders, in Edinburgh, or the Cannongate, in the house called the Lady Hume's Lodging:

It is answered, That as to speeches and consultations in general, not relevant except they were condescended on; and as to the words spoken by Cromwel, if spoken by him, it was a lye, and can infer nothing against the defender: and the occasion of his stay was till he got Berwick and Carlisle, which could not be restored till the Treaty of Sterling was closed. And as to his meeting and treating with him, absolvitur, because he and others did the same by warrant of the Committee, and which Treaty was ratified in the aforesaid Act of Parliament thereafter.

To the fourth member, That he concealed and voted to the drawing up of a letter, directed to Cromwel, wherein he and his complices engaged themselves, in the name of the Kingdom of Scotland, to do their utmost endeavours, that none who had been accessary to the engagement, or in arms at Sterling, in pursuance thereof, should be employed in any place of Trust, without the advice and consent of the Parliament:

It is answered, 1. No such letter produced.

2. Though it were produced, yet consenting and voting not relevant; because a vote in the Committee of Estates can infer no crime against the defender, nor any member thereof, nor any Act pass'd in the said Committee: especially seeing,

3. The Acts of the said Committee were ratified in the fourth Act of the Parliament aforesaid; all ratified thereafter by the Treaty at Breda, and Acts of ratification at Pertb and Sterling: and the necessity thereof would be also considered in respect of the large Treaty, both Kingdoms having given their publick faith, that the breakers should be rendered up to the observers; and that the English army then upon the borders, required the performance thereof against the engagers, and for farther security, pledges and places of strength. It was at that time counted a great favour (considering their power to have made their own terms) when they might have imposed and forced what they pleased more, yet they did accept this Act.

To the fifth member of this article, bearing, That he did draw up, at least did counsel the drawing of certain instructions, given to Sir John Chiesly, purporting, That the Noblemen, Gentlemen of quality, and considerable Officers, who went into England under Duke Hamilton, and were there prisoners, should be kept as pledges for the peace of the Kingdom:

It is answered, 1. Not produced as it ought to be, that it may thereby appear whether he subscribed the same or not.

2. Not relevant (one of the Committee) except it were libelled present, and voted at that time; for noxa caput sequitur.

3. Not relevant, voted quia in senatu nemo tenetur de consilio.

4. Oppones the authority of the Committee, Treaty, Acts of Parliament, and Ratifications aforesaid.

To the last member of this Article, bearing, That he gave warrant under his hand for issuing of a proclamation against the families of the Laird of Rea and Vyres:

It is alledged for the defender, 1. No such warrant produced; if any such a warrant were produced under the defender's hand, it will certainly appear to be as President of some Committee, and so not his personal deed; nor such a deed as can infer any crime against him.

2. No such proclamation ensued.

3. Although ensued, yet that took no effect, and so was mine tantum, & animus ad effectum non perductus.

4. Oppones the Act of the Committee, and Act of Parliament, 1649, aforesaid; which Parliament, and the whole Act thereof, is ratified in the Treaty at Breda, and approved in the Parliament at St. Johnston's and Sterling; wherein was also made an Act of oblivion, oftentimes before alledged on: in respect whereof the defender ought to be absolved from the said ninth Article, and whole member thereof, and all therein contained. And because the defender has in his defences so oft alledged the Act of Parliament, 1649, for his vindication, he desires that it may be observed (which is very observable) that by the printed Treaty at Edinburgh and Sterling, September, 1648, it is agreed and appointed by those of the Committee at Sterling, 1648, that a Parliament should sit down before the 10th of January next; conform thereunto, they did convene and sit down the fourth of the month of January, as by the said Treaty, and the first and third Acts of the Parliament doth appear: whereby it is clear, that the said Parliament, 1649, was appointed to sit by the Committee of the Parliament, 1648; who had power by the last Act of the said Parliament, to convene the Parliament before the first Thursday in March, 1650, if they thought fit: as also that Session of the Parliament, 1649, by the last Act thereof continues the same to the first Thursday in March, 1650. At which day they convened in the next Sessions, and therein ratified the Act of Parliament made in the former Session; and which day was the Dyet to which the Parliament, 1648, continued the same, with power to the Committee of Estates, to convene the same sooner, if they thought fit, as is said. Whence it is evident, that the said Parliament, 1649, whether as appointed by the uncontroverted Committee, 1648, at Sterling, in the first Session, or as it is continued to the first Tuesday of March, 1650, in the second Session, (both conform to the last Act of the Parliament, 1648) must subsist and sway the said defender his just reason, to found his defences upon the acts thereof. It is also further considerable, as to the loyalty of that Parliament, that therein the murder of his late Majesty was declared against, his present Majesty proclaimed and brought home, his subjects of this Nation reconciled to him, and taken into favour, an army appointed to oppose his enemies, the crown set upon his head; and that Session of Pertb, wherein the whole preceding proceedings were approved, was dignified by the presence of his royal person.

And to the tenth Article, and that part thereof where it is libelled, That the defender, in anno 1649, not daring to oppose in publick, or in a direct way, his Majesty's home-coming, he procured the application made, to be clogged with such limitations and restrictions, as were most derogatory to monarchical Government; as is alledged to be more fully express'd in the Commission, instructions and addresses, which are repeated as a part of the Libel.

It is alledged for the defender; 1. Seeing the said commission, instructions and addresses are libelled on, and repeated as a part of the dittay; in all law and form of process, they ought to be produced with the libel, for the reason adduced in the defence, against the relevancy of the proposition of the dittay; and till which be produced, it cannot be consistent with the said limitations and restrictions, and how far they are derogatory to monarchical Government; and therefore till then there can be no process.

2. It is not condescended nor cleared, on which of the acts libelled on in the proposition, this Article and Members thereof are subsumed; and therefore it is obscure and inept: and in that incertitude, the defender has just reason to deny, that it can be subsumed on any of the said Acts, to infer the crime and pain libelled against the defender, none of the said Statutes making any mention of treating or inferring any pain therefore. Likewise after ruptures and differences betwixt a King and his subjects, all Lawyers and Politicians do agree, that the best and safest way of removing the same, is by Treaty; and that being concluded on, it is, also their opinions, that the same are to be observed, at least so far as to exempt the subjects from punishment, to whom indemnity has been thereby promised. And in this, Grotius de jure belli & pacis, lib. 3. cap. 19. is most clear; and many others who write on that subject. And therefore the said Treaty being concluded, and after ratified by his Majesty and his Parliament, the defender cannot be called in question for his accession thereto, nor the pain of treason thereupon inferred: For the said treaty and conditions thereof, being accepted and agreed to by his Majesty's voluntary contract, cannot be like as a crime, far less so high a crime as treason, against the defender.

3. Absolvitur from that member of the said Article; because not only after the said Treaty did his Majesty tacitly remit any crime, if any was, in the said Treaty, by admitting the defender to places of trust, by receiving the crown from his hand at the coronation, and by admitting him to take the oath of allegiance, and to be a member of his Majesty's Privy-Council; but also after the said Treaty was ratified, there was an Act of pardon and oblivion by his Majesty and Estates of Parliament, oftentimes before alledged, and is here repeated.

Though the above-written defences be relevant in law, as to the said member; yet for the defender's further vindication, the honourable Parliament would take notice, that all along the preceding Articles, all the publick actings from the year of God 1640, to the year 1648, (wherein the Generality and Representatives, both civil and ecclesiastick in the Kingdom, concurred) are charged upon the defender as his particular actings, or as if the defender had been the special author; whereas in this article anent the treating with, and bringing home of his Majesty, therein it is known the defender, according to his bounden duty, was most active and zealous; and therein he wrestled with all his might, and by his pains and God's blessing thereon, overcame many difficulties, and did effectuate the same. The libeller does so far detract from the defender's faithful discharge of his duty in this so glorious action, and without libelling the least presumption of any circumstance to make the same probable; the defender is accused, as if he had in his judgment been against his Majesty's home-coming; which because he durst not avow publicly, therefore he betook himself to under-hand dealing, to clog the Treaty with limitations and restrictions, excluding the defender from all accession to the said duty, in so far as it was good; viz. to bring home the King; and making him to be the sole author of all libelled to be evil therein; to wit, of the limitations and restrictions. Whereas the truth is, he was active in the King's home-bringing, and was passive in the other; having labour'd what he could, that there should be as few conditions, and the same as satisfactory to his Majesty as was possible at that time to obtain; which is known to all that did transact the said affair, and which, if need be, is offered to be proved. And for further clearing hereof, if this Article shall be further insisted on, my Lord Advocate will be pleased to condescend to declare who the Parties were that made the motion for addresses to his Majesty, of whom the defender should have been afraid, if he had been of a contrary judgment, to have opposed openly. For if the defender had so great sway in affairs, as all along the preceding Articles he is allowed to have had; and also if he had intended, (as is broadly and with foul mouth alledged) in the said Libel all along alledged, to have extirpated and evacuated the King's Majesty's authority, government and posterity; and had such correspondence with those abominable Regicides, as all are persuaded by the said libel to believe, in the said year of God, 1649; when the said traitors were strong, and both this land through divisions and otherwise, very low; and when the power was in the defender's and his complices hands, (as my Lord Advocate is pleased to libel and term them) who at that time had the managing of affairs: then was the fittest time and best opportunity, if they had any such disloyal thoughts, to have shaken off that Government. But so far did they abhor any such treachery, that they not only proclaimed his Majesty, and according to their duty owned his interest, even with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, there being none so shallow, but easily might have seen, that the discharge of the said duty would bring upon themselves and the Nation the power of England, (the only power of arms and armies being at that time in the abominable Regicides their hands) who did immediately thereafter invade this Kingdom.

As to the other member of the tenth Article; whereby it is libelled, That the defender, (to obstruct his Majesty's purpose, yea, in so far as in him lay, and to terrify him therefrom; by his and his complices cruelty executed upon the Marquis of Montrose, who as his Majesty's Commissioner did represent his Majesty's person) caused to murder the said Marquis, in anno 1650, in manner, &c.

1. It is no way relevantly libelled, that the defender in general caused to murder him, except if were condescended, quo modo he caused; and if thereby be meant his voicing in Parliament, 1649, in the said matter; non relevat, because a Vote, Act, or Sentence of Parliament, is no way relevant to infer a crime against any particular member therein, as hath been oft before alledged.

Likewise, 2. The sentence of the forfeiture of the life and estate of the said Marquis, was no decree of the Parliament 1649, but of the Parliament 1645, which was homologate by several other Acts of Parliament, excepting the said Marquis among other excepted persons, as specially by and by the 22d Act of the Parliament 1648.

And yet, 3. the Defender did not vote in the business of Montross, as he can prove, if need be, by the members there present 1649. And as to the aggravations of the said murder, the said Marquis being his Majesty's Commissioner for the time; it is no way a relevant circumstance to aggravate the same, except it had been libelled, that the said commission had been shown to the Parliament, which no body can affirm; but on the contrary, the said Parliament conceived they had just reason to presume that there could be no such commission for his coming against them at that time; because his Majesty, after the murder of his royal father, very graciously had admitted their gracious applications to him.

Like as before Montross's coming at that time to Scotland, and always thereafter, his Majesty had a Committee of the said Parliament, under the name and title of the Committee of Estates of his Majesty's Kingdom of Scotland.

As to the Defender, his alledged keeping correspondence with Cromwell in the year 1650, as the same is irrelevantly libelled, no deeds nor acts of correspondence being condescended on; so there was never any such thing. And there was one named Hamilton, who vented this untruth, hanged at Sterling, and at his death did declare, That the same was a most unjust calumny; and it is not to be believed that at that time he would have charged his soul with a Lye; and in Law, the words of a dying man are oraculously believed.

As to the Act of the West-Kirk, the Defender (no ways acknowledging the relevancy of the said article, as it is libelled) was so free from having the least accession to the said Act or Declaration; that so soon as he got knowledge thereof, to evidence his fidelity to his Majesty, it is offered to be proved by witnesses (for their loyalty above all exception) that when the first news came, that the Commissioners were about the drawing of the said Act, the Defender gave advice to his Majesty, to draw a fair Declaration, and to go such a length, as in freedom he could, that thereby he might prevent the said Act, and obviate the pressing thereof. But as for the other that was pressed, he was altogether against the same, and dealt with the Minister who came from the Commissioners of the Kirk, to forbear pressing his Majesty therewith; which also, if need were, might be proved.

As to the eleventh article and subsequent articles, because the same are for deeds of compliance after the Usurpers had prevailed and were in possession; before the Defender make particular answer, it is necessary to premise in general, that it being notoriously known to the world, (to the eternal honour of this Kingdom) as for that damnable usurpation of Oliver, not only we were not active in establishing the same, but according to our bound allegiance to our Sovereign, were to the utmost possibility of our power in arms under his Majesty; and other ways active against him, and in opposition thereto, many lost their estates, many their lives, and all of us our liberties: and when we could do no more, being oppressed by the force of the said Usurper,

(as a chaste forced Virgin) we cried to God and Man, attesting Heaven and Earth against Usurpers, (even when their bloody swords were at our throats) he and his army, amongst many other execrable mischiefs, were also guilty of this usurpation. We have suffered, and been only passive under that irresistible force. And as this was the condition of the Kingdom, so specially the Defender, who as he had been most active and instrumental in his Majesty's home-bringing, (which was the only ground of the quarrel, and for which he was looked upon by them as one of their capital enemies) even so after it pleased God for our exercise and punishment, to suffer their power to prevail over all his Majesty's forces and over this Kingdom, such aversion had the Defender, even so much as to live under their power; much less to comply actively with them; that after Worcester fight, the Defender offered to Mr. David Dick, if he could get his company, or the company of any other honest Minister, that he would never capitulate with any Englishman, so long as he could subsist in any part of Scotland, either in his lands or isles thereupon. It is humbly craved that Mr. David Dick may be examined. Neither did the Defender ever capitulate with them, in August 1652; having before that, endeavoured all that in him lay, to have persuaded those of Athol, Monteith, and others, his neighbours in the Highlands, to have concurred with him, that they might have jointly made some probable force, for resisting the over-spreading power of the Usurper; but all in vain. Likewise, long before that time, the whole forces and strength of the Kingdom were surrendered, yea, the whole Kingdom, by their Deputies and Representatives, (who met at Dalkeith, with the Commissioners of the Parliament of England, so called) was forced to submit to their power, and accept the tender of the Union of this Nation with England, proffered by them. Neither did he at the said time in August 1652, voluntarily come in, and capitulate with the said English; but was surprized, (several Regiments of their forces, horse and foot, having suddenly come about his house, where he was for the time, lying deadly sick) as can be testified by Dr. Cunningham, who was with him for the time, and is humbly craved to be examined thereon. As also, notwithstanding the said surprizal, and the Defender's condition, though they threatned, (notwithstanding his sickness) to carry him away prisoner, yet all their threatning could not prevail with him, but he did absolutely refuse to subscribe the articles first offered, which contained the tender of the union, and an obligation upon his part, to promote the same, and the Government as then established, and to live peaceably; yea, such jealousy had they of the Defender, that by his capitulation, he was prisoner upon demand. Neither during all the time of their power over this Kingdom, had he ever any favour of the said English, but was always look'd upon by them with a most jealous eye. And for evidencing hereof, the Defender humbly craves, that there be a commission granted for examining of Lieutenant-Colonel Utter, (anent what was deposed by Macnabhan, and several others) viz. of the Defender's small affection to the English, or any other authority but the King's. Likewise, it is notorious how unjustly he was persecuted before the Exchequer here for the time, for payment of 4000 l. Sterling, alledged to be due for by-gone feu duties. This being the Defender's true case, it is hoped, that that the honourable Court of Parliament, will take consideration how the Defender stood out as long as he could, till he was prisoner; and will have a different consideration of Subjects acting under the lawful Magistrate in exercise of his authority by himself, or others lawfully constituted by him; and of the actions under cruel usurpation and tyranny, the lawful Magistrate being forced, for his own safety, to abandon his Dominions and People to the lust and oppression of the unjust Usurper (who was master not only of their fortunes and persons, but their lives and all that was dear to them;) and had for a long time detained the possession of his unjust usurpation, and devoured the lawful Magistrate. Which case is not only differenced by all who write on that subject, but also Coke in the third part of the Institutes of the Laws of England, cap. 10. anent Treason, in expounding the Statute of the 25 Edw. III. upon the words of the Statute le Roy, puts such a weight upon the King's being in possession, or one of the same, that he expressly affirms, the Statute is to be understood of a King regnant, and in possession of the Crown and Kingdom; as also, that in such cases, a favourable consideration is to be had of the actions of a subject, who was particularly noticed, and jealously looked upon by the Usurper, for his affection to the lawful Magistrate and his Government. All which being remitted to the Commissioner his Grace, and the honourable Parliament their consideration, he now comes to answer to the eleventh article: against which eleventh article, and all the members thereof, as libelled, it is alledged, the said article is general, not condescending on the day or month, nor on the particular year of God, of the committing of the deeds therein libelled, but only alternative in anno 1653, or 1654, and therefore (as has been oft before alledged), the same is inept, and there can be no process thereon. 2. It is not condescended on, nor cleared, which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on in the proposition, this article, and several members thereof, are subsumed; and therefore it is obscure and general, and in that incertitude the Defender has reason to deny, that it can be subsumed on any of the said Acts, to infer the said crime and pain.

As to that which is first libelled in this article, That the Defender did not rise in arms with the Commissioner his Grace, and the Earl of Glencairn, who were commissioned by his Majesty; the Defender repeats the two exceptions aforesaid, against the whole article, being confident this cannot be subsumed on none of the Acts libelled on. And further alledges, that it is not relevantly libelled, to infer (vel minimam culpam) against the Defender, far less so high a crime, except it were libelled, that your Lordship's commission had been shewed him, and he required, which was never done. And herein he may refer himself to the Commissioner his Grace's Declaration; and if his Grace does not remember, that the Defender sent him word, shewing his desire to have met with his Grace, and to have spoke with him about the business; but had never the honour to have his Grace's answer or appointment.

2. For further clearing, that his not joining, except he had been required, is no crime, it is evident from the fourth Act of the first Parliament, Jac. I. that those only are punishable, who do not assist the King's host, being required thereto. And Craig, pag. 365, says, that because the King has so many Vassals, they are not obliged, nor cannot be punished; except the particular pain to be inflicted upon the away-stayer, be particularly express'd in the edict, by which they are commanded to appear. And page 365, he says, that those who come not, being warned by an edict, shall be punished; and page 370, he says, that the Vassals should not be obliged to appear at any such services, except they be desired; which commands shall be proved by his Peers. These edicts were particularly required by the fundamental Law, and were called beri bona, which is defined by Cujas, to be the calling and citation of the army, and is lib. 3. cap. 10. quart. leg. franc. to be the punishment of him who comes not to the King's host, when he is called: and this assertion is clearly proved from Rague, in his Treatise de Jur. Reg. pag. 53. Likewise by the said Act of the first Parliament of King James I. it is expressly ordained, that those who disobey to defend the King against notorious Rebels shall be challenged:

1. If they be required by the King, as is said;

2. And except they have for themselves reasonable excuses. But sure it is, the Defender not only was never required, as has been alledged, but there were even pregnant reasons, as he humbly conceives, the which seemed very probable at that time. Albeit it be the duty of all his Majesty's Subjects, to rise for his Majesty's Interest, in opposition to Usurpers; yet it was not seasonable, as affairs then stood, till either they had been defeated by sea in the engagement, that they then had with Holland, (whereby both the forces might have been diverted, and the transportation of Victuals and Ammunition from England, Ireland, and the parts of Scotland under their command, and their army in Scotland, might have been intercluded;) or that Spain and France had concluded that peace, whereof there was then several reports: and thereupon his Majesty's subjects in Scotland, might have had hopes of some probable assistance in the undertakings in his Majesty's service; or that division, and in consequence, confusion, had fallen out in the English army amongst themselves; whereof there seemed to be but little hope, so long as the appearance for his Majesty should meet them as against a common enemy, as it was. Like as it would be thought it should have no other effect; and as in effect the event proved, that that army never divided till they had no common enemy, against whom, mutual preservation doth necessitate a mutual concurrence, but all at amity one with another. And albeit a particular command had not been absolutely necessary, (if his Majesty had been there in person) yet in a juncture of time, wherein such a war was improbable for many state reasons (which induces the Defender to believe, that there was no commission granted at that time) which presumptions excusant à dolo; and without dolo (as has been said formerly) there can be no crime. And though he had been required, yet could not have been punished for his not obeying, seeing in effect he was the enemies prisoner upon demand.

But this is conceived only to be libelled as an aggravation of what followed, which is, That he joined in open hostility with the Usurper's forces, especially with the Colonels Overton and Twisleton, at the least Cobbet and Twisleton, at the least Twisleton, when he was in the Higblands, and in opposition to the said Earls.

It is answered, 1. This member is general, not condescending upon the particular deeds of hostility, and therefore inept; for criminal libelling ought to be most clear, as is affirmed by Dambaud, cap. 30. prax. coron. num. 4. and should contain all the qualities of the crime alledged committed. And as to the alternative, that he joined with one or other of them, it is most lax and obscure, and therefore in that also this Dittay is inept. And for the alternative added (at the least he gave counsel) non relevat (because general) except the counsel were condescended on, and that it were such as might fall under the Acts libelled on; and the most that can be alledged, if the time were condescended on of his alledged joining, is, that he was in company (it may be) with Twisleton; and if it was, he was only going along with him to General Monk (being sent for by him, and that when the Earl of Glencairn was under treaty with him; if not after the treaty was concluded, which he conceives will not be denied) and the Defender being their prisoner upon demand, by his capitulation with Major-General Dean.

It is alledged first, that a prisoner should go in company (being commanded) with, and to those whose prisoner he is, is nothing like a crime.

2. Though that had not been, yet he alledges in answer to that member of the alternative, anent his furnishing of several pieces of great cannon to Alured, Governor of Air, viz. That the Defender and all that was his, or in his possession, being under the absolute power of the Uurper; they might command him to go, or call him where they would, with whom to go along, or to bring whatever he had to them, had it been on his back, had he been able to carry it: and that cannot be imputed to him for any crime (otherwise who should be innocent) when subdued; must they not give to their enemy of their goods, whatever he will have? And who in Scotland should be innocent? Behoved not all to bring them; that is, in effect, did they not take what they pleased? but as for voluntary going, or joining in action with Twisleton, or any of the others named in their service, the Defender absolutely denies the same.

Item, For his taking and relieving prisoners, non relevat, except the prisoner was specially condescended on: specially relieving of prisoners, is not relevant to infer any crime, but on the contrary is a good office to the persons and parties; except it is libelled that he, as an Officer under the English service, took and relieved prisoners, which can never be made appear, whatever the same might import. But the truth is, the Defender meddled with no such things; and the Defender shall truly relate the point of fact which he conceives hereby to be meant, which is as follows: The Defender hearing that his Isle and County of Roisnaitb was pillaged, and going up the river Clydde, the boat wherein he was being followed by another boat; and the Defender having asked what they were, they alledged they did belong to the Earl of Glencairn, but could shew no warrant; and thereupon the Defender having some suspicion that they were rather robbers, than soldiers belonging to the Earl; and fearing that General Monk, whom the Defender was then going to, and whom he had never seen till that time, might get notice thereof, and make use of the same as a snare; the Defender advised them to secure their money and arms in the hands of one of his servants, upon assurance that the same should be delivered to them, after he should be certified what they were; and thereafter recommended them (fearing to incur the danger of a private prison) to the Garrison of Dumbarton, not under the notion of soldiers under the Earl of Glencairn, but as common Delinquents for injury done to the Country. And at his return after a few days (being tender that they should incur no danger) procured their releasement, and their names were never enrolled as prisoners to be exchanged; and according to his promise, he caused to be re-delivered their money and arms.

As to the following member of that article, viz. That the Defender took pay from the Uurpers, for a company of Scots under them, and in their service:

Adhering to the several exceptions against the relevancy of the propositions of the Dittay, and exceptions against this whole article, in the beginning of the answer thereto; specially that it is not condescended, under which of the Acts libelled on, this member is subsumed, till which be done, the Defender has reason to deny that it falls under any of them. Neither is it relevantly libelled, to infer any crime, unless it had been libelled, that the Defender, having commission for that pretended company for the English service at that time, had levied that company, or enrolled their names as a formed company, under the English and their Regiments, and engaged them to the Commonwealth and their service; because these are required in a soldier in any service.

1. That he be relatus in numeros, that is to say, inrolled, per lex eod. 42. Y. de Test. milit.

2. Ut præstet Sacramentum, that is, that they gave the oath, ex milit. 11. F. eod. & Veget. 2. cap. 6. or that the Defender had employed them in the English military service, or in execution of their orders, all which the Defender absolutely denies; they never having been inrolled, given any oath or engagement, or employed in their service, as is said.

But on the contrary, and the truth is, there used to be in the said shire, and all other places in the Higblands in broken times, watches to keep off depredations, masterful reifs, and other oppressions amongst the country people themselves and their neighbours in such times. And accordingly, in the year of God 1653, or thereabout, the shire of Argyle not being able to entertain their watch, and pay cess also (not being as yet well planted after the burning) General Monk was prevailed with, to help to entertain the said watch (like as at the same time, also several other shires bordering upon the Higblands, as Inverness, Pertbshire, Aberdeenshire, Sterling, Dumbarton, all of them had watches at the said times, and allowance therefore from General Monk) who within two months did withdraw the said allowance from the said watch of Argyleshire, because they refused to engage against those that were then in the hills, under the Defender's son and others, whom the said General Monk also alledged they favoured; and thereupon withdrew his help and allowance for the said watch, and spake of the Defender what his Grace pleased.

And to evince that this was nothing but a watch, the men were not in a formed company, but several Gentlemen in the shire had the ordering of several numbers of them at convenient and needful places of the shire, with proportionable entertainment, and without subordination as ordinary soldiers; all which is notorious, and, if need be, the Defender offers to prove. And the Duke of Albemarle it is hoped will remember, how much offended he he was, that the Defender would not engage the said watch, against the said Lord Lorne and his parties; and what prejudice he did still entertain against the Defender upon the said publick account. As also Colonel Robert Lilburn, when the Lord Lorne and Kenmure went to Kentyre, in the year 1653, the said Lilburn, immediately upon the notice thereof, having come with a considerable party of the English army to Dumbarton; and sent to the Defender to meet him, and to go along with him in Argyle towards Kentyre; if the said Colonel does not know and perfectly remember, that the Defender shunned the meeting, and would not go; whereupon he returned back with the forces, after he was at the length of Lochlomond; whereupon the Defender humbly craves that he may be urged to declare. As also that the Countess of Balcarras may be examined, if the Defender did not assist her and her husband, in their passage through Argyleshire, as they were going to a meeting at Finlarig, for the business in the hills, in the year 1653. Neither can it be alledged, that the Defender or any of his people did the least prejudice to any person or party that professed to be for his Majesty's service; albeit if he had been so disposed, he had and might have had several opportunities to have done the same.

As for the member following, That the Defender called the actions of his Majesty's forces against the Usurper, rebellion:

It is most general, neither condescending on time nor place, and therefore irrelevant and inept; but when condescended on, he nothing doubts, but that it shall appear he spoke no such things, nor had he ever any such construction thereof.

As to the last deed in the said article, That the Defender in anno 1654, took upon him power to bring off such as were in that service, and to give remissions thereof, and particularly to John Macdowgall:

It is general, neither condescended on time nor person brought off, and therefore inept, and irrelevant. And if it be meant only of the person named, viz. John Macdowgall of Dumolich; it will never be made out that he was in that service, when the Commissioner his Grace and the Earl of Glencairn were in the field; nor that ever there was a remission granted by the Defender to him, or any other, in relation to that service.

As to the twelfth article and first member thereof, anent the Defender's countenancing and assisting, by his personal presence, the tyrannical and treasonable Proclamation of Richard the Usurper and Protector of his Majesty's dominions, at the Market-Cross of Edinburgh, and Dumbarton.

The Defender is so notoriously innocent of this member of the article, that he might with much confidence (in place of all other defence) simply deny it. But he will do no more for defence and clearing of his innocency, than where he is to propound his defence of alibi, that there month and day must be condescended on, whereof none is condescended on in this member of the article; and till this be condescended on, it is inept, and the Defender ought to be assailed therefrom. But the days of the said Proclamation at Edinburgh and Dumbarton, being condescended on; the Defender offers him to prove, that during these days he was alibi, and neither at the city of Edinburgh nor Dumbarton all these days.

As to the second member, anent the Defender's procuring himself elected a Commissioner for the shire of Aberdeen; and accepting a Commission from them, to Richard's pretended Parliament, and sitting and voting therein, as a Member of his pretended House of Commons:

That the English usurpation was one of the most horrid usurpations that ever has been in Europe, against all divine and human Law, against the most uncontroverted right of the most illustrious of Kings, our dread Sovereign, and his most Royal Father of eternal glorious memory, which none of common sense or honesty will controvert. Next, the said Usurpers having nothing but an unparalleled, unjust detention of that power, whereunto no manner of way they had the least right to, or any title whatsoever; but in place of a title, armed violence and force: the only mean (for title they had none) whereby they both de facto attained, and violently detained that possession unjustly, of that power whereof the only right was, and possession ought to have been our dread Sovereign's: Whosoever by arms, counsel or otherways, aided or abetted that armed force, in establishing de facto, of the power in the persons of the monsters of men, and so in setting up of that abominable usurpation; that he is guilty of the highest Treason, is heartily acknowledged. But the Usurpers having treasonably thrust their and our Sovereign, his Majesty, from all possession of his just right, and having taken upon them the supreme power; and being possess'd (though most unjustly) yet most peaceably therein, and keeping the same by force, as they had taken it; the case then became most singular, as to what the poor oppressed subjects under their force might do, hoc rerum statu posito, in this state of affairs, wherein the Usurper had treasonably put them. Lucklama, a most acute Juris Consult. Ecclæg. 6. membran. in L. 3. de Officiis prætorum observes learnedly, that Distinctio fieri debet inter personam ejus qui Magistratum gerit (cum tamen jus ad Magistratum non habeat) & ipsum Magistratum quem gesserit; persona enim ejus est privata, hic publicus; & in publicis non tanta personæ quam utilitatis hic publicæ habenda est ratio, ut enim tutela, ait Cicero, p. 1. Offic. Sic procurato rei-pub. ad utilitatem eorum qui commissi sunt, non ad eorum quibus commissæ gerenda est, & sapientes definiunt nihil aliud esse imperium nisi curam rei aliene, ut ait Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 29. that is, ipsius rei-pub. So Lucklama distinguishes betwixt the person of him who unjustly de facto attains the Magistracy (whose person is still but in effect private, and in the case of usurpation, a Traitor) and the Magistracy which he carries, which is publick.

Likewise, it should be distinguished betwixt Acts concurring with the Usurper, transferring de facto in his person the power he usurps, (which are treasonable against the lawful Sovereign) and acts, whereby the oppressed subjects make use of the power now usurped; wherein the utility, not of the Usurper, but of the subjects, is respected, as Lucklama observes, ubi sup. And then Grotius, lib. 1. de Jure belli & pacis, cap. 4. num. 15. speaking of an unjust invader, while his possession remains unjust, says, the act of power is binding for the good of the Commonwealth; and because it is probable the lawful Governour's will is, rather the Usurper's command should be obeyed, or take effect, than that Laws and Judgments should fall in confusion in their terms; Restat ut de invasore imperii videamus nunc postquam longa possessione vel pacto jus nactus est, sed quam diu durat in jussæ possidendæ possidendæ causa, & quidem dum possidet actus imperii quos exercet vim habere possunt obligandi, non ex ipsius jure, quod nullum, sed ex eo quod omnino probabile sit, eum qui jus imperandi habet sive est Populus ipse, sive Rex, sive Senatus, se mal'e interim rata esse quæ imperat quam legibus sub tali summam induci confusionem. And Lessius, who is one of the Authors Grotius cites upon the place, says, in the place cited, viz. Lib. 2. de Justitia & Jure, cap. 29. dub. 9. F. 37. That Tyranni usurpatione potestatis mandatis obtemperandum propter bonum commune; which is, that the Tyrant and Usurper is to be obeyed, even from the law of nature, for the publick good, in such a state of affairs; and adds, alioqui omnia essent plena latrocinii & furtis; that is, all would be full of robberies, thefts and confusion, in that state of affairs, because of the Usurper's force, the use of no other Government can be had. So that the necessity of the benefit of Government for the good of the subjects or common-wealth, especially in what relates ad reipublicæ statum, in things necessary for the standing of the common-wealth, or to evite the ruin thereof; and the interpretative and presumed consent thereupon of the Prince, who has the right to the authority which the Usurper has usurped, but is excluded by the Usurper from benefiting the subjects by it himself for the time, are the two grounds whereupon the making use of the power now in the hands of the Usurper is founded, as is said. Whereupon it is subsumed, that in our case, the Invader and Usurper Oliver having violently taken upon him the power, after he had put his and our Sovereign from the possession thereof, oppress'd by his armed force this Nation, and amongst others the defender; and Oliver having kept the possession all his time, and Richard continuing the same, the benefit of that power, which now he had usurped, and whereof he was in possession, was, as always it is, so necessary for the standing of the common-wealth, that without it men become but as fish in the sea, the lesser a prey to the oppression of the great: but especially, the said Richard having called a pretended Parliament, and commanded the Shires to send Commissioners thereto. Meetings and Representatives of the Nation, as they are of great use at any time, for treating common affairs of common consent, so transcendently at that time, for moderating the arbitrary tyranny of a Usurper; and that not being able to expugn his force, they might by strength of common-counsel, overcome and persuade his reason to things absolutely necessary for the subsistence, at least for the preventing the ruin of the whole body of the Kingdom, and of his Majesty's Lieges therein: as was the stopping that miserable union, which the defender knew that it would be, as it had been before, at even other Parliaments, so, at that, strongly attempted, as indeed thereafter it was. Which union was that Vorax wherein our Religion, our ancient Government, monarchick in his Majesty's person and family, and the interest of the nobility and our liberties, were wholly swallowed up; and under pretext of being united, we were really enslaved to that pretended commonwealth. The easing, if they could not persuade him to the taking off of the maintenance and cesses, (which, upon Scotland, was sixtuple more than the proportion of England, and in itself so heavy, with the excise and other publick burthens, laid by the Usurper on it, that more was exacted in one month, than his Majesty's royal Predecessors would have imposed or taken of taxation for an age, so that the Country could not subsist under it;) as also taking off some of the forces under which we were kept in bondage, if that at least could have been obtained: The prevention of the alteration and change of our whole laws, which was vehemently threatned, yea, and in general, the confounding, and, dolo optimo, circumventing and defeating of the counsels, by which the event proved, it was more hopeful and easy to overcome that force, than by might or power. And as the liberty of the election of the members in England, at that time of Richard's Parliament, made it serviceable to his Majesty in it, and hopeful to all his Majesty's friends and loyal subjects, so was it no small encouragement to the defender to go there for the same end: And at the meeting in the Committee of Scots affairs, and several other meetings, when they were upon the debate of the said union, the defender, on purpose to stop the same, did propose, that there could be no union, except it were agreed, that we might enjoy our Religion in Scotland without alteration, as it was established by our own laws; and that we might be ruled and judged according to the same laws, and except our cesses were proportioned according to theirs in England. All which Concerns the defender knew would never be granted, and were indeed so utterly improbable at that time, that the proposition thereof was construed for no other end, than for the end aforesaid, to stop the said union: likewise it did so well succeed, as in effect it did obstruct it, as the several persons of quality that were present, can, and if need be will declare. And at that meeting, the actings and usurpation of the Usurper Oliver, and the oppressions of that army were of purpose much called in question, to make that Government and them odious, which accordingly happily followed; and such a breach and confusion amongst them was made, that their affairs thereafter could never come to any consistency, which made considerably and evidently a way to his Majesty's happy and glorious Restauration. To all which joining, that the call and command of the armed force has parentis necessitatem, a necessity of obeying lying upon persons under their power; it will follow from what is alledged out of these above-cited Authors, founded strongly on reason, the defender in that state of affairs had necessity and some obligation to go and essay what could be done by counsel, wisdom and prudence, since now there was no strength nor might left, effectuate for the standing; at least, to evite the ruin of the Country, in the particulars above mentioned, and others of that nature; at least, the defender, as all of us, was under their force; and for eviting of his own and the Country's ruin, habuit parentis necessitatem: and by consequence there was no design of treason therein, but by the contrary most loyal intentions, upon good ground of hope, and very probable appearance. And therefore it is hoped the Commissioner's Grace and the Estates of Parliament will not find this member relevant to infer so high a crime against the defender; hoc maxime attento, that beside publick ends, it was even a necessary self-preservative act; for the Defender had several other things of personal interest; as that they had ordained him to pay to them about 4000 l. sterling, for alledged feu duties, and in time coming so much, that both joined, he was not able to bear, and if need be, it is offered to be proved, and that he was most rigorously persecuted for the same; not only threatening to use real execution against his Estate, but also to imprison his person.

For eviting whereof, he was behoved to go at that time to London, and could not have his person secured from arrestments there, but by going in commission: And it is known that his Majesty is so gracious, as in not a few, to excuse what they did of that nature, to evite though but their own personal ruin, not imputing it to unfaithfulness in them at such a time; according to whose glorious and imitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the Commissioner's Grace and honourable Estates of Parliament will have a favourable construction of what the defender did in that particular, being necessitated thereto, both for publick and private interest; without any deceit or fraud, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for confirming the usurpation, or excluding his Majesty's interest.

Likewise it may appear, that it was only the course both of publick and private interests and necessities aforesaid, that moved the defender to go at that time; because, though he was desired oftentimes before to go, yet he still refused till then: He was one of the last that went to that, being the very last pretended Parliament under their power; not till long after that commissioners had gone for the Nation for several years, and that all had submitted to their constitutions, and were of necessity made use of as laws for the time.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the first, That because of the defendant's nobility, he was incapable to have been elected, at least might have refused:

It is answered, that it is notorious, nobility was not then respected at all, nor was any ground of excuse, the meetings to the elections being commanded to all, as heretofore (and so noblemen and others heretofore met promiscuously through all the Nation) as is notoriously to all known.

And whereas it is libelled, That he had not his residence within the Shire; it ought to be repelled as irrelevant, because it is true, and was known to the usurpers, and their ministers and underlings, that he had land within the said Shire, and that considerable. So that he could not decline the said employment without prejudice, the will and lust of the usurper at that time being uncontrollable, and tied to no rules of law or justice.

And whereas it is inferred, That sitting and voting in that pretended Parliament, he acknowledged his Majesty's power and interest to be in the Usurper's person: It is answered,

1. He acknowledged the same no otherwise but as all the Kingdom did, to-wit, de facto; for de facto the Usurper had taken or possess'd himself of the power; as his Majesty is pleased to speak of it in his proclamation anent commerce with Portugal; in October last, and had detained the same for a long time: But neither the defender, nor any other loyal subject, ever did, or will acknowledge, that de jure the same belonged to him, or that he had any just right or lawful title thereto: as also Lessius says in the above-written place, speaking of them that seek from Usurpers that use of Government; whereunto, he says, they are holden in and obliged, once taking on them the Government; (though sinfully and unlawfully) they seek the benefit of it, says he, not absolutely, but under a tacit condition; viz. if the usurpers will take upon them the Government: Petunt, says he, sub tacita quadam conditione, si velit se pro principe gerere; speaking of the Usurper. And that the Usurper would not give the use of the power he had taken upon him, but in the way he pleased, was his crime, which he continued during his usurpation. In respect of all which, it is humbly craved, that the defender may be absolved from the crime of treason, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly desired, that certain ministers and others above exception whom the defender shall condescend on, may be examined, if after his return from England, in anno 1658, he did not express with great joy his hopes, that business in England did tend toward his Majesty's advantage.

Item, That a commission be directed for examining Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and several other Englishmen above all exception; how the defender express'd himself in private anent his disaffection to that usurpation, during his being there the time of the said Parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

Item, That certain persons, upon whose names also he shall condescend, may be examin'd, if the defender to their certain knowledge, at the time of Sir George Booth's rising (which fell out immediately after the defender's return from the said Parliament) did not put himself out of the way, being informed that he was to be secured, and thereupon delay'd his journey to Calibness, and so be the readier to have laid hold of any opportunity that should have offered for his Majesty's service and restitution; that time being the most probable that ever offered after Worcester fight.

As for the precept of twelve thousand pound sterling, which is alledged the defender got from the Usurpers;

It is answered, The defender did indeed obtain a precept, but not as a reward of any service (which he never did, nor desired to deserve from them) but for what they had wrongfully intromitted with, of the half of the excise of wine and strong waters, whereunto the defender had right by Act of Parliament, before they had any power in Scotland.

And as to the thirteenth Article, first, for the whole Article, it is not consented on what Act of Parliament, the same consisting of three different members, is subsumed; and till it be condescended on, there can be no process thereupon.

And as to the first member thereof, anent the words alledged spoken at Innerary:

1. No time is condescended on, and therefore the libel in that part is inept for the reasons aforesaid, for which a criminal dittay ought to be special in the time, at least year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, he rebuked the ministers for praying for the King, in the words libelled, or some such like words; non relevat as to the ministers, except the persons were condescended on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, some such-like words; some such-like being most general, except the words were particularly libelled, alledged to be such-like where-by the defender might advise his defences, and alledge why they were not such-like, as he would if any words ever he spoke were condescended on.

For the truth is, he never spoke any such words: And was so far from rebuking any for praying for the King's Majesty, that after the defeat at Worcester (which is the general time libelled, wherein he should have rebuked the ministers for praying for the King) he himself caused continual praying for his Majesty both in his Parish-Church and Family, yea even in presence and audience of the English when they came there, though it was to his great hazard so to do.

As to the second member anent the words libelled and alledged to have been spoken by the defender at London, That he wondered how the people should be so mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never restore; or some such-like words:

First, This is also general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, condescended on.

Secondly, it is libelled, That it was in the presence of persons of quality, they ought to be condescended on.

Thirdly, In so far as it is libelled the defender said, The people were mad to call home his Majesty; it is general and inept, not condescending what people, and what was the occasion; if there was any motion made of calling home the King, whereupon that should have been spoken, and among whom it was. And Dambaud, cap. 30. prax. com. num. 4, and others, say, A criminal dittay should be most clear, and contain omnes criminis patrati qualitates, lib. 30. F. de accus. and Bart. and others, ibid. that it should contain all the qualities of crimes alledged to be committed.

Fourthly, Some such-like words non relevat, except the words were specially condescended on; which if they were, the defender would alledge and evince they were no wise such-like: for the truth is, he never spake any such words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his Majesty's happy restauration; as has been at length cleared before.

And was a very suspected person, in so far as in the year one thousand six hundred fifty-seven, Oliver was so jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to stay at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleased to express, were settled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the Lord Broughil and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty: Whereupon the defender desires the said Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he also desired at London. And not only was suspected, as odious to the English for his known affection thereunto, as is notorious, and has also before been express'd.

As to the third member of the said article, anent the alledged speech in Masterton's;

1. Neither the year nor month condescended on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept.

2. As to the first member thereof, That he would own any thing he had done;

First, It is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were specially condescended, and what time, year and month: It is an unparallell'd generality, and therefore till made special, no process thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common sense, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge; which is an expression of ingenuity, and no crime: And this being the received sense of owning, the word cannot be strained to any other sense; or if occasion should be taken so to do, and that another sense could be put on that expression, yet being more interpretatio capienda est, the most usual interpretation is to be taken, Perd. ea quæ S. I. 1. F. de reg. juris, as being both justest and safest by that law. And in ambiguous speeches, or such as may receive two senses, every man is the best expounder of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, per leg. in ambiguis F. de reg. juris, and other laws. But the sense aforesaid is so plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the said member, That if what he had owned or done were to do, he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that has been would have come:

1. As to what is alledged against the first part of this member, That this is exceedingly general as to the time and month he should have spoken it on.

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that time the things were done or owned to be done, or that the saying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were those things in particular that are understood, or may be subsumed under the general of all things that have come to pass; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have said, that notwithstanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel in this part of the member is also general, obscure and inept. And to evince the ineptitude of this generality, suppose the defender were thus indicted; You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Masterton's house; after your coming for London; were not that dittay without all controversy irrelevant? Then is it not also irrelevant to be indicted for owning in general that he had owned, or saying in general, that he would do that he had owned during that time, if that were to do again, without any farther particular condescendance?

Like as, 4. There is a very clear, obvious and benign sense these words may have, (if ever he spake, as he truly never remembers that he spake any such words) that if it had been possible that times could have returned, and actions to be done under the same circumstances and representations they had then, it is probable these same might be the defender's actions again, though he had known what had come thereafter, not having connexion with, or necessary dependance on these actings, each does not so much as import his present thoughts or approbation thereof, but is very consistent with a present disapprobation of the same. And is it not ordinary to say, that if such times were as have been, or such motives or circumstances of actions as have been, that it is very like I would be engaged in them as well as others, or as I have been myself; and yet to say with great consistence I ought not so to do, like as truly it is known, and if need be, is offered to be proved, that the defender, on the just contrary, had said to one of Cromwel's Counsellors, and to many other famous Gentlemen, that things had been done wherein he would would have been very far from engaging in, if he had seen what followed, which was the product of the corruption of evil men, that had abused what was well intended, for accomplishing of their wicked ends, and (till they brake forth and could not be resisted) unknown designs. And the defender hopes the sense aforesaid is very clear, and even though it were not so obvious, yet rapienda est occasio qua benignum præbit responsum, L. Rapiend. 168. F. de reg. juris: That is, any occasion should be even taken, as it were, though there were some violence done to the words, for a benign interpretation; and therefore by all means that interpretation of the words that may seem to infer a crime ought to be eschewed. Or if the word might be drawn to any other sense, yet in dubiis benigniora preferenda sunt, as has been said, in speeches dubious, the most benign sense is to be preferred, pret. semp. 56. F. de reg. juris; or where words are obscure, or may suffer two senses, the party's own interpretation is to be taken, as the best interpreter of his own mind; Per ea quæ ff. 1. F. de reg. juris. And odia sunt restringenda, favores ampleandi; what is odious, (as that which may infer a crime against any) should be restricted, and favour amplified; and in general, the Judge is always to be more inclined to absolve than condemn, and so consequently take the sense that may absolve, rather than that which may condemn, Leg. Corianus F. de oblig. & 47. ult.

5. The Doctors say, that voluntas & propositum delinquentis distinguunt facinora per legem expressam, leg. qui in jur. 53. F. de furtis in præ: that is, the will and purpose of him that commits a crime, distinguisheth it; but velleitas, or voluntas inefficax, as it is called, not a will, but a will, is no purpose to do, and can be the cause of no crime; especially being about things past, and qualified with an impossible condition, if things already done were to do, which is altogether impossible, that a deed done can return to have a new Being, and so to be done. And even there is some presumption of that mistake may be in this, from the place libelled, in which it is alledged to have been spoken, it being such as it is not improbable, that men may be very apt to fail both in judgment and memory, and so both wrong themselves and misconstrue others. And as for the aggravations that follow, that by speaking these words the defender took upon him by outward success, to give judgment upon the secret Counsel of the Almighty: 1. As it is in no wise true that the defender spoke any of the words libelled; so this does, as he humbly conceives, in no wise follow upon the words immediately going before, alledged spoken in Masterionne's, viz. That the defender owned what he had done, or would do the same if it were to do again; for that is not any judgment given of any hidden counsels of the Lord's, but an expression at most of his own actions. And as for the words before these, albeit he had been so presumptuous as to say them, as he blessed the Lord he never was, yet it is not libelled, that any thing that is therein alledged to have been spoken, either at Innerary or London, was spoken or inferred from providence and success. For the defender blesses the Lord, he has been otherwise taught, than to use, or rather to abuse so Turkish an argument; and which the Lord has by his Majesty's happy restoration so signally refuted.

VOL. VII.

And as to the last aggravation, that the defender thereby hardened others, such as otherwise were not ill disposed, in their wicked courses towards his Majesty; it is indeed a sad reflection upon others herein not called. However, 1. It is so general, both as to these others and their courses, that it cannot, and the defender hopes it shall have no weight; especially considering that, 2. The defender opposes his defences before alledged, against all the members of this Article; whereby it is clear, that as they are libelled, they can infer no such thing, in respect of all which the defender ought to be assailed also from this Article of the Dittay.

As to the last Article, 1. It is not condescended under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on, it is subsumed; and till then, it is ineptly libelled, and there can be no process thereupon. Moreover, the defender has the testimony of his own conscience, yea, and of an higher, that nothing libelled therein is true. Albeit if he had said, that the Usurper's hazard was great from his Majesty, and if his Majesty's designs took effect they were ruined, the same were notorious truths, and it ought to have been so; that is, it ought to be, and it was good, they were in hazard from his Majesty's designs: and it was most just that his Majesty's designs should take effect to their ruin. And what crime could be in so saying, he cannot apprehend; however, he never spoke any such words to Cromwell or Ireton, which Ireton he never saw with his eyes; and did far more abhor the least thought of giving counsel to challenge, or question his late Majesty upon his precious life; and his innocency shall rest confident, absolutely to deny the same.

And as to the last part of this Article, whereby it is libelled, that in anno 1649, in face of the Parliament then sitting, he told, that the Usurper Cromwell had told him, that England and Scotland would never be at peace till the King were put to death; the defender adheres, as to this part, to the general exception against all this Article.

That it is not condescended under which of the Acts of Parliament libelled on it is subsumed, till which be done, there can be no process; and if it be intended that it be subsumed under the 43d Act, 2 Parl. Jam. I. and the 134th Act, Parl. 1. and 10th Act and 10th Parl. and 205th Act, 14th Parl. K. Jam. 6. all these Acts, as both by their titles and tenours; and by Skeine in his Index on the words leasing-makers appears; and it seems by their conjunction in this libel, they are understood also therein of lying and slandering his Majesty and his Progenitors: and the words libelled, though very horrid, yet seem to be of another nature. And 2. to that Act 205, Parl. 14. Jam. 6. whereon only any thing can be subsumed against him for concealing and not apprehending; 1. It is general as to the time when Cromwell should have told it to him, and therefore inept till the time be condescended on, which must be; especially seeing, if it be not condescended on to have been after the engagement was broken, nothing can be subsumed on the said Act thereupon against the defender, nor on his not apprehending him; for he was not holden thereto by that Act expressly, except (according to Law) it had been in his power. But so it is, it is known, that at that time it was not in the power of the whole Kingdom to apprehend him, whether his victory or strength be considered, or the Kingdom's low and weak condition at that time, wherein they lay open to ruin by him, if the Lord had not restrained him more than their power could effectuate. And as to the concealing and not revealing, the defender ought to be assilized; because by the exprefs words of the Act, that revealing is declared to be such a revealing to some of his Majesty's privy council, or some under-officer, &c. as that there-through the authors of slanderous speeches may be called, tried, and punished: But that cannot be subsumed, except it were subsumed that the speeches were spoken before witness; otherwise could not have been proved, and without probation could not have been so urged, as that sentence could have been given thereupon, and the Author punished according to the words of the Act, which is also according to Common Law, and which is hereafter cleared. Like as if the words thereafter should have been found treasonable, and the defender not being found able to have proved them, he should have brought himself under the crime of treason, for accusing another of treason, and not being able to prove it, and therefore could not be holden so to do. As also albeit the defender had heard any such words as is libelled, (which he altogether denies) and that before witness, yet through his revealing thereof, the Author could not be tried or punished; for it is notoriously known, it was above the power of the Kingdoms at that time, as is said, or for many years thereafter, to punish him. And therefore the defender's not revealing cannot be subsumed upon the said Act of Parliament, to infer the pain contained therein, or related unto.

Lastly, the pains of the said Act, and other Acts before-mentioned together therewith, is not the pain of treason, as has been oft before evinced; and therefore the defender cannot be convened for treason, or the pain thereof, upon the said Acts, but ought to be assilized therefrom.

But if this member of this Article be intended to be subsumed under the last part of the proposition of the dittay, whereby it is alledged, that by Common Law and Practice of this Kingdom, all concealers and not revealers of any malicious purpose of putting violent hands on the sacred person of his Majesty, or purposing of killing and putting him to death, are guilty of treason; the defender protesting his innocence in never concealing any such purpose, nor the words aforesaid libelled, which he abhors, he is so far from justifying thereof, judging the horrid murder of his Majesty to have been the very ruin of our peace and happiness: Yet as to the relevancy of that part of the proposition, in so far as is founded upon Common Law and Practice only, the defender, because of the preparative, repeats what was before alledged in the answer to the proposition, in that part thereof: And adds further, In crimine lese Majestatis, in the crime of lese Majesty, Num sciens tractatum proditoris contra principem vel patriam, & illum non relevans, sit puniendus pena mortis; that is, whether he that knows a treaty about treason against his Prince and Country, be punishable by death. Clarus l. 5. S. fus. pract. crim. quest. 57. says, that many hold he is punishable by death: And that Cognol. in his lib. Culpa caret F. de reg. juris num. 2. that it is the common opinion, citing Alciat. in lib. tacere F. de verb. sig. & m. l. bona fide, num. 20. F. de poss. & in lib. 4. of Cato num. 30. F. de verb. oblig. related also by Gigas, de crimine lese majestatis fol. 180. num. 10. Roll. Conf. 88. num. 10. lib. 2. Carel. prac. crim.

fol. 253. num. 29. saith, that all others follow this opinion. And Baldus cries out in one certain counsel, that because Bartol held otherwise, therefore his soul for that, as a crime, is tormented in hell. Where it is clear, that even by Clarus's acknowledgement (which is very high treason) is not treason by the common opinion of the Doctors, according as is asserted by the famous Authors he cites, and whom he contradicts not therein. 2. And Clarus nothing contradicting, but this is the common opinion, albeit he be of another mind with Bartol, that it is capital to conceal, and not reveal, yet it is only in two cases, to wit, In tractatu qui fiat contra ejus personam vel statum; that is, where he has been conscious to, and known any treaty or consultation against the Prince's Estate or Person. But as for other causes, he holds expressly, that the concealer, and not revealer, is not punishable by death, in these words; In alijs autem casibus etsi sint comprehensi in crimine lese majestatis non putarem esse puniendum pena mortis subditum qui non revelaverit: And that he counsels Princes even in these cases, to use clemency and humanity, rather than severity; and to excuse their subjects upon any probable cause, from the pain of death. Whence, 3. It is alledged, even according to Clarus's opinion, concealing not relevant to infer the pain of death; except where the concealer has been conscious to, and heard some treaty, that is, deliberate consultation against the Prince or his Estate. But so it is, the words libelled, especially what is alledged to have been heard in Parliament, 1649, seems not to import that, being, as would appear, but volitantia verba, if any such thing had been heard, which the defender absolutely denies; and importing indeed the Author Cromwel's thought or opinion, that there would be troubles still so long as his Majesty, (borrendum dictum) were not put to death. But Clarus lib. 5. prax. crim. F. fin. num. 87. distinguishing betwixt cogitationem nudam, a naked thought, and tractatum, a treaty or consulting; he affirms, that a naked or sole thought is not punishable in any crime, no, not in Lese-Majesty, except only heresy, when guilt is perfected in the mind. And thereafter num. 2. he moves the question, Sed pone quis non steterit in meris terminis cogitationis, sed ulterius etiam processerit ad tractatum cum aliquo de ipso maleficio committendo. But, says he, put the case that any has not contained himself within the bounds of a thought, but has proceeded further to treat with any for committing the crime, &c. thereby making a clear difference betwixt a clear sole thought and a treaty, about committing the crime. Now the words, as they are libelled, do not import any treaty with any for committing that horrid murder; but the signification only of Cromwel's damnable thought, what might be the consequence of not taking the life of our dread Sovereign.

And hence, 3. It will follow, that these words cannot be subsumed relevantly, under that part of the proposition of the Libel; because that any sense these words seemed to have as they are libelled, would appear only to import his naked thought of what might be the consequence of taking the life of our then dread Sovereign, but no purpose of his to take the same. Neither could any presume, albeit his thought anent that consequence had been true, (as it is most contrary to the truth) that yet any man, in whom there had been the least sparkle of common reason, or conscience, would have purposed posed to commit, or committed one of the highest evils of sin, to evite, though very great evils of punishment, it being a received rule among men, at least among Christian men, that the least of the evils of sin should not be committed, to evite the greatest of the evils of punishment.

4. Gomez, a most excellent Lawyer, is clear in his third tom. variar. resolv. de crimine læsæ majestatis, num. 8. that concealing even of treason, is only then punishable, when the concealer might prove it otherwise; not per text. leg. nostris, in fine cap. de calumniat. & L. quæ accus. capite, cap. de edendo: whereby it is said, that whosoever counsels to accuse, should have his proofs ready, and who accuseth falsely shall be punished as the party accused would be, if the accusation were proved. Gomez citeth the canon law, Platia, Hippolatus, and others for their exception, which à fortiori holds in our law, whereby the 49th Act Parl. 11. Jam. VI. accusing any of treason, not being able to prove, so that the party accused be acquit, being so far reprobate by our law, that it is declared, that thereby the accuser shall incur the same crime of treason whereof he accused the other; is a sufficient warrant to the defender not to have revealed that of Cromwel, if there had been any such speech, as the defender never heard any such, except he had witness to have proved it; which neither is libelled, nor can be alledged, and therefore he ought also to be absolved therefrom.

5. All these laws anent concealing and not revealing, (as the defender humbly conceives) must be understood where the treason is privately plotted, and the execution thereof is carried on by secret conveyance, and which by revealing might be crushed and prevented. But it is notorious that the Usurper, as he had the power of armed force, so he had the unparalleled boldness to carry on his execrable treason most openly; and that his power was such, as it was impossible for his Majesty's poor subjects of this Kingdom to resist (nor yet his Majesty's other Kingdoms, though far more powerful, and that many thousands of them from their souls abhorred the said act) or prevent and impede the same. And if the defender had heard any such words of the Usurper (as he has just reason to deny he ever heard) whatever they should import; what probable reason might have been for not revealing it at that time, from the prevalency and power of that enemy, the condition of our poor Country, and utter impossibility to bring him to punishment, beside the want of probation: And so what place there were to Clarus's counsel of humanity, the defender leaves to the Commissioner's Grace, and the honourable Estates of Parliament to judge.

6. Whatever relevancy there were in the defender's concealing, yet his acknowledgement thereof in Parliament, 1649, as libelled, non relevat, to infer or prove it. 1. Because a confession that prejudgeth a party must be prejudicial, that is, In judicio, idque utroque jure & civili & canonico; as says Panormitan. C. ex parte decret. de confess. num. 16. that it must be in judgment in a process, wherein he who confesseth is convened, as is clear by Leg. 6. F. de confess. where the words are, Si dum quis convenitur, confiteatur; that is, If any be convened, confess, &c. and Panormitan. dicto loco saith, That to the end a confession may prejudice him, who confesseth, it must be among other requisites, super re litigiosa, that is, on any thing litigious, or any thing in dependance or process, per L. in confessionibus, F. de Interrog. ait; the words are, Confessionibus falsis respondentes, ita obligantur, si ejus nomine de quo quis interrogatus sit, cum aliquo sit actio; that is, any in making answer is obliged by false confessions, if there be any action or dependance against him, upon that whereupon he was interrogate and confessed: and Panormitan is express, ubi supra, That non valet confessio, facta coram Judice, tanquam in judicio, nisi Judex ad hoc sedeat, per Bartol. in lib. si confessus, F. de custod. reor. That is, a confession is not valid, though made before a Judge, as in judgment, except the Judge be sitting on that business. Whence it is clear, that the acknowledgment libelled is no ways relevant to infer against the defender what is libelled to have been thereby acknowledged, except it were libelled that he had been in judgment convened thereupon; or that there was a process depending against the said defender, wherein he had confessed what was libelled in judgment, and the Parliament had been sitting on that process. But so it is, that neither is it, nor can be libelled, and therefore his naked acknowledgment not relevant; and in effect, if in any discourse before the Parliament, any such word had escaped the defender, (which he in no wise acknowledges) yet that such a passing and indeliberate word should infer or prove a crime, or so high a crime against him, he is hopeful the honourable Court of Parliament will be very far from ever finding: For the very reason, why confession has so much weight, is because it is presumed that no man will confess against himself in Judgment, that whereupon he is convened and processed, without great deliberation: which holds not, if the acknowledgement be given out of any process, there being no dependant action or process upon the matter thereof. And therefore the defender is confident that he need not trouble the honourable Court with more legal dispute against the relevancy of the alledged acknowledgment.

7. The words or acknowledgment libelled as spoken in Parliament, 1649, can never be obtruded to the defender; nor that he was conscious to the Counsel of that horrid murder of his late Majesty: because it is notorious, and he offers to prove, if need be, that the whole members of the said Parliament, 1649, and he himself, amongst others, in plain Parliament, were purged by their solemn oaths of all knowledge of, or accession to that wicked design in relation to the King's Majesty and house of Parliament.

8. And yet he is so confident he never spake any such thing in Parliament, that the day being descended on, and dyet of sitting of Parliament, as by all doctors is agreed it ought to be, then the defender offers to prove his alibi: He offers to prove, (if need be) he was alibi all that dyet, and so not in Parliament, where he is alledged to have spoken these words. And yet that the defender's innocency, as to the accession or knowledge of that horrid murder, may yet further appear, it is known to many persons, and to some of the Members of this present Parliament, that when Cromwel was in Scotland, in anno 1650, notwithstanding it is known what malice he had to the defender at that time, in this particular he expressed himself concerning the Marquis of Argyle, That he thought him a man that had neither courage nor honour to have been upon
H h h 2 such

Such a business: And the defender thanks God he had so much honour and honesty, as in no wise to be accessory thereunto, and to abhor the same.

9. The defender ought to be affoizled from the two last Articles, as from all the other, from the year 1641, to his Majesty's coming home to Scotland, in anno 1650, because of the ratification and oblivion contained in his Majesty's treaty at Breda, and most full and ample Act of ratification and oblivion at St. Johnston and Sterling, anno 1650, and 1651.

And in regard the deeds libelled are either such as preceded the Treaty and Act of oblivion, in anno 1641, and were thereby pardoned and buried in oblivion; or such as intervened after the year 1641, before his Majesty's home-coming, in the year 1650, during which time he is in his libel charged with several deeds which are irrelevant, and whereof the defender is most innocent. And for such publick actings as the defender is charged with and had accession to, the defender is also secured and pardoned by his Majesty's treaty, and gracious condescendance at Breda, which was also thereafter ratified in Parliament; or are deeds of necessary compliance, both for the publick and self-preservation in that unhappy juncture. Which compliance, as it was fore against his inclination, if it had been in his power to have helped it, so it is not more than whole Kingdoms did, and far less than many condescended to: It is in all humility expected, that the defender should not be brought under the compass of law for the same, which were as to make him the singular sufferer in so universal a guilt; so there can be no precedent therefore instanced, either out of Scripture, or Holy Writ, the Histories of our own, or of other Nations, that a subject not having contributed to the said usurpation but to his power resisted the same, when the said unjust usurpation prevailed, expelled the lawful Magistrate, detained the unjust usurpation for many years, and tyrannized over the people when the lawful Magistrate could not rule for the time, or protect or help; that the said subject for his compliance, and using endeavours for necessary, publick, and self-preservation, should be indicted of so high a crime, is in all humility conceived without precedent or parallel, and quite contrary to the current of example and practice, that may be from Scripture and other Histories adduced, and not so suitable to that goodness and natural clemency, whereof his Majesty hath given so abundant proof to others, even the Usurpers and Invaders, and who aided and abetted them, without envy be it spoken; and which is not only most agreeable to his Majesty's gracious inclination, but very suitable to that advice given by his royal father to him; in whose words, in one section, there are as follows, Your Prerogative is best shewed and exercised, in remitting, rather than in exacting the rigour of the Law, than which nothing is worse. In respect whereof, and of the defences above-mentioned, the defender ought to be affoizled from this Libel, and the whole Articles therein contained.

See State-Trials, Vol. II. pag. 428, 429, 430, and 431. for Bp. Burnet's Account of the further Proceedings on this Trial; * and the Marquis's speech on the Scaffold.

* The Author of an Apologetical Relation of the particular Sufferings of the faithful Ministry and Professors of the Church of Scotland, since August, 1660, in pag. 78, 79, 80, 81, and 82. gives the following Account of the Proceedings against this Nobleman.

This his compliance with them, at that time, by sitting in their Judicatories, and their concurring with his advice and counsel, for the good of the land that was now under their feet, is the only particular ground upon which his sentence is founded; and the particular special cause pretended, for which he was condemned to lose his head as a Traitor, and to have his head put up on the top of the Toll-booth, as an eminent Traitor. A sentence, which questionable, at first view, may make all men of understanding astonished, and to wonder how ever it could have entered into the mind of the Parliament of Scotland, to sentence unto death such a Peer of the Land, such an useful Member of the Kingdom, and an Ornament; upon such a ground, and for such a cause. But if these four particulars be considered, the matter will yet appear more wonderful.

1. The matter of compliance with the English at that time, was so far from being accounted treasonable, that several of the Lawyers, (among whom was one Sir John Fletcher, who was now advanced to be his Majesty's Advocate, and did accuse this worthy Nobleman of Treason) did swear and subscribe an oath, to be faithful unto the Government, as it was then established, without King and House of Lords. Now if there had been treason really in this deed, either by the civil law, or by the municipal laws of the land, would not the lawyers have perceived it, whose daily work and study the laws are?

2. If this had been the deed of this nobleman alone, the matter had been less to have been wondered at; but it being such a deed whereof few of the Nobles of Scotland were altogether free, yea, whereof many of the Members of Parliament his Judges were guilty, the matter is beyond a parallel. It is hard to make socios criminis sit as Judges and condemn the accused, reason would require that the table should be purged. Is it not strange for a Parliament to condemn one for such a fault, for which many of their own Members might with as much justice and equity be condemned? And is it not strange, how they being by their own confession Traitors in the highest degree, could sit and judge others? It is true, it will be replied, That his Majesty might pardon whom he pleased: But then it will evidently appear, that not this, but something else was the cause of this worthy nobleman's death. Whatever may be said in point of law, yet it will be a dispute in point of conscience, If Kings may pardon such crimes as do deserve death by the law of God, or if such crimes which Kings may pardon, of their own accord, and according to their own good pleasure, do before the Lord deserve death?

3. If the Parliament had thought this particular worthy to bear so much stress, why would they have spent so much of their time in searching for other grounds to go upon? And why did they not make use of this at the first? But it is like this had never once been mentioned, if they had been able to fasten treason upon any other of his actions. And this makes it so much the more to be wondered at, that they would condemn such a nobleman for such a particular, which they would never once have named, if they could have done their intended work otherwise.

4. Is it not strange, that of all the compliers of Scotland, there was not one, except this nobleman, impannelled upon this account, much less put to death; yea, is it not strange that those noblemen were never once questioned, who being desired by General Monk, when he was entering England with his army to encounter Lambert, did abjure King Charles and his interest, and this nobleman must die? Yea, is it not yet more strange that one William Purves, who by complying had occasioned almost ruin to many noblemen, burghs and gentlemen, should have been absolved by Act of Parliament, (as might be cleared, if there were a table of the unprinted Acts set down after their Acts, as is done always in other Parliaments) and yet this nobleman must be sentenced to death, for complying for the good of the Country?

But to speak unto the business in point of law, let these four or five particular Quære's be considered, and then any shall be able to perceive the iniquity of this sentence.

1. By what Act of Parliament is such a deed as this condemned as treasonable? By what municipal law can any Member of the Kingdom be challenged upon the account of treason, for treating with a conqueror for life and liberty; and for sitting in his counsels for the good of the country, after that he, with the rest of the body of the land, had fought in the defence of King and Country till no more could be done; after the whole land had been overcome in several battles, and wholly over-run; and had acted nothing for the advantage of the enemy, and disadvantage of the King and Country, before the victory obtained; but in all points had carried as became a loyal subject, contributing all the help by arms and counsel which was required? What Act of Parliament declareth such a deed as this treasonable, and such a subject to deserve death as a Traitor?

2. Was

2. Was there ever such a Præfque in Scotland since ever there was a King in it? Several times was the Kingdom of Scotland over run by the Kingdom of England, particularly in the days of Baliol, and at that time King Edward caused the Nobles of Scotland to swear allegiance unto him. But when Bruce came to be King, was there any of the Nobles questioned for treason upon that account? And seeing there can no instance be produced out of the History of Scotland, since ever it was a Kingdom; that any subject, nobleman or other, was accused of high-treason, for such a cause, surely this nobleman's case was unparalleled'd.

3. Is not this strange, considering what the principle of Royalists is? They say, That Conquest giveth a just title to a crown; so sayeth D. Ferne, erniseus, and Maxwell, in his Sacro-Sancta Regum Majestas, cap. 17. And by this principle, Cromwel was the lawful supreme Governor of the Kingdom of Scotland, and had just title and right to the crown thereof, having now conquered the same. And if this principle of theirs be true (which is much questioned by their opposites) no compliance with him, could by any law in the world, be treason against any Prince whatsoever; for obedience unto, and concurrence with, a lawful supreme Magistrate, can be treason against no man living: How then could this nobleman be challenged upon the account of treason for compliance? Let all the Royalists answer this, without contradicting themselves, if they can.

4. Is there any lawyer who can produce such a definition of treason against a Prince, or a supreme Magistrate, out of the civil law, as will condemn the deed of this worthy nobleman, and make compliance with a Conqueror for the good and safety of the Country, after all means of Defence are broken and lost, an act of treason? And since the civil law can condemn no such deed as treasonable, the sentence given out against this nobleman, must be without all warrant of law.

5. Are there not many Countries, Kingdoms and Cities that have been over-run by their enemies, and have had their own lawful Governors put from them, and so have been forced to live under the feet of strangers? And hath it not been usual for them to comply with such as had the present power in their hand, for their own safety and the good of the place? And was it ever yet heard, that such were accused and condemned of treason against their own lawful Governors, thrust from them fore against their wills, for any such compliance? And is it not wonderful that this eminent nobleman should become a preparative to all the world?

XXIX. The Trial of the Lord MORLEY, for Murder, April 30, 1666. 18 Car. II. before the ~~House of Lords~~. Peers triers

MEMORANDUM*, That upon Saturday the 28th of April, 1666, Anno 18 Car. II. all the Judges of England, viz. myself, J. K. Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench; Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Matthew Hales, Chief-Baron of the Exchequer; my brother Atkins, brother Twisden, brother Tyrell, brother Turner, brother Browne, brother Windbam, brother Archer, brother Raynsford, and brother Morton, met together at Serjeant's-Inn in Fleet street; to consider of such things as might in point of Law, fall out in the Trial of the Lord Morley†; who was on the Monday to be tried by his Peers for a murder: and we did all una voce resolve several things following, par. 1. First it was agreed, that upon the letter of the Lord High-Steward directed to us, we were to attend at the Trial in our scarlet Robes, and the Chief-Judges in their Collars of SS, which I did accordingly. But my Lord Bridgman was absent, being suddenly taken with the Gout; the Chief-Baron had not his Collar of SS, having left it behind him in the Country; but we all were in scarlet, but no body then had a Collar of SS, but myself, for the reasons aforesaid.

2. It was resolved, that in case the Peers who are Triers, after the evidence given, and the Prisoner withdrawn, and they gone to consult of their verdict, should desire to speak with any of the Judges to have their opinion upon any point of Law, that if the Lord Steward spoke to us to go, we should go to them; but when the Lords asked us any question, we should not deliver any opinion, but let them know we were not to deliver any private opinion, without conference with the rest of the Judges, and that to be openly done in Court. And this notwithstanding the precedent in the case of the Earl of Castlehaven, was thought prudent in regard of ourselves, as well as for the avoiding suspicion, which might grow by private opinions, all resolutions of Judges being always done in publick.

3. Although we were not all agreed in the precedent of the Lord Dacres case, cited by Sir Edw. Coke, in the Pleas of the Crown, p. 29. & 30. that the Judges may deliver any opinion in open Court, in the absence of the Prisoner; yet it was agreed, that if the Lord Steward should, in open Court, demand any of our opinions in any thing, though in the absence of the Prisoner, we were to give answer to the question, the Lord High-Steward should demand of us; we being call'd to assist the Court, and the demand of any question in such case being referr'd to the discretion of the High-Steward.

4. It was resolved by us all, that in case any of the Witnesses which were examined before the Coroner, were dead or unable to travel, and oath made thereof, that then the examinations of such Witnesses, so dead or unable to travel, might be read; the Coroner first making oath that such examinations are the same which he took upon oath, without any addition or alteration whatsoever.

5. That in case oath should be made, that any Witness who had been examined by the Coroner, and was then absent, was detained by the means or procurement of the Prisoner, and the opinion of the Judges asked whether such examination might be read; we should answer, that if their Lordships were were satisfied by the evidence they had heard, that the Witness was detained by means or procurement of the Prisoner, then the examination might be read; but whether he was detained by the means or procurement of the Prisoner, was matter of fact, of which we were not Judges, but their Lordships.

* Kelyng's Reports, page 53.

† Vide Mom's Reports, 621. Resolved by all the Judges, that on a Trial by Peers, the Prisoner cannot challenge any of the Peers that are returned on his Jury.

6. Agreed, that if a Witness who was examined by the Coroner be absent, and oath is made that they have used all their endeavours to find him and cannot find him, that is not sufficient to authorize the reading of such examination.

7. Agreed, that no words, be they what they will, are in Law such a provocation, as if a man kill another for words only, will diminish the offence of killing a man, from murder to be manslaughter. As suppose one call another son of a whore, or give him the lye, and thereupon he to whom the words are given, kill the other, this is murder. But if upon ill words, both the parties suddenly fight, and one kill the other, this is but manslaughter, for it is a combat betwixt two upon a sudden heat, which is the legal description of manslaughter*: and we were all of opinion that the Statute of 1 Jac. for stabbing a man, not having first struck, nor having any weapon drawn, was only a declaration of the Common Law, and made to prevent the inconveniencies of Juries, who were apt to believe that to be a provocation to extenuate a murder, which in Law was not.

8. Agreed, that if upon words two men grow to anger, and afterwards they suppress that anger, and then fall into other discourses, or have other diversions for such a space of time as, in reasonable intendment, their heat might be cooled, and some time after they draw one upon another, and fight†, and one is killed, this is murder; because being attended with such circumstances as is reasonably supposed to be a deliberate act, and a premeditated revenge upon the first quarrel; but the circumstances of such an act being matter of fact, the Jury are Judges of those circumstances.

Per Senescallum,

THE Lord-Chancellor being then Lord-Steward, came from Worcester-house in his coach, having (besides his usual attendance) Sir John Eaton, his Majesty's chief Gentleman-Usher, carrying a white staff nine foot long; and Sir Edward Walker, Garter King at Arms in his Coat of Office, attending on him. And he was met at Westminster-ball-gate with five Maces more, who all went before him into the Court, where he took his place in a Chair of State; the five Maces placed themselves on each side of the State; and Serjeant Lee went into the body of the Court, and there laid down his Mace; and he supplied the place of Marshal or Crier of the Court. Sir John Eaton with the white Staff, and Sir Edward Walker stood at the lower-end of the State; Sir John Eaton on the right-hand of the Lord-Steward, and Sir Edward Walker on the left.

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, standing at the lower-end of the Court, with three obeisances coming up to the Lord-Steward, on his knee presented the Commission unto him.

Sir Thomas Fanshaw, Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench with the like reverence, came and received the Commission from the Lord-Steward, and returned to his place in the midst of the Court.

Serjeant Lee, after an O-yes, made Proclamation, viz. the Lord High-Steward of England, doth command all persons to keep silence, while his Majesty's Commission is reading.

Sir Thomas Fanshaw read the Commission.

Then Sir John Eaton and Sir Edward Walker carrying the white Staff between them, on the knee presented it to my Lord-Steward, and he delivered it it back to Sir John Eaton, who placed himself with it on the lower-end of the State, on the right-hand of the Lord-Steward, and Sir Edward Walker on the left, on a seat even with the body of the Court, having a space between them for the Lord-Steward to see the Prisoner; on which seat also sat the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and Mr. Kips, the Seal-bearer, the Seal being laid at the lower-end of the State before the Lord-Steward.

O-yes again, and Proclamation made; The Lord High-Steward of England doth command all persons whatsoever, except Peers, Privy-Counsellors, and Judges to be uncovered.

Serjeant Barcroft called to make return of the precept to him directed, who came into the body of the Court, and delivered it to Sir Thomas Fanshawe, and he read the return on the backside of the precept.

O-yes again, and the Lords required to answer to their names.

The Lords Triers called by the list, Mr. Waterhouse, assistant to Sir Thomas Fanshawe, reading their names, and Serjeant Lee calling.

John Lord Roberts, Keeper of the Privy-Seal.
Edward Earl of Manchester, Lord-Chamberlain.
Henry Lord Arlington, Secretary of State.

William Earl of Craven.	John Lord Fresbeville.

O-yes again, and the Lieutenant of the Tower called, to make return of his precept, and bring in his Prisoner.

The Prisoner brought to the Bar, and the precept delivered to Serjeant Lee, and by him to Sir Thomas Fanshawe, who read the return on the backside of the precept.

Then the Lord-Steward made a speech to the Prisoner, telling him the cause of his being brought thither.

The Indictment read by Sir Thomas Fanshawe, and the Plea made in the King's-Bench, where he had pleaded Not guilty, and put himself upon his peers.

Then the Lord-Steward made a speech (by way of charge) to the Peers.

O-yes, and Proclamation made; If any will give evidence for our sovereign Lord the King, against Thomas Lord Morley and Mounteagle, they shall be heard; the Prisoner stands at the Bar upon his deliverance.

Lord-Steward said, he heard the Lord Morley was lame, and therefore bid the Lieutenant of the Tower set a chair for him to ease himself.

Lord Morley desired to be heard, but the Lord-Steward told him, that it was usual to hear the evidence first, and after that he might and should be heard any thing he had to offer; whereupon he sat down.

Serjeant Glynn, the King's eldest Serjeant opened the Indictment, then Mr. Attorney-General Palmer.

Several Witnesses examined; the Prisoner asking them what questions he pleased.

Two Witnesses swore, that the Lord Morley run him into the head.

One Witness swore a former grudge*.

Another, that when he had run Mr. Hastings through the head, he swore God-damme, I promis'd thee this, and now I have given it thee. And that the quarrel begun at the Fleece-Tavern about an Half Crown, that the Lord Morley said, he had laid down.

Mr. Solicitor-General Finch desired the depositions of some Witnesses taken before the Coroner, (who were since dead) might be read; which the Prisoner opposed, desiring that no evidence might be given against him, but face to face.

The Lord-Steward demanded the opinion of the Judges, who by the Lord Chief-Justice Kelyng delivered their opinion; that upon proof made that the Witnesses were dead, and oath by the Coroner, that the depositions were unaltered, they ought to be read; which was done.

The depositions of three Witnesses read.

Serjeant Maynard desired, that the depositions of a material Witness taken at the Coroner's Inquest, (who had now absented himself, so that they could not find him) might be read.

The Prisoner opposed it, and the opinion of the Judges being required; the Lord Chief-Justice delivered the opinion, That if the Court upon any evidence were satisfied, the Witness was withdrawn by the procurement of the Prisoner, the deposition ought to be read, otherwise not. Whereupon Thomas Harding sworn, deposed, that Thomas Snell, his apprentice was lately run away from him, and that his fellows said, he told them, before he went away; that the Lord Morley's Trial was to be shortly, but he would not be there.

The Court not thinking this evidence sufficient, the deposition was not read.

Lord Morley desired some witnesses might be heard on his side, on his behalf, who were admitted, but not upon oath.

Lord Morley heard to say what he pleased for himself.

Mr. Solicitor summ'd up the evidence as follows, viz.

* Mr. Hastings and his brother had some time before met Lord Morley in the street, and grossly affronted him; whereupon Lord Morley complain'd to the House of Peers, who order'd them first into custody, and then committed them to the Tower, from whence they petitioned the Lords, who discharg'd them upon their entering into Recognizances for their good behaviour. Vide Lords Journals of that time.

April 30, 1666.

The Speech of Sir Heneage Finch, Knt. the King's Solicitor-General, at the Trial of the Lord Morley (the Earl of Clarendon, Lord-Chancellor, being then Lord High-Steward of England, pro tempore) who summ'd up the Evidence, &c.*

THAT a man is slain, is not denied by my Lord Morley: the manner how it came to pass, we have proved for the King. His Lordship hath endeavoured by his witnesses, to difference the case in some circumstances: the question will now be reduced to this; whether this fact be murder, as it is charg'd upon him in the Indictment, or any less offence than that; in which I see, my Lord Morley placeth his hopes, that it will fall. My Lord, because that this is a question of Law, arising from fact; I will, with your Grace's permission, and the favour of my Lords the Peers, presume in the first place, to lay down some principles, or conclusions in Law, wherein, I think, I am not deceived; and would be loth to prevaricate in a case of blood. And when I have laid down the conclusions, I shall proceed to apply them to the fact now in proof before you, and compare it to such a proof, as his Lordship hath produc'd. There are in Law but three cases imaginable, which are any way capable of excuse for the death of a man. These are, First, when a man kills another in his own defence. Second, when he doth it upon misadventure, and meer accident. Third, when he doth it in heat of passion, or any sudden adventure, (for that which is done in prosecution of Justice, hath no affinity with the present question). The two first of these do excuse à Toto, 'tis not so much as felony; the last à Tanto, 'tis felony, but within Clergy. But yet, my Lord, the Common Law, the antient Common Law of England, would not endure to hear of any excuse at all for the death of a man. By the antient Law, before the Statute of Marlbridge, he that killed a man in his own defence; and after that till the statute of Gloucester, he that had killed a man by the most innocent misfortune in the world (the glance of an arrow, or any thing else than that) must have died for it, as a murderer. For, murder is a sin so contrary to the genius and temper of the English nation, that whatsoever looks but like it, hath ever been prosecuted by our Law, by a most strict and speedy vengeance. When the Law began to let in some kind of excuses in these cases, yet they were circled in with as wary cautions and observations; and bound and limited with as nice distinctions and differences, as could be. And therefore, he that kills a man se defendendo, must not plead, that he did it so; but he must plead not guilty: for it is a maxim in the Law, that the death of a man can never be justified; nay, the Jury cannot find him to be se defendendo, but they must find the special fact, and leave it to the Court to judge, whether it were se defendendo, as in circumstances. For if the fact be so, that the man did not fly to the wall, or his last refuge, before he did give the mortal wound, he is a felon still. He that kills a man by accident, or misadventure, must take care, that the action he was about, were absolutely lawful and necessary too: for if there were an unnecessary meddling with edge-tools, or fire-arms; if there were unnecessary recreation in the act, which produc'd this event, he is responsible to the Law for the utmost consequence. And at this day, if a man that kills another in the city, escapes out of the city, the city is to be amerced for letting a notorious malefactor escape. Hitherto your Lordships see, that in these two cases, which are most pardonable of any, yet the Law is very severe; and therefore in cases of an higher nature, it is still more rigorous. Now because the hope of this case, is, that it will end in manslaughter, and because that manslaughter is only distinguished from murder, in that it is not designed, but otherwise, it is in itself an act as wilful and as violent, (though not so malicious) and so borders upon murder: I shall proceed to shew your Lordships how the Law watches upon manslaughter, with all the jealousies and circumspections imaginable; and therefore, it is an undoubted principle of Law (and all the men in England hold their lives upon very miserable terms, if it were otherwise) if any man shall meet a man in the street, and kill him without any visible provocation, the Law supposeth there was malice precedent, and judgeth this act murder. Secondly, as it is murder, to kill without any provocation, so if the provocation be slight and trivial, it is all one in Law, as if there were none. For the Law of England allows no man, to value himself at such a rate, as if the blood of his neighbour were a fit sacrifice to expiate every mean and slight affront. This was the case, that fell out in the time of the most reverend Chief-Justice, the Lord Popham: A Gentleman of Kent came by another, and made wry mouths and laugh'd, and made such signs as usually put men into passion; the other presently fell upon him and killed him; and my Lord Chief-Justice Popham and his brethren, deliver'd their opinions, that it was murder: for this was not a competent provocation, and the man was hang'd upon an appeal of murder. Thirdly, as no provocation makes it murder, and a slight one, is all one with none; so if the provocation be great and high, and such, as might be capable of excuse in itself, yet if a man be not slain in the very heat and bent of passion; if there be any interval of time, as a night's rest, and sleeping upon it, the Law knows no such period: but if there be such an interval, that the Law supposes the blood might, and ought to have been cool'd again; that a man might have come to himself, and then he falls on the person that gave him the provocation, that which was passion at the first, is malice at the last; and that which would have been manslaughter then, is murder now. This I submit to your Lordships judgments, who hear me now; and if I did not think the Law was clear in these points, I would not presume to affirm it in so great and solemn an assembly. To come to the matter of fact; I desire your Lordships to consider what Mr. Hastings hath done, and what he hath suffered. First, there appears to be so little of provocation, that the poor Gentleman, that is murder'd, offer'd any man five pound to tell him what the quarrel was. His Lordship makes his defence, that he hopes his Peers will consider, that there is no other provocation than the half crown. I am sorry for it. I am sure the the Laws of England, allow no man to take away another's life for half a crown, without being guilty of murder. The first thing that is said Mr. Hastings should do, is this : he is in a manner suspected, and hears my Lord quarrel about an half crown, and saith, I wonder a person of honour should make such ado about an half crown, and then throws down four half crowns upon the table to make satisfaction : presently swords are drawn, and Mr. Brommidge draws his first, and hectors it for my Lord : then they are put up again ; there is one interval, and recollection of time : My Lord proceeds to quarrel with Mr. Hastings, and calls his sins to remembrance ; and knowing that Mr. Hastings had been guilty of killing a man not long before, presently tells him, we come not here to stab folks ; which was a bitter reply. Mr. Hastings is grieved to see himself so openly reproached by my Lord, and could not chuse but tell him, he was a Gentleman, (and surely Hastings is a confest'd Gentleman, and a noble name in this Kingdom, and always must be) but at last goes a little farther, and saith, as good a Gentleman as my Lord. This is not comparable to laughing at my Lord, nor to making wry mouths ; and yet if Hastings had done this, and his Lordship had killed him for it, he had stood guilty of murder. Observe, I beseech your Lordships, how Mr. Hastings is treated, he is four times drawn upon, twice by Brommidge in the house ; in the street, Brommidge draws upon him again ; and just under the arch in Lincoln-Inn-fields he draws the fourth time. Now saith Mr. Hastings, I have no quarrel to you, Captain, if there be any, it must be disputed between me and my Lord. This is not such a speech to make a quarrel, but to prevent one ; what could a Gentleman do less, that found himself four times assaulted ? For if he would decline the quarrel, the best way was to put Brommidge out of the case, as a likely expedient ; when that would not do, to the field they come. And here, my Lord Morley hath produced some witnesses, who being not to be sworn, have said freely, that Mr. Hastings press'd Lord to fight, and saw him draw, and attack with the three on the other side. Street said, he resolved to fight my Lord ; and another, that my Lord said he would not fight. This they bring, to make my Lord Morley purely passive, and only drawn to fight. Under favour, we must submit to the judgment of your Grace, and your Lordships, his Peers. The thing, that is said here, is not probable. 'Tis plain, Mr. Hastings had said, he would give any man five pounds, that would tell him what the quarrel was : would he that knew no quarrel, have the blood of my Lord Morley ? But then, compare this with the witnesses, which we have brought, and sworn ; all three expressly say, they saw the fight, and the beginning of it. But with submission to your Grace, a fight it cannot be called ; in truth, it is a direct assassination : for three witnesses swore, there were two upon one all the while ; viz. upon Mr. Hastings. And Mr. Hastings being thus press'd, steps back to get a little ground ; then my Lord takes him at the advantage, and shortens his sword, and run him in the head. Now they that say, my Lord Morley went away first towards his own house, have forgot that he came back again and killed the man. I press this case upon the bare want of provocation, because the consequence is great in Law : I press it, as if the proof were to be set here, and no more were to be said ; and do presume to affirm, it is malice in the Law, and murder in his Lordship. But yet we shall not rest here ; but if we go a little farther, your Lordships will see, here is malice apparent, malice confest'd, and most evident. As soon as Mr. Hastings was slain, my Lord Morley, with a most desperate imprecation, throws the sword upon him, God damn-me, there you lie. Another swears his Lordship said, I have promised, and now you have it. Can your Lordships doubt now, whether my Lord killed Mr. Hastings with a deliberate hatred ? You see, he confesseth, it was in discharge of a promise ; and my Lord is to be believed against himself. And the brother of the Gentleman hath made a sad comment upon these words, and tells us, how the promise arose, and how it came to be perform'd. Mr. Hastings tells his brother, that he once had the unhappiness to have a quarrel with my Lord, many years ago, almost ten ; and that fighting with my Lord, he had the misfortune to give him an hurt ; and though the witness speaks only out of his brother's mouth, yet he testifies, that his brother told it him in the anguish of his spirit, as a secret that troubled him, and which he did not tell out of design, but by way of lamentation. And yet if Mr. Hastings had been found bleeding in the field, and been asked who kill'd him, and had said, my Lord Morley had slain him ; it had been good evidence, though no other witnesses were, and though it came out of his own mouth. The brother swears farther, that my Lord Morley coming by, and his brother paying his Lordship due respect, my Lord received it with so much contempt, that his brother said presently, he knew not what it meant, I doubt he bears me a grudge. This was a year and an half before his death ; but within a quarter of a year before, the witnesses say, his brother, his father, and my Lord, were at an ale-house ; no sooner was his brother gone down stairs, but when he came up again he finds my Lord, with a sword drawn, and swears that his brother then told him, that my Lord was always urging him to drink ; and then would seek all occasions he could to give and take offence. So then, it seems, it was my Lord's custom to urge Mr. Hastings, and to give him frequent provocations, as if he had sought an occasion for manslaughter, that he might kill him within the protection of the Law. This is the most desperate complication of malice, that can be. To this purpose, I shall presume to put a case (which our books speak) and which will highly concern the point, in this case. If my Lord Morley had fled to the wall, and had slain Mr. Hastings when he had fled to the wall, that would not have serv'd his turn, as this case is ; for our books tell us of one, who bore malice to another, and then provok'd him to draw his sword ; seeing the sword drawn, he fled away, to tempt the adversary to pursue, and still retir'd till he came to the wall ; now seeing himself at his last refuge, he thought to kill him legally and safely in his own defence. But since the pretence of Law was but an art to disguise the malice of his heart, which he now executed freely, the book says it was murder : so 'twill be here. Your Lordships will give me leave on this occasion, to tell you, that it is either the misfortune, or the just reproach of some Governments in foreign States, that there are places abroad, where murder is a cheaper sin than theft ; and the same people, that will rise up in arms as one man, to pursue a pilferer, will yet make a lane through the midst of them, them, for the man-slayer to escape. Hence it comes to pass, that men are slain every day for any thing, for nothing; insomuch that a learned Civilian writing of those Republicks, tells us plainly, Frequentiores sunt hominum caedes, quam natiuitates. But however it be in these Commonwealths, yet we, who have the happiness to live under a monarchy, (the best of Governments) and under a King (the best of monarchs) have all our lives secur'd to us, by his Majesty's own royal and immediate protection; and therefore no corruption of manners will ever be able, to bring this sin into fashion and credit amongst us, nothing will ever naturalize it here. I do acknowledge to your Lordships (for why should I conceal any thing that makes for my Lord Morley's advantage?) I do confess that an affront, or indignity offered to a Peer, is much more heinous, than that which is offered to a private Gentleman. But I must needs say withal, that the Law hath provided another manner of reparation for a Peer, than that which it gives a Gentleman. The same words that being spoken of a Gentleman, will bear no kind of action, when they are spoken to a Peer, become Scandalum Magnatum. The Peer recovers great damage; the King inflicts fine or imprisonment: so that upon the matter the offender is bound in chains, and brought and laid at my Lord's feet. Now for him, whose honour is thus guarded by the Law, to avenge himself by his sword, is a most unpardonable excuse: I do not pretend, I do not offer to say, that the killing of a man, is more capital in case of a Peer, than would be in the case of a private Gentleman: but I do presume to affirm, that no provocation in the world, can make that to be but manslaughter in the case of a Peer, that would be murder in the case of a Gentleman; that is this case. Will your Lordships therefore give me leave to turn the tables, and suppose Mr. Hastings had killed my Lord Morley, upon so slight and groundless a pretence; as suppose, my Lord Morley, in his life-time, had with grief of heart complained to his brother, that Mr. Hastings did bear him a secret hatred, because in a former combat, his Lordship had worsted Mr. Hastings, and given him an hurt: Suppose, my Lord Morley had long before this complained farther, that he saw the effect of Mr. Hastings's malice upon every occasion, and when his Lordship did but offer to salute Mr. Hastings, and give him a respect, Mr. Hastings receiv'd it sullenly and unmannerly, and return'd it with contempt; suppose that his Lordship had complain'd farther, that Mr. Hastings did nothing but seek occasions and pretences of a quarrel; and suppose that within a quarter of a year of my Lord Morley's death, Mr. Hastings had been found in an alehouse, with my Lord Morley, and had there drawn his sword upon my Lord; and then my Lord had complain'd to his brother, that he did believe Mr. Hastings would do him some mischief, some time or other: And suppose, after all this, that my Lord Morley had been slain just in such a manner, as Mr. Hastings hath been, would your Lordship, would the Kingdom have thought this a sufficient account for noble blood, if Mr. Hastings had been only found guilty of manslaughter, and escap'd by his Clergy, and a burning in the hand? My Lords, the quality of an offender may serve to enhance the crime; but since the world stood, it never was counted any abatement. The same duty to the King, the same obedience to his Laws, the same reverence to human nature; the same care to avoid effusion of christian blood is expected from a Lord, which is required from the meanest Commoner of England. 'Tis the case of all the people of England, who are highly concern'd in the present example; if they put their trust in the Law, as the great avenger of blood in the world; and once find themselves deceived, who knows the consequence that may follow? What feuds in private families? What massacres it may produce at last? And therefore, no doubt, but all the Kingdom will observe, and mark the issue of this day; and will be curious to know, what will become of a Lord, in whose eyes the blood of a Gentleman hath been so vile and inconsiderable; if it were possible, I say, if it were possible, that so great a Tribunal as this, should either mistake the fact, or misunderstand the Law, what Judicature is there left on this side Heaven, for mankind to rely on? I pretend not to aggravate the matter: this is the place where no detestation of the crime, no passion of the Prosecutor, and no compassion of your Lordships towards a Peer of the Realm, is to have any ingredient in the verdict. And therefore, having observ'd to your Lordships, that there is malice imply'd by the Law, and in a manner confess'd by the party, besides the direct and formal malice, which hath been prov'd; I shall now submit all to the Judgment, which the Law hath wisely placed in your Lordships most noble breasts; with this only consideration, 'tis the voice of blood that crieth, I know your Lordships will give it such an audience as it ought to have; such an audience as may quiet it, and keep it from crying any more; such an audience as may cleanse the land from blood, and be a means to continue to your Lordships that due veneration, which all men have to your Lordships most righteous and impartial proceedings.

After him Serjeant Maynard spoke.

Lord-Steward desired the Lords to withdraw into the Court of Wards, and consider of their evidence; but he did sum not up the evidence.

Lieutenant of the Tower bid to withdraw his Prisoner.

The Lords and the Prisoner being withdrawn; Serjeant Lee brought wine and biscuits to the Lord-Steward, and then round the Court.

The Lords stayed about three hours, and then returned into the Court, and took their places.

Sir Thomas Fanshew first called them according to their precedence; and all being present, he then called them again, beginning with the lowest, who answering to his name,

The Lord-Steward asked him, saying, my Lord Fresbeville, is my Lord Morley, Guilty or not Guilty? who laying his hand on his breast, answered, Not Guilty of Murder, but Guilty of Manslaughter.

And in the same manner asking them all severally, they all gave the same answer, except two, the Lord Wharton, and Lord Ashley, who answered, Guilty of Murder.

The Lords having delivered their verdict, the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to bring in his Prisoner.

The Lord-Steward told him, his Peers had found him Guilty of Manslaughter, and asked him, what he could say for himself.

He answered, he desired the benefit of the Clergy, and the benefit of the Statute.

Lord-Steward said, he must have the benefit of the Clergy: and that he conceived the Statute was clear in his behalf, and asking the opinion of the Judges, they all bowed in token of consent.

The Lord-Steward making a short speech of admonishment to the Prisoner, told him he was discharged, paying his Fees; and then dismiss'd the Court, and broke his staff.

*Sir Samuel Barnardiston against Sir William Soame, late Sheriff of Suffolk, in B. R.

CASE, and declares that a writ issued out of Chancery to the defendant, then Sheriff of Suffolk, to elect a Knight of the County for the Parliament: and that the plaintiff was chosen by the majority of Freeholders, and that the defendant returned the writ with an indenture of the said election, but maliciously intending to deprive the plaintiff, de fiducia & officio præd' falso & deceptive, una cum indentura præd' retornavit unam alteram indenturam in cancellaria præd' specificant' quod alia personæ liberi tenentes vel major pars liberorum tenentium elegerunt quendam Lionellum Tolmach, ubi re vera præd' Lionellus non fuit electus per majorem numerum liberorum tenentium; ratione cujus, the plaintiff was kept out of the house of Commons, and put to great charge to prove his election in the house of Commons. The defendant pleaded non culp. and upon trial at bar, Twisden, Rainsford, and Wyld held, and so directed the Jury, That if this double return was made maliciously, they ought to find for the plaintiff, which accordingly they did, and gave him 800 l. damages; though the evidence, as to the malice and falsity, was very slender. For the poll was granted, upon which the matter seeming doubtful, whether some of them who voted for the plaintiff had sufficient freehold to qualify them to give their votes, the Sheriff, by advice of counsel then present, and of some members of Parliament there also, made this double return, to prevent an action for a false return, in case it should appear that some freeholders that voted for the plaintiff had sufficient freehold. And after upon examination in Parliament, the election of the plaintiff was adjudged good, and the defendant committed by them for making this double return: And now 'twas moved in arrest of judgment by North, Attorney-General, and Scroggs, King's Serjeant, that this Action lies not, and that no such Action was ever yet maintained in this case; for the case of Nevil and Stroud was never resolved, but in respect of difficulty sent to Parliament, where it never received a determination. And the reasons they urged against the Action, were, First, because the falsity or verity of the return is only examinable in the house of Commons, who are the sole judges, and will punish such falsities; and accordingly they have so done in this case, by committing the Sheriff, and he ought not to be twice punished for the same fault. And before the Statute of H. 6. no action lay for a false return, and that only gives an action of debt for 100 l. Secondly, the right of the party is not considerable in this case; for this is not an office of profit, but of trust, concerning the State. Thirdly, what the Sheriff does in this case, he doth as a judge, for he is judge of the election, and therefore no action lies against him. Fourthly, what the Sheriff doth in this case is propter difficultatem, upon his doubtfulness of the matter, and judges of assize may, propter difficultatem, adjourn an assize: the Sheriff hath done no more in this case than laid the matter before the house of Commons, that the validity of the votes may be there deliberately examined. To which 'twas answer'd by Maynard, King's * Levinz's Reports, Part. II. 114. Kemble's Reports, Vol. III. 365, 369, 329, 419, 428, 442, 664.

King's Serjeant, and Sir William Jones, Solicitor; First, That here was malice and falsity in the Sheriff, and thereby damage and charge to the plaintiff, and all this found by the Jury, which is sufficient to maintain an action in all cases, whether there has been a like action in such case or no before; for actions upon the case are founded upon the particular case, which is mostly new. And the case of Nevil and Stroud was not for a double return, but for making no return; for there two were elected, and the Sheriff made no return as to one, and for that he brought the action. Secondly, The commitment by the Parliament is only to punish the contempt of the Sheriff, as to them and the State, but not to repair the party for the damage he sustained; and thus in several respects, one may be twice punished pro uno delicto. As it falls out often in many cases, particularly in criminal matters, wherein the party is punished for the King by indictment, and by the party for the special damage he sustained. Thirdly, The Sheriff is not a Judge of the election in this case, but a minister to take the polls; of which, in point of sufficiency, the house of Commons is judge. Fourthly, Though the Statute of H. 6. gives to the party the 100*l.* penalty, that will not prove this action does not lie at common law. The Parliament intended only to give a certain penalty to the party, which was considerable then, though not so considerable now, and not leave them to a Jury's discretion altogether for damages. Et adjournatur ad proximum terminum, when Hale being in Court, he, Twyssden and Wylde, for as much as the return is said to be falso & malitiose & ea intentione, to put the plaintiff to charge and expence, and so found by the Jury; held the action lay, and gave Judgment for the plaintiff; Rainsford doubting.

Upon this a writ of Error was brought in the chequer chamber, where six Judges were for reversing the Judgment, and two for affirming it.

There Arguments here follow.

Barnardiston versus Soame. In Case.

The Case.

ON the death of Sir Henry North, one of the Knights for Suffolk, a writ was issued forth for the election of a new Member; and Sir Samuel Barnardiston, and my Lord Huntingtoure, were the two candidates; but Sir Samuel carried it by 78 voices, and was returned: And my Lord Huntingtoure having made an interest with the Sheriff, got the Sheriff to return him too; and he sat in the House till the Election was there determined for Sir Samuel. Whereupon Sir Samuel Barnardiston, for this double Return, brought an action upon the case against the Sheriff, and tried it at the King's-Bench bar, 12 Nov. 1674. before my Lord Chief-Justice Hale, and recover'd 1000*l.* damages: and afterwards a writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber, and there the Judgment in the King's-Bench was reversed; only Atkins and Ellis were for affirming it.

Judge Ellis's Argument is as followeth.

First, The Declaration does consist of the writ to the Sheriff, his Return, and the Averment of the plaintiff's damage.

The writ does shew the great import of what was to be done, and what he should do.

Now as to the Return:

1. It is impossible to be a true Return; but it is a false Return; for that simul & semel, both should be chosen at the same time, that can't be: So then he hath not observed the writ.

2. The writ requires that the House should be full, and have a Member of Parliament; but by this Return neither can sit in Parliament; for it appears, that from the 24th of February, 25 Car. II. until the confirmation, he was kept out. So the end of the writ not at all observed, and the business of the Parliament retarded as much as could be.

3. It may be said, This may be done by mistake, he may mistake the law; but when the plaintiff comes and says, That he knowing the Plaintiff was duly elected, and on purpose to keep him out of the House, did falso & malitiose make this Return; then here is a false and malicious Return, and made knowingly upon him: Then an Action lies.

Then to consider the Case,

1. At Common Law; and I conceive it will lie.

2. The Acts of Parliament have not taken away the Remedy which the Common Law gave.

1. That the Common Law gave remedy; for that it was falsely and maliciously done, we must not doubt it: It is a matter of fact, and the Jury have found it so, and that there was a wrong done to Barnardiston, and it is of the Sheriff's own knowledge: Then,

2. When I suffer an injury, joined with a loss, the Common Law gives me a remedy for it.

Cooper and Andrews's case, Hob. 43.

Then take it as done by an Officer of Justice, and a sworn Officer, one of the greatest in the Kingdom: If it should not lie in that case, there would be a failure of Justice, but no failure of wrong.

Second, That in cases of far less concern, as to Officers, it will lie, and then we shall see in this case what it will do.

Powle and Godfrey's case, Rolls, lib. 1. 63. Co. lib. 12. 128. In that case, because there was a temporal loss to the party, though for a spiritual wrong, the law gave him damages.

Rolls 1 lib. 1. 108. 24. Ford and Hoscbin's case against an Archdeacon, F. N. B. 47. and yet an Archdeacon is a spiritual Officer: So that if he do not induct the Parson, he may have his remedy; for where he suffers a loss, the Law gives him his remedy.

Now here is injuria & dampnum, he does complain about the nature of his election, and the undue return of an election; and to a Court that never yet did give damages to the party.

3. Then when there is a colour of Justice, and a man does proceed in a legal way, yet falso & malitiose, an action lies, Hob. 266. Waterer and Freeman's case. If a man will arrest one, and put him to special bail, a special action of the cases lies against him.

Cro. 3. 130. Windbam and Clere's case against a Justice of Peace: Whereas in truth the Justice never had any complaint. An action will lie against him, because he did falso & malitiose.

Id. 21 E. 4. 22, 23. If a misinformation be in a Court of Justice, an action lies against him. Now here is a very great misinformation given to the Chancery upon this return.

Obj. This is a new case, and a case of a great deal of danger, and therefore we must have a great deal of care of making new laws.

Answ. It were endless to put cases where there never was a case before, yet an action will lie, if damage: there was no precedent for an action of the case for falsely and maliciously accusing one of treason, before Smitb and Crasbaw's case. Rolls Abr. 1. 1. 1131.

Bulstr. 2. 270. Jones 93. Cro. 1. 15. Tho' there it was objected, that never any precedents were, that this action was brought for maliciously and falsely accusing one of treason, and the danger of that action would lie, yet the Judges resolved otherwise, being falsely and maliciously; and tho' never any precedents could be shewn, yet they gave judgment expressly that the action would lie.

2 Cro. 534. Moor and Blackwell's case: Objected, that no precedent could be found where insufficient returns have been amended; yet the Court said, If there never was a precedent, they would make a precedent thereof. The first precedent had a beginning, and there was none at first.

2. There is a great difference where the Law is silent in the case.

Before Stade's case they never could shew any action of the case upon an Indebitatus assumpsit; multitudes of actions of debt, but none of the case, yet adjudged it would lie: For where there is eadem ratio, there is eadem lex: and will any man doubt where there is a false return, whether an action will lie? In actions of the case there is less reason to expect precedents than in other things; they grow as the invention of man grows; according as new frauds and new deceits arise, so should new remedies.

Obj. Never an action brought for such a return; and Littleton's rule is, That if such an action could be brought, it would have been brought before now.

Answ. 1. My Lord Coke says, The not user of an action does not take away the action, but ye may bring the action if ye have cause.

2. May it not be said as it was said to the former cases? there were accusations of treason, and false ones too, and no actions brought; therefore no action ought to lie now. I cannot see, if ye reverse this judgment, ye must reverse many more of the same nature.

'Tis true, there is a great difference, that if the nature of the thing be such as it cannot be falsely and maliciously, the adding these words will not change the nature; but if the nature of the thing be so, and the Jury do find falso & malitiose, the action will lie: as for the first part, as for a false accusation of stealing an apple off a tree, an action will not lie, tho' the declaration is falso & malitiose, for the nature of the thing will not permit it; so Moor, 491. Palmer and Porter's case, there no action will lie upon that reason: But in our case, the nature of the thing is of such a wrong, that an action may lie.

Then tho' the Acts of Parliament may give remedy, yet that takes not away the remedy at Common Law, which was his ancient remedy. Plow. 113. puts many cases to that purpose; and the difference is plain, for if it were no crime and offence at Common Law, but given by the Act, then no action could lie but upon the Act; but where there was another remedy, he may take either that at Common Law, or the other upon the Act.

The Common Law gave an action of the case upon too little issues returned by the Sheriff, the Statute gives an averment, yet he may take the action still.

Now consider the remedy this Act gives, and see whether it be so good a remedy: For first, he must bring his action within the time limited by the Act, or else he is out of the Act; now if there be a double return depending in the House, no man will bring an action, depending that return undecided, and the Judges will not countenance such an action; so the party is quite deprived of his remedy. Then, secondly, as this case is, the Sheriff is not within the Act at all, for he has returned the Plaintiff. Now if this should be suffered, there would be an evasion out of the Statute, and the Statute would give no remedy at all. Thirdly, It is the same mischief to the plaintiff; if my Lord had been singly returned, he might have vindicated his election as much as in this double return, and have been in the House as soon.

Obj. This is a general matter, and all the subjects of England are concerned in it; and Co. Rep. 3. Williams's case, where there is a general nuisance, every man shall not have an action.

Resp. Where there is a general concern, and no particular damage, every man shall not have an action; but when there is particular damage, there he may. Here is a particular damage to the Plaintiff, and so he is well intitled to his action. Rep. 9. Marie's case. 1 Inst. 59. Powell's case. 3 Cro. 664. Fineux and Hoveden's case.

Obj. This matter is matter proper to be determined in Parliament, and a hard case the Sheriff should be condemned for that he could not help.

Resp. As to the Right of election that is determinable there, and it was so; but for his damage, it neither was, nor could be examined there. If the house of Commons had given damages, and the Parliament had broken up, how should he have recovered them?

1. Here is no action brought against a Member.

2. No action brought for any thing done in Parliament.

3. The return is into Chancery; the Sheriff's work was ended in Chancery: It was filed in Chancery, and there remains, and there must remain. So that all the malice and falsity was done in Chancery; and the action is not brought for any right of election, but for what was done to put him to charges.

If there had been an equality of voices, he must have returned so; nor is here a little mistake, but what is done, is done falsely and maliciously, and with an intent to put him to charges.

Obj. The Sheriff is not concerned himself for what was done in the Commons House.

Answ. He was not charged with it there; this action is not brought purely for a double return; yet if so, and he does it knowingly, an action will lie, the return is plain, for the Sheriff is a great Officer, and the law does give that credit to him, that that it will not suffer an averment against his return, but an action of the case will lie, Rep. 11. Bagg's case; and the Sheriff is a sworn Officer, and the law imposes this Man upon me, and the law is my caution in that case, and gives me a remedy.

Obj. Here is no double return, for it is no return at all, it not being under seal; and the Statute says, all returns shall be under the seal of the Electors: So here is no harm at all; he might have gone into the House, if he had pleased.

Ans. At the Common Law there was no necessity the return should have been under the seal of the Electors: So it is a good return until avoided, and not a void return. If it were not good unless under the seal of all those that elect, what will become of those that sit now? It was never done yet; if he makes a return without seal, it is good, prima facie.

As to the exceptions taken to the declaration, it is well laid in strictness of pleading; he says, secundum exigentiam brevis; and tho' he says per aliam indenturam factam, it was as much as factum indenturatum, 1 Inst. 103. Leo. 310. Maydwell and Andrews's case. How should it be a return, unless it be as it should be? and ye must intend so as it should be, 3 Cro. 737.

The pleading of Bulckley's case is the same with this, and no exception taken to it: But if it had been upon a demurrer, there might have been more said for the exception; but now it is an exception upon a verdict, and it shall be intended, that they that tried it had the right of the return. 2 Bull. 41. Yelv. 247. after a verdict a vicious plea shall be made good, Allen and Nashe's case, 3 Cro. 53. ibid. 371. Southwell and Brown's case, and Fulwood's case, 4 Rep. is a stronger case than has been cited, and yet adjudged good.

Though there be no seal, yet when he returns this, and a man suffers damage by it, and all the mischief that may happen, who is the party would take advantage of it? he that has done the wrong? No, he cannot, 21 E. 4. 22. 15 E. 4. 18, 19.

So therefore, both because the declaration is well laid, and the party well entitled to his action,

The Judgment ought to be affirmed.

An Argument in the great Case concerning Election of Members to Parliament, by Sir Robert Atkins, Knight of the honourable Order of the Bath, and late one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas.

Trin. 26 Car. II. In the Court of King's-Bench, Rot. 577.

Sir Samuel Barnardiston, Bart. Plaintiff; Sir William Soame, Defendant. In Trespasts upon the Case.

THAT whereas the King, 8 Feb. 25. of his reign, by a writ out of the Chancery, directed to the then Sheriff of Suffolk, commanded that he should cause an election to be made of another Knight for the said Shire, in the place of Sir Henry North, lately dead; and that he should certify the election under his own seal, and the seals of those that were present at the election, into the Chancery.

VOL. VII.

Which writ, 12 Feb. 25 Car. 2. was delivered to the defendant, then Sheriff.

And, 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2. in full County, by the people resident in that County, the writ was read.

And altho' the plaintiff was duly elected to be Knight for that County, by the greater number of the people then resident in the said County, every one whereof could spend 40 s. per annum, within that County:

And altho' the defendant, then Sheriff of the said County, premissa satis sciens, afterwards the same 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2. returned the said writ into the Chancery; together with an Indenture between him the said Sheriff, and the aforesaid Electors of the plaintiff, of the aforesaid election of the plaintiff, made according as the said writ requires.

Yet the defendant, then Sheriff, Officii sui debitum minime ponderans, sed machinans & malitiose intendans ipsum Samuelem in hac parte minus rite prae-gravare, and to deprive the plaintiff of the trust and office of one of the Knights of the Shire, to be exercised in Parliament; and to cause the plaintiff to expend great sums of money against the duty of his office:

Falsely, maliciously and deceitfully returned into the Chancery, together with the aforesaid Indenture, another Indenture annex'd to the said writ, purporting the same to be made between him the said defendant, then Sheriff, of the one part, and divers other persons; containing, That the said other persons, as the greater part of the said County, did chuse one Sir Lionel Talmach, Bart. otherwise Lionel Lord Huntingtore, as Knight of the Shire, to come to Parliament.

Whereas in truth, the said Lionel was not chosen by the greater part.

By reason of which false return of the said other Indenture, the plaintiff could not be admitted into the lower House at the return of the said writ, and a long time after.

'Till the plaintiff, upon his petition to the Commons, and till after he had spent divers great sums of money about the proving of his election, and divers pains and labours in that behalf sustain'd, afterwards, scil. 20 Feb. 26 Car. 2. he was admitted, and his election was declared to be good.

To his damage of 3000 l.

Plea. Not guilty.

Verdict. Pro quer' dam. 800 l.

Judgment. Pro quer' Sir Samuel Barnardiston, in the King's-Bench, for the 800 l. damages, and for the 98 l. costs.

The defendant, Sir William Soame, sued a writ of Error before the Justices of the Common-Bench, and the Barons of the Exchequer, in the Exchequer Chamber, to reverse the said judgment given by the Judges of the King's-Bench.

And two of the Justices of the Common Bench, viz. Sir Robert Atkins, and Sir William Ellis, upon argument, were of opinion, That the said judgment was good in law, and were for affirming that judgment.

But the other two Judges of the Common Bench, and the four Barons of the Exchequer, holding the said judgment in the King's-Bench erroneous, were for reversing the said judgment.

And the said judgment still stands revers'd; but needs a redress by error in Parliament.

Sir

Sir Samuel Barnardiston, Bart. Plaintiff, Sir William Soame, Defendant, in an Action upon the Case.

I Shall divide the Record into the several parts of it.

1. There is first, the occasion, or as we commonly call it, the inducement to the action; that is, Sir Henry North, who served in Parliament as Knight of the Shire for Suffolk, died; and a new writ issued to chuse another in his place.

2. In the next place, the right that accrued to the plaintiff, Sir Samuel Barnardiston, he was duly elected Knight of the Shire.

3. The injury done him by the defendant, with the aggravations of it, viz. Altho' the defendant well knew the plaintiff was duly elected, and tho' he did return him; yet contrary to the duty of his office as Sheriff, and intending to oppress him, and to deprive him of the right he had, and on purpose to put him to great expence and charges,

He did falsely, maliciously, and deceitfully return another Indenture with the former; importing, that another person was chosen by the greater part of the County.

4. The damage sustained by the plaintiff, after the writ was returned.

1. He could not for a long time be admitted to sit to do his duty, and discharge his trust.
2. He was put to great charges to prove his election.
3. He did sustain great pains and labour.

5. The right done him at last, and the satisfaction and amends made him;

1. By the House of Commons. His election was declared good, and he was admitted to sit.
2. By the Jury. They have found the wrong done by the defendant, and the damage sustained by the plaintiff; and they have repair'd him with 800 l. damages.
3. By the Court of King's-Bench. They have given judgment for the plaintiff.

And the question before us, is, whether this judgment be erroneous? I hold the judgment not to be erroneous. I am for affirming of the judgment.

1. I conceive the matter set forth in the plaintiff's declaration, to be actionable. 2. That the wrong and injury complained of, is such for which the Law gives him a remedy. And 3. That he has taken his proper remedy, by bringing this action upon the case.

All this being in the affirmative, the proof of it lies upon me.

My ground and foundation is this, That where one person does injury to another, and the person to whom the wrong is done, sustains particular damage and loss by the injury, there the Law gives a remedy by action, to the party injur'd.

But here is an injury done.

And here is a particular damage sustain'd. Therefore an action lies.

I shall first prove the ground or foundation, which is the major proposition, That where a wrong or injury is done, and a particular damage sustained, there the Law gives a remedy by action.

1. From the nature and quality of the Law; which is to do right to all, and to give relief and redress to those that receive wrongs. And should there be any case where a person might receive an injury and damage, and yet have no remedy nor redress, the Law would be defective; which would be a reproach to the Law and Government.

The Law has appointed several Courts, and given them several powers and jurisdictions; so that in the one or the other, every person that has suffered injury and damage may make his complaint, and have right done him.

Sir Edw. Coke in his Mag. Chart. fol. 405. in his Expos. upon the Stat. of W. 2. c. 14. says, It is an ancient maxim of the Common Law, Non recedant querentes a curia Regis sine remedio. Whoever has just cause to complain, shall have their just remedy. And curia Regis non debet deficere in justitia exhibenda.

Both these rules and maxims, which have one and the same sense, are remembered in that Stat. of Mag. Chart. c. 24.

In Pincbon's case, 9 Rep. fol. 88. b. adjud. That an action upon the case lies against executors for a debt, due by the testator upon a simple contract. And in the argument of that case it is said, That by that resolution, Justice and right is advanced, and the creditor paid his just debt; and if the debt should be discharged by the death of the debtor, it would (say the Judges) be a great defect in the Law, that there should be a right, and no remedy for it: And the Judges urge the maxim I mentioned but now, curia Domini Regis deficere non debet conquerentibus in justitia exhibenda.

In Meriel Tresham's case, 9 Rep. fol. 3. it is urged as an absurd thing in law, that a man should have wrong done him, and yet should be without remedy: And the reporter does observe, that the Judges in all ages have endeavoured to put the rule of W. II. in execution, Curia domini Regis non debet deficere conquerentibus in justitia exhibenda.

Nay, the Law has so great a zeal for redressing of wrongs, that as sacred as the maxims and rules of the Law are, yet if there were any rules or maxims that stood in our way to hinder, the Law would break through those rules and maxims, rather than suffer an injury to be without remedy. 4 Inst. fol. 71. about the middle, No wrong or injury, either publick or private, can be done, but it shall be reform'd or punish'd in one Court or other, by due course of Law. And in the lower end of that folio, A failure of Justice is abhor'd in Law.

Sir Fran. Bacon, amongst the elements of the Law, fol. 51. delivers this as a principle, Receditur a placitis juris potius quam injuria & delicta remaneant impunita; which he himself expounds in this sense, The Law will dispense with some maxims, rather than wrongs should be unpunished.

2. My next argument to prove this position, That where an injury is done, and damage sustained, the Law gives remedy, shall be taken from the nature of an action, which is the ordinary remedy the Law gives for the repairing of a private wrong.

Now what the nature and definition of an action is, we learn from the most ancient authors of the Law, as Bracton, and Fleta, and the Mirror of the Justices, as they are collected by Sir E. C. 2 Inst. fol. 40. and they all agree almost in the same words:

Actio nihil aliud est quam jus prosequendi in judicio, quod alicui debetur, & quod nascitur ex maleficio, vel quod provenit ex delicto vel injuria.

It is nothing else but a means or remedy for a man to have right done him, that has suffered wrong and injury.

It is the argument commonly used, and the reason given to maintain an action, and in particular an action upon the case, viz. That there is an injury done, and a damage sustained.

Sir E. C. 12 Rep. fol. 128. ref. p. tot. cur. If a Sumner return one summon'd, or cited into the Spiritual Court, where in truth he was never summon'd, and he is pronounced contumax, and thereupon excommunicate; he shall have an action upon the case against the Sumner: And the reason given is, because there is injuria & damnum. 'Tis the same case that is reported in Rolls 1 Rep. fol. 63. by the name of Powle and Godfrey: which I shall have further occasion to mention before I have done: You have the same case reported by Sir Francis Moor, fol. 835.

This may suffice to prove the major proposition, That where wrong and injury is done to any man, and particular damage sustained by it, there the Law entitles him to an action.

For the minor proposition, That in the case before us, there is a wrong and injury done to the plaintiff, and a particular damage sustained by him: To make this out, I shall need to do no more than barely to relate the very fact; and put it as a question to any plain man, that has but a common capacity, and no learning, nor acquired parts; and to stand to his judgment in the case.

And the case is no more than this: The plaintiff had the honour to be chosen to that great trust and employment, of a Knight of the Shire, by his Countrymen, to serve in Parliament; by which he was justly entitled to several great privileges, and to wages for the time he serv'd. And 'tis an honour and employment we all know is highly esteem'd, and generally desired and sought after; and he that desires it, desires a good office. The defendant having the office of a Sheriff, and being bound by his office and oath to do justly and truly, Et premissa satis sciens; that is, well knowing the Plaintiff had the only right to be returned, and that no other had the least colour for it, and where there was not the least doubt or difficulty in the case:

Yet falsely, deceitfully, and maliciously to deprive him of his trust and office, on purpose to put him to great charges, he returned another person with him.

And after all, the Question is, Whether he has done him any wrong or no?

By occasion of this, the plaintiff was hindred from sitting in the House, and was put to great expence, and underwent great trouble and labour. And the Question is, Whether the Plaintiff has been at any particular damage?

Shall I have my action for a half penny trespass, pedibus ambulando? Does the Law give me an action of assault and battery, if a man does but lift up his hand to strike me? Or for a few ill words, that will break no bones? And shall I recover damage for these petty things, and shall no action lie for so notorious an injury as is done in this case?

But our greatest work is to answer the many objections that have been made against this action; which yet I will be bold to say, have much more of wit than of weight in them.

And the difficulty rather lies in the great power and interest of the parties to the action, and of those that concern themselves in the example and consequence of it, upon a politick account, than from any uncertainty of the Law: that is, there is a design, to model the Parliament to the humour of the Court.

Sir Ed. Coke, in his preface to 10 Rep. fol. 6. in the beginning of the folio, affirms, That he never saw any case of great value proceed quietly, without many exceptions in arrest of judgment.

Object. 1. This is a matter that concerns the Government, and is of a publick nature; the employment of a Parliament-man, consisting in negotii regem, statum, & defensionem Regni & Ecclesie concernentibus: And therefore the punishment of an offence committed, in reference to this, should be by a publick prosecution, and not to be appropriated to any particular private person; nor the amends and satisfaction made to any one man.

Ans. It must be agreed, That publick injuries wherein all, or very many are concerned, are proper for a publick prosecution; as in the name of the King, or by a presentment at a Leet, or Quarter-Sessions, &c. But if any particular man receive a particular damage by the publick offence or injury, he shall have his action; and this is consistent enough with the prosecution for the publick. As the case of 27 H. 8. fol. 26. 27. Br. Abr. A. Sr. Ca. Plac. 6. If a man make a ditch upon the King's highway, this is a wrong to every man that has a right to pass that way; and he is presentable at a Leet for this offence. But if I and my horse happen to fall into the ditch, riding along the way, and so receive a particular damage, I may have an action upon the case against him that made the ditch. 9 Rep. 113. 5 Rep. 72, 73. It is the ordinary case, A makes an assault and battery upon B. this is but one single act, but it has a double aspect; 'tis a breach of the King's peace, and for that A. is indictable, and may be fined to the King, and imprisoned. It is a particular wrong to B. for which B. may have an action of assault and battery, and recover damages; and both of them consistent.

So in our case, this false and malicious double return, it was an injury to the King and Kingdom, and to the House of Commons, in that while the election by this means was under dispute, they wanted the plaintiff's service and assistance. It was a wrong to the County of Suffolk, for the Knight of a Shire has plenam potestatem pro se & communitate comitatus ad faciendum & consentiendum. But it was more particularly an injury to the plaintiff; in that he was for some time deprived of the honour done him by his Country; who by their electing of him, settle that character upon him, that he was magis idoneus & discretus; for the writ commands such to be chosen.

He was hindred from discharging his trust, committed to him by his own Country; hindred from doing service to the King and Kingdom; hindred of his wages.

The Stat. of 27 H. 8. c. 26. which unites England to Wales, enacts, That for every Shire in Wales there shall be chosen one Knight to serve in Parliament, and one Burgeſs for every Borough; and that the Knights and Burgeſſes shall have like dignity, pre-eminence, and privilege, and shall be allowed such fees as other Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament have, and are allowed: by which it appears there are dignities, pre-eminences, privileges and fees, belonging to such as serve in Parliament; of all which, the plaintiff for a time, was hindred by this false return.

And in that it does concern the Government, it argues the greater injury done to the plaintiff; for every member of Parliament, for the time he serves there, is instrumental in carrying on the Government: which is an high honour to him. Tu regere imperio populos, He tibi erunt artes. 'Tis a noble employment.

And since it does so nearly concern the Government, we that are Judges should be the more careful to discourage all abuses committed by Sheriffs in elections: It is of vast concernment to the Kingdom that elections should be fair, and returns duly made, without partiality and indirect means used. And we, by Judgments, should encourage all remedies against such abuses and practices.

Besides all this, the plaintiff has been put to great expences, and undergone great labour and trouble; which is a private and particular damage, and therefore entitles him to his particular action.

A Justice of peace may have an action of slander in relation to his office, yet that was not an offence at Common Law neither; and yet it concerns the Government.

The Stat. of 7 H. 4. cap. 1. recites, That the Commons made a grievous complaint to the King, of the undue elections of the Knights of the Counties, which (says the Preamble) be sometimes made by affection of the Sheriffs, to the great slander of the Counties, and hindrance of the business of the Commonalty of the said Counties.

By which it appears, how great the mischief was in those days, and whence it came principally, viz. from the partiality of the Sheriffs: And that Stat. to prevent the abuses, does appoint the return of Indentures under the Seal of the Sheriff, and the seals of the Electors: But the defendant in our case has practis'd an abuse even in the very remedy, by returning several Indentures, and so evading the good provision made by that Statute.

The Stat. of 11 H. 4. c. 1. observes, That no pain is set in special by that Stat. of 7 H. 4. upon Sheriffs, if they make returns contrary to that Statute, and gives power to Judges of Assize to punish them, and to inflict the penalty of 100 l. upon the Sheriff; and the Knights unduly returned are to lose their wages: And all this depends upon the enquiry made by the Judges of Assize. At this time surely this matter of elections, and the examining and determining of the right, was not held so sacred and so incommunicable a thing as some would have it now; for by this Statute 'tis referred to the Judges of the Assize.

But the principal Statute in this matter, is that of 23 H. 6. c. 15. which sets out the great abuses by Sheriffs committed in elections; it recites, That of late divers Sheriffs, for their singular avail and lucre, have not made due elections of the Knights. One would think by those words (for their lucre) that there was money stirring upon these occasions, even in those times; and that some men paid dear to be chosen Parliament-men: Or else, how could a Sheriff make profit to himself by an election? And to be a Parliament-man, it seems, was a very desirable thing in those days.

And forasmuch (says that Statute) as a sufficient pain, and convenient remedy for the party in such case grieved, is not ordained in the said Statutes against the Sheriffs: It therefore provides a better remedy.

But let us, to our purpose, observe by the way, that it mentions the Party grieved; so that there is a Party grieved: It is not merely a publick offence, but an injury to some particular persons, and to some one person; for it says the party grieved, but it does not mention who that party grieved is. So that it may be objected, that those words (the party grieved) refers to every Elector, as well as the Knight elected.

But the enacting Clause expounds the words, and declares whom the makers of that Law meant; for it makes the first offer of the forfeiture to every person chosen Knight, and not duly return'd: So then 'tis plain, that the Knight elected, and not returned, is the Party grieved. If he have a particular wrong done him, then it follows he ought to have a particular remedy and satisfaction: And he was a party grieved before these Statutes made, and this penalty and remedy given; for these Statutes do not first make him a party grieved, but mention him as being so before. If he were so before, surely the Law gave him some remedy, or else there was a Gravamen without Remedium; which would have been a defect in the same.

Object. 2. Is that which I think is most relied upon, and that has most weight laid upon it, viz. That this action concerns an election of a Knight to the Parliament, and therefore belongs to the jurisdiction of the Parliament, and ought to be determined there, and not by any Court inferior to it.

Answer. To this it has been truly answered, That tho' in this case we have often occasion to speak of the Parliament, and to mention an election to Parliament, yet the right of election is not called in question, nor was it to be tried in this action, but was determined by the House of Commons; and this action is pursuant to that decision of the right of election by the Parliament, and grounds itself upon it.

I shall, however, take this occasion in the first place, to shew in what matters that concern the Parliament, the Judges of Westminster-hall have in all times, and must meddle, and take cognizance of them. And in the next place, what they have declined and left to the Parliament.

1. They have debated and resolved, what is a good Session of Parliament, and what is not, and what makes a Session, as in Tr. 12 Jac. in R. R. Rolls, Rep. 29. There were several acts of Parliament that had pass'd at a former Parliament, which were continued only to the first Session of the next Parliament; and in that case they held those acts then still in force: for tho' the Parliament had met, yet no Act passing, they therefore adjudged it was no Session, and there was a necessity that the Judges should determine this. For tho' the King and Parliament make Acts, yet the Courts in Westminster-hall put those Acts in execution, and therefore must first satisfy themselves.

2. Whether they are in force or not so, in the Prince's case 8 Rep. whether the charter made by King Ed. 3. to the Prince, were an Act of Parliament or not, is here argued and resolved. So 4 H. 7. 18. 6 and 7 H. 7. 14, 15.

3. In Rolls Ab. 1st part, fol. 93. ca. 19. under the Title of Action upon the Case, there is cited 17 E. 3. in B. R. Rot. 69. where an action is brought by John Bokeland, Knight of Wiltshire, against the Sheriff of that county, for not levying 10 l. 4 s. pro expensis suis in attendencia sua in Parlamento. Now in order to the recovery of this Action, many things relating to the Parliament, as, When the Parliament began? How long his attendance was? And and divers other questions relating to the Parliament, must of necessity be incident.

10 Eliz. Dy. fol. 275. The very lower end of that folio, there is an action brought against the Keeper, for letting a Burgeſs of Parliament go at large by writ de privilegio Parliamenti, who was in execution. The Lord Dyer ſays nothing there, what became of it; but Sir Francis Moor, in his Rep. fol. 57. at the lower end of that fol. reports, that it was held by Dyer, that if one condemn'd in debt or treſpaſs, be choſen to the Parliament, and after taken in execution, that he ſhall not have his privilege of Parliament. And, as he ſays, it was ſo held by the Sages of the Law, in the caſe of Ferrers; and that tho' his privilege was indeed allow'd, yet, (as they held) it was minus juſte, which caſe of Ferrers was the ſame here mentioned before to be in Dy. fol. 275. as appears by Mr. Crompton in his jurisdiction of Courts, fol. 8. b.

So that ſome things relating to the Parliament, the Courts of Westminster-hall muſt determine; and the Judges cannot avoid it, if they will do juſtice.

2. But ſome things there are concerning the Parliament, which the Courts of Westminster-hall may determine if they think fit; or they may at the diſcretion of the Judges ſuſpend their further proceeding, and refer them till the Parliament meets to determine them.

33 H. 6. fol. 17, 18. It is there debated by the Judges, whether it were a perfect and legal Act that paſs'd in Parliament againſt Sir John Pilkington, for a rape committed by him; and it depended upon the courſe of the two Houſes, in their transmitting of bills from one to another, and of indorſing the bills; and they ſent for the Clerk of the Parliament and conſulted with him about it; and there, Forreſcus, chief-juſtice, held the Act in queſtion to be a good Act of Parliament; but, ſays he, peradventure the matter, or queſtion, ſhall wait till the next Parliament meet, and then we may be certified by them of the certainty of the matter. By this it appears, that the Judges did not diſown the jurisdiction of that cauſe, that was ſo nearly depending upon the uſage of Parliament, but that it belonged to them, and not to the Parliament; yet it was convenient to be adviſed by the Parliament, and to wait till then.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inſt. 408. tells us, that matters of difficulty were uſually adjourned to Parliament.

3. Some things there are that concern the Parliament, wherein the Courts of Westminster-hall muſt not intermeddle, but the jurisdiction belongs to the Parliament only.

By the Statute of 4 H. 8. c. 8. tho' all in that Act that concerns one Richard Strode, is a private Act, yet there is one claufe which is a general Act, and is declaratory of the ancient law and cuſtom of Parliament, viz. It is enacted, That all Suits, Accuſements, Condemnations, Executions, Fines, Amerciaments, Punishments, Correſtions, Charges, and Impoſitions, at any time from thenceforth, to be put or had upon any Member, for any Bill, ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter concerning the Parliament, to be commened or treated of, be utterly void and of none effect. This concerns none but members of Parliament, and it provides for freedom of debates in matters that are proper to be treated of in Parliament.

The Lords, for themſelves only, and for their own Houſe, made claim of this privilege and jurisdiction, 11 R. 2. num. 7. Sir Robert Cotton's Abr.

fol. 321. but it is limited only to matters moved in Parliament, and the King allowed it in full Parliament.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inſt. fol. 15. ſays, that pari ratione, the like belongs to the houſe of Commons: *And this is the reaſon, ſays Sir E. C. that Judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, becauſe it is not to be decided by the common Laws uſed in other Courts, but ſecundum legem & conſuetudinem Parliamenti.

So likewiſe in caſe of the privilege of a Member of Parliament, againſt ſuits and executions, ſitting the Parliament, the Judges have reſuſed to give their opinion, tho' demanded by the Lords. As they did in the caſe of Tborp, Speaker of the houſe of Commons, who was taken in execution between two ſeſſions of Parliament, of which the Commons made Complaint to the Lords, and the Lords asked the advice of the Judges, whether the Speaker ought to be delivered by privilege of Parliament; the Judges answered, That they ought not to determine the privilege of the high Court of Parliament: the caſe is 31 H. 6. fol. —. Rolls Ab. 2d part. 94. ca. 1. See 39 H. 6. Sir Robert Cotton's Abr. num. 6.

Concerning departure from Parliament, (ſitting the Parliament) and not attending according to their duty; the caſe ſeems doubtful, whether any other Court than the Parliament can determine of that offence, it ſeeming to be of a middle nature. For tho' it be an offence committed by a Member, and that in Parliament-time, which argues for their privilege, and againſt the jurisdiction of any inferior Court, eſpecially while the Parliament ſits, who undoubtedly may take cognizance of it, and puniſh it: Yet on the other ſide, when the Parliament has not taken cognizance of it, and the Parliament is riſen, why ſhould not that offence, at the King's ſuit, be puniſhed in the Star-chamber, while that was a Court, and now in the King's-Bench? And why ſhould privilege protect againſt non-attendance, when the true ground of privilege is by reaſon of attendance. And Mr. Plowden, who was a very learned lawyer, ſubmits to the jurisdiction, but traverses his departure; as the caſe of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, 3 E. 3. remembered by Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inſt. in his Chapter of Parliament, (as far as he reports it) ſeems rather to be an authority againſt the jurisdiction of any other Court beſides the Parliament itſelf, in ſuch caſe of proceeding againſt a Member to puniſh him for non-attendance: For the Biſhop being impleaded by original writ at the King's ſuit, (which I ſuppoſe was in the King's-Bench) quia recuſſit à Parlamento ſine licentia Regis.

The Biſhop pleaded quod ipſe eſt unus de paribus, & dicit, quod ſi quis eorum deliquerit in Dominum Regem in aliquo Parlamento, in Parlamento debet corrigi & emendari, & non alibi in minori curia. And ſo Sir E. C. ſeems to leave the victory on the Biſhop's ſide, and that his plea ſucceeded. But Sir Francis Moor, 779, 780. reports the caſe of the Lord Sturton, and the Lord Mordant, how they were deeply fined in the Star-chamber, 4 Jac. for abſenting from Parliament, at the complaint of the Attorney General, ore tenus. And there were then preſent in the Star-chamber, the Lord-Chancellor, Chief-juſtice Popham, Fleming, and Walmſley. And for precedents to juſtify the proceeding againſt them in that Court, they cite the caſe of the Earl of Cornwal, 4 H. 3. and the Biſhop of Wincheſter's caſe, (which I mentioned but now) 3 E. 3. how that for departing from Parliament, without licence, their lands were seized.

But the objection in our case is, concerning a matter of election of a Knight of a Shire to serve in Parliament: that no other Court but the Parliament must meddle in it, as the objectors would have it.

Answ. It is not impertinent therefore, to enquire briefly of the true Jurisdiction in this matter.

Sir Robert Cotton affirms, that writs of Summons for Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament, began 49 H. 3. and that the admittance of Commons into the Parliament, was purposely to lessen and curb the power of the Lords, after the daring Earl of Leicester was slain in the battle of Evesham, (which was that very year) and the Barons were totally routed by Prince Edward, (afterwards King E. 1.) and K. H. 3. was rescued out of their hands. And to back that opinion, it is observed, that the first writ to the Sheriffs, to summon two Knights out of every Shire, that is to be found upon record, is that of the close Roll 49 H. 3. (the very same year) dorso 10 and 11. Thus Mr. Prynne affirms, in his preface to the abridgment of the Records of the Tower, fol. 11. in the beginning of that fol. and fol. 13 b. in the middle of that fol.

But we must not be governed by Historians in matters of law; and therefore notwithstanding this observation of Sir Robert Cotton's and Mr. Prynne's, we must presume that the House of Commons, and election of Knights of the Shire, are as ancient as the Common Law, and have been time immemorial; because we find no written law that does first begin any such Institution.

But to come closer to the objection, and to enquire who are the proper Judges of the right of elections.

Mr. Prynne, in the same preface, fol. 14. b. in the middle of it, (as I myself have folio'd it, for the print has no folios to the preface;) "The King and Lords (says he) were anciently sole Judges of the legality of elections of Members of the House of Commons, till the time of King Henry 7."

And in Sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment, fol. 392. the year 1 H. 4. num. 80. at the prayer of the Commons, the King declares, that the Commons were only petitioners, and that all judgments appertain to the King and Lords, unless it were in Statutes, Grants, Subsidies, or such like; the which order the King would from that time to be observed.

But we know that the House of Commons is now possess'd of the jurisdiction of determining all questions concerning the election of their own Members; so far at least, as is in order to their being admitted or excluded from sitting there. But how far their judgment is concluding to all others to other purposes, I have now no just occasion to examine; for, as has been observ'd, the plaintiff in this case grounds his action upon his original right of election, and mentions the determination of the house on his side; and not only alledges that he was duly elected, but so returned by the defendant himself: And that tho' he were for some time hindered from sitting, by occasion of the false return, made by the defendant on purpose, and the election was under question by it, yet he prov'd it clearly to the house, and was admitted, and his election declared good; and taking it for granted that he was duly elected, he sues in the King's-Bench, by this action to recover damages for the injury done him by the defendant, for which the house of Commons could not have help'd him. For to that purpose they have no jurisdiction, for they cannot examine a witness upon oath, nor can they act the part of a Jury to give damages, nor have they any power to award a trial, or to cause the Sheriff to impanel a Jury.

Obj. 3. This is an action of a new invention, and primæ impressionis, and never any such was brought before, save that of Nevil against Stroud; which never had any determination.

Anf. 'Tis true, 'tis new, in the particular circumstances, but not in the main, nor in the substance; 'tis new, in that 'tis brought by one elected Knight of a Shire against the Sheriff, for a false and malicious return of another Indenture, whereby the plaintiff was put to great expence and trouble; but 'tis not new in the general nature of the action. For nothing is more frequent than actions upon the case, where an injury is done and damage sustained; nay, 'tis very frequent for actions upon the case to be brought against Sheriffs, for mere false returns, and that where there is no malice, nor any of those great aggravations that appear in this case.

For this I refer you to the case in Rolls's Abr. 1. part. fol. 99. Getin, Palmer and Marshall, in the King's-Bench; where the Bailiff of a franchise was newly removed; but tho' he were removed, took upon him to answer, but made a false answer to the Sheriff's warrant, to execute a Fieri fac' against an administrator, and the Sheriff made that return to the Court; and thereupon an action upon the case brought against the Sheriff, and adjudged it lies: And that the Sheriff at his peril must take notice who is the rightful bailiff of the franchise, and accept of no answer to his warrant from any other.

19 H. 6. 29. An action upon the case against a deputy Sheriff, for embezzeling a writ.

19 H. 6. 38. by Pafton. If a Sheriff upon a Venire fac' return a Jury that is insufficient to pay issues, the next Sheriff to whom the issues are estreated to be levied, must charge himself with the issues, and must not return a Nilil, but shall have an action upon the case against his predecessor, for his false return; yet here is no malice, but at the most a neglect, or a mistake only.

39 E. 3. 7. Brook. action upon the case, 67.

An action upon the case against a Sheriff for not summoning and warning a man in due time, upon a writ of Præmunire or attachment, whereby he sustained damage, as judgment given against him, or the like. This is but a bare neglect or omission, and seems to be the least or lowest sort of injuries; and yet being accompanied with a particular damage to the party, tho' without any malice on the Sheriff's part, the action will lie.

3 E. 4. 20. Brook. action upon the case, pl. 91. by Danby and Pigot, for a false return only.

If a Nilil be returned against me who have land, F. N. B. 93. 31 E. 3. Fitz. Abr. Proces 55.

So for not returning a writ of second deliverance, which is a mere neglect and non-feasance, tho' there be no malice, 21 E. 3. 43. Br. Act. f. ca. pl. 48. 5 Rep. 32. b. 91. 7 Rep. 1.

So against a Bishop, if he falsely return, that an executor has not refused the executorship, when re vera he has refused it, 2 Leon. 221.

So against an escheator. 9 H. 6. 60. 21 E. 4. 23. 27.

Much more shall the action upon the case lie against the Sheriff, as the circumstances of this case are, where the return is not only false, but he knew knew it to be false, and he did it maliciously, with a purpose to hinder the plaintiff from sitting, and to put him to expence, and where the plaintiff has had so great a damage. And the Sheriff by his oath is oblig'd to do right as well to poor as to rich, in all that belongeth to his office. 2. To do no wrong to any man for favour nor hate. 3. To disturb no man's right. 4. Truly to return, and truly to serve all the King's writs, as far forth as shall be within his cunning. And the Jury by their verdict in this case, have found the defendant to fail in every one of these clauses of his oath. And tho' the circumstances that do diversify all cases are new in this case; yet 'tis very frequent in actions upon the case, to have new cases and new circumstances; and there is nothing more frequent than this variety and novelty.

Sir Fran. Bacon, in his Book of advancement of learning, speaking of cases omitted in law, fol. 38. says, That the narrow compass of man's wisdom cannot comprehend all cases which time hath found out; and therefore cases omitted and new, do often present themselves, but every new case does not require a new law; for then the legislative power must be continually exercis'd: But tho' it differs from former cases in circumstances, yet it may fall under a general rule, or be proceeded upon by parity of reason; ubi est eadem ratio, ibi idem est jus.

And the Statute of W. 21. cap. 24. has made ample provision for all such new cases that fall under a general rule, but have no form'd writ, or writ of course that fits it in all the particulars and circumstances. In consimili casu, simili remedio indigente, fiat breve, says that Statute.

In the 8th Rep. fol. 48. Jebu Webb's case, there you have the distinction of writs; some are brevia formata seu de cursu, and from thence the Curstors have their name, because they have the drawing of those writs.

Some are brevia Magistralia quæ nec sunt de cursu nec formata, i. e. de aliqua certa forma, sed sæpius variant secundum varietatem casuum, factorum & querularum; as are actions upon the case, &c. which have not any certain form, but are upon occasion drawn by the Masters of the Chancery, and from thence are called Magistralia; all this is by virtue of the words of the Statute of W. II. c. 24. Concordant clerici in Cancellaria de brevi faciendo. 2 Inst. 405, 406, 407.

And many new cases may be put, that have no parallel cases to be found in our Books, if all the particulars and circumstances be regarded, as the case, 8 Car. Croke 291. in the King's Bench, where an action upon the case is brought against an Apparitor, for what he did in his office, viz. for falsely and maliciously presenting one, and that in the Spiritual Court, for incontinency. This was against an officer for what he did in his office, and to which his oath obliged him; and this was for a thing done in the spiritual Court, viz. the Consistory Court at Exeter, and for a matter merely of ecclesiastical cognisance, viz. incontinency, wherein the Common Law had nothing to do; and this case had no parallel nor precedent before it: and yet being an injury and damage to the party presented, and done falsely and maliciously, and without colour, and for which the party injured could have no recompence in any other Court, but at Common Law, it was adjudged the action lay. This case, tho' it had no parallel before it in all the circumstances, yet in many respects it is a paralleled to the case before us. There is the like action against constables for making a false presentment, Croke Car. 467. and the case I cited before against a Sumner. 12 Rep. 128.

And for that objection and observation concerning the novelty of this action, this more may be said in answer to it; That till of late years Sheriffs have given no occasion for the like action of this; for double returns, upon elections to Parliament, have not been in ancient times.

Mr. Prynne, in his Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, fol. 137. observes, that there were not above two or three cases of elections questioned from 49 H. 3. till 22 E. 4. for ought appears by the returns, or Parliament-Rolls, and not so much as one double return or indenture.

And the common law does comply with and conform to the general opinion and genius of the Kingdom, and values what they generally esteem and value, and disesteems what they value not.

Heretofore an election to serve in Parliament, was not a thing so desirable, and so much sought after as now-a-days it is; and it is not the desire or seeking after it, that is to be disliked or condemn'd, for he that desireth the office of a Bishop (says the Apostle) desires a good office; but it is the undue means used, or the ill ends for which it is desired, that makes the seeking bad.

Mr. Prynne, ut supra, fol. 165. anno 1 E. 3. a writ issued to elect two Knights for the county of Northumberland, and the Sheriff returned this answer, communitas commit. Northumbriae sic respondet; quod ipsi per inimicos Scotia adeo sunt destructi, quod non habent unde solvere expensa duobus militibus proficisuris ad consilium apud Lincoln. tenendum.

In his fourth part of his Register of Parliamentary writs, is mentioned a Patent of exemption granted 42 E. 1. to the town of Torrington in Devonshire; which Patent recites in its preamble, that the men of that town never used to send Burgesses to Parliament, till the Sheriff 21 E. 1. summonitos fuisse malitiose retornavit.

So that a malicious return to Parliament, is no new thing, but has been formerly done; and as the plaintiff in this action has well sued the Sheriff for returning another with him, so I make no doubt but as the case then stood with the general humour and opinion of the people, those of Torrington might have had their remedy against the then Sheriff for returning them summoned.

And the Law is still the same, in that it still sets a price and esteem upon that which the people generally esteem and value:

And several cases have been put to prove, that new Statutes have given occasion to new actions upon the case, which actions could not have been sued at the Common Law; and yet those new Laws and statutes, do not give those new actions, but only occasioned them.

Barnes vers. Carey 12 Jac. King's-Bench; Rolls' Rep. fol. 47.

The plaintiff there brought an action upon the case against the Sheriff of Bristol, for suffering J. S. to escape out of his custody. J. S. being committed by the Commissioners of bankrupts, for refusing to answer Interrogatories, the plaintiff being one of the creditors, and J. S. a bankrupt; and after many exceptions taken to the declaration, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. And yet there was no such thing as a commission of bankrupt at the common Law; but the common Law takes occasion, sion by the statutes of bankrupt, to give such an action upon the case, which before those statutes could not have been sued.

In like manner the common Law takes occasion by those statutes that give the action of waste against tenant for life, or years, against whom it lay not by common Law, to give an action upon the case against such tenants, if they will not permit their Lessors to enter upon the thing demised, to view whether waste be done or not. Croke 2 part, 478.

Object. 4. That there is not one case in Law parallel to this case, for a Sheriff to be sued for returning the whole truth, and something more than the truth: tho' actions for false returns are frequent.

Ans. This is an action for a false return, and something more. That it is for a false return, appears by that allegation, that he did falsely make his return, and the Jury have found it so, and we must believe it. And it was false in this, in that he returned an Indenture pretended to be under the hands and seals of divers persons, as the greater part of the said county, purporting the choice of another than the plaintiff to be Knight of the Shire. The plaintiff does not alledge, that there ever was any such Indenture sealed by any person; but that the defendant did falsely return another Indenture, purporting the same to be made by divers persons, &c. So that we may reasonably understand it, that in truth there never was any such Indenture sealed by any but the Sheriff himself, and not by any others that were present at the election. 2dly, Tho' the Sheriff have returned the whole truth, yet together with that truth he returned a falsehood; and till it was re-examined, it could not appear which was the truth, and in the mean time the plaintiff sustained all his damage.

Object. 5. That the Sheriff acted herein as a judge, and therefore if he err, he is not to be sued for it, but his error may be reformed; and the Law will not suffer an averment tending to the discredit of a Judge. Pl. comment. 491. b. and Dy. 89. b.

Ans. All this is true, as to one that is a judge of Record, in respect of the greatness of his authority, and the great trust the King and the law repose in a judge of Record. But the Sheriff is no judge at all in what he acts in the election of Knights for the Shire, but is only an officer upon Record, 9 H. 6. 53. and 60. Br. Ab. Tit. Act. f. ca. plac. 6. tho' in some particular cases indeed, the Sheriff is a judge, as in a Justicies, 6 Rep. 12. ad fin. and a judge of Record, as in a Re-disseisin, by the Statute of Merton, c. 13.

Object. 6. The Statute of 23 H. 6. c. 15. has provided a remedy against the Sheriff for any abuse committed by him in elections, viz. the penalty of a hundred pound, in case of Knights of the Shire, to the Knight injured: And it does recite in the preamble, that a convenient remedy for the party grieved, is not ordained in the former statutes; and from hence it is inferred, that there was no remedy for the party grieved at the common Law, nor before this statute.

Ans. I have already proved, that there was a remedy at the common Law, and before this statute; and this statute is an argument to prove it, for this statute mentions a party grieved, and there could be no grief without a remedy, otherwise the Law would have been defective. And it cannot be denied, but that if there were a remedy at the common Law, this statute being in the affirmative, does not take it away, only it gives another remedy.

And far the words of this statute of 23 H. 6. that a convenient remedy for the party grieved is not ordained by the former statutes; this does not argue that there was no remedy at the common Law, nor does it argue that there was no remedy at all; but that there was no convenient remedy by those former statutes, and thereupon the statute of 23 H. 6. gives an hundred pound to the Knight injured by an undue return.

I shall put some like cases where Acts of Parliament give remedies, where yet there were other remedies before at common Law, and the party may sue for either; Rolls' Ab. 1 part, fol. 93. case 20.

A Distingas is awarded to the Sheriff to distrain the defendant in an action, and the Sheriff returns too small issues, tho' an averment lies by the statute of W. II. c. 43. yet the plaintiff may well have his action upon the case against the Sheriff, because it appears by the words of the statute, that it is a false return. Observe the argument there used, viz.

If the action upon the case did not lie, in such case the plaintiff had not any remedy at the common Law, which was greatly mischievous; and the statute (as is there observed) tho' it gives a new remedy, and takes no notice of any remedy that was before in the case, yet it does not restrain the plaintiff from any remedy that he had at the common Law. 'Tis there indeed made a Quero; but Serjeant Rolls has this Note upon it, that Tr. 3 Car. one Mrs. Bennet, upon good advice, brought such an action upon the case against the Sheriff of London, for returning too small issues against the Mayor and commonalty of London.

The statute of W. II. c. 24. (Sir E. C. 2 Inst. fol. 404, 405.) first gives an assize of nuisance against the Alienee of him that levied that nuisance; and that statute seems (as Sir E. C. observes) to understand that the party grieved was without any remedy before; for it provides in these words, de cetero non recedant querentes a curia Regis sine remedio: yet Sir E. C. takes notice, fol. 405. of his 2 Inst. at the lower end of that folio, upon the words (a curia) That the makers of that Act knew well that the party injured by the nuisance, might enter upon the ground of the wrong-doer, not only when it was in his hands, but after it was aliened too, and abate the nuisance, and so prevent himself of the remedy by assize of nuisance given by this Act. And besides this, he had another remedy by action, viz. If he had any particular damage (says Sir E. C.) he might bring his action upon the case, and recover damage, ne querentes recederent a curia sine remedio.

Object. The ground of this action against the Sheriff is for making a double return. Now the declaration sets forth only one perfect return, and that is of the plaintiff's election, which the declaration says, was secundum exigentiam brevis; and it was by Indenture, under the seal of the Sheriff and Electors: And tho' the plaintiff alleges, that the late Sheriff and the Electors returned another Indenture of the election of another person, (which is the gravamen that he complains of) yet that appears to be no return; for it was not said, that that Indenture was under any seals. And the statutes of 7 H. 4. c. 15. and 8 H. 6. c. 7. require Indentures ensealed by the electors to be tack'd to the writ, which Indentures so sealed and tacked, shall be holden for the Sheriff's return.

Ans. This other Indenture last mentioned, must be understood an Indenture ensealed, in like manner as the former; for the declaration just before men-mentions the first Indenture, whereby the Plaintiff was returned to be chosen, and that it is said to be so enfealed, as the Statutes require; and then the declaration says, that the Sheriff, together with that Indenture, return'd another Indenture: so that it must be reasonably understood, to be an Indenture, in like manner enfealed.

And then 'tis said by the declaration, of this last Indenture, that it was annexed to the Writ; and so return'd by the Defendant the Sheriff, which must therefore be presum'd to be an Indenture enfealed, or else to what purpose did the Defendant annex it to the Writ, and return it?

And further the declaration says, that by reason of the false return, the Plaintiff could not be admitted into the Lower House, till he had made proof of his Election. Now, if that other Indenture were not enfealed, it could not be said to be a false return; for it would indeed have been no return, and it could not have hindered the Plaintiff from being admitted, nor put him to the proof of his Election.

And that the Indenture must be understood an Indenture enfealed, by those that were present at the Election, appears by the Writ; the form whereof you will find in Crompt. Jurisdiction of Courts, fol. 1. b. the Clause is this; Et nomina eorundem militum, sic electorum, in quibusdam Indenturis, inter te & illos qui hujusmodi Electioni interfuerint inde consuecendis, inseri. And in another Clause, Et Electionem illam sub sigillo tuo & sigillis eorum qui Electioni illi interfuerint nobis in Cancellariam certifies, remittens nobis alteram partem Indenturar. predictar. presentibus consutam una cum hoc breve.

There is a verdict given for the Plaintiff; and damages found to the value of 800 l. and Judgment thereupon, and a Writ of Error is brought to reverse that Judgment.

I have but little Time left me, to say what I have to offer, it being very late; and yet I must desire leave to produce those reasons I have in maintenance of my opinion: I will be careful not to detain you longer than will be necessary.

And therefore, I will not trouble you with starting the case again, nor will I speak of any exceptions that have been made to the declaration, for I love not the niceties of the Law, in cases where they do prevail: and in this case I have only considered the foundations of the action; which if I had found well-established upon reason, or the grounds of the Law, I would have examined what has been objected to the forms of the declaration, which must have brought great weight to have overturned those Proceedings.

But as the point of the action, upon the most serious consideration I could have of it, and weighing what has been before now, and also at this time, said in support of it; I am of opinion, that the Judgment ought to be reversed; for that no such action as this, at Bar, does lie by the Common Law.

Because this is a cause of considerable value, great damages being recovered; because it is a Judgment of great authority, being upon a cause tried at the King's-Bench Bar, and given upon deliberation there; because it is a case of an extraordinary nature, and of great import, each party pretending benefit to the Parliament by it; because it is an action Præmissæ Impressionis, that never was before adjudged, the report of which will be lifted after: I have taken pains to collect and set down the reasons that I must go upon in determining this case; that as the Judgment had the countenance of some deliberation in the Court where it was given; so the reversal being with greater deliberation, may appear grounded upon reasons that ought to prevail.

I can say with my brother Windham, that I love rather to affirm Judgments, than to reverse them; but I can attribute nothing of authority to the Judgment

ment, tho' it were given in a superiour Court, and upon deliberation; I must judge of it as if the case came to be judged originally by me: the argument to support a judgment from the authority of itself, is, Exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitur Dissolutio, which must not be admitted in cases of Writs of error. We are entrusted to examine and correct the errors of that Court, and for that purpose we are made superior to it; we must proceed according to our own knowledge and discretion, or else we do not perform the trust reposed in us.

I must needs say, this is a cause that imports it more than any cause I have known to come before us, for it is a cause Primæ Impressiōis; and the question is, whether by this Judgment a change of the Common Law be introduced. It is the principal use of Writs of Error, and Appeals, to hinder the change of the Law; therefore do Writs of Error in our Law, and Appeals in the Civil Law, carry Judgments and Decrees to be examin'd by superior Courts until they come to the highest, who are entrusted that they will not change the Law.

Therefore do Writs of Error lie from Ireland, which is a subordinate Kingdom to England, by whose Laws it is governed; that they might not be able to change the Law by their Judgments, and not so much for the particular right of the party.

For otherwise it would be very easy for Judges by construction and interpretation to change even a written Law, and it would be most easy for the Judges of the Common Laws of England, which are not written, but depend upon usage, to make a change in them; especially if they may justify themselves by such a rule as my brother Atkins lays down to support this case, viz. that the Common Law complies with the genius of the Nation. I admit that the Laws are fitted to the genius of the Nation; but when that genius changes, the Parliament is only entrusted to judge of it, and by changing the Law to make it suitable to it. But if the Judges shall say it is Common Law, because it suits with the genius of the Nation; they may take upon them to change the whole as well as any part of it, the consequence whereof may easily be seen; I wish we had not found it by sad experience.

If the case at the bar be a change of the Law, it is happy that it comes to be questioned in the first instance; for if this cause had been any way agreed and quitted, and a second case of this nature had been question'd, there would have been a precedent urg'd, which cannot be spoke of here; for this case hath no fellow, there never having been the like Judgment before.

The method I shall take in what I have to say, shall be,

- 1st. To remove some prejudice the Case is under.
- 2^{dly}. Give my reasons against the Action.
- 3^{dly}. Weigh what has been said to maintain the Action.

1st. The case is under this prejudice, that an action of the case lies for false returns of Sheriffs, and why should it not lie in this case as well as any other?

To remove this prejudice, I shall shew some material differences betwixt the nature of ordinary returns and this return.

In ordinary returns the party is concluded, and absolutely without remedy; for the Court must take the return as the Sheriff makes it. In ordinary cases the Sheriff may, and frequently does, take security of the Plaintiff, or the Sheriff hath means by Law to be secure; as, if he doubts the property of the goods, he may return a Fieri facias, Nullus venit ad monstrandum bona. In some cases he may, for his safety, impanel a Jury, as upon an Elegit; or he may resort to the Court, and pray reasonable time to prepare his return, if the matter be difficult; and hath other shelters, that if he be wary, will save him from danger.

But in this case the party is not concluded, for upon a Petition to the Parliament, if they see it just, they will cause the return to be altered by the Clerk of the Crown, if the Sheriff be not in the way; in this case, the Sheriff may not take security, it were criminal in him to make such a return by compact, nor can the Sheriff make a fruitless return, or obtain delay to consult his safety.

These differences are of that nature, that they change the case in the reason of it, as I shall hereafter make appear: and no man can infer, because an action lies for false returns in ordinary cases; therefore it lies in case of a return to Parliament, where the Sheriff is clearly upon terms.

My reasons against this action are applicable to this case, and make it different from all the cases, that have been put by my brothers that argued for the action: I observe they argued only upon generals, without any other application to this case than by the topick of concluding, a Minori ad Majus, because an action lies in cases of inferior nature, therefore it will lie in this; which rule holds not in diverse cases, where there are particular reasons to the contrary, as I shall by and by shew to be in this.

2^{dly}, I shall give you my reasons against this action, which are as follow:

(1.) My first reason is this, because the Sheriff as to the declaring the majority is judge, and no action will lie against a Judge, for what he does judicially, tho' it should be laid falso, malitiose & scienter; as appears in Co. 12. Rep. fol. 24. They who are intrusted to judge, ought to be free from vexation, that they may determine without fear; the Law requires courage in a Judge, and therefore provides security for the support of that courage. But,

1. Is the Sheriff a Judge in this case? And,
2. Is there the same reason he should be freed from all actions?

As to the first, it is of necessity, that as to the declaring the majority, he should be Judge upon the place: in other cases, in the County Court, the Freeholders are the Judges, and he is the Minister. When we say the Freeholders, we mean the major part of them is to judge; but when the question is, which is the major part, they cannot determine the question; but of necessity the Sheriff must determine that, the nature of the thing speaks it.

Therefore it was held rightly in Letchmere's case, 13 and 14 Car. II. that as to the Election of Knights to the Parliament, the Court is properly the Sheriff's Court, and the Writ is in the nature of a special commission, Elegi facias.

I know a Judge may have many ministerial Acts incumbent upon him, as the Chief-Justices have to certify Records upon Writs of Error; therefore it is necessary for me to observe, that the suit here is for what he does as a Judge, and not for any thing ministerial; which appears by the averment, that the Sheriff annexed another Indenture, specifying it to be made by the major part of the Freeholders, and containing that the Lord Huntingtore was chosen, ubi re vera the Lord Huntingtoure was not chosen by the major part of the Freeholders. If it had been said ubi re vera the Freeholders supposed to seal the same, never did seal the same, there had been a falsity in his ministerial part of sending in the Indenture; but his sending his two Indentures, which were really sealed by the Freeholders, as they import; wherein the Freeholders of each Indenture (and not the Sheriff) say, that they are the major part, is no falsity in his ministerial part, but only deferring to judge between them, which is the major part; or more properly judging that they are both equal in number.

They object, that the matter of this question is not matter of Judgment, 'tis but counting the Poll, which requires Arithmetick, but not Judgment; but certainly if it be rightly considered, it will be thought this question of majority is not barely a question of fact, but a question of judgment, a question of difficult judgment, there are so many qualifications of Electors.

1. They must have 40 s. per annum, there the value must be judged.

2. It must be Freehold; there the Title.

3. It must be their own; there colourable and fraudulent gifts made many times on purpose to get voices, must be judged.

4. The Electors must be resident; here the settlement of the party must be determin'd.

5. There are many things that incapacitate voices, as bribery, force, &c. and many other questions arise, that are of such difficulty in debate of them, much time is spent in Parliament; and sometimes a Committee determines one way, and the House another. Is not this then a question that refers to Judgment?

They object again, the Sheriff may give an oath concerning all the qualifications, and he is to look no farther.

I answer, the statute has given the Sheriff power to give an oath in assistance of him; but the Statute does not say that whosoever takes that oath shall have a voice: neither does the Statute 23 Hen. VI. say that the Sheriff shall not be charged with a false return, that pursues that way: so that altho' he may use those means for his direction, yet he must consider his own safety, and not make a false return. If a man, upon taking such an oath, give the Sheriff a special answer, or if it should be known to the Sheriff he swears false; the Sheriff must determine according to his own judgment, and not by what is sworn.

It may hence be concluded, that the Sheriff, as to declaring a majority is a Judge; and if so, my next assertion is, that there is the same reason he should be free from actions, as any Judge in Westminster-hall, or any other Judge. Does it not import the publick, that the sheriff should deal uprightly and impartially? Ought he not to have courage, and for that end should not the Law provide him security?

Consider his disadvantages, what a noise and croud accompany such elections; what importunity, nay, what violence there is upon him from the contesting parties.

We may say, no other Judge has more need of courage and resolution to manage himself, and determine uprightly, than he. No other Judge determines in a case of greater consequence to the publick, or difficulty, than he; expose him to such actions, and in most Elections he must have trouble; for commonly each party is confident of his strength, his conduct, and his friends; that let the Sheriff return never so uprightly, the party that is rejected will revenge it by a suit, especially if he may sue at Common Law, to have boundless damages, without running any hazard himself, but of the loss of his costs.

VOL. VII.

If we Judges, that find ourselves secure from actions, should not be tender of others, that are in the same circumstances; it may well be said, Wo unto you, for you impose heavy burthens upon others, but will not bear the least of them yourselves.

2. My second reason is, because it is alieni fort, either to examine the right of the Election, or behaviour of the Sheriff; both which are incident, and indeed the only considerations that can guide in the Trial of such causes, if they be allowed.

It is admitted, that the Parliament is the only proper Judicature, to determine the right of Election, and to censure the behaviour of the Sheriff. How then can the common Law try a cause, that cannot determine of those things, without which the cause cannot be try'd.

No action upon the case will lie for breach of a trust, because the determination of the principal thing, the trust, does not belong to the common Law, but to the Court of Chancery: certainly the reason of the case at bar is stronger, as the Parliament ought to have more reverence than the Court of Chancery.

They object, that it may be tried after the Parliament hath decided the Election; for then that which the Common Law could not try, is determined, and the Parliament cannot give the party the costs he is put unto.

Then I perceive they would have the determination of the Parliament binding to the Sheriff in the action, which it cannot be; for that is between other parties to which the Sheriff is not call'd: it is against the course of Law, that any Judgment, Decree or Proceeding betwixt other parties should bind the interest of, or any way conclude a third person; no more ought it to do here: it may be easy for parties combining to represent a case so to the Parliament, that the right of Election may appear either way as the parties please. Is it fit the Sheriff, who is not admitted to controvert such determination, should be concluded by it, in an action brought against him, to make him pay the reckoning?

Did the Parliament believe, when they determined this Election, that they pass'd Sentence against the Sheriff, upon which he must pay 800 l? Sure if they had imagin'd so, they would, nay in Justice they ought to have heard his defence, before they determin'd it.

And yet that was the measure of this case, the Sheriff was not heard in Parliament, indeed he was not blamed there: and yet upon the Trial, which concerned him so deeply, he was not allowed to defend himself, by shewing any majority or equality of voices, the Parliament having determin'd the Election.

I do not by these reflections tax the Law of Injustice, or the course of Parliament of Inconvenience; I am an admirer of the methods of both: it is from the Excellency of them, I conclude this Proceeding in this new-fangled action, being absurd, unjust and unreasonable, cannot be legal.

To answer the other branch of this objection, I say, it does not follow, that because the Parli-ment cannot give costs; therefore this new-devised action must lie, to help the party to them.

For then such an action might as well lie in all cases, where there is a wrong to be remedied by course of Law, and no costs are given for it.

At the Common Law no costs were given in any case, and many cases remain at this day, where the Statutes have given no costs: as in a Prohibition, Scire facias, and Quare impedit, and divers other cases; and yet no action will lie to recover those costs, and why should it lie in the case at Bar?

In this case the Parliament have already had it under their consideration in the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and have appointed what shall be paid by the Sheriff that offends, viz. 100 l. to the party, 100 l. to the King, and imprisonment; the Parliament have stated what shall be paid for compensation, and what for punishment, and would have provided for costs, if they had thought fit.

3. My third reason is, because a double return is a lawful means for the Sheriff to perform his duty in doubtful cases.

If this be so, then all aggravations of falso, malitiose & scienter, will not make the thing actionable; for whatever a man may do for his safety, cannot be the ground of an action.

There is sometimes Damnum absque injuria, tho' the thing be done on purpose to bring a loss upon another, without any design of benefit to himself; as if a new house be erected contiguous to my ground, I may build any thing on purpose to blind the lights of that new house, and no action will accrue, tho' the malice were never so great; much less will it lie, when a man acts for his own safety.

If a Jury will find a special verdict; if a Judge will advise and take time to consider; if a Bishop will delay a Patron, and impanel a Jury to enquire of the Right of Patronage; you cannot bring an action for these delays, tho' you suppose it to be done maliciously, and on purpose to put you to charges; tho' you suppose it to be done scienter, knowing the Law to be clear: for they take but the liberty the Law has provided for their safety, and there can be no demonstration that they have not real doubts, for these are within their own breasts; it would be very mischievous; that a man might not have leave to doubt without so great peril.

The course of Parliament makes out the ground of this reason to be true in fact, so that a double return is lawful when the Sheriff doubts; for if the Parliament did not allow a double return in doubtful cases, they ought never to accept a double return: if it were in itself a void and unlawful return, they ought not to endure it a moment, but send for the Sheriff, and compel him forthwith to make a single return. But we see where there is doubt, the Parliament sends not for the Sheriff before they have examin'd the case, and given particular directions.

And it must of necessity be the course: for suppose the voices are equal; suppose the Election is void for force; suppose the Sheriff doubts upon the validity of some voices, shall he transmit his doubts, specially to Parliament? Was there ever any such thing done? Was there ever any other way but to make a double return, and leave it fairly to the decision of the Parliament?

It was said by my brother Ellis, that if the Sheriff had return'd, in the nature of a special verdict, the special matter, and had concluded in this manner, viz. if the Parliament shall adjudge Sir Samuel Barnardiston to be chosen, then he returns him; and if the Parliament shall adjudge the Lord Hunting-towre to be chosen, then he returns him; that such a return as this had been safe, and could not have borne an action.

This is a pretty invention, found out for argument sake, but methinks it furnishes no force at all to the part for which it is brought, but rather shews the right to be the other way: for let any man of reason say, whether a double return, as it is now used, be not the same thing in consequence? Is not a double return, as if the Sheriff should say to the Parliament, "The right of Election is between these two, I am in doubt which of them I shall reject, and expect your directions." This is the import of a double return, and is the same in effect, as if it had concluded like a special verdict; and so my brother Ellis's instance should not be actionable, tho' he concluded otherwise.

That other new-fangled way could not be receiv'd. —For,

1. The Freeholders would never join in such a return.
2. Such a return is not capable of being amended by the Sheriff.

But the judgment of the Parliament must be entered upon record, to make it any return; it concluding nothing of itself, as a special verdict concludes nothing, till the judgment of the Court be enter'd upon the roll with it.

3. The Parliament will not, as I believe, admit of new devices in the course of their Proceedings, whatever we do at Law.

But the double return is practicable in the Country, for the Freeholders of each part will tender their Indentures; and it is easily amended in Parliament, by rejecting the Indenture of those Freeholders that were not the major part, which way has been practis'd in doubtful cases for many years.

So that I apprehend the case at Bar, to be more regular and favourable, than that case, which my brother Ellis put as a case that would bear an action.

Again, suppose the Sheriff had inform'd the Parliament of his doubts, and that he could not readily determine where the majority was, but it was betwixt two persons, A. and B. and thereupon desir'd their favour, either to grant him time to determine it, if they pleas'd to command him so to do, or else, that they would decide it themselves, and he would obey what directions they should make in it; and thereupon the Parliament had taken upon themselves to determine it.

This most clearly had not been actionable, for it is not actionable to delay a return, to any Court of Justice, where the Sheriff hath leave from the Court so to do.

A double return, in my understanding, speaks the same thing, to the Parliament; and upon it they may either direct the Sheriff to make a single return, which is to cause him to decide it, or they may do it themselves.

And here, I must needs reflect upon the second reason I gave against this action, that the matter of it is alieni fori; I find myself and my brothers that argued for the action, engaged in a discourse of the nature of a double return, and the course of Parliament upon it, which, as a Judge, I cannot so well speak to. I had the honour to be of this House of Commons, and whilst I was there, I considered sidered as well as I cou'd the course of the Proceedings of the House, and am therefore able to speak something of them; and I am brought into this discourse necessarily by this action: but I must needs say, it is an improper discourse for Judges, for they know not what is the course of Parliament, nor the privilege of Parliament. When the Lords in Parliament, whom they are bound to assist with their advice, ask the Judges any thing, concerning the course or privilege of Parliament, they have answer'd, that they know them not, nor can advise concerning them.

If in Parliament we do not know, nor can advise concerning these things; how can we judge upon them out of Parliament? We ought to know before we judge; and therefore we cannot judge of things we cannot know.

Our being engaged in a discourse improper for Judges, shews the action to be improper, as much as any other argument that can be made; and this argument arises from my brothers that argued for the action.

But now I am in this discourse, I must go a little farther; my observation from the course of Parliament has been, that they will not permit the Sheriff to delay his return, to deliberate, and he cannot take security of either party; and if a single return be not justified by the Committee of Elections, he is in danger of the Statute of 23 Hen. VI.

It follows, that there is no way for an innocent Sheriff to be safe, where he conceives doubt, but in making a double return; and if that should be actionable too, the service of the Parliament would be the most ungrateful service in the world.

It seems ridiculous to me, that it should be objected, that this course of Law is necessary to prevent the great mischief arising from double returns; whenas, if it be a mischief, or disliked by the Parliament, either in general or any particular case; they may reject them when they please, and command the Sheriff to make a single return; so that they may remedy it by their practice, without their Legislative Power.

Their practice hitherto has been to receive double returns, which therefore in some cases must be lawful, and in this very case the double return was accepted, and the Sheriff no way punish'd for it; which he ought to have been, if he had been blameable.

If double returns are accepted by Parliament, they are allow'd, and we must say they are lawful, which is the ground of my third reason; for which I hold this action not maintainable.

4. My fourth reason is, That there is no legal damages occasioned by the Sheriff. The damages laid in the declaration are,

1. Being kept from sitting in the House.

2. The pains and charges he was put unto, to get his admittance into the House.

1. That of his being kept from sitting in the House, is as much every man's damage in the whole County, nay, in the whole Kingdom; and any man else, might as well have an action for it, as the Member chosen.

To sit in Parliament is a service in the Member, for the benefit of the King and Kingdom; and not for the particular profit of the Member.

It is a rule in Law, that no particular man may bring an action for a nuisance to the King's highway; because all the men in England might as well have actions, which would be infinite: and therefore such an offence is punishable only by Indictment, except there be special loss occasion'd by that nuisance.

For the same reason, the exclusion of a Member from the House, being as much damage to all men in England, as to himself; he, nor any man else in England, can have an action for it; but it is punishable upon the publick score, and not otherwise.

For this reason was the Statute 23 Hen. VI. wisely consider'd: by that Statute the action is not given to the party for his particular damage; but the action given is a popular action, only the party griev'd hath a preference for six months: but if he do not sue in that time, every man else is at liberty to recover the same sum.

2. The other point of damage, is the pains and charges he was put unto, and that is not occasion'd by the Sheriff, but by the deliberation of the House. Why should the Sheriff pay for that? It may be, if the Parliament had sent for the Sheriff the first day, and blamed the double return, he would have ventur'd to determine the matter speedily, and there should have been no cause of complaint for delay: but the Parliament saw so much cause of doubt, that they think it not fit to put the Sheriff to determine, but to resolve to examine the matter, and give him directions that may guide him in mending his return; thereupon they give a day to the parties on both sides, and finding the matter of long examination, and withal difficult, they deliberate upon it.

It seems very unreasonable the Sheriff should be made pay for this, which he did not occasion; but was a course taken by the Parliament for their own satisfaction, who found no fault in the Sheriff for putting them to all that trouble.

Suppose Sir Samuel Barnardiston had been return'd alone, and the Lord Huntingtower had petitioned against that return, there had been the same charge to have defended that return; so that it was the contest of the opposite party that occasioned the charge, the deliberation of the Parliament that occasioned the delay; but neither of them can be imputed to the Sheriff.

I cannot difference this case, from the case of bringing an action against a Jury, for maliciously, knowingly, and on purpose to put the party to charges, finding a matter specially, whereby great delay and great expences were, before the party could obtain judgment; and yet I think no man will affirm that an action will lie in that case.

In this case the damages are found entire, so that if both parts, viz. the not sitting in the House, and the pains and charges are not actionable causes of damages; it will be intended the Jury gave for both, and so the judgment is for that cause erroneous.

I suppose the wages of Parliament will not be mentioned for damages, for in most places they are only imaginary, being not demanded; but if there were to be any consideration of them, it will not alter this case; for upon this return they are due as from the first day, and so no damage can be pretended upon that score.

5. My fifth reason is drawn from the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. which has been so often mention'd; that Statute is a great evidence to me, that no action lay by the Common Law against a Sheriff, for a false return of a writ of Election to the Parliament; and this evidence is much strengthened by the observation observation that hath been made, that never any action was brought otherwise than upon that Statute.

I must admit, that if an action lay by the Common Law, this Statute hath not taken it away, for there are no negative words in the Statute; but it is not likely that the Parliament would have made that Law, if there had been any remedy for the party before.

The Statute observes, that some Laws had been made before, for preventing false returns, but there was not convenient remedy provided for the party griev'd; and therefore gives him an action for 100*l.* If the Courts of Justice had, by the Common Law, jurisdiction to examine misdemeanors concerning the returns of Sheriffs to the Parliament; what needed the Parliament to be so elaborate, to provide Law after Law, to give them power therein, and at last to give the party griev'd an action? Can any man imagine but that the Parliament took the Law to be, that the party was without remedy? I know preambles of Acts of Parliament are not always Gospel; but it becomes us, I am sure, to have respect to them, and not to impute any falsity or failing to them, especially where constant usage speaks for them.

It has been objected, that in those times, it was reckoned a damage, to be return'd to serve in Parliament, which is the reason that no man then did bring his action against the Sheriff for returning another in his stead. This cannot be true, for the Statute calls him the party griev'd, and is careful in providing convenient remedy for him; and we see by the many Statutes about those times, that it was a mischief very frequent, and there wanted no occasion for those actions; which does extremely strengthen the argument of the non-user of this pretended Common Law.

An action upon the case, where it may be brought, is a plaster that fits itself for all times and all sores; and if such an action might then have been brought, there was no need for the Parliament to provide a convenient remedy.

By Littleton's rule, often mentioned by my brothers, we may conclude this action will not lie; for if such an action had lain, it would have been brought before this time.

In the case of Buckley against Rice Thomas, in Plowden's Commentaries, 118, which appears to be so elaborately argued both at Bar and Bench; if this Common Law had been thought upon, they might have prevented the question, whether the Sheriffs of Wales were bound by the Statute 23 Hen. VI.

It seems plain to me, that the makers of the said Statute were ignorant of this Common Law; and yet my brother Thurland observes, the Judges in those times, usually assisted in the penning of the Laws.

The Judges and Council in the time of Buckley's case were ignorant of this Common Law, else it would have been mention'd in the argument of that case.

This Common Law was never reveal'd, that I find, until a time that there were divers other new lights: I mean those times, when Nevil brought an action for a false return against Stroud, during the late troubles; but in those times it could never obtain Judgment. I have heard that the Court of Common-Pleas sent the Record to the Parliament, as a case too difficult for the Courts of Common Law to determine.

The Statute of 23 Hen. VI. is not only evidence, that no such action lay at the Common Law; but, in my opinion, is not consistent with any remedy at the Common Law, unless it be allowed that the party should be doubly punished.

If the party griev'd, has brought his action upon the Statute, and recover'd, it was admitted by the Council, that no action can be brought at the Common Law; nor e contra, can he recover by the Statute, after he has recovered by the Common Law, because Nemo bis punitur pro eodem delicto.

So far it stands well, but suppose the party griev'd has let slip his time of three months, and then a third person brings a popular action, and recovers 100*l.* upon the Statute; there is nothing can bar the party griev'd from his action at Common Law; for his sitting still will not conclude him; no Statute of Limitations extending to this case. And if it be so, then must the party, besides his Fine and Imprisonment, be doubly punished by this Statute; which was made, as the Letter of it imports, because there wanted convenient remedy.

And now I am discoursing of this Statute, I must observe the great wisdom of the course of Parliament in these cases, which hath in great measure prevented the bringing actions against Sheriffs, even upon this Statute.

Where the Sheriff mistakes the person in his return, he incurs the penalty of 23 Hen. VI. tho' it be without malice: and it may happen that any where there are 21 Electors of one side, and 20 of the other, the Sheriff returns him that hath 21, and the Parliament adjudging an incapacity in two of the 21, may determine he that had the 20 voices was duly chosen. In such case the Sheriff had made a false return, within the penalty of the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and no evidence shall be given against the determination of the Parliament.

This was a very hard case for the Sheriff; and if we were liable to such a mischief, many a past Sheriff might be awaken'd, that takes himself to be secure.

But the course of Parliament prevents this, as it is reason; for immediately upon their determination, they send for the Sheriff, and cause him to amend his return; and thenceforward the amended return is the Sheriff's return, and there is no record that can warrant any action to be brought for a false return: as when the Marshal of the King's Bench, or Warden of the Fleet have made an improvident return, omitting some causes, wherewith the Prisoner stood charg'd in their custody, whereby they became liable to action; they frequently move the Court to amend the return; and when the return is amended, all is set right, for there is no averring against a Record: in like manner, when the Sheriff hath amended his return, he is secure from any action upon that occasion.

By this means, there has of late years been no recovery upon the Statute, because all persons chuse rather to compel the Sheriff to amend his return, that they might be admitted to sit in the House, than to take their remedy upon the Statute; and no man can recover upon the Statute first, and have afterwards their return amended: for I have been told, that by the course of Parliament, unless the Petition be lodged within some few days after the return, it cannot be received afterwards. So that a man cannot upon that Statute have remedy at Law, and also in Parliament: which seems to be wisely wisely provided, to prevent any contrariety of determinations.

This statute of 23 H. 6. furnished those that argued for this action, with one argument, which doth now vanish: They said that all the inconveniences that could be objected to this action, were the same upon the statute of 23 H. 6. viz. That upon that statute, the right of election must be examined upon a trial, where there might be a contrariety of determinations; for it appears by what I have said, that there can be no contrariety of determinations.

And there are other inconveniences in this remedy by the common Law, which are not in the remedy given by the statute, for by the statute the sum to be recovered is limited; the informer hath a time prefixed, so that there are bounds set which cannot be exceeded: but the remedy by the Common Law is without limitation of time, which is considerable; for all Sheriffs that ever made any return otherwise than the Parliament determined, will be liable, during their whole lives, to them that will call them to account for it. I say, this is without limitation of time, without measure of damages, or any rules contained in a written law: It depends upon a general notion of remedy, which may be enlarged by construction, as it is now introduced without precedent.

To finish my observation upon this statute, I say it is great wisdom in the Parliament to call the Sheriff to amend the return, and so prevent any remedy against him upon the statute 23 H. 6. for I do not see that the rules of law, concerning elections, are so manifestly clear and known, that it is fit that the Sheriff should upon all returns that are corrected by the Parliament, pay the reckoning of the contest.

6. I have a sixth reason against this action; which is, because the Sheriff is not admitted to take security to save him harmless in such cases; I take this reason to be instar omnium, and there needs no other in the case.

It were the most unreasonable and grievous thing in the world, that the Sheriffs should be bound to act without any deliberation, and not to be allowed to take any security; and yet be liable to an action, which way soever he takes: There is no course can avoid it but this of a double return, as I have before shewn.

It has not been said, by any that argued the other way, that the Sheriff may take security: and, I suppose, will not be said; for it would be a dangerous Course for Parliaments, for then the most litigious man must be returned, and not he who is truly chosen.

If the Sheriff may not take security, the law must be his security. It was an argument used by my brother Ellis, That because the law imposes an officer, to-wit, the Sheriff, therefore the law must give the party an action against that officer, if he misdemean himself: The argument does not hold universally, for the law imposes a judge, and yet no action lies against him. But the reason of that argument, if turned the other way, is irrefragable; as thus, The law will not suffer the Sheriff to take a security, therefore the law must be his security, else it were a most unreasonable law. This reason of itself is sufficient to bear the whole case; for no case can be put in our law, nay, no case can be in any reasonable law, where a man is compelled to judge without deliberation, and cannot take security, and yet shall be liable to an action.

I have two more reasons to add, upon which I lay great weight, tho' they depend not upon any particular circumstances of this case, but the general consideration of it.

1. That it is a new invention.

2. That it relates to the Parliament.

1. As it is a new invention, it ought to be examined very strictly, and have no allowance of favour at the end; and it will have the same fortune that many other novelties, heretofore attempted in our law, have had.

Actions upon the case have sometimes been received in new cases, where it stands with the rules of law, and no inconvenience appears; but they have been more often rejected. I shall instance some cases that have been rejected, because it will be manifested by them, that all the arguments and positions laid down by my brothers that would support the action, are as well applicable to several cases that have been already rejected, as to the case at bar.

An action upon the case was brought against a grand-jury-man, for falsely and maliciously conspiring to indite another, and adjudged it would not lie.

Against a witness for testifying falsely and maliciously; and an action was brought against a Judge, for acting falsely and maliciously; but adjudged that no action would lie in those cases.

These three instances are applicable to every argument urged for this action. The arguments my brothers made in depressing falsity and malice, those which they made from the comparison of other actions upon the case à minori ad majus; the argument, that because the law imposes the officer, it will punish the malice, has the same force in the case of a Judge, Juror, or Witness, and yet my brothers admit in those cases, an action will not lie, which shews the invalidity of those arguments.

Now I shall give other instances where actions upon the case have been rejected for novelty, and reasons of inconvenience.

An action of the case was brought against the Lord of a Manor for not admitting a copy-holder, and it was adjudged it would not lie. Cro. Jac. 368.

There was a verdict found, and damages given by the jury in that case: the Lord is compellable in Chancery to admit a copy-holder; and what harm would it have been, if there might have been a remedy given by the common law, there being a custom broken by which the Lord was bound? The reasons of the books are, because it was a novelty, and it would be vexatious, if every copyholder should have an action against the Lord, when he refused to admit him upon his own terms.

It has been adjudged, that an action upon the case will not lie for the breach of a trust, because the common Law cannot try what a trust is; but if such actions were allowed, the law might declare that to be a trust, which the Court of Chancery, that properly judges of trusts, might say is none; and where the common law cannot examine the principal matter, the damages that were but dependant upon it, shall not be regarded.

Anthony Maddison brought an action against Skipwith, for maliciously killing Sir Tho. Wortley: the case was thus; The plaintiff was a young lawyer that that had expended all his gains in the purchase of a rent that was determinable upon the death of Sir Tbo. Wortley; Skipwith quarrelled with Sir Thomas Wortley, in the streets, about a mistress, and killed him, whereby Maddison lost his rent. It was held the action would not lie, tho' it were laid to be done maliciously, on purpose to determine the plaintiff's rent.

I observed in that case, that altho' Mr. Maddison knew very well that there was a mistress in the case, and that the rent was not aimed at, yet he would fain try his fortune in the suit; thinking, that a jury, perhaps out of compassion to him, or to discourage the like facts, might make the man-slayer pay him for his loss: but the judges would not suffer it to go on, it being a meer device and a new-fangled action.

It hath been held, that an action will not lie against a Parson for suing for tithes in kind, knowing that there was a modus, because it might then be perilous for any Parson to insist upon his right.

It was held by the Court of Common-Pleas, that no action will lie for suing an Attorney, knowingly, in any other Court against his privilege: for his means to enjoy his privilege, is to claim it by writ of privilege; and he is not bound to claim his privilege, nor can his adversary know he will claim it.

An action was lately brought in the King's Bench, (as I have heard) for delaying a post letter maliciously, whereby the plaintiff wanted intelligence that might have been of great advantage to him. The Court discountenanced the action, so that it proceeded no farther. It was then said (as I heard) to this effect; That if such precedents were admitted, there could hardly be any dealing or correspondence but might be matter for actions at law; and altho' the case depended upon proof of particular malice, and the defendant will be acquitted if his case be not odious; yet we must consider that there is both charge and vexation of mind that attends the defence of a just cause, and we must not subject men for all their actions to such trouble and hazard.

These instances shew, that altho' an action upon the case be esteemed a catholicon, yet when actions have been applied to new cases, they have always been strictly examined, and upon considerations of justice or inconvenience they have been many times rejected.

For tho' the law advances remedies, as my brothers observed, yet it is with consideration that vexation be not more advanced than remedy.

It is my opinion, that no new device ever was, or can be introduced into the law, but absurdities and difficulties arise upon it, which were not foreseen; which makes me very jealous of admitting novelties. But,

2. In matters relating to the Parliament (which is my second ground) there is no need of introducing novelties; for the Parliament can provide new laws to answer any mischiefs that arise, and it ought to be left to them to do it.

Especially in a case of this nature, concerning elections, which the Parliament have already taken care of, and prescribed remedies by the several Statutes that have been made concerning them; I say, in such a case, there is little need to strain the law.

The Judges in all times have been very tender of meddling with matters relating to Parliament. I do not find that ever they tried elections, but where Statutes give them express power; or that they ever examined the behaviour of a Sheriff, or any officer of the Parliament, in relation to any service performed to the Parliament, but upon those Statutes: And in Brounker's case, Dyer 168. the Statute was their rule in the Star-Chamber, and they inflicted the same punishment that is appointed by that Statute.

If we shall allow general remedies (as an action upon the case is) to be applied to cases relating to the Parliament, we shall at last invade privilege of Parliament, and that great privilege of judging of their own privileges.

Suppose an action should be brought in time of prorogation, against a Member of Parliament, for that he falsely and maliciously did exhibit a complaint of breach of privilege to the Parliament, whereby the party was sent for in custody, and lost his liberty, and was put to great charges to acquit himself, and was acquitted by the Parliament.

If upon such a case the jury should find the defendant guilty, why should not that action be maintained as well as this at bar? It may be said for that action, that the judgment of the Parliament is followed, and the privilege is not tried at Law, but determined, 1. In the House; 2. It may be said, the party has no other way to recover his charges.

It would be dangerous to admit such an action, for then there would be peril in claiming privilege; for if the party complained of, had the fortune to be acquitted by the House, the Member that made the complaint would be at the mercy of the jury, as to the point of malice and quantity of damages. Such a precedent, I suppose, would not please the Parliament; and yet it may with more justice be the second case, than this at the bar the first.

Actions may be brought for giving Parliament-protections wrongfully. Actions may be brought against the clerk of the Parliament, Serjeant at Arms, and Speaker, for aught I know; for executing their offices amiss, with averments of malice and damage: and then must Judges and Juries determine what they ought to do by their officers: This is in effect prescribing rules to the Parliament for them to act by.

It cannot be seen whither we shall be drawn, if we meddle with matters of Parliament in actions at law. Therefore, in my judgment, the only safety is in those bounds that are warranted by Acts of Parliament or constant practice.

Suppose this action had been brought before the election had been decided in the House, and the jury had found one way, and the Parliament had determined contrary; how inconsistent had this been?

But it was said in the King's Bench, that the Court would not try it before the Parliament had determined the election, and then that cannot be contested, but the judgment of the Parliament must be followed: And my brother Ellis but now said, Surely no man will be so indiscreet, as to bring such an action before the Parliament hath determined it; and the Court will not try it, before such time as the election be determined in a proper way.

In my opinion this was not rightly considered, for how can the Court stay any suit, to expect the determination of the Parliament? And what reason or justice is there, that the Sheriff, who is no party called to answer in the Parliament, should be concluded in any thing by a judgment between other other parties, to defend himself from a demand of damages in a Court of law, where witnesses are examined upon oath, which they cannot be in the Commons House?

There is no reason the suit of law should stay till the House have determined the election, if the determination of the House be not conclusive in that suit.

And for the discretion of the parties that are like to bring such actions, I cannot depend upon it; for I see in this age, some men will insist upon their private rights to the hindrance of publick Affairs of higher consequence than any that can come before the Courts in Westminster-hall.

It may be, there will not want men that will press us to judge in such cases; and not only before the Parliament have determined, but against what the Parliament have determined; and will tell us that the Sheriff was no party, that witnesses were not there examined upon oath, and produce Arguments from Antiquity which we shall be very loth to judge of.

I can see no other way to avoid consequences derogatory to the honour of the Parliament, but to reject the action; and all others that shall relate either to the proceedings or privilege of Parliament, as our Predecessors have done.

For if we should admit general remedies in matters relating to the Parliament, we must set bounds how far they shall go, which is a dangerous province; for if we err, privilege of Parliament will be invaded, which we ought not any way to endanger.

This I speak of general remedies: Now I will consider this particular case, which, in my opinion, would bring great danger and dishonour to the Parliament.

It is dishonourable to the Parliament that there should be no protection in their service; I have shewn that the Sheriff can be safe in no case, if he shall be sued in such a case as this; And can there be a greater reproach, than that there is no safety in their service? no body can serve them chearfully and willingly at that rate.

It has been objected that the Sheriff is not their officer, but is the officer of the Court of Chancery, which sends forth the writs, and receives the returns. The Argument is plausible, but will not pass in the Parliament; for they say the Court of Chancery is the Repository for their writs, but will not allow them to issue without warrant from the House: They will not suffer the Court of Chancery to meddle with the returns of the Sheriff. The Parliament sends immediate order to the Sheriff; if the return be too slow, they direct the Sheriff to amend his return, and they punish the Sheriff where they find him faulty; so that it appears they exercise an immediate jurisdiction over the Sheriff. And I suppose they would judge it very false doctrine to say, that the Court of Chancery, or us, can any way meddle with the returns or the officer.

Admitting the Sheriff to act in returns as the officer of the Parliament, it concerns them that he should be liable to no other punishment but what they inflict, otherwise they cannot expect to be obeyed.

To have others judge when their servants do well, will be to have others give rules to their servants and service, which they will think inconvenient.

Let it be considered how hard a task Sheriffs have in the elections of Knights to the Parliament:

VOL. VII.

The appearance commonly is very numerous, the parties contesting very violent, the proceeding tumultuous, the polling sometimes is at several places at once; so that the Sheriff can hardly be a witness of the action: and if the dispute be in the house of Commons, he is no party to it. If after all this, the Sheriff, who cannot indemnify himself by security, still be liable to an action, the service of the Parliament may be reckoned a miserable slavery; which is not for their honour.

As this is dishonourable, so it is dangerous to Parliaments; it concerns the Kingdom that returns to the Parliament should be upright and impartial, and that they may be so, the Sheriff should be secure from all fears.

Judges are not liable to actions, that they may proceed uprightly and impartially; if they were subject to suits for their judgments, there is that earnestness and confidence on both sides, that one side would be dissatisfied and trouble them, and they could not discharge their duty without apprehensions of disquiet.

If the Sheriff be exposed to actions thus, let us consider what and whom he is to fear: He may fear the suit of the party, and he may fear the suit of the King. And it follows necessarily, that if an action lies, an information for the King will also lie for the misdemeanor in his office: If it be not a case privileged by the complexion of it, as Parliamentary, from being examined in Westminster-hall, but that he may be punished at the suit of the party, he may certainly as well be punished at the suit of the King: If so, where is the Sheriff's security? Will his own innocence secure him? That must be tried by a jury of the County where the Parliament sits; who are, it may be, strangers to him as well as to the matter; or by a jury of the County where the election was, where, it may be, they will be of an opposite party; the plaintiff may wait his opportunity, and question him twenty years after: And if he be condemned, his punishment is unlimited, a fine may be set to any height for the King, and damages may be given to any value for the party. Where is his security upon such proceedings? Will he not be more afraid of such punishment out of Parliament, than of any punishment in Parliament? Will not, nay, may not his terror make him desire to please them that can punish him out of Parliament, rather than to do right? Will not that be dangerous to the constitution of Parliaments?

As the punishment out of Parliament may be a terror to those who mean well, so colourable punishments may be as mischievous on the other side; for they may prevent any punishment in Parliament, for nemo bis punitur pro eodem delicto; they may serve for protection of men that do ill. When it is seriously weigh'd, of what consequence this may be, the case at bar will not be thought a case fit to be received by the Judges without the countenance of a new law.

They object, here is malice found by the verdict, and that there can be no danger or inconveniency that malice should be punished.

This objection fortifies my opinion; for malice, upon which they would have the scales turn in this case, is not a thing demonstrative, but interpretative, and lies in opinion; so that it may give an handle to any man to punish another by.

The instance of this very case shews, that a good man may reasonably be afraid of the event of his defence in such a case.

M m m

For

For altho' the matter was of great examination in Parliament; and at last decided but by few voices; and no observation of the Sheriff's miscarriage there; tho' it appeared upon the trial (which I may say, being present there) that the Sheriff was guided by the advice of his friends, of counsel, and of Parliament-men; that told him the only safe course was to make a double return; yet the jury condemned him to pay 800 £. against the expectation of the Court: for the Judges that were present at the trial did all declare publickly, that they would not have given that verdict.

The Judges heard all the evidence the jury could go upon; for being of a remote County to the place of election, the jury could know nothing of their own knowledge, and yet the Judges concurred not with the jury in their opinion.

I know we are not to examine the truth of the verdict, we must take it for gospel; neither doth any partiality in this particular lead me in judgment: but I shew it as an instance that malice is not demonstrative; mens minds may be mistaken, and innocent men may therefore have reason to be afraid, especially in ill times, and may use such means for their safety as may not be convenient for Parliaments.

But there can be no danger or inconvenience in the censure of the Parliament, that represents the whole Kingdom; who hitherto have alone exercised this power, and who may at any time reform the law, if the present practice be any way inconvenient.

Upon these reasons which I have produced, I ground my opinion: Now it will be necessary to weigh what hath been said in opposition to it.

The Arguments urged on the other side, related either to the ingredients or circumstances of this action, or to the foundation or substance of it.

I call the ingredients and circumstances of the action, that it is laid with these words, Falso, malitiose, Deceptive, & scienter: And that there is a verdict in this case, and damages are found.

The words falso, malitiose, & deceptive, will sometimes make a thing actionable, which is not so in itself, without malice proved, tho' there be the same damage to the party.

As where a man causes another to be falsely indicted, yet if it be not malitiose, no action lies; tho' there be the same trouble, charge and damage in one case as the other.

But it is only where a man is a voluntary Agent; for if a man be compellable to act, you cannot molest him upon any averment of malice: As if a grand jury-man causes another to be indicted, tho' you aver malice, you cannot have an action against him: so for a witness that doth testify, or a Judge that judgeth.

In the case at bar, the Sheriff is compellable to act, and not barely as a minister to send the Indenture, but as a Judge to say which is the major part of the due Electors; and if he mistakes, there is no reason it should subject him to an action upon an artificial averment of malice.

I remember in Shepherd and Wakeman's case in the King's Bench, Mr. Justice Wyndham said well, that the words falso & malitiose were grown words of course, and put into every action: So that to his knowledge juries many times had no regard to them, that he looked upon them as words of form.

If we should make the words falso & malitiose support an action without a fit subject matter, all the actions of mankind would be liable to suit and vexation: they that have the cooking (as we call it) of declarations in actions of the case, if they be skilful in their art, will be sure to put in the words falso & malitiose, let the case be what it will; they are here pepper and vinegar in a Cook's hand; that help to make sauce for any meat, but will not make a dish of themselves.

Falso & malitiose will not enable an action against a Judge.

Nor against an indictor or witness, nor where words are not actionable, tho' the plaintiff hath a verdict and damages found; nor for a breach of trust, which is alieni fori.

The reason of every one of these cases holds in the case at bar: Therefore it ought to have the same Resolution.

As to the word scienter, it hath weight sometimes; and if an action be brought for keeping a dog that worried another's sheep, sciens canem ad mordend' oves esse consuetud. or for detaining the servant or wife of another, scienter: In these cases, if the defendant hath been told that the dog did worry sheep, or that it was the servant or wife of another, tho' it may be he did not believe it, yet it was scienter; for the word implies no more than having notice: And in those actions he must inform himself at his peril; and may, if he doubts, avoid danger, by putting away those things which give offence. But in this case he could receive information by none, and is not to believe or disbelieve any body, but is bound to judge of the thing himself, and to act according to his judgment; so that no proof could be made of the scienter, for one side tells him the election was one way, and the other side tells him it is the other way; but he being present to the whole action, must follow the dictates of his own judgment. Hence it appears, scienter in this case is an empty word, not referring to notice of a fact, but to matter of judgment, which cannot any way be proved.

It has been often urged, that this case is stronger by being after a verdict and damages found by the jury; and it has been said, that perhaps upon a demurrer, it might have been found more doubtful.

The case is the same to me upon a verdict, that it would have been upon a general demurrer, and no stronger; for a demurrer is the confession of the party, of all that can be proved, or can possibly be found upon that declaration.

It is my Lord Coke's advice in Cromwell's case, 4th part, 14. a. never to demur to a declaration, if there be any hopes of the matter of fact; for the matter in law will as well serve after a verdict as upon a demurrer.

It had been a very odious case, if the Sheriff should have admitted all this fact to be true by a demurrer.

The finding the Plaintiff's damages adds no strength to the case; for we see every day upon actions for words, tho' the jury find the defendant guilty for speaking words falso & malitiose, and find it to be to the plaintiff's great damages; yet if the words are not such as will bear an action, the Court stays judgment: and if judgment happens to be given, it is reversible for error; which shews that the finding damages by the jury cannot make an action better than if it were to be adjudged upon demurrer.

I shall now consider what hath been said to maintain this action upon the main substance and foundation of it. They say, this is a case within the general reason of the common law, for here is malice, falsity and damage; and where they concur, there ought to be remedy. And altho' this be a new case, yet it ought not for that reason to be rejected; for other kind of actions have been newly introduced, and this is as fit to be entertained as any.

My brothers that argued even now for the action, shewed great learning and great pains; and certainly have said all that can be invented in support of this case: But as far as I could perceive, they have spoken only upon general notions to that purpose I just now mentioned; but nothing that I could observe applicable to the reasons and differences I go upon.

As for the rule they go upon, that where falsity, malice and damage do concur, there must be remedy; I confess it is true generally, but not universally, for it holds not in the case of a Judge, nor an Indictor, nor a Witness, nor of words that import not legal slander, tho' they are found to bring damage, as I have shewn before. And the reasons that exempt these cases from the general rule, have the same force in the case at bar.

I must confess the Judges have sometimes entertained new kinds of actions, but it was upon great deliberation, and with great discretion, where a general inconvenience requir'd it.

If Slane's case were new (for my brother Tburland observed truly it was said in that case, that there were infinite numbers of precedents) that case imported the common course of justice. Actions for words that are said to be new, tho' they have been used some hundreds of years, are a necessary means to preserve the peace of the Kingdom. The case of Smith and Craschaw, Cro. Car. 15. was a case of general concern, being that prosecutions for treasons may be against any man, and at any time.

But in the case at bar, neither the peace of the Kingdom, nor the course of justice is concerned in general, but only the administration of officers of the Parliament, in the execution of Parliamentary writs; and can never happen but in time of Parliament; and must of necessity fall under the notice of the Parliament; so that if the law were deficient, it is to be presumed the Parliament would take care to supply it: Discretion requires us rather to attend that, than to introduce new precedents upon such general notions that cannot govern the course of Parliament.

My brother Atkins said, the common law complied with the genius of the Nation; I do not understand the Argument: Does the common law change? Are we to judge of the changes of the genius of the nation? Whither may general notions carry us at this rate? For my own part, I think, tho' the common law be not written, yet it is certain, and not arbitrary. We are sworn to observe the laws as they are, and I see not how we can change them by our Judgments: and as for the genius of the nation, it will be best considered by the Parliament, who have power of the laws, and may bring us to a compliance with it.

In the case at bar, I look upon the Sheriff as a particular officer of the Parliament, for the managing elections, and as if he were not Sheriff: I look upon the writ as if it were an order of Parliament, and had not the name of a writ: I look upon the course of Parliament, which we pretend not to know, to be incident to the consideration of it; so that it stands not upon the general notion of remedy in the common course of justice.

The Arguments of the falling of the value of money, whereby the penalty of 100 l. provided by the 23 H. 6. is become inconsiderable; and the increase of the estimation of being a Member of Parliament; if they were true, are arguments to the Parliament to change the law by increasing the penalty, but we cannot do it.

My brother Maynard, in his Argument, would embolden us; telling us we are not to think the case too hard for us, because of the name or course of Parliament; for Judges have punished Absentees: They may determine what is a Parliament, what is an Act of Parliament, how long an ordinance of Parliament shall continue, and may punish trespasses done in the very Parliament.

I will not dispute the truth of what he said in this, but if his Arguments were artificial, he might have spared them; for they have no manner of effect to draw me beyond my sphere.

I will not be afraid to determine anything that I think proper for me to judge; but seeing I cannot find the Courts of Justice have at any time meddled with cases of this nature, but upon express power given them by Acts of Parliament, I cannot consent to this precedent; I am confident when there is need, the Parliament will discern it, and make laws to enlarge our power, so far as they shall think convenient.

I see no harm that Sheriffs in the mean time should be safe from this new-devised action, which they call the common law; if they misdeemean themselves, they are answerable to the Parliament, whose officers they be, or may be punished by the Statute, made for regulating elections.

It is time for me to conclude, which I shall do by repeating the opinion I at first delivered, viz. That this judgment is not warranted by the rules of law; That it introduceth novelty of dangerous consequence, and therefore ought to be reversed. Septem viatorem nova, non vetus orbita, fallit.

North, Chief-Justice, and five other Judges (against Ellis and Atkins) reversed the judgment upon the matter in Law, That the action lies not.

[Note, The Lord Chief-Justice Vaughan, and Lord Chief-Baron Turner, both deceased, who in their lives were eminent Members of Parliament, were of the same opinion.]

Soon after the Revolution, Sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his Writ of Error into the house of Peers, to reverse the reversal of the judgment given in the Exchequer; but the house affirmed the reversal of the said judgment, as appears by the following Resolutions.

Veneris, 24 Maii, 1689.

THIS Day the Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of King's-Bench brought into this house a transcript of a writ of Error, to reverse a judgment given against Barnardiston at the suit of Soame.

Sabbati, 25 Maii, 1689.

Whereas Sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his writ of Error into this house, and hath assigned errors thereupon, to which Sir William Soame was Defendant; who left dame Catherine Soame, his widow, his executrix: and the House being moved, that the said dame Catherine Soame may join issue there-

M m m 2 upon;

upon; it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said Dame Catherine Soame be, and is hereby required to join issue to the said writ, on or before Thursday next, being the 30th instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; whereof the said Sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said Dame Soame, to the end she join issue accordingly.

Sabbati, 1 June, 1689.

The House being moved, that they would be pleased to appoint a day for hearing the errors argued upon the writ of Error brought into this house, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiston is plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame, widow, executrix of Sir William Soame, defendant: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, That this house will hear the said errors argued by counsel on both sides, at the bar, on Saturday next, being the 8th instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and in the mean time she may join issue, if she please: whereof the said Sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said Dame Catherine Soame, to the end she attend accordingly.

Sabbati, 8 die Junii, 1689.

This day being appointed for hearing errors argued by counsel, upon the writ of error between Sir Samuel Barnardiston and the Lady Soame, the counsel for the plaintiff appeared, but none appeared for the defendant: And upon oath made at the bar by Nicholas Baker, Solicitor, that he served the order of this House at the House of the Lady Soame; thereby giving notice, that the cause was to be heard this day; whereupon the House heard the counsel of the plaintiff, and made the ensuing Order, viz.

After hearing counsel this day, upon the writ of Error depending in this House, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiston is plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame is defendant; It is ordered by the Lords spiritual in Parliament assembled, the giving judgment on this writ of Error be, and is hereby suspended, until Monday next; and those that are, or were Judges, and now in Town, do attend this House that day, to inform the House of their reasons and grounds for their judgment for reversal of the judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case.

Ordered, That all the judges be present on Monday morning, to assist this House in this business of Sir Samuel Barnardiston.

Lune, 10 Junii.

William Mountague, Esq; was called in, and the Speaker told him, That the House desired to hear from him, upon what grounds and opinions he gave his opinion for the reversal of the judgments for giving eight hundred pounds to Sir Samuel Barnardiston.

He taking notice that there was counsel present for Sir Samuel Barnardiston, but no counsel for the Lady Soame, he said, seeing the defendant did not appear with counsel, he desired he might not be looked upon as counsel for the defendant; upon that the company was commanded to withdraw: And the House ordered Mr. Mountague should be admitted to come in alone; who being come in, said, he would, for their Lordships satisfaction, (as well as he can remember) acquaint them with the grounds and reasons which induced him to give his opinion for the reversal of that judgment; and so he proceeded to give the heads of what he said, which being ended, he withdrew.

And after consideration thereof, it was moved that the counsel for Sir Samuel Barnardiston should be called in, and the Speaker to acquaint them with the effect of what Mr. Mountague had said; that so the counsel might be able thereby to reply, for the better information of their Lordships and the Judges then present. And after some debate, the question was put, whether the counsel shall be called in? It was resolved in the negative.

Then it was moved to make use of proxies, which was opposed, as concerning their not being admitted in preliminary cases of judicature.

After hearing William Mountague, Esq; for his judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case, and debate thereupon, it is ordered, That the clerk do inspect the books concerning proxies; and whether they have been used in cases of judicature; and give an account to-morrow morning what he finds therein: And that all the Judges do attend the House to-morrow.

Martis, 11 Junii, 1689.

The clerk of the Parliament, in pursuance of the order yesterday, shewed several instances where proxies have been used in preliminaries to private causes: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, That proxies may be used in such preliminary cases, but not in giving judgment; and that this order be added to the Roll of standing orders.

Ordered, That the counsel of Sir Samuel Barnardiston shall be heard on Friday next, to reply to what Mr. Mountague gave for his reasons for reversal of Sir Samuel Barnardiston's judgment; and that all the Judges do attend at the same time.

Veneris, 14 die Junii, 1689.

After hearing counsel in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case this day, to reply to what Mr. William Mountague said for his reasons to reverse the judgment given in the Exchequer; It is ordered, That this House will hear all the Judges give their opinions in this case, on Tuesday the 25th of this instant June, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

Martis, 25 die Junii, 1689.

The House heard the opinion of all the Judges in the case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, upon his writ of Error depending in this House.

And the question being put, Whether to go on in the debate of this business now? It was resolved in the affirmative.

After debate, the question being put, Whether to reverse the reversal of the judgment given between Sir Samuel Barnardiston and Sir William Soame? It was resolved in the negative.

Leave is given to several Lords to enter their dissent to the abovesaid question, and accordingly do enter their dissent for the reasons ensuing.

1. Because it is a denying Sir Samuel Barnardiston the benefit of law, which gives relief in all wrong and injury: And tho' this be an action of the first impression, yet their being a damage to the plaintiff, the common law gives him this action to repair himself; and if it were not so, there would be a failure of justice, which cannot be admitted.

2. Be-

2. Because the allowing this reversal tends towards the giving the power and encouragement to Sheriffs to make false and double returns; by which means the right of elections will be avoided, and it tends thereby to the packing of a house of Commons, which may overturn the whole frame of the Government, and establish what religion and governments a pack'd Parliament shall think fit.

XXXI. Proceedings in the House of Commons, on an Appeal being brought in the House of Lords, by Dr. Shirley, against Sir John Fagg, and others, their Members, May 1675, 27 Car. II.

Mariti, 4 Maii, 1675.

SIR John Fagg, Bart. this day informed the House, that he was summon'd to appear to a Petition in the House of Lords, a Committee was thereupon appointed to search for precedents to that purpose.

Mercurii, 5 Maii.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them that this House hath received information, That there is a Petition of Appeal depending before them, at the suit of Thomas Shirley, Esq; against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House; to which Petition, he is, by order of the House of Lords, directed to answer on Friday next; and to desire the Lords to have a regard to the privileges of this House; and that Sir Trevor Williams do go up with the message to the Lords.

Sir Trevor Williams reports, that he had attended the Lords with the message of this House, concerning Sir John Fagg; and that the Lords will return an answer by messengers of their own.

Veneris, 7 Maii.

A message from the Lords by Sir William Beversham, and Sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker,

The Lords have considered of the message received from the House of Commons, concerning privilege in the case of Sir John Fagg, and do return this answer, That the House of Commons need not doubt, but that the Lords will have a regard to the privilege of the House of Commons, as they have of their own.

Sabbati, 8 Maii.

A Committee was appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what entries are therein made against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, and to report the same.

Mercurii,

Mercurii, 12 Maii.

Dr. Thomas Shirley ordered to be sent for in custody, to answer his breach of the privileges of this House, in prosecuting a suit by petition of Appeal in the Lords house, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

And a Committee is also appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what has been done in like cases; and the said Sir John Fagg is ordered not to proceed, or make any answer to the said Appeal, without the licence of this house.

Veneris, 14 Maii.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the house of Lords, and the entries therein, in the case between Dr. Thomas Shirley and Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house, That the Committee had perused the journals of the Lords house, and found the entries to be as follow;

April the 30th.

Thomas Shirley, Esq; presented a Petition to the Lords.

Ordered, That the said Sir John Fagg may have a copy of the said petition, and put in his answer thereunto, in writing, on Friday the 7th day of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, if he thinks fit.

May the 5th.

The Commons send a message by Sir Trevor Williams:

The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons, in Parliament assembled, have been informed, that there is a petition of Appeal depending before their Lordships, at the suit of Thomas Shirley, Esq; against Sir John Fagg, a Member of their House. To which petition he is, by their Lordships order, directed to answer, on Friday next, and desire their Lordships to take care of their privileges.

Answer, That this House have considered of their message, and will send answer by messengers of their own.

Ordered, That the Committee for privileges do meet this afternoon, to consider of the messages received from the house of Commons this day, concerning Thomas Shirley, Esq; and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House, and search precedents in the case, and report to the House to-morrow morning.

May the 6th.

The Earl of Berks reported, That the committee of privileges having met and considered of what was referred to them in the case between Thomas Shirley, Esq; and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the house of Commons, and the message from the house of Commons thereupon; have ordered him to report, That the committee have found that the House did refer the business of Mr. Hale and Mr. Slingsby, upon the like message of the house of Commons, to the committee of privileges; who did report to the House, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land; and the House did agree with the committee therein: And thereupon the committee do humbly offer to their Lordships, upon this occasion, to take the same course, and to insist upon their just rights in this particular, which their Lordships will be pleased to signify to the house Commons, in such manner as they shall think fit.

The House agreed with the committee in this declaration, and ordered the same to be entered into the journal-book of this House, as their declaration, viz.

"That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in Judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land."

Then it was moved, that the former answer sent to the house of Commons, in the case of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, might be given now to the house of Commons; in this case of Sir John Fagg; and that the declaration and report agreed to this day, might be added to it.

The declaration aforesaid was read, and the question being put, Whether this shall be as a part of the answer to be given to the house of Commons? it was resolved in the negative.

The answer returned formerly to the house of Commons, in the case of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, was in these words; That the house of Commons need not doubt but that their Lordships will have a regard to the privileges of the house of Commons, as they have of their own.

The question being put, Whether this answer shall be now returned to the message from the house of Commons? it was resolved in the affirmative.

May the 7th, it was sent accordingly.

Maii 7.

Whereas this day was appointed for Sir John Fagg to put in an answer to the Petition and Appeal of Thomas Shirley, Esq; depending in this House, if he thought fit; the said Sir John Fagg appearing personally this day at the bar, and desiring longer time to put in an answer thereunto;

It is thereupon ordered, That the said Sir John Fagg hath hereby further time given him for putting in his answer, till Wednesday next, being the 12th day of this instant May, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Maii 12.

Sir John Fagg put in his answer to the petition of Mr. Shirley.

A debate arising thereupon, touching the privilege of their House;

Resolved, &c. That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the house of Lords, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house, and the proceedings thereupon, are a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of this House.

The House being informed, that the warrant of this House for taking of the said Dr. Shirley into custody, was forcibly taken away and detained from the Serjeant at Arms his deputy, attending this house, by the Lord Mohun: And the Serjeant's deputy being called in and examined as to the matter of fact, gave this testimony;

That he found Dr. Shirley in the inner lobby of the house of Lords, and that he came to him, and desired to speak with him, and acquainted him that he had a warrant from the house of Commons to apprehend him, and desired to know, whether he could shew him any reason to excuse him, that he might not serve the

the warrant on him: And that he likewise told him, that he would not execute the warrant on him in that place, but desired of him, that he would go along with him freely: And that in case he would not, he would take his opportunity in another place.

And that the said Lord Mobun coming in, in the mean time, required him to shew his warrant, which he producing, the Lord Mobun laid hands on it, and held it so fast, that it was in danger of being torn, and that therefore he was forced to part with it, and desiring to have it again, the Lord Mobun refused it, but carried the warrant into the house of Lords. That Dr. Shirley afterwards refused to go along with him, saying, that he was not then his prisoner; and that several persons interposing, the Doctor escaped from them. And a debate arising thereupon,

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Lords to complain of the Lord Mobun, for forcibly taking away and detaining the warrant of this House, from the Deputy Serjeant at Arms, for taking of Dr. Shirley into custody; and to demand the justice of the Lords house against the said Lord Mobun.

And that the Lord Antram do go up to the Lords with the Message.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue forth a new warrant to the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, for apprehending Dr. Thomas Shirley, to answer his breach of privilege, for prosecuting a suit by petition of Appeal in the Lords house, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

Sabbath, 15 Maii 1675.

The Lord Antram reports from the Lords, that he had, in obedience to the commands of this house, attended the Lords, and delivered the message concerning the Lord Mobun's taking away and detaining the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley; and that the Lords had returned this answer;

Gentlemen of the house of Commons,

The Lords have considered of your message, and of the complaint therein; and they return you this answer, That they find the Lord Mohun hath done nothing but what is according to his duty.

The house then resumed the debate of the matter concerning the privileges of this house; and the matter being debated,

Resolved, &c. That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley, in the house of the Lords against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house of Commons, and the proceedings thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of the house of Commons; and therefore the Commons desire, that there be no further proceedings in that cause, before their Lordships.

Ordered, That a conference be desired with the Lords concerning the privileges of this house, in the case of Sir John Fagg; and that Sir Thomas Lee do go up to the Lords to desire a conference.

A message from the Lords by Sir Mondeford Bramston, and Sir William Glascock;

Mr. Speaker,

We are commanded to let this house know, that the Lords spiritual and temporal assembled in Parliament, have received a warrant, signed Edward Seymour, which they have appointed us to shew you; and desire to know, whether it be a warrant ordered by this house?

The matter of the message being debated, the question being put, That the word unparliamentary, be part of the answer to the Lords message,

It passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the messengers be called in, and that this answer be returned, That this house will consider of the message.

The messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker does acquaint them, that the house will consider of the message.

Resolved, That the message last received from the Lords, is an unparliamentary message.

Resolved, That a conference be desired to be had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the last message received from the house of Lords.

Resolved, That it be referred to Mr. Garraway, &c. to draw up reasons to be offered at the said conference.

Then the house being informed, that there is a cause upon an Appeal brought up by Sir Nicholas Stoughton, against Mr. Onslow, a Member of this house, appointed to be heard at the bar of the Lords house;

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them, that this house has received information, that there is a cause upon an Appeal brought by Sir Nicholas Stoughton against Mr. Onslow, a Member of this house, appointed to be heard at the bar of their house, on Monday next; and to desire their Lordships to have regard to the privileges of this house: And that Sir Richard Temple do go up with the message to the Lords.

Ordered, That Mr. Onslow do not appear any further in the prosecution of the Appeal brought against him by Sir Nicholas Stoughton, in the house of Lords.

Ordered, That Sir Nicholas Stoughton be sent for in custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, to answer his breach of privilege in prosecuting a suit in the house of Lords, against Arthur Onslow, Esq; a Member of this house, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

Resolved, That whoever shall appear at the bar of the Lords house, to prosecute any suit against any Member of this house, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this house.

Lune, 17 Maii, 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports, That the person appointed had attended the Lords, and delivered the vote of this house, concerning the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley against Sir John Fagg.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee appointed to draw up reasons for the conference to be had with the Lords, Reasons agreed by the Committee; which are as follow, viz.

For that the message is by way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the house of Commons, in a case concerning the privilege of a Member of that house, of which they are proper judges.

For that the matter of the message carries in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the house of Commons.

For that the matter of the message doth highly reflect upon the whole house of Commons, in their Lordships questioning that house concerning their own orders; which they have the more reason to apprehend, because the day before this message was brought to them, the warrant was owned by the complaint of the house of Commons to their Lordships, ships, that the same was taken and detained from a servant of theirs, by a Peer; which imports, that the question in that message could not be for information only, and so tends to interrupt that mutual good correspondency, which ought to be preserved inviolably between the two houses of Parliament.

Martis, 18 Maii, 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports from the Lords, That he had attended their Lordships, according to the command of this house, with the message in the case of Mr. Onslow, to which the Lords returned an answer, which being in writing, was delivered in at the clerk's table, and read; and is as followeth;

The Lords do declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either house be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land: And from this right, and the exercise thereof, their Lordships will not depart.

The matter of the Lords answer being debated, Resolved, "That it is the undoubted right of this house, that none of their Members be summoned to attend the house of Lords, during the fitting or privilege of Parliament."

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Lords, upon the privileges of this house, contained in the Lords answer to the last message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow.

Ordered, That Sir Henry Ford do go up to the Lords, to desire a conference upon the subject-matter of their message, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley.

Jovis, 20 Maii, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the committee appointed to draw up reasons to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords upon the privileges of this house, contained in the Lords answer to the last message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow; which reasons were twice read, and with some alterations at the clerks table (upon the question severally put) agreed to: which are as follow, viz.

1. That by the laws and usage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every Member of the house of Commons, in all cases, except Treason, Felony, and breach of the Peace; which hath often been declared in Parliament, without any exception of Appeals before the Lords.

2. That the reason of that privilege is, that the Members of the house of Commons may freely attend the publick affairs of that house, without disturbance or interruption; which doth extend as well to Appeals before the house of Peers, as to proceedings in other Courts.

3. That by the constant course and usage of Parliament, no Member of the house of Commons can attend the house of Lords, without the especial leave of that house first obtained, much less be summoned or compelled so to do.

4. If the Lords shall proceed to hear and determine any Appeal where the party neither can, nor ought to attend, such proceedings would be contrary to the rules of justice.

5. That the not determining of an Appeal against a Member of the house of Commons, is not a failure of justice, but only a suspension of proceedings in a particular case, during the continuance of that Parliament, which is but temporary.

6. That in case it were a failure of justice, it is not to be remedied by the house of Lords alone, but it may be by Act of Parliament.

[Here Sir Thomas Littleton reported from the committee appointed to prepare the further address of this house to his Majesty, for the recalling such of his subjects as are in the French King's service; which the house deferred the further consideration of, till Wednesday next.]

Then Sir Trevor Williams reports from the Lords, that he had attended, and desired a conference with the Lords on the privilege of this house, contained in the Lords answer to the message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow: And that the Lords will return an answer by messengers of their own.

Mr. Powle reports, from the conference had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the former conference, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, That the Lords had returned an answer to the reasons of this house, delivered at the former conference, and are as follow:

"The Lords have appointed this conference, upon the subject-matter of the last conference, and have commanded us to give these answers to the reasons and other matters then delivered by the house of Commons.

"To the first question, the Lords conceive, that the most natural way of being informed, is by way of question; and seeing a paper here which did reflect upon the privileges of the Lords house, their Lordships would not proceed upon it till they were assured it was owned by the house of Commons: But the Lords had no occasion at that time, nor do they now think fit to enter into the debate of the house of Commons being or not being proper judges in the case concerning the privilege of a Member of that house; their Lordships necessary consideration upon sight of that paper, being only, how far the house of Commons ordering (if that paper were theirs) the apprehension of Dr. Shirley for prosecuting his Appeal before the Lords, did entrench upon their Lordships both privilege and undoubted rights of judicature in the consequence of it, exempting all the Members of both houses from the judicature of this the highest Court of the Kingdom; which would cause a failure of that supreme justice, not administrable in any other Court, and which their Lordships will never admit.

"As to the second reason, the Lords answer, That they do not apprehend how the matter of this message is any reflection upon the Speaker of the house of Commons.

"To the third reason, The Lords cannot imagine how it can be apprehended in the least to reflect upon the house of Commons, for the house of Peers, upon a paper produced to their Lordships, in form of a warrant of that house, whereof doubt was made among the Lords, whether any such thing had been ordered by that house, to enquire of the Commons, whether such warrant was ordered there or no? And without such liberty used by the Lords, it will be very hard for their Lordships to be rightly informed, so as to preserve a good correspondence between the two houses, which their Lordships shall endeavour; or to know when warrants in the name of that house, are true or pretended: And it is so ungrounded an apprehension, that their Lordships intended any reflection

" reflection in asking that question, and not taking " notice in their message of the complaint of the " house of Commons owning that warrant, that
 " the Lords had sent their message concerning that " paper to the house of Commons, before the " Lords had received the said Commons complaint.

" But their Lordships have great cause to except " against the unjust and strained reflection of that " house upon their Lordships, in asserting that the " question in the Lords message could not be for " information, as we affirm, but tending to inter" rupt the mutual correspondence between the two " houses, which we deny, and had not the least " thought of.

" The Lords have further commanded us to " say, That they doubt not when the house of " Commons have received what we have delivered " at this conference, they will be sensible of their " error, in calling our message strange, unusual, or " unparliamentary. Though we cannot but take " notice, that their answer to our message, That " they would consider of it, was the first of that " kind that we can find to have come from that
 " house."

The question being put, Whether the house be satisfied with the reasons delivered by the Lords at the last conference? it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That a free conference be desired with the Lords upon the matter delivered at the last conference; and that the former managers do attend, and manage the free conference.

Friday, May 21. The house resolved on Wednes- day next to proceed in the further consideration of that part of the message relating to Appeals from inferior Courts. Sir Trevor Williams ordered to go up to the Lords, to desire a conference upon the privileges of this house, contained in their answer to the message touching Mr. Onslow's case, which he accordingly did; and reports, That the Lords will return an answer thereto by messengers of their own.

May 27. A message ordered to be sent to the Lords to remind them of the former message; and again to desire a conference upon the privileges of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow. And ordered the matter of the jurisdiction of the Lords, in cases of Appeal, be taken into consideration tomorrow morning.

Veneris, 28 Maii, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the committee to whom it was referred to draw up reasons to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of their answer to the last message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow, several reasons agreed by the said committee; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table; where the same being twice read, were, upon the question, severally agreed unto, and are as follow, viz.

" For that the Commons desired a conference
 " upon their privileges concerned by the Lords an" swer to a message sent to the Lords the 18th of " May, in the case of Mr. Onslow; their Lord-
 " ships have not agreed any conference in the case
 " of Mr. Onslow; but have only agreed a confe" rence concerning their privileges in general, with" out reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow;
 " which was the only subject-matter of the desired
 " conference.

Vol. VII.

" The limitation in the Lords agreement to a " conference, with proviso that nothing be offered " at the conference that may any way concern their " Lordships judicature, is in effect a denial of any
 " conference at all, upon the subject on which it " was desired: which ought not to be; the judi" cature which their Lordships claim in Appeals
 " against a Member of the house of Commons,
 " and the privilege of that house being in that case
 " so involved, that there can be no conference up" on the latter, without some way touching upon
 " the former.

" That this manner of agreeing to a conference " with any limitation or proviso, is against the " course of Proceedings betwixt the two Houses
 " of Parliament, in coming to conference; and " doth seem to place a power in the managers of " such conferences, to judge whether such provisos
 " be broken or not; and accordingly to proceed,
 " or break off the conference upon their own judg" ments."

Lune, 31 Maii, 1675.

Sir Leoline Jenkins reports, that he had attended the Lords, with the message of this House, for a conference upon the subject-matter of the Lords answer to the last message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow; and that the Lords had sent answer, that they would return answer by messengers of their own.

A message from the Lords by Sir Mondesford Brampston, and Sir William Beversham.

" Mr. Speaker,

" The Lords have commanded us to acquaint
 " you, that they desire a conference presently in the " Painted-Chamber, with the House of Commons;
 " upon their not coming to the conference desired
 " by them on Thursday last; and by the Lords ap" pointed to be at ten of the clock in the Painted-" Chamber, on Friday the 28th of this instant
 " May."

The messengers being withdrawn, and the message debated, a present conference upon the question was agreed.

And the Messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker acquaints them, that the House had agreed to a present conference.

Ordered, That the former Members that were appointed to manage the former conference in the case of Mr. Onslow, do attend and manage this conference.

Sir John Trevor reports, from the conference, that the Lords had declared the intent of this conference; to the effect following, viz. " That the " Lords have appointed this conference, out of that " constant desire and resolution they have to conti" nue a fair correspondence between the two " Houses; which is of the essence of Parliamen" tary Proceedings.

" For this end their Lordships have commanded " us to tell you, that they cannot but take notice " of the house of Commons failing to be on Fri- " day last, at a conference desired by themselves,
 " and appointed by the Lords at ten of the clock
 " in the Painted-Chamber.

" That they conceive it tends to an interruption
 " of all Parliamentary Proceedings, and to evade the " right of the Lords to appoint time and place for " a conference.

Ordered,

Ordered, That it be referred to the former Committee, who are appointed to draw up reasons, to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords, upon the subject-matter of their answer, to the message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow, to consider of the matter delivered by the Lords at the last conference; and to prepare and draw up further reasons, to be offered at another conference to be had with the Lords, upon the subject-matter of the last conference. And that the Committee do meet this afternoon at five of the clock in the Speaker's Chamber. And Mr. Serjeant Maynard, and Mr. Sawyer, are to have notice to attend the same.

Martis, 1 Junii, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, and to see what Proceedings have been entered, in the case of Mr. Dalmaboy, and Mr. Onslow; that they had inspected the Lords Journals, as to the case of Mr. Dalmaboy, and collected what Proceedings had been in that case; but had no opportunity or time, yet to do it in the case of Mr. Onslow. Which Proceedings being reported, were read, and delivered in at the Clerk's table; and are as follow, viz. 19 April, 1675.

The Appeal brought by Crispe and Crispe, complaining against a Decree in Chancery made, wherein Mr. Dalmaboy is recited to be one of the Petitioners; Cranbourne and Bowyer are ordered to put in an answer, and Dalmaboy, if he please.

Maii 12, 1675.

Ordered, That this House will hear Council at the Bar, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Crispe and others, against the Lady Viscountess Cranbourne, the Lady Anne Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; and their answer thereunto, depending in this House, on Wednesday the 19th of this instant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; whereof the Petitioners are to cause timely notice to be given to the said Defendants, or their Agents in the said cause, for that purpose.

Maii 16, 1675.

Whereas Sir Nicholas Crispe, Bart. having an Appeal depending in this House, against the Lady Cranbourne, Lady Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; a Member of the house of Commons; hath prayed that Counsel may be assigned him to plead his cause upon the said Appeal, and hath named Counsel for that purpose:

It is ordered, That Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, named by the said Sir Nicholas Crispe, be, and are hereby appointed to open, and manage the said cause, on the part and behalf of the said Sir Nicholas Crispe; on Thursday the 27th day of this instant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and at such other times, as it shall be depending in this House.

Upon reading the Petition of Sir Nicholas Crispe, Bart. Thomas Crispe and John Crispe, Esqrs. shewing, that having an Appeal depending in this House, against Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; a Member of the House of Commons, and others; they are in danger of being arrested by an order of the House of Commons; and therefore pray the protection of this House, that they may have liberty to prosecute their said Appeal with Freedom:

It is thereupon ordered, That the said Sir Nicho- las Crispe, Bart. John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, or any of them, their or any of their Counsel, Agents or Solicitors, or such other person or persons as they shall employ, in prosecuting the said Appeal before this House, be, and are hereby privileged, and protected accordingly by this House; until the matter upon the Appeal be determined by their Lordships. And all persons whatsoever, are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise molesting the said Sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, or any of them, their or any of their Counsel, Agents, or Solicitors, upon any pretence whatsoever, during the time prefixed, as they or such of them will answer the contrary to this house.

Maii 26, 1675.

The cause between Sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. plaintiffs, and Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; defendant, appointed to be heard the 27th, was ordered to be heard the 28th Maii.

Maii 27.

Upon reading the petition of Sir Nicholas Crispe, complaining, that the counsel assigned him by this house, to plead his cause at the bar, wherein Mr. Dalmaboy is one of the defendants, do refuse to plead for him in this cause, in regard of a vote of the house of Commons; Sir Nicholas Crispe was called in, and testified, that he shewed the order of this house to Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter.

Whereupon it is ordered, That whereas Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were by order of this house, dated on the 19th instant, assigned to be of counsel for Sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, in their cause depending in this house, against Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; a Member of the house of Commons, and other defendants, at such time as the said cause shall be appointed to be pleaded at the bar of this house; having appointed to hear the said cause by counsel on both sides, to-morrow at three of the clock in the afternoon:

It is this day ordered, That the said Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, be, and are hereby required, to appear at the bar of this house, to-morrow, at three of the clock in the afternoon, as counsel to plead in the said cause, on the behalf of the said Sir Nicholas Crispe, John and Thomas Crispe, as they will answer the contrary to this house.

Maii 28, 1675.

Counsel heard at the bar on both parts, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. and the answer of Diana Viscountess Cranbourne, &c. and Thomas Dalmaboy, Esq; put in thereunto, concerning a decree in Chancery: Resolved, the petition and decree be dismissed.

Maii 28.

This day the house heard the counsel of Sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, upon their petition and appeal depending in this house; and also the counsel of the Lady Bowyer, and Mr. Dalmaboy, upon their answer thereunto; and after a serious consideration thereof, the question being put, Whether this Petition and Appeal shall be dismissed this house;

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter attending at the door, in obedience to the order of the house of Commons; and being severally called in, Mr. Speaker did severally acquaint them, that they were summoned to give an account to the house, of their appearing as counsel at the bar of the house of Lords, in the prosecution of a cause depending upon an appeal, wherein Mr. Dalmaboy, a Member of this house, is concerned, in the manifest breach of the order of this house; and giving up as much as in them lies, the rights and privileges of the Commons of England: And they having answered and made their excuses to the effect following; That they had no notice of the order or vote of this house, but what they have heard in common discourse abroad; and because they conceived Mr. Dalmaboy, a Member of this house, might be concerned, they refused several times to appear as counsel, or to accept their fees; but being assigned of counsel for Sir Nicholas Crispe, and an order of the house of Lords being served on them to attend at their peril, and that then attending, and Mr. Dalmaboy having put in his answer in the Lords house, and not insisting on his privilege afterwards, and the counsel for the Lady Bowyer, who was the principal party concerned, denying to be of counsel for Mr. Dalmaboy, they conceived they might safely appear as counsel without breach of the order, or invading the rights and privileges of this house, which was not intended by them; and Sir John Churchill, by way of further excuse for himself, said, that he had witnesses ready to prove, that Mr. Dalmaboy was willing and desirous to have the business go forward. And the said Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter, did all of them humbly submit themselves to the pleasure of the house, if they had in any thing misbehaved themselves; and being withdrawn, and the matter debated: The question being put, That Serjeant Pemberton be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Charles Porter, Esq; be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, for their breach of privilege of this house.

Mercurii, 2 die Junii.

Ordered, That Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Vaughan, and Sir Thomas Lee do withdraw, and amend the reasons upon the debates of the house, which was done; and the reasons agreed to, are as follow;

"The house of Commons do agree with the Lords, that conferences between the two houses of Parliament, are essential to Parliamentary proceedings, when they are agreed in the usual and Parliamentary way; but the manner of the Lords agreement to the conference, to have been on Friday the 28th of May last, at ten of the clock, in the painted chamber, with limitation and proviso, did necessitate the house of Commons to forbear to meet at that conference, and gave the first interruption to parliamentary proceedings in conferences between the two houses.

"For that the conference desired by the Commons, was upon their privileges, concerned in the answer of the Lords to a message of the house of Commons, sent to the Lords the 17th of May, in the case of Mr. Onslow, to the which "the Lords did not agree, but did only agree to a conference concerning their privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow; which was the only subject-matter of the desired conference.

"The limitations in the Lords agreement to a conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the conference that may any ways concern the Lords judicature, is in effect a denial of any conference at all upon the subject upon which it was desired; which ought not to be.

"The judicature which the Lords claim in Appeals against a Member of the house of Commons, and the privilege of that house in that case, is so involved, that no conference can be upon the matter without some way touching the former.

"That this manner of agreeing to a conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings between the two houses of Parliament, in coming to conferences; and doth seem to place a power in the managers of such conferences to judge whether such provisos be broken or not, and accordingly to proceed or break off the conference upon their own judgments.

"The house of Commons doubt not, but that when the Lords have considered of what is delivered at this conference, the good correspondence which the Lords express they desire to continue between the two houses, (which the Commons also are no less careful to maintain) will induce them to remove the present interruption of coming to conferences; and therefore to agree to the conference, as it was desired by the house of Commons, upon the privileges of their house, concerned in the Lords answer to the message of the house of Commons, in the case of Mr. Onslow: That the particular limitation, that nothing be offered at the conference, that may any way concern the judicature of the Lords, appears unreasonable; for that their Lordships judicature in Parliament is circumscribed by the laws of the land, as to their proceedings and judgments; and is, as well as all other Courts, subjected to Parliament."

Jovis, 3 die Junii, 1675.

Mr. Vaughan reports, That the Lord Privy-Seal did manage the conference, and had delivered the intent and occasion of the conference; which Mr. Vaughan did report to the house, to the effect following, viz.

"The Lords do take notice of the house of Commons their ordering into custody of their Serjeant, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Serjeant Porter, Counsellors at Law; assigned by their Lordships to be of counsel in an Appeal heard at their Lordships bar, in the case of Sir Nicholas Crispe, against the Lady Bowyer, Mr. Dalmaboy, and others; the Lords in Parliament, where his Majesty is highest in his royal estate, and where the last resort of judging upon Writs of Error, and Appeals in Equity, in all causes and over all persons, is undoubtedly fixed, and permanently lodged.

"It is an unexampled usurpation and breach of privilege against the house of Peers, that their orders or judgments should be disputed, or endeavoured to be controlled, or the execution thereof

" thereof obstructed by the lower house of Parliament; who are no Court, nor have authority to administer an oath, or give any judgment.

" It is a transcendent invasion on the right and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws, which have provided, That no Freeman shall be imprisoned, or otherwise restrained of his liberty, but by due process of Law.

" This tends to the subversion of the Government of this Kingdom, and to the introducing of arbitrariness and disorder.

" Because it is in the nature of an injunction from the lower house (who have no authority or power of judicature over inferior subjects, much less over the King and Lords) against the orders and judgments of the supreme Court.

" We are further commanded to acquaint you, That the Lords have therefore, out of that justice which they are dispensers of, against oppression and breach of laws, by judgment of this Court, set at liberty by the Gentleman-Usher of the black Rod, all the said Serjeants and Counsellors; and prohibited the Lieutenant of the Tower, and all other Keepers of prisons, and Goalers, and all persons whatsoever, from arresting and imprisoning, detaining, or otherwise molesting, or charging the said Gentlemen, or any of them in this case: And if any person, of what degree soever, shall presume to the contrary, their Lordships will exercise the authority with them intrusted for putting the laws in execution.

" And we are further commanded to read to you, a Roll of Parliament, in the first year of the reign of King Henry the IVth, whereof we have brought the original with us."

And a debate arising thereupon,

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the last conference; and that these Members following, be appointed to prepare and draw up reasons upon the debates of the house, to be offered at the conference; Mr. Secretary Coventry, &c.

Ordered, That the officer in whose custody the Record of the first of Henry the IVth, mentioned at the conference with the Lords, do attend the committee appointed to draw up reasons for another conference this afternoon: And they are to meet at three of the clock, in the speaker's chamber, and to send for Persons, Papers, and Records.

Ordered, That no Member of this house do attend the Lords house, upon any summons from the Lords, without leave of the house.

Veneris, 4 Junii, 1675.

Ordered, That the thanks of the house be returned to Mr. Speaker, for causing Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, formerly committed by order of this house to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, for a breach of privilege, to be seized and taken into custody in Westminster-hall, for his breach of privilege.

The house being informed, that Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Charles Porter, who were ordered to be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, are now in Westminster-hall;

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms now attending this house, do go with his Mace into Westminster-hall, and do execute the order of this house, and the warrant of Mr. Speaker thereupon; for seizing and bringing in custody Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, for their breach of the privilege of this house.

The Serjeant returning gave an account, that he had executed the order of this house, and Mr. Speaker's warrant thereupon, and had brought the said Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, in custody, into the Speaker's chamber.

The question being put, That Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, be sent to the Tower, for their breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this house?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to receive them into his custody.

Ordered, That John Popham, Esq; the now Serjeant at Arms attending this house, be protected against all persons that shall any ways molest or hinder him from executing his office.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee, the reasons agreed to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords upon the matters delivered at the last conference; which were twice read, and with some amendments made at the table, severally agreed; and are as follow, viz.

" Your Lordships having desired the last conference, upon matters of high importance concerning the dignity of the King, and the safety of the Government, the Commons did not expect to hear from your Lordships at that conference, things so contrary to, and inconsistent with, the matter upon which the said conference was desired, as were then delivered by your Lordships.

" It was much below the expectation of the Commons, that after a representation of your Lordships message of matters of so high importance, the particular upon which the conference was grounded, should be only the commitment of four lawyers to the custody of their own Serjeant at Arms, for a manifest violation of the privileges of their house.

" But the Commons were much more surprized, when your Lordships had introduced the conference, with an assurance, that it was in order to a good correspondence between the two houses, that your Lordships should immediately assume a power to judge the orders of the house of Commons for imprisonment of Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, to be illegal and arbitrary; and the execution thereof a great indignity to the King's Majesty; with many other high reflections upon the house of Commons, throughout the whole conference; whereby your Lordships have condemned the whole house of Commons as criminal, which is without precedent or example, or any ground or reason so to do.

" It is not against the King's dignity for the house of Commons to punish by imprisonment, a commoner that is guilty of violating their privileges, that being according to the known laws and customs of Parliament; and the right of their privileges declared by the King's royal Predecessors in former Parliaments, and by himself in this.

" But

" But your Lordships claiming to be the supreme Court, and that his Majesty is highest in his royal estate in the Court of judicature there, is a diminution of the dignity of the King, who is highest in his royal estate in full Parliament; and is derogatory to the authority of the whole Parliament, by appropriating it to yourselves.

" The Commons did not by this imprisonment infringe any privileges of the house of Peers, but only defend and maintain their own: On the other side, your Lordships do highly intrench upon the rights and privileges of the house of Commons, by denying them to be a Court, or to have any authority or power of judicature; which, if admitted, will leave them without any power or authority to preserve themselves.

" As to what your Lordships call a transcendent invasion of the rights and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws; the house of Commons presume that your Lordships know, that neither the Great Charter, Petition of Right, or any other laws, do take away the law and custom of Parliament, or of either house of Parliament, or else your Lordships have much forgotten the Great Charter, and those other laws, in the several judgments your Lordships have passed upon the King's subjects in cases of privilege. But the Commons cannot find by Magna Charta, or by any other law or ancient custom of Parliament, that your Lordships have any jurisdiction in cases of Appeals from the Courts of Equity.

" We are farther commanded to acquaint you, that the enlargement of those persons in prison, by order of the house of Commons, by the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, and the prohibition which threatens all officers and other persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them; is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges of the house of Commons: And they have therefore caused them to be retaken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, and have committed them to the Tower.

" As for the Parliament-Roll of the first of King Henry the IVth, caused to be read by your Lordships at the last conference, but not applied, the commons apprehend it doth not concern the case in question: For that this Record was made upon occasion of judgments given by the Lords, to depose and imprison their lawful King; to which the Commons were not willing to be made Parties. And therefore the Commons conceive it will not be for the honour of your Lordships to make further use of that Record.

" But we are commanded to read to your Lordships the Parliament-Roll of 4 Ed. III. N. 6. which if your Lordships please to consider, they doubt not but your Lordships will find occasion to apply it to the present purpose."

Ordered, The Thanks of the house be given to the Speaker, for his care in issuing the warrant for retaking the persons committed yesterday into custody.

The Serjeant at Arms ordered to be sent to the Tower; and the other Serjeant at Arms attending, was ordered to apprehend him for betraying his trust, in not executing his office, in bringing the persons committed yesterday to his custody, to the bar of the house.

An Address ordered to be prepared to be presented to his Majesty, to desire a new Serjeant at Arms to attend the house.

Saturday, June 5, 1675.

Mr. Secretary Coventry acquainted the house, that it was his Majesty's desire, that the house would adjourn till four of the clock in the afternoon, and that both houses should at that time attend him in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall.

A debate arising touching the removal of John Popham, Esq; Serjeant at Arms in ordinary, attending the house yesterday, the further debate thereof was adjourned till five o'clock in the afternoon. And then the house adjourned till four in the afternoon.

In the Afternoon.

The house then met at the time they adjourn'd to, and went in a body to his Majesty at Whitehall; and the house of Lords being also present, his Majesty made the following Speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen;

YOU may remember, that at the meeting of this Session I told you, no endeavours would be wanting to make the continuance of this Parliament unpracticable. I am sorry that experience hath so quickly shewed you the truth of what I then said; but I hope that you are well convinced, that the intent of all these contrivances is only to procure a dissolution. I confess, I look upon it as a most malicious design of those who are enemies to me and the Church of England; and were the contrivers known, I should not doubt but the dislike of their practices, would alone be a means of bringing the houses to a good understanding. But since I cannot prescribe any way how to arrive to the discovery of it, I must tell you plainly my opinion, that the means of coming to any composition between yourselves, cannot be without admitting of such free conferences as may convince one another by the reasons then offered; or enable me to judge rightly of the differences, when all hath been said on both sides which the matter will afford: for I am not to suffer these differences to grow to disorders in the whole Kingdom, if I can prevent it; and I am sure my judgment shall always be impartial between my two houses of Parliament. But I must let you know, that whilst you are in debate about your privileges, I will not suffer my own to be invaded. I have nothing more to say to you at this time, but to desire, as I did when we met first, that you would yet consider, and not suffer ill mens designs to hinder the Sessions from a happy conclusion.

[The house of Lords presented an Address to his Majesty, to remove the Lieutenant of the Tower; whereupon the Lord-Treasurer reported his Majesty's answer, viz. " That his Majesty hath considered the circumstances of the matter, and is not satisfied how with justice he can remove him."]

The house then took into consideration his Majesty's Speech, and resolved, nemine contradicente, That the humble thanks of this house be returned to his Majesty, for the gracious expressions in his Speech this day made to both houses of Parliament; and such members of this house as are of his Majesty's privy-council are desired to present the humble thanks of this house to his Majesty.

Resolved,

Resolved, That it doth not appear to this house, that any Member thereof, hath either contrived or promoted the difference between the two houses of Parliament; or in asserting the Rights of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this house; or to have done any thing inconsistent with his duty, or the trust reposed in him. And then adjourned to Monday, June 7.

On Monday, June 7, the house resolved, That what Serjeant Popham did in retaking the four lawyers into his custody, and conducting them to the Tower of London, was in pursuance of his duty, and by the order of the house; and the further debate concerning the said Serjeant at Arms was adjourned till Wednesday morning.

A copy of an order from the house of Lords for the hearing counsel in the case of Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house, to-morrow morning, was then read and debated: And,

Resolved, That as to the case of Appeal brought against Sir John Fagg in the house of Lords, he shall have the protection and assistance of this house.

Resolved, nem. con. That if any person or persons shall be aiding or assisting in putting in execution any sentence or judgment that shall be given by the house of Lords, upon the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this house, such person or persons shall be adjudged and taken to be betrayers of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this house; and shall be proceeded against accordingly.

Ordered, That these Votes be made publick, by setting them up in Westminster-hall, and in the Lobby of this house; and the clerk of the house to take care to see it done.

In the afternoon the house proceeded in the further consideration of effectual means for the preservation of their rights and privileges, and resolved, nem. con. That no person committed by order or warrant of this house, for breach of the privileges or contempt of the authority of the house, ought to be discharged during the Session of Parliament, without the order or warrant of this house.

Resolved, nem. con. That the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, in receiving and detaining in custody, Sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, hath performed his duty according to law; and for his so doing, he shall have the assistance and protection of this house.

Resolved, That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in case he hath, or shall receive any writ, warrant, order, or command, to remove or deliver any person or persons committed to his charge, for breach of the privileges, or contempt of the authority of the house of Commons, by order or warrant of the house; shall not make any return thereof, or yield any obedience thereto, before he hath first acquainted the house therewith, and received their order and direction how to proceed therein.

Ordered, That these resolutions be immediately sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, June 8, 1675.

A message sent to the Lords to remind them of the last conference: and for a conference upon the subject-matter delivered by the Lords at the last conference.

Sir John Robinson informing the house, that he had received the four lawyers committed to his custody by this house, and denied to deliver them to the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod; and that he was served last night with four writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring the said four lawyers before the King and his Parliament at Westminster, this morning, and craved the advice of the house what to do therein:

Ordered, The thanks of the house be given to the said Sir John Robinson for his behaviour therein; and Mr. Speaker intimated to him, that he should forbear to return the said writs of Habeas Corpus, which were read and debated; and the further debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow morning, and a committee appointed to search the Lords Journals to see what hath been done in the case of the four lawyers, the writs of Habeas Corpus, and Mr. Serjeant Popham; and to search for precedents on the writs of Habeas Corpus: and adjourn'd.

Mercurii, 9 die Junii.

Sir Thomas Clarges reports from the committee to whom it was referred to search for precedents touching writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable in Parliament; that the committee had found several precedents of writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in Parliament, and had considered of them: And that the committee thereupon had agreed upon four Resolves to be presented to the house, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table, where they being twice read, were upon the question severally agreed to, and are as follow;

"Resolved, nem. con. 1. That no commoners of England, committed by the order or warrant of the house of Commons, for breach of privilege, or contempt of the authority of the said house, ought, without order of this house to be by any writ of Habeas Corpus, or any other authority whatsoever, made to appear and answer, or receive any determination in the house of Peers, during that Session of Parliament wherein such persons were so committed.

"Resolved, nem. con. 2. That the order of the house of Peers for the issuing out the writs of Habeas Corpus concerning Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, is insufficient and illegal; for that it is general, and expresses no particular cause of privilege, and commands the King's Great Seal to be put to writs not returnable before the said house of Peers.

"Resolved, nem. con. 3. That the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with these resolutions, to the end that the said writs of Habeas Corpus be superseded as contrary to law, and the privileges of this house.

"Resolved, nem. con. 4. That a message be sent to the Lords to acquaint their Lordships, that Mr. Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, were committed by order and warrant of this house, for manifest breach of the privilege, and contempt of the authority of this house."

Ordered, That Col. Birch do go up to the Lords with a message, that a conference be desired upon the subject-matter of the last conference.

A message was this day sent from his Majesty in the house of Lords, by Sir Edward Carteret, Usher of the Black Rod, commanding this honourable house to attend his Majesty forthwith in the house of Peers; and accordingly Mr. Speaker went up with the house, where his Majesty was pleased to make the following speech to them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Think I have given sufficient evidence to the world, that I have not been wanting on my part, in my endeavours to procure the full satisfaction of all my subjects, in the matters both of religion and property: I have not only invited you to those considerations at our first meeting, but I have been careful through this whole Session, that no concern of my own should divert you from them.

Besides, as I had only designed the matter of it to be the procuring of good laws, so for the gaining of them, I have already waited much longer than I intended; and should have been contented still to have continued my expectation, had there any hopes remained of a good conclusion. But I must confess, the ill designs of our enemies have been too prevalent against those good ones I had proposed to myself, in behalf of my people; and those unhappy differences between my two Houses are grown to such a height, that I find no possible means of putting an end to them, but by a prorogation. It is with great unwillingness that I make use of this expedient, having always intended an adjournment for the preserving of such bills as were unfinished. But my hopes are, that by this means the present occasion of differences being taken away, you will be so careful hereafter of the public, as not to seek new ones, nor to revive the old.

I intend to meet you here again in winter, and have directed my Lord Keeper to prorogue you till the thirteenth Day of October next.

October, 13, 1675, the King came to the house, and began thus;

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Meet you now with more than an usual concern for the event of this Session; and I know it's but what may be reasonably expected from the care I have for the preservation of the Government. The causes of the last prorogation, as I for my part do not desire to remember, so I hope no man else will, unless it be to learn from thence how to avoid the like occasion for the future: And I pray consider how fatal the consequences may be, and how little benefit is like to redound to the people by it. However, if any of that kind shall arise, I desire you would defer those debates till you have brought such publick Bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the Kingdom.

[The rest of the speech, relates to his Majesty's recommending the security of the Protestant Religion, the Supply for building Ships, and publick Debts, &c.]

Then the Lord Finch, by his Majesty's order, made a speech to both Houses, recommending Unanimity, and making good Laws, and the care of Religion, &c.

The Earl of Shaftesbury's Speech in the House of Lords, upon the Debate of appointing a Day for the hearing Dr. Shirley's cause, the 20th of October, 1675.

My Lords,

OUR All is at stake, and therefore you must give me leave to speak freely before we part with it. My Lord Bishop of Salisbury is of opinion, That we should rather appoint a day to consider what to do upon the Petition, than to appoint a day of bearing; and my Lord-Keeper, for I may name them at a Committee of the whole House, tells us in very eloquent and studied language, That he will propose us a way far less liable to exception, and much less offensive and injurious to our own privileges, than that of appointing a day of bearing. And I beseech your Lordships, did you not after all these fine words expect some admirable proposal? But it ended in this; That your Lordships should appoint a day, nay a very long day, to consider what you would do in it: and my Lord hath undertaken to convince you, that this is your only course, by several undeniable reasons; the first of which is, That 'tis against your Judicature to have this cause, which is not proper, before us, nor ought to be relieved by us. To this, my Lords, give me leave to answer, that I did not expect from a man professing the Law, that after an answer by order of the Court was put in; and a day had been appointed for hearing, which by some accident was set aside; and the Plaintiff moving for a second day to be assigned, that ever without hearing Counsel of both sides, the Court did enter into the merits of the cause. And if your Lordships should do it here in a cause attended with the circumstances this is, it would not only be an apparent Injustice, but a plain Subterfuge, to avoid a point you durst not maintain.

But my Lord's second reason speaks the matter more clearly; for that is, Because 'tis a doubtful case, whether the Commons have not privilege; and therefore my Lord would have you, to appoint a further and a very long day to consider of it: which in plain English is, that your Lordships should confess upon your books, that you conceive it on second thoughts a doubtful case; for so your appointing a day to consider, will do; and that for no other reason, but because my Lord-Keeper thinks it so. Which I hope will not be a reason to prevail with your Lordships; since we cannot yet by experience tell that his Lordship is capable of thinking your Lordships in the right, in any matter against the judgment of the House of Commons; 'tis so hard a thing even for the ablest of men to change ill habits.

But my Lord's third reason, is the most admirable of all, which he styles unanswerable, viz. That your Lordships are all convinced in your consciences, that this (if prosecuted) will cause a breach. I beseech your Lordships consider, whether this argument thus applied, would not overthrow the Law of Nature, and all the Laws of right and property in the world: for 'tis an argument, and a very good one, that you should not stand or insist on claims, where you have not a clear right, or where the question is not of consequence and moment, in a matter that may produce a dangerous and pernicious breach, between relations, persons or bodies politick, join'd in interest and high concerns together. So, on the other hand, if the obstinacy of the party in the wrong, shall be made an unanswerable argument for the other party to recede and give up his just rights; how long shall the People keep their liberties, or the Princes or Governors of the world their prerogatives! How long shall the husband maintain his dominion, or any man his property, from his friend's or his neighbour's obstinacy? But, my Lords, when I hear my Lord Keeper open so eloquently the fatal consequences of a breach, I cannot forbear to fall into some admiration how it comes to pass, that (if the consequences be so fatal) the King's Ministers in the House of Commons, of which there are several that are of the Cabinet, and have have daily resort to his Majesty, and have the direction and trust of his affairs; I say, that none of these should press these consequences there, or give the least stop to the career of that House in this business; but that all the Votes concerning this affair, may even that very Vote, That no Appeal from any Court of Equity, is cognizable by the House of Lords, should pass nemine contradicente. And yet all the great ministers with us here, the Bishops and other Lords of greatest dependance on the Court, contend this point, as if it were pro Aris & Focis. I hear his Majesty in Scotland hath been pleased to declare against Appeals in Parliament; I cannot much blame the Court, if they think (the Lord-Keeper and the Judges being of the King's naming, and in his power to change) that the Justice of the Nation is safe enough; and I, my Lords, may think so too, during this King's time, though I hear Scotland, not without reason, complain already. Yet how future Princes may use this power, and how Judges may be made not men of ability or integrity, but men of relation and dependance, and who will do what they are commanded; and all mens causes come to be judged, and estates disposed on, as great men at Court please.

My Lords, the constitution of our Government hath provided better for us; and I can never believe so wise a body as the House of Commons, will prove that foolish woman which plucks down her house with her hands.

My Lords, I must presume in the next place to say something to what was offered by my Lord Bishop of Salisbury, a man of great learning and abilities, and always versed in a stronger and closer way of reasoning, than the business of that noble Lord I answered before did accustom him to; and that reverend Prelate hath stated the matter very fair upon two heads.

The first, Whether the bearing of Causes and Appeals, and especially in this point where the Members have privilege, be so material to us, that it ought not to give way to the reason of State, of greater affairs that pressed us at that time.

The second was, If this business be of that moment, yet whether the appointing a day to consider of this Petition, would prove of that consequence and prejudice to your cause?

My Lords, to these, give me leave in the first place to say, that this matter is no less than your whole Judicature; and your Judicature is the life and soul of the dignity of the Peerage of England; you will quickly grow burdensome, if you grow useless: you have now the greatest and most useful end of Parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new Laws, but to redress grievances, and to maintain the old Land-Marks. The House of Commons business is to complain, your Lordships to redress, not only the complaints from them that are the eyes of the Nation, but all other particular persons that address to you. A land may groan under a multitude of Laws, and I believe our do; and when Laws grow so multiplied, they prove oftner snarles than directions and security to the people. I look upon it as the ignorance and weakness of the latter age, if not worse, the effect of the designs of ill men; that it is grown a general opinion, that where there is not a particular direction in some Act of Parliament the law is defective; as if the Common Law had not provided much better, shorter, and plainer for the peace and quiet of the Nation, than intricate long perplex'd Statutes do; which has made work for the Lawyers, given power to the Judges, lessen'd your Lordships power, and in a good measure unhing'd the security of the people.

My Lord Bishop tells us, That your whole Judicature is not in question, but only the privilege of the House of Commons, of their Members not appearing at your Bar: my Lords, were it no more, yet that for Justice and the People's sake you ought not to part with: how far a privilege of the House of Commons, their servants, and those they own, doth extend, Westminster-Hall may with grief tell your Lordships. And the same privilege of their Members being not sued, must be allowed by your Lordships as well; and what a failure of Justice this would prove, whilst they are Lords for life, and you for inheritance, let the world judge; for my part I am willing to come to conference, whenever the dispute shall begin again; and dare undertake to your Lordships, that they have neither precedent, reason, nor any justifiable pretence to shew against us; and therefore, my Lords, if you part with this undoubted right merely for asking, where will the asking stop? And, my Lords, we are sure it doth not stop here, for they have already, Nemine Contradicente, voted against your Lordships power of Appeals from any Court of Equity! so that you may plainly see where this caution and reason of State means to stop; not one jot short of laying your whole Judicature aside, for the same reason of passing the King's money, of not interrupting good Laws, and whatever else must of necessity avoid all breach upon what score soever; and your Lordships plainly see the breach will be as well made upon your Judicature in general, as upon this; so that when your Lordships have appointed a day, a very long day, for to consider whether Dr. Shirley's cause be not too hot to handle; and when you have done the same for Sir Nicholas Stanton, whose Petition I hear is coming in; your Lordships must proceed to a vote, to lay all private business aside for six weeks: for that phrase of private business, hath obtained upon this last age, upon that which is your most publick duty and business; namely, the administration of Justice. And I can tell your Lordships, besides the reason that leads to it, that I have some intelligence of the designing such a vote. For on the second day of your sitting, at the rising of the Lords house, there came a Gentleman into the Lobby, belonging to a very great person, and ask'd in very great haste, Are the Lords up? Have they passed the Vote? and being ask'd What Vote? He answer'd, The Vote of no private business for six weeks.

My Lords, if this be your business, see where you are; if we are to postpone our Judicature for fear of offending the House of Commons for six weeks, that they in the interim may pass the money, and other acceptable Bills that his Majesty thinks of importance; are so many wise men in the House of Commons to be laid asleep, and to pass all these acceptable things; and when they have done, to let us be let loose upon them?

Will they not remember this, next time there is want of money? or may not they rather be assured by those ministers that are amongst them, and go on so unanimously with them, that the King is on their side in this controversy? And when the publick businesses are over, our time will be too short to make a breach, or vindicate ourselves in the matter. And then I beg your Lordships, where are you, after you have asserted but the last Session your right of Judicature, so highly, even in this point; and after the House of Commons had gone so high against you on the other hand, as to post up their declaration and remonstrances on Westminster-hall doors; the very next Session after, you postpone the very same causes; and not only those, but all Judicatures whatsoever? I beseech your Lordships, will not this prove a fatal precedent and confession against yourselves? 'Tis a maxim and a rational one among the Lawyers, That one precedent where the Case hath been contested, is worth a thousand where there hath been no contest. My Lords, in saying this, I humbly suppose I have given a sufficient answer to my Lord Bishop's second question; Whether the appointing a day to consider what you will do with this Petition, be of that consequence to your right? For it is a plain confession, that it is a doubtful case, and that infinitely stronger than if it were a new thing to you, never heard of before: for it is the very same case, and the very same thing desired in that case, that you formerly ordered, and so strongly asserted; so that upon time, and all the deliberation imaginable, you declare yourselves to become doubtful, and you put yourselves out of your own hands, into that power that you have no reason to believe on your side in this question.

My Lords, I have all the duty imaginable to his Majesty, and shall with all submission give way to any thing he should think of importance to his affairs: but in this point it is to alter the constitution of the Government, if you are asked to lay this aside; and there is no Reason of State can be an argument to your Lordships to turn yourselves out of that interest you have in the constitution of the Government; 'tis not only your concern that you maintain yourselves in't, but 'tis the concern of the poorest man in England, that you keep your station: 'tis your Lordships concern, and that so highly, that I will be bold to say, the King can give none of you a requital or recompence for it. What are empty titles? What is present power, or riches, and a great estate, wherein I have no firm nor fixed property? 'Tis the constitution of the Government, and maintaining it, that secures your Lordships and every man else in what he hath: the poorest Lord, if the birthright of the Peerage be maintained, has a fair prospect before him for himself or his posterity; but the greatest title, with the greatest present power and riches, is but a mean creature, and maintains those in absolute Monarchies, no otherwise than by servile and low flatteries, and upon uncertain terms.

My Lords, 'tis not only your Interest, but the Interest of the Nation, that you maintain your rights; for let the House of Commons and Gentry of England think what they please; there is no Prince that ever govern'd without Nobility or an Army: if you will not have one, you must have another, or the Monarchy cannot long support, or keep itself from tumbling into a Democratical Republick. Your Lordships and the People have the same cause, and the same enemies. My Lords, would you be in favour with the King? 'Tis a very ill way to it, to put yourselves out of a future capacity, to be considerable in his service. I do not find in story, or in modern experience, but that 'tis better; and a man is much more regarded that is still in a capacity, and opportunity to serve, than he that hath wholly deprived himself of all for his Prince's service. And I therefore declare, that I will serve my

VOL. VII.

Prince as a Peer, but will not destroy the Peerage to serve him.

My Lords, I have heard of twenty foolish models and expedients to secure the Justice of the Nation, and yet to take this right from your Lordships, as the King by his commission appointing Commoners to hear Appeals; or that the twelve Judges should be the persons, or that persons should be appointed by Act of Parliament, which are all not only to take away your Lordships just right, that ought not to be altered any more than any other part of the Government, but are in themselves, when well weighed, ridiculous: I must deal freely with your Lordships, these things could never have risen in mens minds, but that there have been some kind of provocation that has given the first rise to it. Pray, my Lords, forgive me, if on this occasion I put you in mind of Committee-dinners, and the scandal of it: those droves of Ladies that attended all causes; 'twas come to that pass, that men even hired or borrowed of their friends handsome sisters or daughters to deliver their Petitions: but yet for all this, I must say, that your judgments have been sacred, unless in one or two causes; and those we owe most to that bench, from whence we now apprehend most danger.

There is one thing I had almost forgot to speak to, which is the conjuncture of time, the hinge upon which our reason of State turns; and to that, my Lords, give me leave to say, if this be not a time of leisure for you to vindicate your privileges, you must never expect one. I could almost say, that the harmony, good agreement, and concord that is to be prayed for at most other times, may be fatal to us now; we owe the peace of these last two years, and the dis-engagement from the French Interest, to the two houses differing from the sense and opinion of Whitehall: so at this time, the thing in the world this Nation has most reason to apprehend, is a general peace, which cannot now happen without very advantageous terms to the French, and disadvantageous to the house of Austria. We are the King's great Counsellors, and if so, have a right to differ, and give contrary counsels to those few that are nearest about him: I fear they would advance a general peace, I am sure I would advise against it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wish nothing from you may add weight and reputation to those counsels, who would assist the French. No money for ships, nor preparations you can make, nor personal assurances our Prince can have, can secure us from the French, if they are at leisure. He is grown the most potent of us all at sea: he has built 24 ships this last year, and has 30 more in number than we; besides the advantage, that our ships are all out of order, and his so exquisitely provided for, that every ship has his particular store-house. 'Tis incredible the money he hath, and is bestowing in making harbours; he makes Nature itself give way to the vastness of his expence: and after all this, shall a Prince so wise, so intent upon his affairs, be thought to make all these preparations to sail over land, and fall on the back of Hungary, and batter the walls of Kaminitz? Or is it possible he should oversee his Interest in seizing of Ireland, a thing so feasible to him, if he be master of the Seas, as he certainly now is; and which when attained, gives him all the Southern, Mediterranean, East and West-India Trade, and renders him both by situation, and excellent harbours, bours, perpetual master of the Seas without dispute?

My Lords, to conclude this point, I fear the Court of England is greatly mistaken in it, and I do not wish them the reputation of the concurrence of the Kingdom: and this out of the most sincere loyalty to his Majesty, and love to my Nation.

My Lords, I have but one thing more to trouble you with, and that peradventure is a consideration of the greatest weight and concern, both to your Lordships and the whole Nation. I have often seen in this house, that the arguments, with strongest reason, and most convincing to the Lay-Lords in general, have not had the same effect upon the Bishops bench; but that they have unanimously gone against us in matters, that many of us have thought essential and undoubted rights: and I consider, that 'tis not possible, that men of great learning, piety, and reason, as their Lordships are, should not have the same care of doing right, and the same conviction what is right, upon clear reason offered, that other your Lordships have. And therefore, my Lords, I must necessarily think, we differ in principles; and then 'tis very easy to apprehend, what is the clearest sense to men of my principle, may not at all persuade or affect the conscience of the best man of a different one. I put your Lordships the case plainly, as 'tis now before us. My principle is, That the King is King by Law, and by the same Law that the poor man enjoys his cottage; and so it becomes the concern of every man in England, that has but his liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmost, the King in all his rights and prerogatives. My principle is also, That the Lords house, and the Judicature and Rights belonging to it, are an essential part of the Government, and established by the same Law: the King governing and administering Justice by his House of Lords, and advising with both his Houses of Parliament in all important matters, is the Government I own, I am born under, and am obliged to. If ever there should happen in future ages (which God forbid) a King governing by an Army, without his Parliament, 'tis a government I own not, am not obliged to, nor was born under. According to this principle, every honest man that holds it, must endeavour equally to preserve the frame of the Government, in all the parts of it, and cannot satisfy his conscience to give up the Lords house for the service of the Crown, or to take away the just rights and privileges of the House of Commons to please the Lords. But there is another principle got into the world, my Lords, that hath not been long there; for Archbishop Laud was the first author that I remember of it; and I cannot find that the Jesuits, or indeed the Papish Clergy have ever own'd it, but some of the Episcopal Clergy of our British Isles; and 'tis withal, as 'tis new, so the most dangerous destructive Doctrine to our Government and Law, that ever was. 'Tis the first of the Canons published by the Convocation 1640. That Monarchy is of Divine Right. This Doctrine was then preached up, and maintained by Sibthorp, Manwaring, and others, and of later years, by a book published by Dr. Sor-derson, Bishop of Lincoln, under the name of Archbishop Usher; and how much it is spread amongst our dignified Clergy, is very easily known. We all agree, That the King and his Government is to be obeyed for Conscience sake; and that the divine precepts require not only here, but in all parts of the world, obedience to lawful Governours. But that this family are our Kings, and this particular frame of Government is our lawful constitution, and obliges us, is owing only to the particular Laws of our Country. This Laudean Doctrine, was the root that produced the Bill of Test last Session, and some very perplexed Oaths, that are of the same nature with that, and yet imposed by several Acts of this Parliament.

In a word, if this Doctrine be true, our Magna Charta is of no use, our Laws are but rules amongst ourselves during the King's pleasure. Monarchy, if of divine right, cannot be bounded or limited by human Laws; nay, what's more, cannot bind itself: and all our claims of right by the Law, or constitution of the Government, all the jurisdiction and privilege of this House, all the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, all the properties and liberties of the people, are to give way not only to the Interest, but the will and pleasure of the Crown. And the best and worthiest of men, holding this principle, must vote to deliver up all we have, not only when reason of State, and the separate Interest of the Crown require it; but when the will and pleasure of the King is known, would have it so. For that must be, to a man of that principle, the only rule and measure of Right and Justice. Therefore, my Lords, you see how necessary it is, that our principles be known; and how fatal to us all it is, that this principle should be suffered to spread any further.

My Lords, to conclude, your Lordships have seen of what consequence this matter is to you, and that the appointing a day to consider, is no less than declaring yourselves doubtful, upon second and deliberate thoughts, that you put yourselves out of your own hands, into a more than a moral probability of having this Session made a precedent against you. You see your duty to yourselves and the people; and that 'tis really not the interest of the House of Commons, but may be the inclination of the Court, that you lose the power of Appeals: but I beg our House may not be Felo de se, but that your Lordships would take in this affair, the only course to preserve yourselves, and appoint a day, this day three weeks, for the hearing of Dr. Shirley's cause, which is my humble motion.

Saturday, Nov. 13. 1675. An order from the Lords to hear Sir John Fagg's cause to-morrow morning, was this day read in the House of Commons, and debated, and the farther debate thereof adjourn'd till Monday morning next.

Monday, Nov. 15. The house resolv'd, that the prosecuting Appeals in the Lords house, by Dr. Thomas Shirley, against Sir John Fagg a Member of this house, is a breach of the privileges of this house; and that the said Sir John Fagg do not make any defence at the Lords Bar, in the said Appeal; and the further debate thereof was adjourn'd till to-morrow morning.

Tuesday, the 16th. Adjourn'd the further debate of Sir John Fagg's business till to-morrow morning; and on Wednesday, adjourn'd the further debate till Thursday; when Sir John Fagg's business was resum'd, and resolv'd that a conference be desired of the Lords, for avoiding differences between the two Houses, and then adjourn'd till Friday morning.

Veneris, 19 die Novembris.

Sir William Coventry reports from the Committee, to whom it was referr'd, to prepare and draw draw up reasons to be offered at the conference, to be desired with the Lords, for avoiding the occasions of reviving the differences between the two Houses; and a paper of reasons agreed by the said Committee, to be reported to the house, being read, and the same being agreed to, is as followeth, viz.

His Majesty having recommended to us, at the opening of this Sessions of Parliament, the avoiding this difference if possible; and if it could not be prevented, that then we shou'd defer these debates till we had brought such publick bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the Kingdom: The Commons esteem it a great misfortune, that contrary to that most excellent advice, the proceedings in the Appeal, brought the last Session against Sir John Fagg, by Mr. Shirley, hath been renewed, and a day set for hearing the cause; and therefore the Commons have judged it the best way, before they enter into the argument of defence of their rights in this matter; to propose to your Lordships, the putting off the proceedings in that matter, for some short time; that so they may, according to his Majesty's advice, give a dispatch to some bills now before them, of great importance to the King and Kingdom; which being finished, the Commons will be ready to give your Lordships such reasons against those proceedings, and in defence of their rights, as we hope may satisfy your Lordships, that no such proceedings ought to have been.

Resolv'd, That a message be sent to the Lords, to desire a conference; to preserve the good correspondence between the two Houses.

Resolv'd, That whosoever shall prosecute any Appeal before the Lords, against any Commoner of England; from any Court of Equity, shall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and privileges of the Commons of England; and shall be proceeded against accordingly: and the resolution ordered to be affixed in the Lobby, Westminster-hall-gate, and all Inns of Court and Chancery; and then adjourn'd till next morning, Nov. the 20th:

Die Sab. Nov. 20.

Order'd, That Dr. Thomas Shirley be taken into custody by the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, as also Sir Nicholas Stanton; for serving Mr. Onslow with an order to attend the Lords; and then adjourn'd to Monday Nov. 22.

On Saturday Nov. 20. 1675. Dr. Thomas Shirley appear'd at the bar of the House of Lords, and his Counsel Mr. Wallop appearing, who wou'd have excused himself, but was order'd to appear again on Monday morning next, to plead the cause; and the other two Counsel (one being in the country, and the other sick) were excus'd: and the said Dr. Shirley, Sir Nicholas Stanton, and Mr. Wallop, were order'd to have the protection of the house: And upon debate of the Commons Vote made yesterday;

Order'd, That the paper posted up in several places, signed by William Goldsbro Cler. Dom. Com. against the Judicature of the House of Peers, in cases of Appeals from Courts of Equity, is illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the dissolution of the Government. And then upon consideration of the said vote of the Commons, it was propos'd by Lord Mobun to make an Address to his Majesty to dissolve the Parliament, and call another, and frequent Parliaments; and upon debate thereof, about eight o'clock at night they came to this question, and carried it by two votes only,

VOL. VII.

That there should be no Address; the numbers being fifty and forty-eight: and then adjourn'd to Monday.

On which day the House being met, a message was sent by his Majesty, for the House to attend him forthwith in the House of Peers; which the House accordingly did, when his Majesty pass'd three Bills, and the Lord-Keeper, by his Majesty's order, prorogu'd both Houses of Parliament, till the 15th day of February come twelvemonth, 1676; which ended the dispute.

The Protestation, with reasons of several Lords for the dissolution of this Parliament, entered in the Lords Journal, November 22, 1675. the day the Parliament was prorogu'd.

WE whose names are under-written, Peers of this Realm, having proposed, That an humble Address might be made to his Majesty from this house, that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve this Parliament; and the house having carried it in the negative: for the justification of our loyal intentions towards his Majesty's service, and of our true respect and deference to this honourable house; and to shew that we had no sinister and indirect ends in this our humble proposal, do with all humility herein set forth the grounds and reasons why we were of opinion, that the said humble Address should have been made.

1. We do humbly conceive, that it is according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of this Realm, that there should be frequent and new Parliaments, and that the practice of several years hath been accordingly.

2. It seems not reasonable, that any particular number of men, should for many years ingross so great a trust of the people, as to be their Representatives in the House of Commons: and all other the Gentry, and the Members of Corporations of the same degree and quality with them, should be so long excluded. Neither as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the Government, that the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, should be confined for so long a time to such Members as they have once chosen to serve for them; the mutual Correspondence and Interests of those who chuse and are chosen, admitting of great variations in length of time.

3. The long continuance of any such as are entrusted for others, and who have so great a power over the purse of the Nation, must, in our humble opinion, naturally endanger the producing of factions and parties, and the carrying on of particular Interests and Designs; rather than the publick Good.

And we are the more confirmed in our desires for the said humble Address, by reason of this unhappy breach fallen out betwixt the two houses, of which the house of Peers hath not given the least occasion; they having done nothing but what their ancestors and predecessors have in all times done, and what is according to their duty; and for the Interest of the People that they should do: which notwithstanding, the House of Commons have proceeded in such an unprecedented and extraordinary way, that it is, in our humble opinion, become altogether unpracticable for the two houses, as the case stands, jointly to pursue those great and good ends for which they were called.

For these reasons, we do enter our protestation against, and dissent unto the said Vote.

XXXII. Proceedings against Mr. Francis Jenkes, for a Speech made by him on the Hustings, at Guildhall, on Midsummer-day, 1676, 27 Car. II.

[Publish'd by his Friends.]

MR. Jenkes, having been a Trader for many years, and observing the daily decay of trade in the city, occasion'd by such mischiefs, as lay not in the industry of its inhabitants, but only in the power of the Government to redress; and that did require a more speedy redress than a Parliament prorogued for fifteen months could afford: after having in vain solicited the Lord-Mayor for a Common-Council, that might consider of a Petition about trade, out of a hearty zeal for the good of the city, as well as encouraged by the consent and desire of many sober citizens, the liberty reserv'd to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, by the Statute of the 13th of this King, concerning Petitions, the votes of a majority of temporal Lords at the last Sessions, together with the unanswerable reasons given in their protestation; did at the Folk-mote (or Common-hall) holden the 24th of June last past, in the Guildhall of London, thus deliver himself.

Mr. Common Serjeant,

"It seems a vain thing for this Court to be serious about the choice of Magistrates and Officers for the well government of this city; except they first take care to remedy those many mischiefs and grievances, which this city now groans under; and which seem so to threaten the ruin and destruction of the whole, that if there be not some speedy redress, there will be little need of Magistrates and Officers, for there will be no city or people left here to be governed.

"London has once already been burn'd to ashes, and firing is now become such a trade, that not only London, the Burrough of Southwark, and the places adjoining, but all the Cities, Burroughs, Towns corporate, and Places of principal trade throughout the whole Kingdom, are perpetually in danger; so that no rational or considerate man amongst us can, promise himself, his wife, his children, or estate one night's security, but they may all be devour'd in the consuming flames, except some speedy and effectual course be taken.

"But this is not all; for were our houses secure from fire, yet such is the general decay of trade, if not remedied, as must unavoidably bring the whole city to poverty and ruin: and it is conceived, that this is very much occasion'd by the French, who have laid such great impositions upon our Woollen Cloth, Stuffs and other Manufactures, that we have almost lost our trade with France: they have spoiled our trade with Holland, Flanders, and Germany, by a destructive war. They have ruined our trade at home, and beggar'd many thousands of our honest and industrious Weavers, and other English Manufacturers, and Traders, by the vast quantity of their Silks, and other unnecessary commodities imported hither. So that upon an exact balance of the trade between us and them taken, it has been demonstrated, that this city and Kingdom doth lose eleven hundred thousand pounds every year. By means whereof, they who in Queen Elizabeth's time might not be suffer'd to build men of war, are now grown so powerful at Sea, as to be able to beat both Dutch and Spaniard, and have made themselves in a manner sole masters of the Mediterranean Sea. And they are grown so presumptuous, as daily to affront our English Merchants, and sometimes in his Majesty's own ports. The Privateers daily take our Merchant-ships, plunder others, strip, imprison and torment our Seamen, to the great discouragement of our English Navigation, and almost ruin of the Merchant.

"I shall instance in but one thing more, but that is worse than all the rest; that is, the just apprehension that is upon the minds of good men, of danger to his Majesty's person, and the Protestant Religion. I had not spoken this at this time and place, but having the honour to serve the city in Common-Council; I have endeavour'd

"endeavoured at several times to bring these things before the Court, but could not. In the end of the last common-council I did desire my Lord Mayor, that a common-council might speedily be held, to hear and consider of a petition about trade, subscribed by a great number of citizens of good quality; and his Lordship did then promise, that a common-council should speedily be held: But it is a good time since, and there have been many fires and losses, but no common-council.

"Wherefore methinks it does become the wisdom and gravity of this Court, not to admit of any longer delay in a matter wherein their All is concerned. And I do humbly move, (and I conceive it is not only my sense, but the sense of the far greater part of this Court) that some Members of this Court may accompany the Sheriffs and Mr. Common-Serjeant, before we proceed to any other matter, to wait upon my Lord Mayor and the Court of Aldermen, to desire that a common-council might speedily be held, humbly to petition his Majesty, that for the quieting and satisfying the minds of his liege people, and for remedy of the many mischiefs and grievances we now groan under, he would graciously be pleased (according to the Statutes of the 4th and 36 of Ed. 3.) timely to call a new Parliament."

Scarcely were the words, a new Parliament, pronounced, but the greatest part of the assembly cried out; Well moved, well moved! And though none spake up formally to the Sheriffs, yet several amongst them spake enough to shew a high approbation of what had been said, and not one word was spoken in contradiction: which when the Common-Serjeant saw, to prevent (as is conceived) others speaking to the same matter, he spake to this purpose:

"That what had been moved, seem'd to be the general sense of the whole Court; and since the Gentleman that made the motion was pleased to join him with the Sheriffs, and that he must offer his opinion in the matter, it was this, That it was not so proper to carry up that message before they did proceed to their elections, as first to determine their election, and then carry up an account of these and that together."

But many in the Court did insist upon the motion, and desired a message might be sent up immediately; whereupon, one of the Sheriffs spake, and did acknowledge, That what had been said by the Gentleman that spake first, was true; but that he was an old citizen, and had long known common Halls, and he did believe that the proper work of the day was the election of Officers; and therefore he did desire that the Court would proceed, and not to carry up the message till after that was done. To which one replied, That according to his utmost understanding, that Court was one of the ancientest, greatest, and most powerful Courts of this City; and although the customary business of this day were the choice of officers, yet that Court had cognizance of any thing whatever that did relate to the good of the City; and therefore it was conceived, that nothing was more proper at that time, than this which concerned the preservation of the City from utter ruin.

Upon which the other Sheriff directing his discourse to the assembly, said, That what the Gentlemen had moved there, was true, and not unknown to most of the persons there present; but that he was of his brother's opinion, that it was fit first to go on to the work of the day, and not to carry up that message till after the election.

Many persons being still dissatisfied, and calling for a present message to be sent up, the Gentleman who first moved the business, made it his request, "That since there seemed a difference touching the circumstance of time, that they would proceed to election, and carry up the message with the persons elected, as the Sheriffs desired;" to which the Common Hall unanimously agreed. Upon which, silence being made, the Common Hall proceeded to election of Sheriffs; and made their election, and sent up an account thereof to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen by the Sheriffs; and Common-Serjeant, as is usual in such cases.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen presently came down, and took their Seats in the Court of Hustings, according to custom; upon which, the Common-Serjeant came forth to the front of the Court, and declared the names of the persons elected, and immediately gave back. Whereupon the Common Hall called out for an answer to their message; upon which, the Common-Serjeant stepping forward again in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, said, That he had acquainted his Lordship and the Aldermen with their request, and that his Lordship had commanded him to declare unto them, That he would be ready to join with them in that or any other thing for the good of the City. And with that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, &c. left the Court of Hustings, and dismissed the assembly.

After dinner, the Recorder, Sir John Howel, out of a great pretence of loyalty, but indeed a personal grudge against Mr. Jenkes, conveyed the news to Whitehall; where, with his usual strain of Rhetorick, he made such a dismal representation of the matter, and was so powerful in his eloquence, as to occasion both the Sheriffs and some other of the City-officers to be sent for; who were examined by the Lord Chief Justice Rainsford, in the presence of the King, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Duke Lauderdale, and other Lords.

The Sheriffs and two others made affidavits, but a copy of them could never be obtained.

Upon the 27th of June, Mr. Jenkes was summoned by a messenger to appear at the council-board the next day; accompanied with many of his friends, he attended in the Lobby; near the council chamber, according to his summons, and after some time was called in; but his friends pressing to follow him, (as is usual on such occasions) were kept out, and not one suffered to go in with him.

The King sitting in council, the Lord Chancellor, Duke Lauderdale, and other Lords about him, the clerk read an affidavit made by the two Sheriffs, the common Crier, and one John Green an Attorney; the substance whereof was.

That Fr. Jenkes, at a Common Hall in London, the 24th of June last past, did complain of grievances; and did desire, that before they went upon any other business, certain Members of that Court might accompany the Sheriffs and the Common Serjeant to wait upon the Lord Mayor, then in the chamber, to desire that a Common Council might be called to petition his Majesty, in the name of the City, to call a new Parliament.

The affidavit being read, the council-board proceeded to this effect:

Lord

Lord Chancellor. Sir, What say you to this matter?

Mr. Jenkes. I desire to know if this be all you have to charge against me?

A Lord. Then you make little of this, you will find it to be enough.

L. Chan. Sir, did you move for a common-council to petition for a new Parliament?

Mr. Jenkes. Is it any crime to petition for a new Parliament?

To which his Lordship not thinking fit to give answer, proceeded,

L. Chan. Answer to the matter in charge.

Mr. Jenkes. With the liberty of his Majesty and this board, I will.

The King. Go on.

Mr. Jenkes. May it please your Majesty, of all the subjects you have,

A Lord, (interrupting him) Answer to the matter.

Mr. Jenkes. If his Majesty will be pleased to hear me, I hope you will.

King. Let him go on.

Mr. Jenkes. May it please your Majesty, of all the subjects you have, none are more loyal than your City of London; and in the City none more loyal than myself: And no man there did more desire, and, in my circumstances, act more, in order to your Majesty's Restoration, than my self. And I do defy any citizen or other whomsoever, to say I have forfeited my loyalty by any one individual act.

King. (interrupting him.) Sir, you are not Lord Mayor, and I am very well satisfied with the loyalty of the City, and that it needs no such vouchers.

L. Chan. Speak to the matter.

Mr. Jenkes. May it please your Majesty, being summoned to a Court of Common Hall in London, which is a Court that consists of the main body of the City.

L. Chan. (interrupting him.) Sir you are under a double mistake; for first, it was not a Court, and next, it did not consist of the main body of the City of London.

Mr. Jenkes. With your Lordship's leave, it was a Court which did consist of all the Livery of the City of London; which, if I understand any thing, is the main body of the City of London. And every Member of that Court hath freedom to propose and debate any such matter or thing, as he believes is for the service of his Majesty, and the good of the City; and no man can use more understanding than God hath given him. And I assure your Lordship, what I then moved was according to the utmost of my understanding for his Majesty's service, and the good of the City. And, my Lord, if I were under a mistake, I had the fortune to have good company; for what I moved was approved by the whole Court.

King. It was not so.

Secretary. We have a deposition to the contrary.

Mr. Jenkes. It was so.

Other Lords. It was not so.

Mr. Jenkes. May it please your Majesty, if you have a hundred depositions to the contrary, if the matter of fact were so, it was so; and I do affirm it was approved by the whole Court.

A Lord. How came you to be a Privy Counsellor?

Mr. Jenkes. I never had any such ambitious thought in my head.

A Lord. How came you then to meddle with matters of State?

Mr. Jenkes. I thought any of his Majesty's subjects, in an humble manner, might petition his Majesty for a remedy of any grievance whatsoever.

A Lord. Do you think any one may petition for a Parliament?

Mr. Jenkes. I believe they may.

The King. I know whose scholar you are, and I'll take care that none such as you shall have to do with the Government.

Several Lords. What was't you moved? what was't you moved?

Mr. Jenkes. My Lords what I spake was not in a corner, but openly in the face of a multitude, and therefore cannot want a witness to attest it.

A Lord. Just now it was a Court, and now it is a multitude.

Mr. Jenkes. We citizens pretend not to place our words so exactly in form, but that there may be some mistake in them; but I think my expression was no great absurdity: For though it were a Court, yet the persons there were so numerous, that it may not be very improper to term them a multitude. Yet, if I have failed in due expression, I beg his Majesty's pardon. I know somewhat of the customs of the City of London, and the powers and privileges of the Courts there; and somewhat also of the laws of England; but what the powers and customs of this Court are, I know not, and therefore shall desire to say little, lest I should unwillingly offend.

L. Chan. Sir, pray tell us, who advised you in this matter?

The King. Who advised you?

Mr. Jenkes. What I then proposed was consented to by the whole Court, and so became their Act, as I said before.

L. Chan. and others. Answer directly to the question, or declare you will not.

Mr. Jenkes. Since I see your Majesty and the Lords are angry, tho' I am not sensible that I have given you any just cause for it; I must not say I did it without advice, lest you should be more angry; and to name any particular person, (if there were such) would be a mean and unworthy thing, therefore I desire to be excused all farther answer to such questions; since the law doth provide, that no man be put to answer to his own prejudice.

King. We will take that for an answer.

L. Chan. Since you name the law, by the law you shall be tried.

Mr. Jenkes. I thank you and this board.

L. Chan. You may withdraw.

He immediately withdrew, and the room being cleared of all his friends, and other company; Mr. Jenkes was kept there for the space of an hour and an half; and after that, without being called in any more, was, by a warrant of the council, sent to the prison of the gate-house within the liberties of Westminster. Soon after his commitment, he demanded of the Keeper a copy of the warrant by which he was committed; as he might, and by law ought to have. The Keeper gave him a promise of it, but delaying the performance for two days, Mr. Jenkes resolutely demanded it of him as his duty, but could not yet obtain it. Some time after, the Keeper sent him one voluntarily, by his man, with this excuse, That before he had positive sitive order to deny him one, and now had to give it him.

The Copy of the Warrant.

Whereas it appears to his Majesty in Council, by the examination of Sir Thomas Gold, Sir John Shorter, Knights, Sheriffs of the City of London, John Wells, Common-Crier of the said City, and John Green, one of the Attorneys of the Lord-Mayor's Court, taken upon oath before the Lord-Chief-Justice Rainsford, That Francis Jenkes, of the said City, Linnen-draper, did, on the 24th of this instant June, at a Common-Hall, then assembled at the Guildhall of the said City, for chusing Officers for the ensuing year; in a most seditious and mutinous manner, openly move and stir the persons then present, that before they did go on to the choice of new Officers (which was the only occasion of that assembly) they should go to the Lord-Mayor, and desire him to call a common-council, that might make an address to his Majesty in the name of the City, to call a new Parliament. And whereas the said Francis Jenkes, being now called in, and heard before his Majesty in council, was so far from denying or extenuating his offence, that he did in a presumptuous and arrogant manner endeavour to justify the same:

These are therefore to command you, to take into your custody the body of the said Francis Jenkes, herewith sent you, and him to keep safely, until he shall be delivered by due course of law; for which this shall be your warrant.

Dated at the council-chamber in Whitehall, this 28th day of June, 1676.

Next day, being the 29th of June, divers of Mr. Jenkes's friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamson, and desired to become bail for him; but Mr. Secretary refused to take any bail: but told them, if they did mind him of it on Wednesday morning, he would move it at the council. But Mr. Jenkes believing that to be (as it proved) but a delay, ordered some of his friends to wait upon the Lord Chief-Justice Rainsford, and moved him for an Habeas Corpus ad Subjiciend. & Recipiend. &c. which accordingly was done, but his Lordship denied to grant it, alledging no other reason, but that it was Vacation: though his Lordship could not but know that writ to be the Subject's right at all times, as well out of Term as in Term; and Mr. Jenkes's friends were ready to offer him multitudes of precedents when it had been granted out of Term, both anciently, and since his Majesty's Restoration.

Mr. Jenkes resolving to leave no legal course to attain his liberty, untried; upon Friday, the 30th of June, at a general Seal, did by his counsel move the Lord-Chancellor for an Habeas Corpus. At first his Lordship did seem much surprized, and did refuse to hear his counsel; but after a little pause, his Lordship bid Mr. Jenkes's counsel to move it again the next Seal, and ordered the Seal to be put off from Tuesday the 4th, until Thursday the 6th of July.

Upon Wednesday the 5th of July, Mr. Jenkes's friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamson, and desired him, according to his promise, to move in council, that Mr. Jenkes might be bailed; but he said he had spoke with the King, and could do nothing without a petition. So upon Thursday the 6th of July, being a publick Seal, Mr. Jenkes's counsel did again move the Lord-Chancellor (according to his Lordship's order) and asserted the authority of the Lord Coke, who is most clear in the case, 2 part, Inst. fol. 53 speaking of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in the King's-Bench, he saith, The like Writ is to be granted out of the Chancery, either in Term (as in the King's-Bench) or in the Vacation; for the Court of Chancery is Officina Justiciae, and is ever opened, and never adjourned: So as the Subject being wrongfully imprisoned, may have Justice for the liberty of his person as well in the Vacation-time as in Term.

And in the 4th Inst. fol. 88. speaking of the Court of Chancery, he saith, And this Court is the rather always open, for that if a man be wrongfully imprisoned in the Vacation, the Lord-Chancellor may grant an Habeas Corpus, and do him Justice according to law; vid. 4 Inst. fol. 182, 190. Thus the Lord Coke.

Mr. Jenkes's counsel did likewise offer a precedent or two; but the Lord Chancellor making light of the Lord Coke's opinion, saying, The Lord Coke was not infallible; and slighting all that Mr. Jenkes's counsel offered, over-rul'd the matter, denying to grant the Writ.

On Tuesday morning, July 11, at the Quarter-Sessions, holden for the liberty of Westminster, Mr. Jenkes being still a prisoner in the Gatehouse, did move by his counsel to be bailed; where this was the substance of what passed, as it was taken by a person present.

Court. We have no such name in our Kalendar; and we sitting here by a limited commission, can take no notice of any person that is not in our Kalendar.

Counsel. Every Keeper of a prison, either in County or Franchise, ought by the statute of 3 Hen. 7. cap. 3. to certify the names of every prisoner in their custody, at the next general Goal-delivery there, to be calendar'd before the Justice of Goal-delivery, that the parties may be delivered according to law, upon pain of 100 l. for every default there recorded. And I demand that this default of the Goaler may be recorded according to that statute; and that you would, as you may, command him to calendar him now.

The Statute was read.

Court. We are no general Goal-delivery, for we cannot try several felons, but they must be tried at the general Goal-delivery for the County.

Coun. You are a general Goal-delivery for all offences within the cognizance of your Franchise; and therefore, unless the fact for which he is committed be such as is above your cognizance, he ought ought to be tried here; and if it be such a fact, he ought notwithstanding to be calendar'd here, that you may send him to the County-Goal, where he may be tried.

Goaler. I never did calendar any man that was committed by the council-table.

Coun. The neglect hath not taken away your duty; and as often as you have omitted so to do, so oft have you deserved to be fined. And I do again demand of this Court, that this default of yours may be recorded.

The Court inclined to the Goaler, and would not record his fault; whereupon the counsel proceeded.

Coun. Since you exclude him from the benefit of your present commission, I apply myself to you, without respect to that, as you are Justices of peace in general; and as such, you have power to bail any man bailable by law, except in some particular cases, where you are restrained by statute.

Court. By whom is he committed?

Coun. By the council-board.

Court. Do you believe the council-board can commit to prison?

Coun. I admit it.

Court. We don't know for what offence he is committed.

Coun. I have here a copy of the commitment, and desire it may be read.

But the Goaler refusing to own it for a true copy, tho' given by himself, and the Court requiring a nicer proof that it was a true copy, than could at that time be made, they ordered the counsel to attend in the afternoon; and in the mean time the Goaler to give a true copy. In the afternoon the counsel appearing, the Court called to him, and asked him what he had to say.

Coun. I have now a copy given and signed by the Goaler for a true copy, and desire it may be read.

The Goaler, who was to prove it a true copy, upon the counsel coming into the Court, took an occasion to flink away; and the Court (as if it had been by design) were ready to take hold of that opportunity to evade the business; but Mr. Jenkes's friends fetched him back, and he swearing it to be a true copy, it was read.

Court. What is it you demand?

Coun. What I did before; That there being nothing in this warrant, for which he is not bailable by law, I demand that he may be bailed.

Court. You have taken a wrong course in coming to us.

Coun. I presume he applies himself properly to you; for he being a prisoner within your liberty, you are the most proper persons to bail him: As Justices of the Peace, you have power to bail any man within your jurisdiction, bailable by law; and where you may bail by the law, you ought so to do; and I demand it for Mr. Jenkes.

Court. Where do you find such power given to Justices of the Peace?

Coun. By the same Statute of Hen. 7. that I cited against the Goaler; the enacting part whereof saith,

That the Justices of the Peace in every Shire, City or Town, or two of them at the least, whereof one to be of the Quorum, have authority or power to let any such prisoner or persons, mainpernable by the law, that have been imprisoned within their several Counties, City or Town, to bail or main-prize, unto their next general Sessions; or unto the next Goal-delivery of the same Goals of every Shire, City or Town, as well within Franchises as without, where any Goals be, or hereafter shall be, &c.

The whole Statute was read, and the Court taking hold of the preamble, said, This Statute was made for the prevention of bailing felons, not bailable by law, and enables us only to bail felons bailable by law.

Coun. The preamble of the Act recites the mischief occasioned by the Statute of 1 R. 3. but the enacting part repeals that Act, and gives you a general power of letting any person, mainpernable by the law, to bail; and I am sure no Statutes made for the liberty of the subject, ought to receive such a strait construction.

Court. Do you consider by whom he is committed? The privy-council.

Coun. I do, and think that alters not the case.

Court. He is committed by a superior Court, and we, who are an inferior one, cannot bail him.

Coun. It is not the Court that commits, but the fact for which the party is committed, ought to direct you in bail. The Statute of Hen. 7. hath no such exception in it; nor hath any other since put any such restraint upon you.

Court. Would you have us bail him, after the Lord-Chancellor and the Lord Chief-Justice have refused to grant a Habeas Corpus?

Coun. They did not deny the Habeas Corpus because he was not bailable by law, but because the course of their Courts, in their opinions, would not admit it: But, however, if you ought to bail him, (as by the Statute, I think, you ought) their refusal does not lessen your duty.

Court. We doubt very much that any inferior Court can bail a man committed by a superior one.

Coun. Scruples and fears do not alter the law: This doubt was once made in the King's-Bench, in the great case of Selden, and others; but the law was for the prisoner before that time, and was sufficiently settled then; and this case differs nothing from that in reason.

Court. It does, for that was upon a Habeas Corpus out of the King's-Bench.

Coun. That is but a circumstantial difference. The Habeas Corpus from that Court is only to remove the prisoner, and the cause before them, that justice may be done to him: Mr. Jenkes is already within your jurisdiction, and the Statute gives you authority to bail him; and your authority makes it your duty, and I rely upon that.

Court. We considered upon it at dinner, and do believe it a rare case, and fit to be advised upon; and we will advise.

Why did you not move yesterday when my Lord Chief-Justice was in Town? Now there are no Judges in Town to advise with.

Coun. That we did not come yesterday, was no design, for he is not so fond of a Goal; and if it be an indiscretion, yet that is no sufficient reason to detain a man in prison. However, if you have have power (which you ought to know) you have it as well when they are not in Town, as when they are. Is he bailable by law, or not?

Court. There is nothing in the warrant, for which he is not bailable by law.

Coun. For what reason then do you deny him?

Court. We do not deny him, but we will advise, because he is committed by a superior Court.

Coun. No man ought to be imprisoned for any misdemeanour before conviction, without bail; and it is against the Petition of Right, that any man bailable by law, should be detained in Goal without it. I don't know how, by such denials as this, the being committed by a superior court may grow to be reason; but at present I think the Petition of Right spoils it for being a good one.

Court. You can give us no precedent of any one being bailed by Justices at the Sessions, who was committed by the council-board.

Coun. I believe it is a rare case that a man should be forced to apply himself to such, but I think I can furnish you with an instance; and that is of one Cannon, a Quaker, who was committed by the privy-council about Christmas last, and was bailed at the Sessions of the Old-Bailey.

A pert By-stander, no ways concerned, suggested to the Court, and the Court repeated after him, Court. He was committed to Newgate-prison, and was calender'd there.

Coun. If you stick to the reason of being committed by a superior Court, that is no answer; but if it must be an answer, Mr. Jenkes is committed to the prison of this liberty, and ought to have been calender'd here; and then I do again demand that the Goaler be fined.

Court. We think it a rare case, and fit to be advised upon; and our commission we here sit by, directs us to do so in difficult cases.

Coun. I told you before, I had nothing to do with the commission you here sit by; and you yourselves excluded me from it: but I apply myself to you as Justices of the Peace merely, and as such you ought to take upon you the knowledge of your office.

Court. In the great case of Selden, that you cited, the Judges took two Terms to advise.

Coun. You very well know what opinion was had of their doing so. Will you advise upon it to-night with the King's counsel, and I'll attend you to-morrow morning?

Court. We think fit to advise with the Judges about it, till next Sessions.

Coun. I can easily interpret what such advising means.

Court. You say you apply yourself to us as Justices of the Peace merely, then you may come to any two of us a fortnight hence, or more, and perhaps we may advise in the mean time.

Coun. I believe it will be a difficult matter to get any two of you together upon this occasion.

Mr. Jenkes finding all these common doors to liberty shut against him, did by advice betake himself to another method, not less legal than the former; tho' the power granted by the Statutes, to Justices of Peace, and the constant issuing of the Writ of Habeas Corpus upon demand (both more easy courses) have occasioned it to be of more seldom use.

VOL. VII.

Justice Fitzberbert, in his Natura Brevium (an Author, and a Book of justly venerable authority in our law) in his Chapter of Main-prize, declares, That if a man be taken by the King's commission, and kept in prison for felony or misdemeanours, he may by his friends put in sureties in the Chancery, that he will appear before the Justices, &c. and be of good behaviour, &c. and that body for body; and thereupon he shall have a Writ out of the Chancery, unto the Sheriff, or unto the constable of the castle where he is imprisoned, to set him at liberty, if he be imprisoned for that cause and no other.

Which words seem plainly to declare the Writ of Main-prize to be the subject's right, and not to leave a discretionary power to the Officers of Chancery in granting it. But the scarcity of precedents being the great objection against the Habeas Corpus out of Chancery, Mr. Jenkes resolved to offend no more in that kind, and therefore caused a search to be made in the Rolls in the Tower, for the Writs of Main-prize, where a multitude of them was found, and many in the case of a commitment by the King's command. A copy of one, and a note of several others were taken out, to back the authority of Fitzberbert. With this provision, on Monday, July 17, four of Mr. Jenkes's friends, substantial Merchants, attended by a counsel, went to the Lord Chancellor; and tho' upon tender of themselves as bail for him, they might have demanded their Writ of Main-prize as the subject's right, without other formality, yet they addressed themselves to him in a more respectful manner, by way of petition, thus:

To the Right Honourable Henry Lord Finch, Baron of Daventry, and Lord High-Chancellor of England; the humble Petition of A. B. C. D. of London, Merchants, friends to Francis Jenkes, now a Prisoner in the Gatehouse of Westminster, sheweth,

THAT the said Francis Jenkes was committed to the said Prison, by virtue of a warrant, a true copy whereof is hereunto annexed, for a fact bailable by law; for which, and no other cause, he yet remains there a Prisoner: And that in this and all other cases of like nature, your Petitioners are advised, upon putting in bail in the Court of Chancery, according to the ancient course and usage thereof, a Writ of Main-prize ought to issue under the Great Seal, to be directed to the Sheriff or Keeper of the Prison where such prisoner stands committed, to deliver the prisoner so committed.

That your Petitioners being men of good estates, (as shall, if your Lord require, be made out to your Lordship) do desire, and are ready to become bail for the said Francis Jenkes; according to the course of the Chancery, and according to the law.

The Petitioners therefore pray, that your Lordship would accept of bail accordingly; and that thereupon your Lordship would order a Writ to be made forthwith, to be directed to the Keeper of the Gatehouse, for the discharge of the said Francis Jenkes. And your Petitioners shall always pray, &c.

The Petition being sent in to, and read by his Lordship, was returned by the Secretary with this answer; "That his Lordship did very well approve of the Petition; but since Mr. Jenkes was committed by the council-board, he thought

"fit that they should be petitioned, and should bail him."

But Mr. Jenkes's friends not being satisfied with that answer, pressed to speak to his Lordship, and were by his Lordship's order called in, who coming towards them, spake to this effect:

Lord Chan. Who is't that puts you on these improper methods?

Coun. We presume this address to your Lordship to be a proper course in our case, and is such as we have precedent for.

Lord Chan. Are you a Lawyer?

Coun. Yes, my Lord.

Lord Chan. Have you read Fitzberbert's Nat. Brevium? Look in his Writ de Homine replegiando.

Coun. We have nothing to do with that Writ, but it is by Fitzberbert that we are directed to this course, in his Chapter of Main-prize, where he saith (what is before cited;) and we are confirmed in his opinion by a multitude of precedents out of the close Rolls in the Tower: I have the copy of one here, and the Number and Roll of many more.

The precedent shewn to his Lordship was this.

Ex Rol. claus. de Anno Regni Regis Ed. 3. XI. parte prima, membr. 28.

The Note of the Number and Roll of several Writs of Main-prize, upon surety put into Chancery, shewn to his Lordship, was this:

Eodem, Rot. mem. 22. To the Justices of North Wales, to deliver Lloyd.

Lord Chan. One precedent of discretion is worth a thousand of these precedents.

His Lordship read the precedent, and observing it to bear Teste the 19th day of March, which could never be in Term, asked, When it was returnable? And said, it must be returnable in some Court at Westminster.

Coun. This precedent hath no return, neither doth the nature of the Writ in this case require one; for it is only a mandate to the Goaler, to set him at liberty upon sureties first taken in Chancery for his appearance before the Justices; which Justices, and the time of his appearance, I suppose, are to be named in the Recognizance.

L. Chan. Whether there ought to be a return, is the question; besides, this is a Writ directed immediately to the Marshal of the household, and is a different case.

Coun. With submission to your Lordship, it makes no difference who is the Goaler; and those I have given your Lordship the Number and Roll of, are to several Goalers.

Then Fitzberbert's Nat. Brevium was shewn to his Lordship, and upon reading the words there, If a man be imprisoned by the King's commission, &c. his Lordship said, That it was intended of one imprisoned by virtue of a commission out of Chancery.

Coun. I humbly presume, that is not the sense of the Book; the precedents I have shewn your Lordship seem to interpret it, and are upon other Comments; and Fitzberbert, in his Abridgement, Tit. Main-prize, pl. 23, cites a Book-case, that shews this to have been a course in the Chancery; but we submit it to your Lordship's judgment.

L. Chan. A little submission in a proper place will do, but he hath a mind to come out with a high hand.

Coun. He has a mind to be discharged by law, as the warrant for his commitment directs.

L. Chan. I am not to controul any Act of the Privy-Council.

Coun. At the last motion for a Habeas Corpus, your Lordship was pleased to say, That though that was not a proper method for Mr. Jenkes to obtain his liberty by, yet there was one: and upon that encouragement from your Lordship, search has been made, and this course we have now taken, found to have been the ancient course; and we did presume, the same that your Lordship meant.

L. Chan. You have used a great deal of industry to miss the right way. Your precedents of Edward III. and Richard II. (three hundred years old) I'll consider of till next Term. Upon which answer, Mr. Jenkes's friends withdrew.

Now the plenty of precedents proved as great a fault as want of them did before; and their Age, which used to add to their authority, and give them a greater respect, made them contemned. Such always is the success, where Stat pro ratione voluntas.

luntas. In the afternoon, the Secretary that first carried in the Petition, came to Mr. Jenkes in a dissembled confusion, and told him, That he had committed a mistake in returning the Petition;

That his Lordship had asked him Note, That he for it, and would be very angry returned it by his with him if he had it not; That he Lordship's Order. had left his Lordship looking over some papers, and had taken that opportunity of coming for it; and desired that he might have it, to preserve him from his Lordship's displeasure.

Tho' the Morning's action gave Mr. Jenkes a great deal of reason to suspect the Secretary's tale to be a meer contrivance, and easy to surmise the truth; yet he took no notice of what had then passed, but sent the Petition, (which was then in some of his friends hands) that evening to him. Upon the second thoughts which his Lordship bestowed upon the matter of the Petition, he was better reconciled to it, and proved better than his word in considering the precedents; for instead of pausing upon them till the next Term, he was pleased to carry them and the Petition to the Privy-Council, the next Wednesday; where, tho' all the particulars are not known, upon credible information, this was the substance of what passed:

His Lordship acquainted the Board with the Address that had been made to him; and moved, that the Petition might be there read. After it was read, his Lordship told them, that it had some appearance of law, and desired that the Attorney-General might give his opinion: Mr. Attorney told him, if it were law, his Lordship ought to grant it; if it were not law, then to deny it; if it were of such difficulty as he could not satisfy himself, that then he should advise with the Judges.

His Lordship then moved for an order of council for his direction in the matter; to which some of the Lords replied, That they were a Court of State, and not of Law, and that it did belong to him, as Lord Chancellor, to inform them of matters of law: Thereupon his Lordship, clapping his hands to his breast, said, I thank God I have courage enough to serve his Majesty.

About the latter end of July, some of Mr. Jenkes's friends attended his Lordship again, and offered him bail; insisting upon the Writ of Mainprize as the subject's right; alledging to his Lordship the hazards that his health, his family, and his trade were exposed to by his confinement. His Lordship asked them, why they had not petitioned the King and Council? And told them, if Mr. Jenkes thought it better to lie in prison and complain, than petition and be bailed, he might do as he pleased.

They told him, they had tendered bail to Mr. Secretary Williamson, who promised them to move the King in Council in it: But when they reminded him of it upon the next council-day, he was pleased to excuse himself. His Lordship told them, he never heard they had tender'd bail; but the Writ of Main prize was forgotten in all his answer.

They then told him, that the general report was, that the King and Council had referred it to his Lordship; but his Lordship would take no notice of that likewise, but said, the King would advise with the Judges when they came to Town. His Lordship withdrew from them; and they left word with his Secretary, That Mr. Jenkes looked upon himself to be his Lordship's Prisoner.

VOL. VII.

On the—of August, Mr. Jenkes's friends went again to my Lord Chancellor's; but his Secretary told them, his Lordship could not be spoke with.

They prevailed with his Secretary to go up to him, and remind his Lordship of his last answer of advising with the Judges; and tell him, that several of the Judges had been in Town, and they did now desire his Lordship's Resolution.

The Secretary, at his return told them, that as soon as he began to mention the business, his Lordship fell into a fit of the Stone; but when that was over he would mention it to him. About two hours after, they returned; and the Secretary being absent, another of his Lordship's servants came to them, and told them, that his Lordship was not well, and could not be spoke with; but had ordered him to tell them, That Mr. Jenkes might advise with his counsel what was fit to be done, for he was none of his counsel; and if he would petition the King and Council, he might; and that that was his answer.

On the 11th of August, being the last council-day that was to be before the 3d of October, Mr. Jenkes thought fit again to tender bail to the Council; and that the Lord Chancellor, who disowned all knowledge of his doing so before, and that the whole Council might know of it, he sent this Letter by his bail to the Lord Privy-Seal, then President of the council, which was publicly read.

" My Lord;

" I Have been imprisoned since the 28th of June, to my great loss, charge, and prejudice of my health. I have hitherto been denied bail, Habeas Corpus, and the Writ of Main-prize; which I am informed, were never before denied to any of his Majesty's subjects in the like case: And this only for moving in a lawful Court, and in a quiet and peaceable manner, that which I did believe to be for his Majesty's service, and the good of the City and Kingdom, and the preservation of the Protestant Religion; and which I conceive I can make appear to be according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, if I am publicly called, thereto. Wherefore I do not beg a discharge, for I desire nothing more than to clear my innocence by a public trial: but since Mr. Murrel and others, committed to this Prison for matters of a far other nature, are daily bailed out; my humble request to your Lordship, is, that you would be pleased to move his Majesty, that I, as well as any other of his Majesty's subjects, may enjoy the benefit of the Laws; and that the Writ of Main-prize may be granted to me; or that my bail, which now attend, may be taken: Your Lordship will very much oblige,

Your Lordship's humble Servant,

Francis Jenkes.

This Letter was by some improved into a Petition; and when they had given it that name, (tho' that was the only thing wanting to please the Lord Chancellor) yet it could not procure the acceptance of bail; but the method proposed by his Lordship, proved as ineffectual as those that were demanded of him. The Lord Chancellor's

Resolu-

Resolutions being sufficiently discovered, Mr. Jenkes's friends forbore all farther solicitation of his Lordship, and made fresh application to the Lord Chief-Justice Rainsford, on August 18, then just returned from the circuit.

The time of Sessions at the Old-Bailey drawing on, they caused two Writs of Habeas Corpus to be made, (the common course of removing prisoners from one Goal to another) one, ad deliberandum, directed to the Keeper at the Gate-house; the other ad recipiendum, directed to the Sheriffs of London, and desired his Lordship to sign them, that Mr. Jenkes might be removed and brought to trial; for that the keeper of the Gate-house not calendar any State-prisoner, (as he called him) at the Sessions for Westminster, he might lie there all his life-time without trial, which no subject ought to do. His Lordship excused himself upon his late return to Town, which had not yet afforded him leisure to advise; and sent them to the Attorney-General, to know whether he were ready for a trial, before he would give them any answer.

Mr. Attorney, upon their coming to him, very worthily told them, That he had no order in it, but that he would not oppose the granting of those Writs: adding, God forbid but that the Law should have its due course.

They returned to the Lord Chief-Justice with this answer, and offered to make oath that it was Mr. Attorney's answer; but he would give credit to nothing but a Note under Mr. Attorney's own hand. They told him, it was hard that a man should lie in prison, who was willing to bring himself upon trial; that Writs of this nature were every day granted, and did presume, could not reasonably be denied. His Lordship answered, he would know whether Mr. Attorney were ready for a trial. They replied, That they did not know when Mr. Attorney would be ready, and Mr. Jenkes must stay for his trial till then.

They then moved his Lordship, as they had done formerly, That he would grant a Habeas Corpus to bring him before his Lordship, and that he would accept of substantial citizens for bail, who should render him whensoever Mr. Attorney should call for him; alledging, that such Writs had been frequently granted by the Lord Chief-Justice Keeling, and one of the now Justices of the King's Bench.

His Lordship returned, That he did not doubt the security they should offer him; but he had never granted such a Writ, and he knew not upon what authority others had done it: And in short, refused to grant either that or the other Writs.

After all these denials of right, Mr. Jenkes resolved to sit still, with the satisfaction, that his ill success was not imputable to the injustice of his cause; but to the pleasure or fear of those that had the power of making it otherwise: And with patience to expect it till the Term should set open the prison-doors; which will not brook the denial of a Habeas Corpus, tho' a long Vacation must.

No further address was therefore made to either of their Lordships; but themselves, after they had taken the pleasure of denying him, were pleased to condescend to intercede for him: for as we heard, by very credible information, the Lord Chief-Justice went to the Lord Chancellor and told him, "That the Writs demanded of him, were according to Law, and could not be denied; and that he had only taken time till he had acquainted his Lordship with it."

The Lord Chancellor directed him to the Lord Treasurer for further advice; who sent him to the King. As soon as his Majesty understood, that what was demanded was the subject's right, he immediately commanded that the Laws should have their due course, which their Lordships had stopped: And accordingly he was bailed.

[He was afterwards in 1683, tried with Thomas Pilkington, Henry Cornish, Elqrs; and others, for a Riot at Guildhall, and fined 300 marks. See State Trials, Vol. 3. pag. 541.]

XXXIII. Articles of High Misdemeanours, humbly offered and presented to the Consideration of his most Sacred Majesty, and his most Honourable Privy-Council, against Sir William Scroggs, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench; exhibited by Dr. Oates, and Captain Bedlow. 31 Car. II.

I. HAT the said Lord Chief-Justice, contrary to his oath, the duty of his place, in contempt of the King, his Crown and Dignity, did set at liberty several persons accused upon oath before him of High-Treason, without their being ever tried, or otherwise acquitted; as namely the Lord Brudenell, &c.

II. That at the Trial of Sir George Wakeman and others at the Sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, for High-Treason, the said Lord Chief-Justice (according to the dignity of his place) managing the said Trial, did brow-beat and curb Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, two of the principal witnesses for the King in that case; and encourage the Jury impanelled and sworn to try the malefactors, against the said witnesses, by his publicly speaking slightly and and abusively against them and their evidence, and the misrepeating and omitting of material parts of their evidence; whereby the parties indicted were by the said Jury acquitted of the fact, then charged against them, and fully proved by the said witnesses*.

III. That the said Lord Chief-Justice, after the Trial of the said Sir George Wakeman, and others for High-Treason, as aforesaid, in the further abuse of the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, and in their great disparagement speaking of them; said, that before the Trial of Sir George Wakeman (meaning the aforesaid Trial) the witnesses (meaning the aforesaid Dr. Titus Oates, and the said Mr. William Bedlow) were to be believed; but that at and after the said Trial, they were not to be believed by him, nor should not be believed by him; or to that very effect.

IV. That the said Lord Chief-Justice, by reason of his office, hath taken upon him the power to oppress by imprisonment, his Majesty's loyal subjects; namely, Henry Care, for writing and causing to be printed divers single-sheet Books in English, called The Packet of Advice from Rome; for the information and discovery of the idolatrous errors and impieties of the Romish Church, to his Majesty's loyal and obedient Protestant Subjects (in this conjuncture of time very useful:) although the said Lord Chief-Justice, neither did, nor could alledge or charge the said Care, with any thing contained in the said Book, that was any ways criminal or derogatory to his Majesty's Laws, Crown or Dignity; and refused to take very good Bail for him, though offered; and afterwards less bail taken for him upon his Habeas Corpus in Court: but by the said Lord Chief-Justice's means, he was continued bound all the Term to his good behaviour; and at the end thereof until the next Term; although no particular crime was, or could be proved against or laid to his charge.

V. That to the great oppression of his Majesty's loyal Subjects, the said Lord Chief-Justice, contrary to Law, and in manifest breach of his oath, hath, without any reasonable cause, imprisoned a Feme Covert, and divers others his Majesty's said Subjects, and refused to take bail, though tendered, and the matterailable, as in the case of Mrs. Jane Curtis, Mr. Francis Smith, &c.

VI. That the said Lord Chief-Justice is very much addicted to swearing and cursing in his common discourse; and to drink to excess, to the great disparagement of the dignity and gravity of his said place. He did in his common discourse at dinner at a Gentleman's house of Quality, publicly and openly use and utter many oaths and curses, and there drank to excess.

VII. That Charles Price being accused upon oath, before the said Lord Chief-Justice, to be a Popish Priest and Jesuit, and imprisoned for the same, and also divers other persons accused upon oath for High-Treason; as namely, Sir Francis Mannock, Richard Vaughan, Esq; and Daniel Arthur, Merchant; the said Lord Chief-Justice set them at large upon bail, without consulting his Majesty's Council, or his witnesses, and against their consent; divers of which persons have not since appeared, but have forfeited their recognizances, and the persons not to be found.

VIII. That the said Lord Chief-Justice, to the great discouragement of his Majesty's loyal Protestant Subjects; to the manifest encouragement of the Roman Catholick Subjects; when information hath been duly and legally given to him of the abode, or person of a Popish Priest or Jesuit, and a warrant desired from him to take or search for such Priests or Jesuits; he hath in a slighting and scornful manner refused the same, and bid the Informer go to Sir William Waller, who busied himself in such matters mainly.

IX. That the Trial of Knox and Lane, at the bar of the King's-Bench Court, for their misdemeanours, in endeavouring to take away the credit of Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, two of the principal witnesses for his Majesty, in the proving of the Conspiracy and Conspirators against his Majesty's Life, and Government of these Kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland, the destruction of the Protestants and Protestant Religion, and introducing and settling of Popery there; although the evidence was so full and clear against them, that the Jury found them guilty without going from the bar; yet the said Lord Chief-Justice, in further discouragement and disparaging the evidence of the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, would not, nor did not give any charge to the Jury therein, but rose up suddenly, after the evidence closed by the Council, and left the said Court abruptly, before the said Jury had given in their verdict.

X. That the said Lord Chief-Justice, knowing that one William Osborn was in the conspiracy and contrivance with the said Knox and Lane, in the last article mentioned, to take away the credit of the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow; and knowing the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, to be material witnesses for his Majesty, in proving of the conspiracy and conspirators, in the said last article mentioned, and had been so against several of the said conspirators that had been tried, and were to be so against several others of the said conspirators that were impeached or accused for the said High-Treason, and were to be tried for the same; and knowing the said William Osborn had been detected before the Lords in Parliament assembled, for his said conspiracy and contrivance with the said Knox and Lane; and that upon his own oath, thereupon denying the fact in their said conspiracy and contrivance to be true: yet out of his malice

* Sir Francis Winnington in his Speech in the Parliament, 1680. printed in The Faithful Register, or, the Debates of the House of Commons in four several Parliaments; says, at Wakeman's Trial, Those persons who at former Trials had been treated with that respect that is due to the King's Evidence, and whose Credit and Reputation had stood clear without exception in all other Trials, were now not only brow-beaten, but their Evidence presented to the Jury, as doubtful and not to be depended on, and so at all other Trials of Papists from that time forward. By which many of the greatest offenders were quitted and cleared as to the Plot, and those that were brought for defaming the King's Evidence, and suborning Witnesses, in order thereto, very kindly treated, and discharged with easy sentences, especially if Papists; but if Protestants, though only for printing or vending some unlicensed Book, were imprisoned and largely fined. But, I beg leave to particularize in the case of one Clare, who was indicted for Printing a Weekly Intelligence, call'd The Packet of Advice from Rome, or the History of Popery. This man had a strange knack of writing extraordinary well upon that subject, and that Paper was by most persons thought not only very ingenious, but also very useful at this time for the information of the people, because it laid open very intelligibly the errors and cheats of that Church. However, upon an information given to the Court of King's-Bench against this Case, this Rule was made; lice to the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow; and as much as in him lay to endeavour the disparagement, if not the suppressing of the further discovery of that hellish and damnable plot; the said Lord Chief-Justice, without the knowledge, consent or approbation of his Majesty, or any of his learned Council in the Law, or the said Dr. Titus Oates, or Mr. William Bedlow; did voluntarily give the said Osborn liberty to make an affidavit before him upon oath, of the truth of the said fact, he had before, as aforesaid, denied upon his oath; with intent that the same might be made use of against the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, to their disparagement, and the apparent prejudice of his Majesty, against the said conspirators, in the said High-Treason.

Ordinatum est, quod Liber intitulat. The Weekly Packet, &c. non ulterius imprimatur, vel publicetur per aliquam personam quancunque. Per Cur.

I think it amounts to little less than a total prohibition of printing any thing against Popery.

XI. That he the said Lord Chief-Justice, to manifest his slighting opinion of the evidence of the said Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, in the presence of his most sacred Majesty, and the Right honourable the Lords and others of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council; did dare to say, that he had thought that Dr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, always had an accusation ready against any body.

XII. That at the assize holden at Monmouth last, the said Lord Chief-Justice, in the presence of several Justices of the Peace for the said County, did say to Mr. William Bedlow, that he did believe in his conscience, that Richard Langborn, whom he condemned, died wrongfully, to the great disparagement of his Majesty's Crown and Dignity, the Justice of the Court, the Jury and Evidence.

XIII. That the said Lord Chief-Justice, contrary to the dignity of his place, did make merchandize of the Trials of certain Priests to be tried in Staffordshire, and took twenty guineas in earnest; then sold the said Trials to other persons, refusing to return the said twenty guineas to those from whom he had received them. And furthermore, before the Trial of Sir George Wakeman; he the said Lord Chief-Justice, did bargain with two Booksellers for one hundred and fifty guineas, for them to print the Trials; and in case they would not lay down the money before he went into the Court, he would not go into the Court, but would go into the Country: and if the said Trial, by reason of its length, could not be finished in one day, he would have a hundred guineas more, or to that very effect.

The Answer of Sir William Scroggs Knt, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench; to the Articles of Mr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow.

I. TO the first, he saith, That the Lord Brudenell was bailed by the Court of King's-Bench in open Court, and afterwards by the Court discharged; with this, that William Bedlow did importune the Lord Westmorland to get the said Lord Brudenell discharged, for that he had nothing to say against him, as he said to the Lord Westmorland.

II. To the second, he saith, That as to his omitting or misrepeating the evidence at Sir George Wakeman's Trial, it is a reflection upon the whole Court to suppose it true, and that they should let it pass. But he saith, that Mr. Oates being ask'd at that Trial, why he did not charge Sir George Wakeman at the Council-Table with a letter under his own hand concerning the death of the King? he answer'd he did not know but that he did: to which it was replied, it is plain he did not; for then the Council would have committed him. To which Mr. Oates replied, that that Council would commit no body for the plot; which might be the cause of the misdemeanour of frowning in the articles mentioned.

III. To the third, he saith, he doth not remember that ever he express'd much concerning their credit before their Trial; but that there were some passages at that Trial, which gave him great cause of doubt: which he hopes he might do, without making it an article of misdemeanour.

IV. and V. To the fourth and fifth, he saith, That the persons in the articles mentioned, were committed by him for publishing several libellous and scandalous papers, which were proved against them upon oath: which commitments, even of a Feme Covert also, notwithstanding Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow's skill, were according to Law: tho' there is no Law for these persons to call me to account for judicial acts done upon other men.

VI. To the sixth, which is an insolent scandal, he referreth himself to the testimony of that Gentleman of Quality, whoever he be.

VII. To the seventh, he saith, That the persons in this article were bailed and discharged by the Court, where the Attorney-General was first called; but indeed Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow's consent was not ask'd.

VIII. To the eighth, he saith, he conceives himself not obliged to do all the business that Justices of the peace may do; and though without an offence he might have given such an answer as is mentioned, yet he did not, but a servant of his did.

IX. To the ninth, he saith, That when the cause was tried, he told the Jury the matter was plain, and so did the rest of the Court; upon which he went away, without any compliment to Mr. Oates, to try causes in London.

X. To the tenth, he saith, That Osborn made only two affidavits before him, the substance of one was, that one Bowring a servant to Mr. Oates had said, that he had heard Mr. Oates say, that the Kingdom of England would never flourish, until it became Elective, and the Kings chosen by the People. The other affidavit was, when he was sent to him, by an order of Council to be examined; wherein amongst other things he swears, that though at the Trial of Knox and Lane, it was ask'd where Osborn was, and Mr. Oates's Counsel answered that he was fled; yet Osborn swears, that he at that time was at his father's house in the country, and that Mr. Oates knew it; that he took his leave of him the day before he went, and told whither he went, and saw a letter wrote by Mr. Oates to his father to send for him. Notwithstanding it was carried at the Trial, as if he had been fled no man knew whither; so that the affidavit which the article chargeth me for permitting to be made, was not sworn before me.

XI. He saith, it is more to be wondered how Mr. Oates should dare to charge that as an article of misdemeanour, which was said in the King's presence, and yet repeated false too.

XII. That at Monmouth Assizes he did tell Mr. Bedlow, that he was more unsatisfied about Mr. Langborn's Trial than all the rest; and the rather, for that he was credibly informed since the Trial, that Mr. Langborn's study was so situated, that he that walked walked in his chamber could not see Mr. Langborn write in his study: which was Mr. Bedlow's evidence.

XIII. He saith, the matter complained of is a meer contract with other men, of which he thinks himself not bound to give Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow any other account, but that by the taking of twenty guineas he lost forty; and that his backwardness to go into the Court at Wakeman's Trial, makes it look as if he had not had ten thousand pounds to favour Wakeman in his Trial.

If these Articles shall appear to you, Majesty to be frivolous, or scandalous, or not true, I humbly pray your Majesty's just resentment thereon, in Honour to your Courts and Government.

And that such an unknown Attempt may not go unpunished; that the promoters may be left to be proceeded against according to Law.

The Articles of Mr. Titus Oates, and Mr. William Bedlow, against the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, were heard this 21st of January, 1679, before the King and Council; and upon the hearing of both sides, Mr. Oates, and Captain Bedlow are left to be proceeded against according to Law.

But I don't find the Chief-Justice recover'd any damages.

XXXIV. Proceedings against Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and other Judges, in Parliament, 1680. 32 Car. II.

Novem. 13, 1680.

Several Persons were examined in the House of Commons about the dismissing of a Grand-Jury in Middlesex. After which, several Members of the House spoke as follows; viz.

Sir William Jones.

R. Speaker, Sir, the preservation of the Government in general, as well as our particular safeties, have a dependance upon the matter that is now before you, in which there are so many miscarriages so complicated, as there ariseth some difficulty how to examine them. I cannot but observe, how the Proclamation is here again mentioned; by which you may conclude, there lieth a great weight upon the people's right to petition by means thereof, and that the best way to remove it, is to find out the advisers and contrivers of that Proclamation, in order to proceed against them according to their deserts. Without which, what you have done in asserting the Right of Petitioning, will remain with some doubt; and those that advised the proclaiming to the people, that it is seditious to petition the King, without that chastisement they deserve. And therefore, I humbly conceive, you will do well to consider of it as soon as you can. It is not strange, that the Proclamation should be made use of with Country Gentlemen, to get abhorers to petitioning, seeing the Judges themselves have made use of it to that purpose. They should have known, that though a Proclamation might be of great use, to intimate the observation of a Law, yet that it had never been used instead of a Law. But yet I do not admire so much at this as I do at the discharge of the Grand Jury, before they had finished their presentments. It tends so much to the subversion of the establish'd Laws of this Land, that I dare pronounce, that all the Laws you have already, and all that you can make, will signify nothing against any great man, unless you can remedy it for the future. I observe, there were two reasons why this Grand-Jury were so extrajudicially discharged; one, because they would otherwise have presented the Duke of York for a Papist; the other, because they presented a Petition to be deliver'd to the King for the sitting of the Parliament, which they said it was not their business to deliver. Though I cannot but observe, how upon other occasions they did receive Petitions, and delivered them to the King; and all the difference was, that the Petitions so delivered, were against sittings of Parliaments. The truth is, I cannot much condemn them for it; for if they were guilty of such crimes as the witnesses have this day given you information of, I think they had no reason to further Petitions for the sitting of a Parliament. But, Sir, this business will need a further Information, and therefore, I humbly pray it may be referred to a Committee.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I think we are come to the old times again, When the Judges pretended they had a rule of Government, as well as a rule of Law; and they have acted accordingly. If they did never read Magna-Charta, I think they are not fit to be Judges; if they have read Magna Charta, and do thus so contrary, they deserve a severe chastisement. To discharge Grand-Juries of purpose to disappoint them of making their presentments, is to deprive the Subject of the greatest benefit and security the Law hath provided for them. If the Judges, instead of acting by Law, shall be acted by their ambition, and endeavour to get promotions rather by worshipping the rising Sun, than by doing Justice; this Nation will soon be reduced to a miserable miserable condition. Suppose that after the discharge of this Grand-Jury, some Person had offered to present some Murder, Treason, or other capital crime, for want of the Grand-Jury, there would have been a failure of Justice. As faults committed by Judges are of more dangerous consequence than others to the publick, so there do not want precedents of severer chastisements for them than for others. I humbly move you first to pass a Vote upon this business of discharging Grand-Juries, and then to appoint a Committee to examine the miscarriages of the Judges in Westminster-hall, and to report the same with all speed to you.

Mr. S. Titus.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, As it hath been observed that this business has some reference to the Proclamation, so I believe there is something of the plot in it too. And therefore, I think if this Plot do not go on, it will have the worst luck that ever Plot had; seeing the Judges, as well as most other persons in publick places, have given it as much assistance as they could. But whereas some have spoken ill of these Judges, I desire to speak well of them in one thing: I am confident they have herein shewed themselves grateful to their benefactors; for I do believe that some of them were preferr'd to their places of purpose, because they should do what they have done. Laws of themselves are but dead letters: unless you can secure the execution as well of those you have already, as of those you are now making, we shall spend our time to little purpose. Therefore I second the motion that hath been made for a Vote, to declare the sense of the house as to the discharging of Grand-Juries, and for referring the further examination to a committee.

Mr. W. Sacheverel.

Mr. Speaker, Sir the business of this debate, is a great instance of our sick and languishing condition. As our Ships, Forts, and Castles are for securing us from the danger of our Enemies from abroad, so our Laws from our enemies at home; and if committed to such persons as will turn their strength upon us, are equally dangerous. Sir, We all know how the Government of Scotland hath been quite altered since his Majesty's Restauration, by some Laws made there; pray let us have a care that ours be not altered by the corrupt proceedings of Judges, lest we be reduced to the same weak condition of defending ourselves against Popery and arbitrary Government here, that they are there. If Judges can thus prevent the penalties of the Law, by discharging Grand-Juries before they have made their presentments, and can make Laws by their Rules of Court, I think the Government may soon be subverted; and therefore, that it is high time for this House to speak with those Gentlemen. In former times several Judges have been impeached, and hanged too, for less crimes than these; and the reason was, because they had broke the King's oath as well as their own. If what hath been said of some of these Judges be fully proved, they shall not want my Vote to inflict on them the same chastisement. The truth is, Sir, I know not how the ill consequences we justly fear from Judges, can be prevented, as long as they are made durante beneplacito, and have such dependencies as they have. But this must be a work of time: in order to remedy our present grievances, let us pass a Vote upon this business of discharging Grand-Juries, and that it may be penn'd as the case deserves. If you please, let it be drawn up by a Committee, that may withdraw for that purpose; and let there be also one appointed to examine the miscarriage of the Judges.

Mr. H. Powell.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I would beg leave to observe to you, because I think it may be necessary to be considered by your Committee, what an opinion was given not long since by some of these Judges about Printing; which was, that Printing of News might be prohibited by Law, and accordingly a Proclamation issued out. I will not take on me to censure the opinion as illegal, but leave it to your further consideration. But I remember there was a consultation held by the Judges a little before, and they gave their opinion, that they knew not of any way to prevent Printing by Law, because the Act for that purpose was expired. Upon which, some Judges were put out, and new ones put in, and then this other opinion was given. These things are worthy of a serious examination: for if Treasurers may raise money by shutting up the Exchequer, borrowing of the Bankers, or retrenchments; and the Judges make new Laws by an ill construction, or an ill execution of the old ones; I conclude, that Parliaments will soon be found useless, and the liberty of the people an inconvenience to the Government. And therefore, I think, Sir, you have been well moved to endeavour to pass your censure on some of these illegal proceedings by a Vote, and to refer the farther consideration to a Committee.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker, In the front of Magna Charta it is said, Nulli negabimus, nulli deferemus Justitiam; we will defer or deny Justice to no man: to this the King is sworn, and with this the Judges are entrusted by their Oaths. I admire what they can say for themselves: if they have not read this Law, they are not fit to sit upon the Bench; and if they have, I had almost said, they deserve to lose their heads.

Mr. Speaker, The state of this poor Nation is to be deplored, that in almost all ages, the Judges, who ought to be preservers of the Laws have endeavour'd to destroy them; and that to please a Court-faction, they have by treachery attempted to break the bonds asunder of Magna Charta, the great treasury of our peace. It was no sooner pass'd, but a Chief-Justice (Hubert de Burg) in that day, persuades the King he was not bound by it, because he was under age, when it was pass'd. But this sort of insolence the next Parliament resent'd, to the ruin of the pernicious Chief-Justice. In the time of Richard II. an unthinking dissolute Prince, there were Judges that did insinuate into the King, that the Parliament were only his creatures, and depended on his will, and not on the fundamental constitutions of the Land; which treacherous advice proved the ruin of the King: and for which all those evil Instruments were brought to Justice. In his late Majesty's time, his misfortunes were occasion'd chiefly by the corruptions of the long Robe; his Judges by an extrajudicial opinion gave the King power to raise money upon an extraordinary occasion without Parliament, and made the King judge of such occasions: Charity prompts me to think they thought this a service to the King, but the sad consequences of it may convince all mankind that that every illegal act weakens the Royal Interest; and to endeavour to introduce absolute Dominion in these Realms, is the worst of Treasons: because whilst it bears the face of friendship to the King, and designs to be for his service, it never fails of the contrary effect.

The two great Pillars of the Government, are Parliaments and Juries; it is this gives us the title of freeborn Englishmen. For my notion of free Englishmen is this, that they are ruled by Laws of their own making, and tried by men of the same condition with themselves. The two great and undoubted privileges of the people, have been lately invaded by the Judges that now sit in Westminster-hall; they have espoused Proclamation against Law; they have discountenanced and opposed several legal Acts, that tended to the fitting of this honourable House, they have grasped the legislative Power into their own hands, as in that instance of Printing; the Parliament was considering that matter, but they in the interim made their private opinion to be law, to supersede the judgment of this House: They have discharged Grand Juries, on purpose to quell their presentments, and shelter great Criminals from Justice; and when Juries have presented their opinion for the sitting of this Parliament, they have in disdain thrown them at their feet, and told them they would be no messengers to carry such Petitions; and yet in a few days after, have encourag'd all that would spit their venom against the Government: they have serv'd an ignorant and arbitrary faction, and been the messengers of abhorrences to the King.

Mr. Speaker; What we have now to do, is to load them with shame, who bid defiance to the Law; they are guilty of crimes against Nature, against the King, against their Knowledge, and against Posterity. The whole frame of Nature doth loudly and daily petition to God their Creator; and Kings like God, may be address'd to in like manner by petition, not command. They likewise knew it was lawful to petition; Ignorance can be no Plea, and their knowledge aggravates their crimes; the children unborn are bound to curse such proceedings, for 'twas not Petitioning, but Parliaments they abhorr'd. The Atheist pleads against a God, not that he disbelieves a Deity, but would have it so. Trefilian and Belknap were Judges too; their Learning gave them honour, but their Villanies made their exit by a Rope. The end of my motion therefore is, that we may address warmly to our Prince against them; let us settle a Committee to enquire into their crimes, and not fail of doing Justice upon them that have perverted it; let us purge the Fountain, and the Streams will issue pure.

Then the House agreed to the following Resolutions.

Resolved, That the discharging of a Grand-Jury by any Judge, before the end of the Term, Assizes, or Sessions, while matters are under their consideration, and not presented, is arbitrary, illegal, destructive to public Justice, a manifest violation of his Oath, and is a means to subvert the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom.

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-hall, and report the same, with their opinion therein to the House.

* This Report is printed in State-Trials, Vol. III. page 218, but without the Impeachment and Answer of the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, or the Debates in Parliament; so that to make this Proceeding complete, we have printed the Report here again, that Gentlemen may see the whole at one view.

VOL. VII.

Whereupon a Committee was appointed, and they sat several days, and then made the following Report.

The Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges, &c. Thursday, Dec. 23, 1680 *.

THIS Committee being inform'd, that in Trinity-Term last, the Court of King's-Bench discharg'd the Grand-Jury, that serv'd for the hundred of Ossulston, in the County of Middlesex, in a very unusual manner; proceeded to enquire into the same, and found by the information of Charles Umfreville, Esq; Foreman of the said Jury, Edward Proby, Henry Gerard, and John Smith, Gentlemen, also of the said Jury, That on the 21st of June last, the Constables attending the said Jury, were found defective, in not presenting the Papists as they ought, and thereupon were ordered by the said Jury to make further presentments of them on the 26th following, on which day the Jury met for that purpose; when several Peers of this Realm, and other persons of honour and quality, brought them a bill against James Duke of York, for not coming to Church: but some exceptions being taken to that bill, in that it did not set forth the said Duke to be a Papist, some of the Jury attended the said persons of quality to receive satisfaction therein. In the mean time, and about an hour after they had received the said bill, some of the Jury attended the Court of King's-Bench with a Petition, which they desired the Court to present in their name unto his Majesty for the sitting of this Parliament. Upon which, the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs raised many scruples, and on pretence that they were not all in Court (tho' twenty of the Jury had subscrib'd the Petition) sent for them, saying he would dispatch them presently. The Jury being come, and their names called over, they renewed their desire that the Court would present their Petition: but the Chief-Justice ask'd, if they had any bills? they answered, they had, but the Clerks were drawing them into form. Upon which, the Chief-Justice said, they would not make two works of one business. And the Petition being read, he said this was no article of their charge, nor was there any Act of Parliament that required the Court to deliver the Grand-Jury's Petitions: That there was a Proclamation about them; and that it was not reasonable the Court should be obliged to run on their errands; and he thought it much, that they should come with a Petition to alter the King's mind declared in the News-Book. The Jury said, they did it not to impose on the Court, but (as other Juries had done) with all submission they desired it: but the Court refused, bidding the Cryer return them their Petition. And Mr. Justice Jones told them, they had meddled with matters of State, not given them in charge, but presented no bills of the matters given in charge. They answered as before, they had many before them, that would be ready in due time. Notwithstanding which, the said Justice Jones told them, they were discharged from further service. But Philip Ward (the Clerk that attended the said Jury) cried out, No, no, they have many bills before them; for which the Court understanding (as it seems to this Committee) a secret reason, which the Clerk did not, reproved him, asking if he or they were to give the rule there? the Cryer then told the Court, they would not receive their Petition; the Chief-Justice bid him let it alone, so it was left there, and the Jury returned to the Court-house, and there found several Constables with Presentments of Papists and other offenders, as the Jury had directed them on the 21st before; but could not now receive the said presentments, being discharged. Whereby much business was obstructed, tho' none of the said Informants ever knew the said Jury discharged before the last day of the Term, which was not till four days after. And it further appeareth to the Committee, by the evidences of Samuel Astry, Jasper Waterhouse, and Philip Ward, Clerks, that have long served in the said Court, that they were much surprized at the said discharging of the Jury, in that it was never done in their memory before; and the rather, because the said Waterhouse as Secondary, constantly enters on that Grand-Jury's paper, that the last day of the Term is given them to return their verdict on, as the last day but one is given to the other two Grand-Juries of that County, which entry is as followeth:

Trinit. 32 Car. II.

Middlesex. Juratores habent diem ad veredictum suum
 Offulton reddendum usq; diem Mercurii proxime
 Hundred. post tres Septimanas sancte Trinitatis.

Being the last day of the Term, and so in all the other Terms the last day is given; which makes it appear to this Committee, that they were not in truth discharged for not having their presentments ready, since the Court had given them a longer day, but only to obstruct their further proceedings: and it appeareth by the evidence aforesaid to this Committee, that the four Judges of that Court were present at the discharging of the said Jury, and it did not appear that any of them did dissent therein; upon consideration whereof, the Committee came to this resolution:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the discharging of the Grand-Jury of the hundred of Offulton in the County of Middlesex, by the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity-Term last, before the last day of the Term, and before they had finished their presentments, was illegal, arbitrary, and a high misdemeanour.

This Committee proceeded also to enquire into a rule of the Court of King's-Bench, lately made against the publishing of a Book, called The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; or, The History of Popery: and Samuel Astry, Gent. examined thereupon, inform'd this Committee, that the Author of the said Book, Henry Carr, had been informed against for the same, and had pleaded to the Information; but before it was tried, a rule was made on a motion, as he supposeth, against the said Book: all the Judges of that Court (as he remembers) being present, and none dissenting. The copy of which rule he gave into this Committee, and is as followeth:

Dies Mercurii proxime post tres Septimanas sancte Trinitatis. Anno 32. Car. 2.
Regis.

Ordinatum est quod liber intitulat. The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or, The History of Popery, non ulterius imprimatur vel publicetur per aliquam Personam quamcunq;
Per. Cur.

And this Committee admiring that Protestant Judges should take offence against a Book whose chief design was to expose the cheats and foppery of Popery; enquired further into it, and found by the evidence of Jane Curtis, that the said Book had been licens'd for several months, that her husband paid for the copy, and enter'd it in the Hall-book of the company. But for all this, she could not prevail by these reasons, with the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, to permit it any longer; who said, 'twas a scandalous Libel, and against the King's Proclamation, and he would ruin her if ever she printed it any more. And soon after she was served with the said rule, as the Author, and other Printers were; and by the Author's evidence it appears, that he was taken and brought before the said Chief-Justice by his warrant above a year since, and upon his owning he writ part of that Book, the Chief-Justice called him rogue and other ill names; saying, he would fill all the Goals in England with such rogues, and pile them up as men do faggots, and so committed him to prison, refusing sufficient bail, and saying he would goal him, to put him to charges; and his Lordship observed his word punctually therein, forcing him to his Habeas Corpus, and then taking the same bail he refused before. Upon which, this Committee came to this resolution.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Committee, that the rule made by the Court of King's-Bench, in Trinity-Term last, against printing a Book, called The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary.

And the Committee proceeded further, and upon Information that a very great latitude had been taken of late by the Judges, in imposing fines on the persons found guilty before them, caused a transcript of all the fines imposed by the King's-Bench since Easter-Term, in the 28th of his Majesty's Reign, to be brought before them, from the said Court, by Samuel Astry, Gent. By perusal of which, it appear'd to this Committee, that the quality of the offence, and the ability of the person found guilty, have not been the measures that have determined the quantity of many of these fines; which being so very numerous, the Committee refer themselves to those Records as to the general, instancing in some particulars, as follow:

Upon Joseph Brown of London, Gent. Trinit. 29.
Car. 2.
 on an Information for publishing a printed Book, called The long Parliament dissolved; in which is set forth these words: Nor let any man think it strange, that we account it Treason for you to sit and act contrary to our Laws; for if in the first Parliament of Richard II. Grimes and Weston for lack of courage only were adjudged guilty of High-Treason for surrendering the places committed to their trust; how much more you, if you turn Renegadoes to the people that intrusted you, and as much as in you lie surrender not a little pitiful Castle or two, but all the legal defence the people of England have for their lives, liberties and properties at once! Neither let the vain persuasion delude you, that no precedent can be found, that one English Parliament hath bang'd up another; though peradventure even that may be proved a mistake: for an unprecedented crime calls for an unprecedented punishment; and if you shall be so wicked to do the one, or rather endeavour to do, (for now you are no longer a Parliament) what ground of confidence you can have that none will be found so worthy to do the other, we cannot understand: and do faithfully promise, if your unworthiness provoke us to it, that we will use our honest and utmost endeavours (when ever a new Parliament shall be called) to chuse such as may convince you of your mistake: The old and infallible observation, That Parliaments are the pulse of the People, shall lose its esteem; or you will find, that this your presumption was overfoud; however, it argues but a bad mind, to sin, because it's believed it shall not be punished. The Judgment was, that he be fined 1000 marks, be bound to the good behaviour for seven years, and his Name struck out of the Roll of the Attorneys, without any offence alledged in his said vocation. And the publishing the Libel consisted only in superscribing a Pacquet, with this inclosed, to the East-Indies. Which Fine he not being able to pay, (living only upon his practice) he lay in prison for three years, till his Majesty graciously pardoned him, and recommended him to be restored to his place again of Attorney, by his warrant dated the 15th of December, 1679. Notwithstanding which, he has not yet obtained the said restoration from the Court of King's-Bench.

Upon John Harrington of London, Hill. 29 & 30. Car. 2. Gent. for speaking these words, laid in Latin thus: Quod nostra Gubernatio de tribus statibus consistat, & si Rebellio eveniret in Regno, & non accideret contra omnes tres status, non est Rebellio. A Fine of 1000 l. sureties for the good behaviour for seven years, and to recant the words in open Court; which Fine he was in no capacity of ever paying.

Upon Benjamin Harris of London, Hill. 31 & 32. Car. 2. Stationer, on an information for printing a Book, called An Appeal from the Country to the City, setting forth these words: We in the Country have done our parts, in chusing for the generality good Members to serve in Parliament: but if (as our two last Parliaments were) they must be dissolved or prorogued whenever they come to redress the grievances of the subject, we may be pitied, not blamed, if the Plot takes effect; and in all probability it will. Our Parliaments are not then to be condemned, for that their not being suffered to sit, occasioned it. Judgment to pay 500 l. Fine, stand on the Pillory an hour, and give sureties for good behaviour for three years. And the said Benjamin Harris informed this Committee, That the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs pres'd the Court then to add to this Judgment, his being publicly whipt; but Mr. Justice Pemberton holding up his hands in admiration at their severity therein, Mr. Justice Jones pronounced the Judgment aforesaid; and he remains yet in prison, unable to pay the said Fine.

Notwithstanding which severity in the cases forementioned, this Committee has observed the said Court has not wanted in any other cases an extraordinary compassion and mercy, though there appeared no publick reason judicially in the Trial; as in particular:

Upon Thomas Knox, principal, on Hill. 31 & 32. Car. 2. an Indictment of Subornation and Conspiracy against the Testimony and Life of Dr. Oates, for Sodomy; and also against the Testimony of William Bedloe; a Fine of 200 marks, a year's imprisonment, and to find sureties for the good behaviour for three Years.

Upon John Lane, for the same offence, a Fine of 100 marks, to stand in the Pillory for an hour, and to be imprisoned for one year.

VOL. VII.

Upon John Tasborough, Gent. on an Indictment for Subornation of Stephen Dugdale, tending to overthrow the whole discovery of the Plot: The said Tasborough being affirmed to be a person of good quality, a Fine of 100 l. Par. 32 Car. 2.

Upon Anne Price, for the same offence, 200 l. Eod. Ter.

Upon Nathaniel Thompson and William Badcock, on an Information Trin. 32 Car. 2. for printing and publishing a weekly Libel, called The True Domestic Intelligence, or, News both from City and Country, and known to be popishly affected, a Fine of 3 l. 6 s. 8 d. on each of them.

Upon Matthew Turner, Stationer, on an Information for vending and publishing a Book, called The Compendium; wherein the justice of the Nation in the late Trials of the Popish Conspirators, even by some of these Judges themselves, is highly arraign'd; and all the witnesses for the King horribly aspers'd: And this being the common notorious popish book-seller of the Town, Judgment to pay a Fine of 100 marks, and is said to be out of prison already. Eod. Ter.

Upon — Loveland, on an Indictment for a notorious Conspiracy and Subordination against the Life and Honour of the Duke of Buckingham, for Sodomy, a Fine of 5 l. and to stand an hour in the Pillory. Trin. 32 Car. 2.

Upon Edward Christian, Esq; for the same offence; a Fine of 100 marks, and to stand an hour in the Pillory. Mich. 32 Car. 2. And upon Arthur Obrian, for the same offence; a Fine of 20 marks, and to stand an hour in the Pillory.

Upon consideration whereof, this Committee came to this Resolution:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the Court of King's-Bench in the imposition of Fines on Offenders of late years) hath acted arbitrarily, illegally and partially, favouring Papists, and Persons popishly affected, and excessively oppressing his Majesty's protestant subjects.

And this Committee being informed, That several of his Majesty's subjects had been committed for crimes bailable by Law, although they then tendered sufficient sureties, which were refused, only to put them to vexation and charge; proceeded to inquire into the same, and found that not only the forementioned Henry Carr, had been so refused the common right of a subject, as is above-said; but that George Broome, being a Constable last year in London, and committing some of the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs's servants, for great disorders, according to his duty, he was in few days arrested by a Tipstaff, without any London Constable, and carried before the said Chief-Justice, by his warrant, to answer for the said committing of those persons above-said; but being there, was accused of having spoken irreverently of the said Chief-Justice, and an affidavit read to him to that purpose; and was falsely (as the said George Broome affirms) sworn against, by two persons that use to be common bail in that Court, and of very ill reputation. Upon which, he was committed to the King's-Bench, though he then tendered two able citizens and common-council-men of London to be his bail: And he was forc'd to bring his Habeas Corpus, to his great charge, before he came out; when the Marshal, Mr. Cooling, exacted 5*l.* of him, of which he complained to the Chief-Justice, but had no other answer, but he might take his remedy at law. But the said Marshal fearing he should be questioned, restored him two Guineas of it.

And further this Committee was informed, by Francis Smith, bookseller, That about Michaelmas was twelve-month he was brought before the said Chief-Justice, by his warrant, and charged by the messenger, Robert Stephens, That he had seen some parcels of a Pamphlet, called Observations on Sir George Wakeman's Trial, in his Shop: Upon which the Chief-Justice told him, he would make him an example, use him like a boor in France, and pile him and all the booksellers and printers up in prison, like faggots: and so committed him to the King's-Bench, swearing and cursing at him in great fury. And when he tendered three sufficient citizens of London for his bail, alledging, imprisonment in his circumstances would be his utter ruin; the Chief-Justice replied, the citizens looked like sufficient persons, but he would take no bail: And so he was forced to come out by a Habeas Corpus, and was afterwards informed against for the same matter, to his great charge and vexation. And a while after Francis (the Son of the said Francis Smith) was committed by the said Chief-Justice, and bail refused, for selling a Pamphlet, called A New-Year's Gift for the said Chief-Justice, to a coffee-house; and he declared to them he would take no bail, for he would ruin them all.

And further it appeared to this Committee, that the said Chief-Justice (about October was twelve-month) committed in like manner Jane Curtis, she having a husband and children, for selling a book, called A Satyr against Injustice; which his Lordship called a Libel against him: And her friends tendering sufficient bail, and desiring him to have mercy upon her poverty and condition, he swore by the name of God she should go to prison; and he would shew her no more mercy than they could expect from a wolf that came to devour them; and she might bring her Habeas Corpus, and come out so; which she was forced to do, and after informed against and prosecuted, to her utter ruin, four or five Terms after.

In like manner, it appeared to this Committee, that about that time also, Edward Berry, Stationer, of Gray's-Inn, was committed by the said Chief-Justice, being accused of selling The Observations on Sir George Wakeman's Trial: and though he tendered 1000*l.* bail, yet the Chief-Justice said, he would take no bail, he should go to prison, and come out according to Law. And after he, with much trouble and charge, got out by a Habeas Corpus, he was forced by himself, or his Attorney, to attend five Terms before he could be discharged, though no information was exhibited against him in all that time. In consideration whereof, and of others of the like nature (too tedious here to relate) this Committee came to this Resolution;

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, That the refusing sufficient bail in these cases, wherein the persons committed wereailable by law, was illegal; and a high breach of the liberty of the subject.

And this committee being informed of an extraordinary kind of a charge, given at the last Assizes at Kingston, in the County of Surry, by Mr. Baron Weston, and proceeding to examine several persons then and there present; it was made appear to this committee, by the testimony of John Cole, Richard Mayo, and John Pierce, Gentlemen, and others; some of whom put down the said Baron's words in writing, immediately; that part of the said charge was to this effect: He inveighed very much against Farel, Luther, Calvin, and Zuinglius, condemning them as authors of the Reformation, which was against their Princes minds: and then adding to this purpose; "Zuinglius set up his fanaticism, and Calvin built on that blessed foundation; and to speak truth, all his disciples are seasoned with such a sharpness of spirit, that it much concerns Magistrates to keep a strait hand over them; and now they are restless, amusing us with fears, and nothing will serve them but a Parliament. For my part, I know no representative of the Nation but the King; all power centers in him: 'Tis true, he does intrust it with his Ministers, but he is the sole Representative; and i'faith, he he has wisdom enough to intrust it no more in these men, who have given us such late examples of their wisdom and faithfulness." And this committee taking the said matter into their consideration, came to this Resolution;

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the said expressions in the charge given by the said Baron Weston, were a scandal to the Reformation, in derogation of the rights and privileges of Parliaments, and tending to raise discord between his Majesty and his subjects.

And this committee being informed by several Printers and Booksellers, of great trouble and vexation given them unjustly, by one Robert Stephens, called a messenger of the Press; the said Stephens being examined by this committee, by what authority he had proceeded in that manner, produced two warrants under the hand and seal of the Chief-Justice Scroggs, which were in hec verba.

Angl. ff. WHEREAS there are divers ill-disposed persons, who do daily print and publish many seditious and treasonable Books and Pamphlets, endeavouring thereby to dispose the minds of his Majesty's subjects to sedition and rebellion: And also infamous Libels, reflecting upon particular persons, to the great scandal of his Majesty's Government. For suppressing whereof, his Majesty hath lately issued out his royal Proclamation: And for the more speedy suppressing the said seditious Books, Libels, and Pamphlets, and to the end, that the Authors and Publishers thereof may be brought to their punishment:

These are to will and require you, and in his Majesty's name to charge, and command you, and every of you, upon sight hereof, to be aiding and assisting to Robert Stephens, messenger of the Press, in the seizing on all such Books and Pamphlets as aforesaid, as he shall be informed of, in any Booksellers or Printers Shops or Warehouses, or elsewhere, whatsoever; to the end they may be disposed as to Law shall appertain. Also if you shall be informed of the Authors, Printers or Publishers of such Books or Pamphlets as are above-mentioned, you are to apprehend them, and have them before one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, to be pro-proceeded against according to Law. Dated this 29th day of November, 1679.

To Robert Stephens, messenger of the Press; and to all Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Constables, and all other Officers and Ministers whom these may concern.

W. SCROGGS.

Angl. ff. WHEREAS the King's Majesty hath lately issued out his Proclamation for suppressing the Printing and Publishing unlicensed News-Books, and Pamphlets of News: Notwithstanding which, there are divers persons who do daily print and publish such unlicensed Books and Pamphlets:

These are therefore to will and require you, and in his Majesty's Name to charge and command you, and every of you, from time to time, and at all times, so often as you shall be thereunto required, to be aiding and assisting to Robert Stephens, messenger of the Press, in the seizing of all such Books and Pamphlets as aforesaid, as he shall be informed of, in any Book-seller's Shop, or Printer's Shop or Ware-houses, or elsewhere whatsoever, to the end they may be disposed of as to Law shall appertain. Likewise, if you shall be informed of the Authors, Printers or Publishers of such Books or Pamphlets, you are to apprehend them, and have them before Me or one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, to be proceeded against as to Law shall appertain. Dated this 28th Day of May, Anno Dom. 1680.

To all Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Constables, and all other Officers and Ministers whom these may concern.

W. SCROGGS.

To Robert Stephens, messenger of the Press.

Upon view whereof this Committee came to this Resolution;

Resolved, That it is the Opinion of this committee, that the said warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

And this committee being informed of certain scandalous discourses, said to be uttered in publick places by the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, proceeded to examine Sir Robert Atkins, late one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, concerning the same; by whom it appears, That at a Sessions-dinner at the Old-Bailey, in the Mayoralty of Sir Robert Clayton, who was then present; the said Chief Justice took occasion to speak very much against petitioning, condemning it as resembling 41, as factious and tending to rebellion, or to that effect; to which the said Sir Robert Atkins made no reply, suspecting he waited for some advantage over him. But the Chief Justice continuing and pressing him with the said discourse, he began to justify petitioning as the right of the people; especially for the sitting of a Parliament, which the Law requires, if it be done with modesty and respect. Upon which the Chief Justice fell into a great passion; and there is some reason to believe, that soon after he made an ill representation of what the said Sir Robert had then spoke, unto his Majesty. And this committee was further informed, that the said Sir Robert Atkins being in circuit with the said Chief Justice, at Summer Assizes was twelve-month, at Monmouth, (Mr. Arnold, Mr. Price, and Mr. Bedloe being then in company) the Chief Justice fell severely, in publick, upon Mr. Bedloe; taking off the credit of his evidence, and alledging he had over-shot himself in it, or to that effect; very much to the disparagement of his testimony. And the said Sir Robert defending Mr. Bedloe's evidence and credit, he grew extreme angry and loud; saying to this effect, That he verily believed Langhorn died innocently. To which the said Sir Robert replied, He wondered how he could think so, who had condemned him himself, and had not moved the King for a reprieve for him. All which matters of discourse, this committee humbly submit to the wisdom and consideration of this house, without taking upon them to give any Opinion therein.

And this committee proceeded further to inquire into some passages that happened at Lent Assizes last for the County of Somerset, at the trial of Thomas Dare, Gent. there, upon an Indictment for saying falsely and seditiously, That the Subjects had but two means to redress their grievances, one by petitioning, the other by rebellion: and found, that though by his other discourse, when he said so, that it appeared plainly he had no rebellious intent, in that he said, Then God forbid there should be a rebellion, he would be the first man to draw the sword against a Rebel; yet he was prosecuted with great violence: And having pleaded, Not guilty, he moved Mr. Justice Jones, who then sat Judge there) that he might try it at the next Assizes; for that Mr. Searle, who was by at the speaking of the words, and a material witness for his defence) was not then to be had, and an affidavit to that purpose was made and received. But the said Justice Jones told him, That was a favour of the Court only, and he had not deserved any favour, and so forced him to try it presently. But the Jury, appearing to be an extraordinary one, provided on purpose, being all of persons that had highly opposed petitioning for the sitting of this Parliament, he was advised to withdraw his plea; and the said Justice Jones encouraged him so to do, he confessed the words, denying any evil intention, and gave the said Justice an account in writing, of the truth of the whole matter, and made a submission in Court, as he was directed by the said Justice, who promised to recommend him to his Majesty; but imposed a fine of 500 l. on him, and to be bound to good behaviour for three years: Declaring also, That he was turned out from being a Common-Counsellor of the Corporation of Taunton, in the said County, on pretence of a clause in their Charter, giving such a power to a Judge of Assize. And the said Thomas Dare remains yet in prison for the said Fine; in which matter of the trial aforesaid, this committee desireth to refer itself to the judgment of this House.

The Resolutions of the House of Commons upon the said Report.

1. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the discharging of the Grand Jury of the hundred of Ossulston, in the County of Middlesex, by the Court of King's Bench, in Trinity Term last, before the last day of the Term; and before they had finished their presentments, was arbitrary and illegal, destructive to publick Justice, a manifest violation of the oaths of the Judges of that Court, and a means

means to subvert the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, and to introduce Popery.

2. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the rule made by the Court of King's Bench in Trinity Term last, against printing of a Book, called, The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary; thereby usurping to themselves legislative power, to the great discouragement of the Protestants, and for the countenancing of Popery.

3. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the Court of King's Bench, in the imposition of fines on offenders of late years, have acted arbitrarily, illegally and partially, favouring Papists, and persons popishly affected, and excessively oppressing his Majesty's Protestant subjects.

4. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the refusing sufficient bail in these cases, wherein the persons committed were bailable by law, was illegal and a high breach of the liberties of the subject.

5. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the said expressions in the charge given by the said Baron Weston, were a scandal to the Reformation; and tending to raise discord between his Majesty and his subjects, and to the subversion of the ancient constitution of Parliaments, and of the Government of this Kingdom.

6. That it is the opinion of this House, that the said warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

The Resolutions of the Commons, for the impeachment of the said Judges.

Resolved, That Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief Justice to the Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the said report, and the resolutions of the House thereupon.

Resolved, That Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Justices of the said Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the said report, and resolutions of the House thereupon.

Resolved, That Sir Richard Weston, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, be impeached upon the said report, and resolutions of the House thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to prepare an impeachment against Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, do prepare impeachments against the said Sir William Scroggs, Sir Thomas Jones, and Sir Richard Weston, upon the said report and resolutions.

Ordered, That the said report, and several resolutions of this House thereupon, be printed; and that Mr. Speaker take care in the printing thereof, a-part from this day's other Votes.

January 5, 1682. The Articles against Sir William Scroggs, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, were read as follow:

Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanours, against Sir William Scroggs, Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, by the Commons in Parliament assembled, in their own Name, and in the Name of all the Commons of England.

1. THAT he the said Sir William Scroggs, then being Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws, and the established Religion and Government of this Kingdom of England; and instead thereof, to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government, against Law; which he has declared by divers traitorous and wicked Words, Opinions, Judgments, Practices and Actions.

2. That the said Sir William Scroggs, in Trinity Term last, being then Chief Justice of the said Court, and having taken an oath duly to administer Justice, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; in pursuance of his said traitorous purposes, did, together with the rest of the said Justices of the same Court, several days before the end of the said Term, in an arbitrary manner discharge the Grand Jury, which then served for the Hundred of Ossulston, in the County of Middlesex, before they had made their Presentments, or had found several Bills of Indictment which were then before them; whereof the said Sir William Scroggs was then fully informed: and that the same would be tendered to the Court upon the last day of the said term; which day then was, and by the known course of the said Court hath always heretofore been given unto the said Jury for the delivering in of their Bills and Presentments: By which sudden and illegal discharge of the said Jury, the course of Justice was stopped maliciously and designedly, the Presentments of many Papists and other offenders were obstructed, and in particular, a Bill of Indictment against James Duke of York, for absenting himself from Church, which was then before them, was prevented from being proceeded upon.

3. That whereas one Henry Carr had, for some time before published every week a certain Book, intitled, The weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or the History of Popery; wherein the superstitions and cheats of the Church of Rome were from time to time exposed; he the said Sir William Scroggs, then Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, together with the other Judges of the said Court, before any legal conviction of the said Carr of any crime, did in the same Trinity Term, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, make, and cause to be entered, a certain rule of that Court, against the printing of the said Book, in hæc Verba.

Ordinatum est quod Liber intitular' The weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or, The History of Popery, Non ulterius imprimatur vel publicetur per aliquem personam quemcunque.

Per Cur'

And did cause the said Carr, and divers Printers and other persons to be served with the same; which said Rule and other Proceedings were most apparently contrary to all Justice, in condemning, not only what had been written without hearing the Parties, but also all that might for the future be written on that subject; a manifest countenancing of Popery and discouragement of Protestants, an open invasion upon the right of the subject, and an encroaching and assuming to themselves a legislative power and authority.

4. That the said Sir William Scroggs, since he was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench, hath, together with the other Judges of the said Court, most notoriously departed from all rules of justice and equality, in the imposition of fines upon persons sons convicted of misdemeanours in the said Court; and particularly in the Term of Easter last past, did openly declare in the said Court, in the case of one Jessop, who was convicted of publishing false News, and was then to be fined, That he would have regard to persons and their principles in imposing of fines, and would set a fine of 500*l.* on one person for the same offence, for the which he would not fine another 100*l.* And according to his said unjust and arbitray declaration, he the said Sir William Scroggs, together with the said other Justices, did then impose a fine of 100*l.* upon the said Jessop; although the said Jessop had before that time proved one Hewit to be convicted as Author of the said false News. And afterwards in the same Term, did fine the said Hewit upon his said conviction, only five marks. Nor hath the said Sir William Scroggs, together with the other Judges of the said Court, had any regard to the nature of the offences or the ability of the persons, in the imposing of fines; but have been manifestly partial and favourable to Papists, and persons affected to, and promoting the popish Interest, in this time of imminent danger from them: And at the same time have most severely and grievously oppressed his Majesty's protestant subjects, as will appear upon view of the several Records of fines set in the said Court. By which arbitrary, unjust, and partial proceedings, many of his Majesty's liege people have been ruined, and Popery countenanced under colour of justice; and all the mischiefs and excesses of the Court of Star-Chamber, by Act of Parliament suppressed, have been again, in direct opposition of the said Law, introduced.

5. That he the said Sir William Scroggs, for the further accomplishing of his said traitorous and wicked purposes, and designing to subject the Persons as well as the Estates of his Majesty's liege people, to his lawless will and pleasure, hath frequently refused to accept of bail, though the same were sufficient, and legally tendered to him by many persons accused before him only of such crimes for which by law bail ought to have been taken, and divers of the said persons being only accused of offences against himself; declaring at the same time, that he refused bail, and committed them to goal only to put them to charges; and using such furious threats as were to the terrour of his Majesty's subjects, and such scandalous expressions as were a dishonour to the Government, and to the dignity of his office. And particularly, that he the said Sir William Scroggs did, in the year 1679, commit and detain in prison, in such unlawful manner, among others, Henry Carr, George Broome, Edward Berry, Benjamin Harris, Francis Smith, sen. Francis Smith, jun. and Jane Curtis, citizens of London: Which proceedings of the said Sir William Scroggs, are a high breach of the liberty of the subject, destructive to the fundamental laws of this Realm, contrary to the Petition of Right, and other Statutes; and do manifestly tend to the introducing of arbitrary power.

6. That he the said Sir William Scroggs, in further oppression of his Majesty's liege people, hath, since his being made Chief-Justice of the said Court of King's-Bench, in an arbitrary manner, granted divers general warrants for attaching the persons and seizing the goods of his Majesty's subjects, not named or described particularly in the said warrants: By means whereof, many of his Majesty's subjects have been vexed, their houses entered into, and they themselves grievously oppressed, contrary to Law.

7. Whereas there hath been a horrid and damnable Plot contrived and carried on by the Papists; for the murdering the King, the subversion of the Laws and Government of this Kingdom, and for the destruction of the protestant religion in the same; all which the said Sir William Scroggs well knew, having himself not only tried, but given judgment against several of the offenders: Nevertheless, the said Sir William Scroggs did, at divers times and places, as well sitting in Court, as otherwise, openly defame and scandalize several of the witnesses, who had proved the said treasons against divers of the conspirators, and had given evidence against divers other persons, who were then untried, and did endeavour to disparage their evidence, and take off their credit. Whereby, as much as in him lay, he did traitorously and wickedly suppress and stifle the discovery of the said popish Plot, and encourage the conspirators to proceed in the same, to the great and apparent danger of his Majesty's sacred life, and of the well-established Government, and Religion of this Realm of England.

8. Whereas the said Sir William Scroggs, being advanced to be Chief-Justice of the Court of King's-Bench, ought by a sober, grave and virtuous conversation, to have given a good example to the King's liege-people, and to demean himself answerable to the dignity of so eminent a Station; yet he the said Sir William Scroggs, on the contrary, by his frequent and notorious Excesses and Debaucheries, and his prophane and atheistical Discourses, doth daily affront Almighty God, dishonour his Majesty, give countenance and encouragement to all manner of vice and wickedness, and bring the highest scandal on the public Justice of the Kingdom.

All which Words, Opinions and Actions of the said Sir William Scroggs, were by him spoken and done, traitorously, wickedly falsely and maliciously, to alienate the hearts of the King's subjects from his Majesty, and to set a division between him and them; and to subvert the fundamental Laws, and the established Religion and Government of this Kingdom, and to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government, contrary to his own knowledge, and the known Laws of the Realm of England. And thereby he the said Sir William Scroggs hath not only broken his own oath, but also, as far as in him lay, hath broken the King's oath to his people; whereof he the said Sir William Scroggs, representing his Majesty in so high an office of Justice, had the custody: for which the said Commons do impeach him the said Sir William Scroggs, of the high Treason against our sovereign Lord the King, and his Crown and Dignity, and other the high crimes and misdemeanours aforesaid.

And the said Commons, by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Sir William Scroggs, and also of replying to the answer that he shall make thereunto, and of offering proofs of the premises, or of any other impeachments or accusations that shall be by them exhibited against him, as the case shall (according to the course of Parliament) require; do pray that the said Sir William Scroggs, Chief-Justice of the Court of King's-Bench, may be put to answer to all and every the Premises, and may be com-committed to safe custody; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be upon him had and used, as is agreeable to Law and Justice, and the course of Parliaments.

Resolved, That the said Sir William Scroggs be impeached upon the said Articles.

Upon which the following Speeches were made.

Sir Thomas Lee.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, in my opinion, the matter contained in the last seven Articles, doth not answer the first Article nor the Title; for therein you accuse Sir William Scroggs in general words, of high Treason, the highest of crimes; and when you come to particulars, you instance the dismissing of Grand Juries, prohibiting the printing of Pamphlets, inequality in levying of fines, and the like. Sir, I would not be understood to be an Advocate for the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs; but I hope that as long as I sit here, you will always give me leave to be an Advocate for this House; which I cannot more signally demonstrate, than by offering my opinion against every thing which I think will reflect upon the Justice or Prudence of the House, or prove any hindrance to the finishing of those great Affairs you have under debate.

Sir, I am of opinion, that though all these things contained in these Articles should be fully proved, they will not amount to treason; and although it be true that you do but impeach, and that the Lords are to judge, yet it is not agreeable to the Justice of this House, that the Articles should be for Treason, unless you are well satisfied that you can make out that the matter contained in the Articles is so: which I very much doubt. And therefore I am of opinion, that the Articles ought only to be for high crimes and misdemeanours; which I am the more forward to press you earnestly to, because I am afraid if these Articles should go for high Treason, it may occasion some dispute with the Lords, who happily, if they do not conclude that the matter contained in the Articles amounts to treason, will not commit him, notwithstanding their Order made in the Earl of Danby's case: And that may occasion such mis-understandings as may hinder all other business. And also if you send it up for high treason, it may occasion another dispute with the Bishops, whether they shall withdraw or no, when the Case comes to be tried. Upon the whole matter, I think it will be much safer that you make the Impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanours only.

Mr. Daniel Finch, (afterwards Earl of Nottingham.)

Mr. Speaker; Sir, my obligation to serve my Country, calls on me to give you my opinion in this matter, and not any kindness to my Lord Chief-Justice; for I can safely declare, that I do not think him fit for that eminent place now, because indeed I never thought he was fit: So that what I shall say, proceeds from my kindness to the Publick, and particular obligations to this House. I think we ought to be cautious how we increase Laws to take away our lives; our fore-fathers were very careful in it, as may appear by the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. which was made to prevent the Judges from taking on them any power to declare any thing treason but what was express'd within that Statute; reserving all obvious crimes of that nature to the judgment of the Nation in Parliament, who no doubt may declare other things treason which are not within that Statute. But it is a question with me, whether it can be done any other way than by Bill, that so it may be an Act of King, Lords and Commons; and not for the house of Lords only, the Commons only prosecutors, and the King not concerned. That the Lords alone are proper Judges in many cases, when persons are prosecuted upon some known Law, is not to be doubted: But I much question if they ought to be so in cases of declarative Treason, though upon an Impeachment from the House of Commons: For that were to allow the Lords alone a power of making a Law in the cases of the highest nature, even of life and death. Sir, our forefathers thought not good to intrust their lives nor liberties with any one Estate alone, they thought with a multitude of Counsellors there was most safety: And therefore I hope we shall be very cautious how we make a precedent in the case. And I am the more earnest in moving you herein, because I am very confident that no precedent can be offered to make good, that there was ever any thing declared treason in Parliament, which was not felony by some express known law before. And I hope we shall be so careful of ourselves and our posterity, as not to go about to make a breach upon the constitution of the Government in this particular, but rather make the Impeachment only for high crimes and misdemeanours.

Sir Francis Winnington.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I cannot agree with that honourable Member that spoke last, as to his notion that the Parliament cannot declare any thing to be treason, which was not before felony by some known law; the Statute of 25 Ed. 3. leaves the power at large to Parliaments without any such restriction. And I am of opinion, that any thing that tends to the destruction or alteration of the Government, hath always been, and ought to be declared in Parliament, treason, if brought there to be judged. The Parliament doth not in this make new Crimes, and then condemn them; but only declares that to be a Crime which was so before, and wanted nothing but condemnation. And it may consist with the prudence of this House, as well to be careful how to weaken those laws and customs which tend so much to the preservation of the Government, as how to increase any that may tend to the destruction of any one Man, by multiplying precedents for chastizing of treason; the crimes for which Trefilian and the rest at that time were impeached, were not felony by any known law, and yet they were condemned in Parliament. Empson and Dudley were accused in general, for endeavouring to subvert the Government, which being in general words, was not felony by any known law, yet the Judges having recourse to Parliament, they were condemned. The Articles against Finch, Berkley, and the rest, were all for high treason; and the matter contained in their Articles amounted to no more than what is now contained in this: And there is so little weight in the cases that have been offered against this, that, I think they are offered rather for ornament than argument. The Chancellor is the keeper of the King's conscience, and the Judges of his coronation-oath. As they are in great places, and have a great power, so they ought to be the more careful how they behave themselves: And as they have greater encouragements, so to be subject to more severe chastisements than others, the publick being more concerned in their actions; and therefore the custom of Parliaments hath made that treason in them, which is not so in other persons. The words of Judges and Privy-Counsellors, in some cases, are Overt-Acts of themselves, I think it will become the wisdom of the Nation, to make all the defence and provision they can, against the corrupt doings of Men in such places: And I do not see what danger can arise to our posterities by such proceedings. Is it not with the Parliament we intrust this power? Who can imagine that a Parliament can ever be so constituted, as not to be carefully concerned in their proceedings as to life and death; and only to concern themselves therein, when some extraordinary exigences in which the Government is much concerned, requires it? What Man would desire to live after he was thought worthy of death by such an assembly? And notwithstanding what hath been said to extenuate the crimes mentioned in these Articles, I think, the Order that was made in the King's Bench about Printing, by the Judges, was taking on them a legislative Power; which hath formerly been judged treason: And I think we live now in as dangerous times as ever, and under as great a necessity to have a care of the mischiefs that may happen to the Nation by ill Judges, as ever. And I see no reason to doubt our being able to make good these Articles; and therefore I pray that the Articles may be ingrossed as they are.

the

Mr. Powel.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I agree that it will become this House very well, to be very cautious how they make precedents in cases of treason, which are the Sheet-Anchors of life and death: as also how they weaken parliamentary proceedings, that are necessary to preserve the Government. And I hope that nothing but the true merits of the cause will lead us in a matter of so great importance, and neither wit nor oratory, nor any forced explanation of the laws. I see it agreed by all, that Parliaments have a power of declaring treason. The question is, which is most customary and securest, to have it done by Bill, that so King, Lords and Commons may join therein; or whether by an impeachment from the Commons, the Lords being only the Judges; or whether any thing ought or can be declared treason by Parliament, which was not felony by some known law before.

Sir, I am of opinion that it is safest and most agreeable to the policy of this Government, that the declaring of any thing treason in Parliament should be by Bill, that King, Lords and Commons may join therein, that so such a precious thing as the life of the subject should have the greatest security imaginable. However, it is not to be doubted, but it hath been practised otherways, and that many persons have been condemned in Parliament upon impeachments from the Commons, for facts which were not treason by any known Law. And the reason may be, thereby to prevent the dangers that might arise from some Ministers of State growing so great with the King, as that they should be able to secure him from ever giving his consent to a Bill. In such a case, by giving ill counsel and other secret courses, (happily as far as treason, yet not known by any law) they would be secure from punishment, if this way of proceeding against such a person, where the King's concurrence is not necessary, were not allowed of. And the preserving of this right, is so far from being contrary to the wisdom of our Ancestors, that it is very agreeable to all their proceedings in the constitution of this Government, in order to ballance it the better, and preserve it against the designs of great ill Men. And as to the other objection, whether the Parliament can declare any thing treason that was not felony before by some known law? I am quite of another opinion, and do believe that the practice hath been otherways. The Judges in Rich. the 2^d's time were condemned for giving extrajudicial opinions, which, I think was not felony by any Statute-Law. A Knight of Cheeshire was condemned in Parliament, for conspiring the death of the King's uncle: An Earl of Noribumberland, for giving liveries to so many persons as were judged a little army. And many other cases which I have read of, in which persons have been condemned in Parliament, when their crimes were not felony by any known law. But I do not take any delight in ripping up old Statutes or Precedents about treasons. I am sorry the misfortunes of our times should make it now necessary. But if the Parliament, as I conclude, have often declared such things as these treason, and the Commons have impeached persons guilty of such crimes for high treason; I see no just objection why these Articles should not go up as they are drawn: For notwithstanding what hath been said to mitigate the crimes contained in these Articles, I am of opinion, that the order made in the King's Bench, about Printing, their warrants for seizing of Books, their dismissing of Grand Juries, doth tend to the subversion of the Government; and hath been, and ever ought to be, in Judges, judged high treason. And therefore, that it cannot consist with the prudence of this House, nor the security of the Nation, that this person should be impeached of less than high treason: And therefore I move you, that the articles may be ingrossed.

Mr. Paul Foley.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, we are not going about to declare any thing treason, but to offer our Articles, and leave it to the Lords; therefore most of these arguments would be more proper there: for we only impeach, they are to be the Judges, whether the matter be treason or no. It is true, we ought to be cautious what we do in it, because it is not proper that this House should impeach a Man for treason, without having good grounds for it. But is not the Order about Printing a kind of an Act of State to serve instead of a Law? Is not the use of grand Juries a very essential part of this Government? and is not the dismissing of them, as this Judge did, a way to render them useless? Are not his Warrants to seize Books and Papers, arbitrary? and doth not all tend to the subversion of the Government? And what better grounds should we have for our proceedings? I think the Articles are well drawn, and ought to be ingrossed as they are.

Sir Richard Temple.

Mr. Speaker; Sir, I cannot admit that Parliaments, by impeachments before the Lords, can make any thing treason, but only such matters as were treason by common law, before the Statute of Edward the third. And, I think, we ought to be so cautious of our posterities, as not to press for such precedents, lest you put into the hands of the Lords a power, for which we may have cause to repent hereafter, but never get back again: For the Lords do not use to part with those Powers they once get. There are precedents by which it appears, that the Lords have attempted to make declarative treasons alone, without any impeachment from the Commons. Have a care how you give them encouragement to proceed therein; better keep to the other way of making no declarative treasons but by Bill.

Lords

The Articles were read, and Question put:

Resolved, That the said Sir William Scroggs be impeached upon the said Articles; and that the said Articles be ingrossed, and carried up to the Lords by my Lord Cavendish.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to examine the proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-hall, and to prepare impeachments against Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Justices of the Court of King's Bench; and Sir Richard Weston, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, do bring in such impeachments with all convenient speed.

After the Articles were brought into the House of Lords, the Lord Chief Justice put in the following answer; viz.

The Answer of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief Justice of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench; to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Commons of England, in the late Parliament assembled.

THE said Sir William Scroggs, by, and under protestation, that there is no manner of high treason, nor any overt-act of high treason, particularly alledged or expressed in the said articles of Impeachment, to which the said Sir William Scroggs can, or is bound by Law to make any answer unto; and saving to himself, (and which he prayeth may be saved to him) both now and at all times hereafter, all, and all manner of benefit and advantage of exception to the insufficiency of the said Articles, in point of law; as well for that there is no overt-act of treason expressed therein, as for all other the defects therein appearing; for the Plea thereto he saith, that he is in no wise guilty of all or any the crimes, offences, or misdemeanours, of what nature, kind, or quality soever, by the said Articles of Impeachment charged upon him, in manner and form, as in and by the said Articles is supposed; which he is ready to aver and prove, as this honourable House shall award; and humbly submitteth himself, and the justice of his cause, to this most honourable House: and prayeth to be discharged of the premises, and to be hence dismissed and acquitted of all the matters, crimes, misdemeanours, and offences, in and by the said Articles of Impeachment charged upon him, &c.

W. Scroggs.

After this, a Petition of Sir William Scroggs was read.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in this present Parliament assembled; The humble Petition of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief Justice of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench; sheweth,

THAT your Petitioner, the last Parliament, was impeached before your Lordships, by the House of Commons, of several Articles styled high treason, and other great crimes and misdemeanours.

To which your Petitioner hath now, with the first opportunity, put in his answer to this honourable House.

Your Petitioner humbly prays, that your Lordships would be pleased to appoint the House of Commons to reply, that so a convenient day may be appointed for the hearing of the Cause; that your Petitioner may no longer lie under the reproach of the word high-treason.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

W. Scroggs.

Ordered, That the copy of this Answer and Petition shall be sent to the House of Commons.

But the Parliament being soon after prorogued, this affair was dropped. However, the Lord Chief-Justice was removed from his high Station, and allowed a pension for life.

XXXV. The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed by the Honourable House of Commons, to consider the Petition of Richard Thompson of Bristol, Clerk; and to examine Complaints against him. And the Resolution of the Commons in Parliament upon this Report, for his Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanours; Friday, December 24, 1680. 32 Car. II.

The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed to consider the Petition of Richard Thompson, and to examine Complaints against him.

At the Committee appointed to take into consideration the Petition of Richard Thompson, Clerk; and to examine the Complaints against him.

IN the first place, the Committee read unto the said Thompson, the heads of the Complaints against him; which (for the most part) he denying, desired to have his accusers brought face to face: Whereupon the Committee proceeded to the examination of witnesses, to prove the said complaint.

The first witness examined, saith, That there being a great noise and rumour, that Mr. Thompson, had prepared a Sermon to be preached on the thirtieth of January, 1679, the said witness went to the said Sermon, and did hear Mr. Thompson publicly declare, that the Presbyterians were such persons, as the very Devil blush'd at them; and that the villain Hampden grudged, and made it more scruple of conscience, to give twenty shillings to the King, for supplying his necessities by Ship-money and Loan, which was his right by Law, than to raise Rebellion against him. And that the Presbyterians are worse (and far more intollerable) than either Priests or Jesuits.

The second saith, That hearing a great talk and noise spread of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompson, on the 30th of January, 1679; he was minded to hear the same, and accordingly did; at which he writ some notes: amongst which, he saith, that Mr. Thompson openly preached, that the Devil blush'd at the Presbyterians; and that the villain Hampden grudged more to give the King twenty shillings, which was his just due by Law (Ship-money and Loan) than to raise Rebellion against him; and that a Presbyterian Brother, qua talis, was as great a Traitor by the Statute, as any Priest or Jesuit whatsoever.

That he heard, that Mr. Thompson said, that he hoped the Presbyterians would be pulled out of their houses, and the Goals filled with them: and wish'd their houses burnt.

VOL. VII.

The third saith, That he was cited to the Bishop's Court, to receive the Sacrament last Easter; but being out of town at that time, did receive it at a place called Purl in Wiltshire; and that a month after he came home, was again cited to the said Court; and he did accordingly appear, and told the Court, that he hoped his absence and business might be accepted for a lawful excuse; upon which Mr. Thompson immediately said, that they would proceed to excommunicate him. Upon which, this Informant produced his certificate, of which the Chancellor approved, and said it was lawful. Hereupon Mr. Thompson said, that his receiving the Sacrament from any other Minister, than the Minister of the Parish wherein he dwelled, was damnation to his Soul; and that he would maintain this doctrine.

The fourth saith, That being at Bristol-Fair, he heard a great talk and noise of a Satyr-Sermon prepared, and designed to be preached by Mr. Thompson against the Presbyterians, on the 30th of January, 1679; and that very many resorted to hear him: in which Sermon, the said Mr. Thompson declared and said, that there was a great talk of a plot: but (says he) a Presbyterian is the man; and further added, that the villain Hampden scrupled to give the King 20 s. upon Ship-money and Loan, which was due by Law, but did not scruple to raise Rebellion against him.

The fifth saith, That Mr. Thompson, in a Sermon preached the 30th of January, 1679, did say, that the Presbyterians did seem to outvie Mariana, and that Calvin was the first that preached the King-killing Doctrine; and that after he had quoted Calvin often, said, if this be true then, a Presbyterian-Brother, qua talis, is as great a Traitor as any Priest or Jesuit: and that then he condemned all the Proceedings of Parliament.

The sixth saith, That he the said Mr. Thompson, had utter'd many scandalous words concerning the Act for burying in Woollen; affirming, that the makers of that Law, were a company of old Fools and Fanatics, and that he would bring a School-boy, should make a better Act than that, and construe it when he had done.

The seventh saith, That Mr. Thompson, in a Sermon by him preached (while Petitions for the sitting of this Parliament were on foot) speaking of a second Rebellion by the Scotch, who had framed a formidable Army, and came as far as Durham, to deliver a Petition forsooth; and that they seemed rather to command than petition their sovereign to grant; and comparing that Petition with the then Petition on foot, greatly inveighed against it, and scoffed much at it.

The eighth saith, That Mr. Thompson (when the Petition was on foot for the sitting of this Parliament) used at the Funeral Sermon of one Mr. Wharton these words (pointing at the dead, said) that he was no Schismatical petitioning Rebel, and that by his instigations, the Grand-Jury of Bristol made a presentment of their detestation against petitioning for the sitting of the Parliament; that the said Mr. Thompson had told him, that he was Governor to Mr. Narbor, when he was beyond Sea; and said, that he had been very often (and above one hundred times) at Mafs, in the great Church at Paris, and usually gave half a Crown to get a place to hear a certain Doctor of that Church, and that he was like to be brought over to that Religion; and that when he went beyond Sea, did not know but that he might be of that Religion before his return. That he is very censorious, and frequently casts evil aspersions against several Divines at Bristol of great note, viz. Mr. Cbetwind, Mr. Standfast, Mr. Croftman, Mr. Palmer, and others, saying, that such as went to their Lectures, were the brats of the Devil.

The ninth saith, That Mr. Thompson in his preaching inveighed bitterly against subscribing Petitions for sitting of this Parliament, saying, that it was the seed of Rebellion, and like to Forty-one; and that the Devil set them on work, and the Devil would pay them their wages; saying, that before he would set his hand to such Petitions, he would cut it off, yea and cut them off.

The tenth saith, That about two years since, being in the Chancel of St. Thomas's Church in Bristol, where Queen Elizabeth's Effigies is, Mr. Thompson pointing his finger to it, said, that she was the worst of women, and a most leud and infamous woman; upon which, this Informant replied, he never heard any speak ill of her: thereupon Mr. Thompson said, she was no better than a Church-robber, and that Hen. VIII. begun it; and that she finish'd it.

The eleventh, Rowe, saith, That in the year 1678, he waited on the Mayor to Church, and that Mr. Thompson, who was there, railed at Hen. VIII. saying, he did more hurt in robbing the Abby-lands, than he did good by the Reformation. That after dinner, Mr. Thompson comes to this Informant, and claps his hands on his shoulders, saying, Hah, boy, had Queen Elizabeth been living, you needed not to have been Sword-bearer of Bristol. The said Rowe asked him why? He replied, she loved such a lusty Rogue (so well) as he was; and he would have been very fit for her drudgery at Whiteball.

The Twelfth saith, That he heard a great noise of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompson on the 30th of January, 1679, to the second part of the same Tune; and that he was present at the same Sermon, in which Mr. Thompson said, there was a great noise of a Popish Plot, but, says he, here is nothing in it but a Presbyterian Plot; for here they are going about to petition for the sitting of the Parliament, but the end of it will be to bring the King's head to the block, as they have done his father.

The Thirteenth saith, That in January last, or thereabouts, there was a Petition going about for the sitting of this Parliament, when Mr. Thompson, in Redcliff Church, in his Sermon said, it was a feditious and rebellious Petition, and rather than he would sign it, his hand should be cut off.

The fourteenth saith, The 8th day of April, he going to pay Mr. Thompson his dues, speaking concerning the Meeters in private; Mr. Thompson said, he would haul them out, and fill the Goals with them, and hoped to see their houses a-fire about their ears in a short time; and this he the said Thompson doubled again and again.

The fifteenth saith, That about December, 1679, Mr. Thompson came to visit his mother, being sick, and discoursing of Religion, Thompson said, if he were as well satisfied of other things, as he was of justification, auricular confession, penance, extreme unction, and crism in baptism, he would not have been so long separated from the Catholick Church. And further affirmed, that the Church of Rome was the true Catholick Church. He further endeavoured to prove extreme unction, and auricular confession, as well as he could out of the Epistles. Further, he hath heard him say, the King was a person of a mean and soft temper, and could be led easily to any thing, but yet a Solomon in vices; but that the Duke of York was a Prince of a brave spirit, would be faithful to his friends, and that it was our own faults that he was a Roman Catholick, in that we forc'd him to fly into France, where he embraced that Religion. About the same time, he the said Thompson said the Church would be militant; but greatly commended the decency of solemnizing the Mafs in France; and that it was performed with much more reverence and devotion than any other Religion doth use. He further heard him say, in a Sermon, about the time of petitioning, he would rather cut off his hand than sign it, and had many bad expressions of it; that it was the seed of Rebellion, and like forty and forty-one. And further, the said Mr. Thompson at one Sandford's shop-door in Bristol, speaking of Bedloe, said, that he was not to be believed, because Bedloe had said he, meaning Mr. Thompson, was at St. Omer's, where Mr. Thompson said he was not; and that Bedloe was of a bad life, and in many Plots, and not to be credited in any thing he said. And that in another discourse he commended the Romish Clergy for their single life, and is himself so; and did at the same time vilify and rail at the English Clergy for marrying; saying, it was better for a Clergyman to be gelt than to marry; and that the Calvinists in France were lecherous fellows, and could scarce be two years a Priest without a wife. About the time, and after the Election of Sir John Knight to this Parliament, Mr. Thompson said, he was not fit to be believed, and as bad as any fanatick. He further said in the Pulpit at St. Thomas's, that after excommunication by the Bishop, without absolution from the Spiritual Court, such a one was surely damned; and he would pawn his Soul for the truth of it.

Evidence ended; Mr. Thompson after the evidence given by every particular person face to face, was asked to every one, if he had any questions to ask before they called another? Who answer'd, he should not say any thing at present. When the witnesses before-mentioned were all examined, Mr. Thompson being desired to make his defence, and declare whether he were guilty of the matters laid to his charge, did for the greatest part confess words spoken to that effect; and in other things endeavoured to turn the words with more favour towards wards himself; but the witnesses being of great credit, and many more being ready to have made good the same things, the Committee look'd upon the business to be of a high nature, and therefore ordered the matter to be reported specially; leaving it to the wisdom of the House.

The Resolution of the House of Commons, upon the said Report.

Resolved, Nemine contradicente,

THAT Richard Thompson Clerk, hath publickly detamed his sacred Majesty, preached Sedition, vilified the Reformation, promoted Popery, by asserting Popish Principles, decrying the Popish Plot, and turning the same upon the Protestants; and endeavoured to subvert the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the Rights and Privileges of Parliament; and that he is a scandal and reproach to his function.

And that the said Richard Thompson, be impeached upon the said Report and Resolution of the House. And a Committee is appointed to prepare the said Impeachment, and to receive further instructions against him; and to send for Persons, Papers, and Records.

Mercurii, 5 die Januarii 1680.

A Petition of Richard Thompson Clerk, in custody of the Serjeant at arms attending this House, was read.

Order'd, That the said Serjeant at arms be impower'd to receive sufficient security, for the forthcoming of the said Richard Thompson, to answer to the Impeachment against him.

Jan. 10. 1680. The House was prorogu'd, which put an end to the intended Impeachment.

XXXVI. The Great Case of MONOPOLIES, between the East-India Company, Plaintiffs, and Tho. Sandys, Defendant: Whether their Patent for Trading to the East-Indies, exclusive of all others, is good? 35 Car. II. 1683.

THE East-India Company having a Patent granted them of the sole Trade to the East-Indies exclusive of all others; commenced a suit against Mr. Sandys for trading thither without licence; in which case, the following Arguments were made, viz.

Mr. Holt * (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) his Argument.

The Governour and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East-Indies, against Thomas Sandys, de Term. Mich. 35 Caroli 2di, Rs. Rot. 126.

THE Defendant comes and prays Oyer of the Letters Patent, which are set forth, as we have declared and pleaded.

To this Plea the Plaintiffs have demurred. My Lord, I do conceive the general question in this case, will be this, Whether or no an action lies by the Company upon this Charter; for that the Defendant not being a member of the Company, has traded into the East-Indies without licence of the Company? My Lord, I think there may be two questions made in this case, first, whether or no this Grant of the King to the Company, to have the sole trade to the Indies, exclusive of all others his Subjects, whether that be a good Grant. Secondly, Supposing it to be a good Grant, yet whether or no it does rest such an interest, liberty or franchise in the Company, that an action may be brought and maintained by them against any person trading to the East-Indies; who is not qualified by this Charter. My Lord, for the first, I do humbly conceive that this Charter granted to the Company to have the sole trade to the Indies exclusive of all others is a good Grant; and my Lord I shall endeavour to make it appear to be a good Grant from these considerations. First, my Lord, from the consideration of the persons that are to be traded withal, and they are Infidels, and not Christians. Secondly, my Lord, from the consideration of Foreign Trade itself, how and in what nature by Law, it may be restrained by the King's royal Power. And

* The Six following Arguments in this Great Case, were copied from the MSS. of Samuel Pepys, Esq; (Secretary to the Admiralty) in Magdalen College Cambridge. These Arguments are of great concern to the Publick in general, and to every individual Man in this Kingdom, either immediately or by consequences, since Trade is the Life of a Nation; and must be of great Service to the Professors of the Law, to shew on what grounds and reasons the Case was adjudg'd. And the Proceedings on the Quo Warranto in State-Trials, Vol. 4. P. 769. having been found useful to the gentlemen of the Law, is the reason why these Arguments; (tho' not so properly a Trial) spoke by some of the greatest Men that ever appear'd at the Bar, are here inserted.

The Arguments of Holt, Treby, Finch, Pollexfen, and Sawyer, are very briefly abridg'd in Skinner's Reports. But the Arguments of Mr. Williams, and the Lord Chief Justice Jeffries, are not mentioned there.

And in the third place consider the circumstances and particulars of this Grant made to the Company in this case.

My Lord, for the first, that does relate to the persons to be traded with, they being Infidels and not Christians; I do conceive that by the law of the land, no subject of England can trade with Infidels, without licence from the King; or at least it is in the power of the King to prohibit it, and for this very reason, because Infidels are by the Law taken notice of, and the Law hath adjudged them to be perpetual enemies: the Law hath set a mark upon them, and they are used as all other enemies are. And so, 7 Rep. 17. 6. the express words of my Lord Coke are in Calvin's case; says he, Infidels, are perpetual enemies. Reg. 282. That sets forth the Writ of Protection, that was given to the Prior and Brothers of the Hospital of St. John at Jerusalem, that it was used for the defence of the Church, contra Christi & omnium Christianorum inimicos, 12 H. VIII. 4. If a man do beat a man outlawed, a Traitor, or a Pagan; and they bring an action, he may plead his being a Pagan; and in abatement of his action: I mention this my Lord, to shew what opinion the Law has of these people, judging of them to be enemies as they are Infidels; and for that reason has excluded them from the benefit of the Law, and the common Justice the Nation affords: and from that it may be inferred, that since the Law hath excluded them from common Justice, surely the Law will not allow an intercourse or intimate correspondence with such persons to the subjects of England. And, my Lord, this is grounded upon the care that the Government hath, or ought to have by the constitution of the Government itself of the Christian Religion, which I conceive is the main end of Government. The profession and preservation of Christianity is of so high a nature, that of itself it supercedes all Law: if any Law be made against any point of the Christian Religion, that Law is ipso facto void. Why? Because it is made against the prime and original end of Government. If the King conquer a Christian country, their Law continues till it be altered by the King; but if he conquers a Pagan country, the Law ceases ipso facto to be Law; for the Law of Infidels is contrary and repugnant to the Christian Religion. Why then if the Christian Religion have the prevalence in Christian countries, there must be some means provided by the Law, whereby the King may have a power to preserve it: and there is nothing more dangerous to the right Religion, than for the professors of that Religion to have commerce with Pagans; we read how the Children of Israel were perverted from the true Religion, by converse with the Nations round about them, in the book of Judges.

And Grotius de bello & pace Lib. 2. Chap 15. Parag. 11. says, Cavendum est enim ne nimia commixturatio contagium adferat infirmis, quomobrem utile erit, Sedes distingui sicut Israelitæ seorsim ab Ægyptiis habitaverunt.

The Government is to take care that there is not an infection, by correspondence with Infidels; my Lord, 'tis not to be doubted but that the King is to have a care of the Christian Religion. In old times of Popery, Brañon, Lib. 2. Ch. 24. the King of England, says he, is Dei Minister & Vicarius; & 5. ch. Brañon, Jus publicum est quod ad Statum.

This is looked upon to be part of the Jus publicum, the care of Religion and sacred things, and the propagation thereof; why then, my Lord, if this be true, then 'tis lawful for the King to take care and use his Royal Authority, to prevent all his subjects from being perverted. My Lord, I think 'tis plain by the Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, that says the King may prohibit any person from going beyond Sea. Why? for the defence of the Realm; that is a sufficient reason, it is not in the power of the party to litigate it with the King, but he must submit. Now always Religion is first to be regarded; secondly, the defence of the Kingdom; and thirdly, the Trade thereof. Now, My Lord, the subjects of a Christian Prince going to trade with Infidels, being in their company, that may be dangerous to the State and Religion; so that it must necessarily be in the power of the King to controul it. Hob. 217. Curteon's case, it was adjudged that an Information did lie at the Common Law, before any Statute, against any persons that should transport Coin, because 'tis against the Policy and State of Government, that money should be transported; now if it be against the Policy of state to trade with Infidels, by the same reason that ought to be restrained. In the next place, I will consider foreign trade, and whether the subjects of England have right to such a foreign trade, that they can ad libitum trade without any controul; and I conceive they have not.

First, My Lord, I conceive that the liberty and right of a foreign trade, depends upon agreement and contract with foreign Princes, in whose country the trade is; and if so be it do depend upon agreement and amity with the Prince; then have not the subjects of England such an uncontrollable right, of trading, because it depends upon the accidents of Peace and War; which, if there were such a right, it could not. 30. ch. Magna Charta, omnes Mercatores, nisi publice antea prohibiti fuerunt, habebant saluum & securum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, & marari & ire per Angliam præterquam in tempore guerre. Then he goes on further, if there happen to be War with a foreign Prince, and the Kingdom of England, and the Merchants of that Country be found in England; this shews that War is an interruption of the Commerce. 12 H. 7. ch. 6. my Lord, that Statute recites, that the Merchants-Adventurers inhabiting within the city of London, and divers parts of England, had free passage, &c. into divers parts of Spain and other places, that were in league and amity with our Kingdom and Sovereign; so that it appears that league and amity is the foundation of Commerce.

Selden, in his Mare clausum, says the rights of trades are founded on the covenants of Princes; what is the reason? lest the manners and morals of the people should be corrupted by the example of foreign Nations. My Lord, 2 Rolls Abr. 214. mentions the Parliament-roll of 1 H. 5. wherein it is said, that the Commons did petition the King that the Merchants of England, paying their customs and other duties, might have liberty to export their goods to any place or country, notwithstanding any proclamation to the contrary: and the King says he will be advised, he would advise with his Council. My Lord, from that time to this it appears that there was no complaint of the King's proclamation as illegal, that did prohibit their trade; but they only pray that he would make an alteration of the Law. But there were several proclamations at that time to restrain the subject from trading with foreigners, (therefore they desire he would consent they might trade;) but the King in that case case did think fit to part with his power, but gives the usual answer in such cases. My Lord, in the next place it is necessary, for the King to have power to restrain a foreign trade; because a foreign trade, as the case may be, may be very inconvenient and mischievous: for 'tis well known, that if so be the importation of foreign Commodities do exceed the exportation of domestick, that trade is rather a grievance than a benefit; so 'tis said, 2 Inst. 325. And, my Lord, there has been sufficient appearance of this matter of late days.

My Lord, the importation of Irish cattle, by the 18th of this King, chap. 2. was declared to be a nuisance. So the 29th of King Charles I. the importation of French Commodities; why this, my Lord, is declared, the Statute does not enact it, but declares it to be in itself a common nuisance: why now, if so be a trade come to be a nuisance, that it is rather hurtful than advantageous; the King by virtue of his prerogative is to defend the Nation, and protect his Subjects from these evils, he has a power to restrain these evils; especially when we have the judgment of the Parliament, by whom these things have been declared to be nuisances 10 Rep. 141. In the case of the Isle of Ely, the first Statute that was made concerning Sewers, was in H. VI.'s time; there was a question, that since there was a thing so necessary as the taking care of the Inundation with remedy there before any Statute, says the book, the King by his prerogative, as the fountain of Justice, might take care of it, tho' there was no Statute then. My Lord, when foreign commodities come to be an annoyance to the people, the Law must be defective, if the King had not a power to restrain them. But in this case here 'tis only a regulation of Trade, a grant of it to the Company; and 'tis only specified how they shall manage that Trade, to the intent all people might trade under the government as they ought to do: and, I think, my Lord, it is well known, that if this Company had not settled and established a Trade in the Indies, Mr. Sandys, nor none of these Gentlemen could have had an opportunity to do it. And if they have liberty to interfere with the Company, they would ruin the Company, and they themselves could not trade; but I know what objections will be made against me, even by the Defendants Plea. My Lord, that 18 E. III. cb. 3. to-wit, that the Sea shall be open to all Merchants to part with their Merchandize where they please; which, with submission to your Lordships, cannot be taken so universally as they themselves would have it. For if you will take the words to be so large, without any manner of restraint, you will make this Statute to give liberty of trade to the King's enemies, for they are Merchants. But, my Lord, the next answer I give to it, is this; I conceive the true meaning of the Statute is, that the Sea should be open without paying any extraordinary duties, but what might justly be imposed: that is, that none should pay any duty or custom for Navigation, but only the due custom, that is, when they come into Port. And so I must compare that Statute with Magna Charta, 30 cb. omnes Mercatores nisi publice antea prohibiti fuerint, babeant saluum & securum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, &c. sine malis soluetis; so that they have liberty allowed in this case to trade without unlawful exactions. But, my Lord, in the third place, supposing this Statute to be taken as general, as I know the other side endeavours it should, yet it cannot extend to this case; for I think they can hardly make it out, that at that time there was any trade drove with Infidels, but the trade was drove with Christians: why now, if there was not such a trade had at the making of that Statute, we must not extend the Law to this case, which differs from the reason of trade in other cases. That there was none, I think appears plainly by History; Hollingshead's History of England, 163, whereas, says he, in times past, the chief trade was in Holland, Portugal, &c. now, says he, men not being content with those journeys, they have sought out the East and West-Indies, and have made now and then suspicious Voyages. And it appears by the Statute of H. VII. that I mentioned before, that the ancient trade of England consisted with near Countries, and so the trade was at the time of the making of this Statute.

My Lord, I do observe as to the Case I reported before, when the Commons did petition the King, that they might have liberty to trade notwithstanding any proclamation; Rolls Abr. 214. they were not of an opinion at that time, that this Statute did extend to Merchants, to give them liberty to trade every where at their will and pleasure; if they had, they would have insisted upon it, and urged it to the King, that whereas there was a Statute gave them free liberty, therefore desire the law might be observed: but they do not deny, no they tacitly acknowledge the King had such a power.

My Lord, it does appear what the ancient trade of England was by the Customs; for at the Common Law there was no Custom but in three things, Wool, Woolfell and Leather; these are the Customs that were due to the King by Common Law: indeed, there was foreign Custom, but that was for a foreign commodity, and was prize; Dyer 165. 2 Inst. 52, & 43. Davies, Rep. 8.

Now, my Lord, if so be the trade of the Nation had consisted of other commodities, it may be supposed, there would have been custom paid for them afterward's; in Ed. III.'s time, when new Trades were introduced, we find Acts of Parliament made for raising new Custom; therefore since no Custom was paid, but these ancient Customs, we may suppose the trade of the Nation mostly consisted of those commodities. Fitzherbert, nat. br. 85. Dyer 165. Merchants as well as others may be prohibited from going out of the land, or any person whatsoever; and Davies, Rep. fol. 9. b. gives one reason why the King did permit the Merchants to trade, when it was in his power by Writ of Ne exeat Regnum, or a proclamation, to put a stop to them.

My Lord, in many cases, when the doing of an Act may be to the publick detriment, the King hath power to restrain it, and it cannot be done without the King's licence: Co. Litt. fol. 5. a Subject can't build a Castle, or other Fortress defensible, without licence of the King; why? because it may be dangerous. Why then should a Subject trade with an Infidel Country, without licence from the King? for by trading with Infidels they indanger their Religion. And therefore, as it requires licence to build a Castle, tho' a man otherwise might lawfully do it upon his own ground; so for the same reason does it to trade with Infidels, 9 Rep. 87. b. 2 Inst. 199. A man cannot inclose his ground to make a Park without licence of the King; in that case he takes nothing from any body, but such inclosing and turning profitable ground into a place of pleasure, may be of publick consequence, and therefore cannot be done without the King's licence, 11 H. VII. 23. If two men play at sword and buckler, and one kill the other, that is felony. But if they play with licence of the King, that is not felony; so that the King hath power to prohibit, and by his command make that unlawful, that otherwise would be lawful. For the King may command a man, by his Writ, to stay in the Kingdom, and if he go contrary to the King's Writ or Proclamation, in that case the King may seize all his Lands for the contempt, as in the case of Sir Francis Inglefield: so that as the King may govern the trade of the Nation in regard it may be mischievous, the King may hinder it, when it will be apparently mischievous.

In the third place, I shall consider the Grant; and the Grant hath these things in it. 'Tis a Grant to a Company, that they and their children shall trade to the Indies, notwithstanding any statute or diversity of Faith or Religion; and that they should have the sole commerce and trade there. There is a prohibition to any of the King's subjects to trade there without licence. Now, my Lord, this Grant I take to be good; for, my Lord, tho' it may not in itself be lawful without the King's licence, yet it is in the power of the King to make it so. And for this reason can the King make an alien a denizen.

The reason of the Law, why an Alien is incapable to purchase lands here, is because 'tis against the policy of the Land for to suffer a Foreigner to come into England and enrich himself with the lands and goods of the Kingdom, yet the King may cure this incapacity; but notwithstanding he be made a Denizen, yet does he remain an Alien still, and subject to that Prince from whence he came; Dyer, 3 ch. B. So that notwithstanding it may be dangerous for an Alien to have land, yet the King is entrusted with it, and he may give this Alien liberty to purchase land.

My Lord, it is, as I have observed, unlawful to transport the Coin of England; yet the King may give leave to transport Coin, as there is a precedent 5 Car. I. of a licence to transport 10,000 l. So, my Lord, for the trading with Infidels, tho' in itself it's against the policy of the Government; that is, for the subject to have an uncontrollable liberty to trade at their pleasure; yet the King, who is entrusted with the administration of the Government, may give authority to do it. And there is a great deal of difference between trading in a Company, and trading out of a Company: if they trade in a Company, they trade under the Government of England; if they trade out of a Company, then they trade out of the Government of England, and out of its protection. This Company is incorporated and made to have the government of this trade; they being Christians, no question, are to take care of the Christian Religion; and to take care that their Agents and Factors that trade under this constitution, keep up to that Religion they profess; but certainly it is quite another thing when people trade of their own head, there they converse only with Infidels, they cannot have Divine Offices.

My Lord, it has been objected, Oh, but say they, if the King give a licence to some, tho' they cannot do it without the King's licence, yet the King having dispensed with this Law, this dispensation shall have an universal influence, and give licence to others.

My Lord, it seems to me a very strange inference; they acknowledge that make this objection, that without the King's licence, beyond what it is, where the King hath qualified his Grant solely to the Company and their Factors, they would have it extend to all the people of England. I think 'tis the first time that ever the King's licence, or authority that he gives, should be extended beyond itself. But, my Lord, the great objection will be, that this is a Monopoly, and therefore the Grant is void in Law; with submission, I think, it is none, and I hope I have said something already to prove it to be none, and it does not come within the definition of a Monopoly, 3 Instit. 181. A Monopoly is an institution or allowance of the King, by his Grant, Commission or otherwise, to any person or persons bodies politick or corporate, of or for the sole buying, selling, making, working or using of any thing; whereby any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade: restrained of the freedom they had before, that I think they cannot make out, that they ever had any such freedom. They cannot make out that they were in possession of this trade before, therefore this Charter does not restrain them of any freedom they had; then say they, it hinders others lawful trade.

My Lord, I have made it appear, that the trading with Infidels without licence of the King is not a lawful trade. But to go further, tho' the proof lies on their side, they having the affirmation; yet I hope to give such evidence, as is even as much as can be expected in any case. In the 43d of Queen Elizabeth, a Parliament was sitting at Westminster, and at that very time there was a Charter granted to this Company; and a Charter that had these very words, of having the sole trade exclusive of others; and there had been another Charter granted before of having the sole trade, 27th of the Queen. Now in this Parliament, 43d of the said Queen, the Parliament fell very vigorously against Monopolies, and brought in a great catalogue of them. But, my Lord, I do observe, that in all the catalogue, and in all the debates of Parliament at that time, there's not one word mentioned of the East-India Company's Charter, neither of the Charter of the 27th of the Queen, nor of the Charter of that very Parliament. Nay, there is not so much as mention made of the Charter granted to any other Company. My Lord, I have this from a Book that is lately come out, Townshend's Collection of Proceedings in Parliament, 244, 245. there is the whole catalogue of Monopolies, and the full debate of them; but as for any Charters of Corporations, tho' there were many at that time, there is not the least complaint.

My Lord, between the 43d of the Queen, and the 20th of King James, is about twenty-three years; in the 43d of the Queen, the discourse of Monopolies first began in Parliament; and they were considering, it may be supposed, all this time, how to settle the matter of Monopolies, and to declare what were Monopolies. And after all this long consideration, and so great an agitation as it had, they came to make the Statute of 21 Jac. which seems to be a settling and bounding the prerogative of the Crown, and right of the subject; it does condemn Monopolies, and has these words, all Monopolies, and all commissions for the sole buying, &c. or using of any thing within the King's Dominions, why that is condemned. But, my Lord, it does appear that the Parliament were so far from condemning the Charter of this Company, or the Charter of any other Company, that there is an exprefs proviso that the Statute of Monopolies should not extend to any Company for the ordering or managing of trade, tho' I think the words of the Statute did not reach this case, yet they were so careful, that they would have a proviso to save this and all other Companies. And, my Lord, there is a Statute 3 Jac. cap. 6. by the preamble of which Statute, it appears that the King had granted a Charter to divers Merchants to be a Company, and to have the sole trade into Spain and Portugal, excluding all others, that were not members. The Statute recites the mischief of liberty to all the King's subjects to trade there: I observe, the Parliament did not condemn the Charter to be unlawful; but took it to be good, and that nothing less than an Act of Parliament could restore the liberty of trade to the subjects against the Charter; for they do say, notwithstanding the Charter had given the sole right of trade to the Company, yet it should be lawful for all people to trade there; notwithstanding that Charter. Now, my Lord, I do think, that practice and usage is a great evidence of the Law: I shall show your Lordship some precedents of some Charters, that have been granted to persons of a sole trade exclusive of others. 6 Feb. 26 Eliz. she granted to Abraham Gilbert and his associates the sole trade to China, prohibiting others 6 March, 27 Eliz. there is a Patent to Sir Walter Raleigh to discover new Countries that were heathenish and under Infidels. 11 Sept. 23 of her Reign, there was a Patent to divers Turky-Merchants to have the sole trade to Turky, excluding all others. 1st of Jan. 34th of the Queen, a Charter granted to the Turky-Company. 5 July, 27th of the Queen, there were Letters Patents granted to certain Noblemen and Gentlemen to trade into Barbary, and that during twelve years none should trade there, but they, their Agents and Assigns. 30 Eliz. a Patent made to the Merchants of Exeter, to have the sole trade to the Rivers of Exe and Ouse in Guinea. 14th of the Queen, another Patent to Gregory and Pope, to have the sole trade to Guinea. My Lord, all these I have now quoted, I have caused to be examined on the Rolls, and are to be found there. 2. Brownlow 296. there it was held by my Lord Coke, that no subject ought to trade to an Infidel Country without licence of the King, for fear of being perverted from the Christian Religion; this my Lord Coke says, and he says he had seen an ancient precedent of a licence. More 675, Darcy and Allen. Justice Dodderidge (that I think was only then Serjeant) argues against the Patent, but he did agree that a Grant to a Company to have the sole trade with Infidels is a good Grant, and the King by his prerogative might restrain his subjects from it: he admits a Patent for sole Printing was good; why, because the publick was concerned. My Lord, the Parliament of late time have been so far from looking upon the East-India Company to be a Monopoly, that they have declared it to be for the good of the Kingdom; 14th of this King, chap. 24. in the preamble 'tis recited.

Now, my Lord, I hope I have made good, that the King has this power both by precedents, by authorities, and opinions of Lawyers; and also the judgment and the opinion of the Parliament: And that it was never condemned, and so I conclude this first point. The second point, my Lord, in the next place, which I shall be very short upon, for that it will be consequential to what I have endeavoured to prove before; that is, supposing it to be a good Grant, whether if any person do trade to the damage of the Company, 'tis a good ground for an action.

First, I do think the Company have, and 'tis very plain they have an inheritance, and 'tis a franchise and liberty they could not have, unless they had the King's Grant, and others excluded from it; then it does agree with all the cases of this nature; wherever the King grants a franchise to one, and another person violates the franchise, the King's Patentee may have an action of the case, against the person that does interfere or violate the franchise. 22 H. VI. 14. 11 H. IV. 47. supposing the King grant a man a Fair or Market, if any man set up another Fair or Market, tho' with the licence of the King, yet he that has the Grant shall have an action. Now the East-India Company are to be at great charges, nay there is a trust reposed in them, that they shall trade, and carry on this trade for the good of the Company; so that they are put into a trade, and are obliged to carry it on. The Defendant hath no right; if they have a right, they shall have a remedy against any that invade it. And for these reasons

I pray your Judgment for the Plaintiffs.

Sir George Treby, (afterwards Lord Chief-Justice) his Argument.

The Governor, and Company of Merchants of London, trading into the East-Indies, against Thomas Sandys. Trin. 35 Caroli Secundi Reg. Rot. 126.

May it please your Lordship,

I Am of Counsel in this case with Thomas Sandys the Defendant. The Case arises upon a Charter set forth by the Plaintiffs, and a Statute pleaded by us; and it is as Mr. Holt has opened it. Only I shall, for my purpose, open it a little more than he did.

It is a special action on the case, declarative; wherein the Plaintiffs declare, that King Charles II. our present King, by his Letters Patents, bearing date the 3d of April, in the 13th year of his reign, reciting, that the Governor and Company of merchants trading into the East-Indies, had been of long time a corporation, and enjoyed divers liberties, privileges and immunities, by virtue of divers Letters Patents and Charters, granted to them by Q. Elizabeth, and K. James; and the King being informed, that divers disorders and inconveniences were then lately committed, to the great prejudice of the said company, and interruption of their trade: Whereupon they had humbly besought the King, to grant and confirm their said Charter, with some alterations and additions, tending to the advancement and benefit of their trade.

The King gives and grants to them, that they shall be a corporation perpetual, to have succession and capacity, &c. And further willed and granted, that they, and every one that was, or should be of the company; and their sons at their several ages of 21; and their apprentices, factors, and servants employed by them, might, and should freely traffick, and use the trade of merchandize by sea, by such ways and passages then found and discovered, as they should think fittest, into, and from the East-Indies; and into, and from the Islands, Ports, Havens, Cities, Creeks, Towns and Places of Asia, Africa, or America, or any of them, beyond the cape of Bona Esperanza, to the freights of Magellan; as by the Court of the Company shall from time to time be limited and agreed; without any molestation, impeachment or disturbance, any statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other cause or matter whatsoever notwithstanding, so always the same trade be not undertaken, or addressed, to any Country, Island, Port, Haven, City, Creek, Town, or Place, already in the lawful and actual possession of any such christian Prince or State, as at this present is, or at any time hereafter shall be in league or amity with the King, his heirs or successors, and who doth not, or will not accept of such trade.

And further grants, That they and their successors, and their factors, servants, and assignees, in the trade of merchandize for them, and in their behalf, shall for ever hereafter have, use and enjoy, the whole, entire and only trade and traffick, and the whole, entire, and only liberty, use and privilege of trading and trafficking, and using the feat and trade of merchandizing, to and from the said East-Indies; and to and from all the Islands, Ports, Havens, Cities, Towns and Places aforesaid.

And further grants to them, That the said East-Indies, or the Islands, &c. shall not be visited, frequented or haunted by any of his subjects, during the time that these Letters Patents remain in force, contrary to the true meaning of the said Letters Patents, and the virtue of the prerogative royal. Charging also and commanding, and prohibiting all other subjects, that none of them visit, haunt, frequent, or trade, traffick or adventure by way of merchandizing into or from any part of the said East-Indies, &c. unless it be by and with the licence and agreement of the Company, in writing first had and obtained under the common seal.

Here the declaration makes a break, or stop, and so it would seem as if the restraint and prohibition were absolute and general; but upon Oyer prayed of the Letters Patents, they being set forth in hac verba, it appears to be, sub modo, under the following penalty, viz. Upon pain that every such other person or persons, that shall trade to or from the East-Indies, shall incur the King's indignation, and forfeiture and loss of the goods, merchandizes, and other things whatsoever, which so shall be brought into this Realm of England, or any the dominions of the same. As also the Ship and Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein such goods, merchandizes and other things, shall be brought or found, the one half of all the said forfeitures to be to the King, his heirs and successors; the other half to the Company. And further, all and every the said offenders, for the said contempt, to suffer imprisonment during the King's pleasure; and such other punishments as to the King, his heirs and successors, for so high a contempt, shall seem meet and convenient; and not to be in any wise delivered, until they and every of them shall become bound to the Governor, in the sum of 1000 l. at least; at no time then after to sail or traffick into any part of the said East-Indies, &c. And further grants, That the Company may grant and give licence under the common seal, to any persons to sail and traffick to the East-Indies; and that the King, his heirs and successors, will not, during the Letters Patents, give licence to any person to sail or trade there.

By virtue of which Letters Patents they alledge they have been, and are a corporation; and have had, established and managed, and do still manage a great trade of merchandize to the said East-Indies, with the inhabitants there; who at the time of making the said Letters Patents, or since, were not christians, nor subjects to any christian Prince or State; but were, and are infidels, and enemies of the christian faith; and have spent and laid out many and great sums of money on that occasion.

And further say, that the commerce and trade aforesaid cannot be established, managed or carried on but per hujusmodi Corpus Corporatum, by such a Corporation; and that they ought to have and enjoy the sole trade there, according to the form and effect of the said Letters Patents.

But the said Thomas Sandys being a subject of the King, and no member of the Company, nor son, apprentice, factor, servant, or assignee, sufficiently knowing the premises, and designing to prejudice the Company, contrary to the form and effect of the said Letters Patents, after the making the same, and after the Company had settled their trade, 19 Jan. 34 Reg. did trade into the East-Indies, within the Parts, Regions, and Places above-specified, beyond the promontory of Good-Hope, on this side the Streight of Magellan aforesaid, in certain Ports and Places, called Atcheon, Mechlopotan, and Porta Nova, with a certain Ship, called the Expectation, without the licence, and against the will of the Governor and Company, and to the prejudice, impoverishment, and manifest grievance, and against the form and effect of the said Letters Patents; to the damage of the plaintiffs 1000 l.

The defendant prays Oyer of the Letters Patents; whereupon they are set forth in hac verba.

And thereupon the defendant pleads the Statute, 18 Ed. 3. Cap. 3. whereby 'tis enacted, That the Sea be open to all manner of merchants, to pass with their merchandize where it shall please them.

Upon this the plaintiffs demur.

My Lord, I shall not differ with Mr. Holt in the state of the controversy, but make the same two points, viz. 1. Whether this Patent, as it purports an exclusion of all other subjects from this trade, be good or void? 2. Whether here be an apt suit brought?

In the first place, I shall not question but the Patent is good, to make these persons a corporation, and all the privileges and benefits they can derive from being a body corporate, they may enjoy, and apply them to trade if they will. Yet as to this particular, I shall observe thus much, that when such Charters of incorporation were first taken notice of in Q. Elizabeth's and K. James's time, they did not escape the censure of learned men, who foresaw the ill use of them. Co. Mag. Char. 540. Three things which have fair pretences are mischievous, 1. New Courts; 2. New Offices; 3. New Corporations trading into foreign Parts, or at home; which under the fair pretence of order and government, in conclusion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies.

1. Rolls Rep. 226. Justice Dodderidge says, these things would overthrow the Realm.

In this argument I am sensible I am to speak of a tender point, the King's Prerogative: But I shall treat it with that regard and deference that I ought, and as our Books teach us.

The prerogative is great; but it has this general and just limitation, That nothing is to be done thereby that is mischievous or injurious to the subject.

Finch's Law, 81, 83, 84. speaks highly of it, as a matter divine. The King (says he) carries God's Stamp, and has the shadow of God's excellencies given him; the power of God is always joined with justice; for to do wrong, is not omnipotence, but weakness. So it is with the King; he can be no wrong-doer, he is all justice; therefore he has a prerogative in all things that are not injurious to the subject, as he may create Corporations, &c. (says he). And so say I, he may create Corporations, and this Corporation; but for the same reason, he cannot add a restraint to all other subjects from exercising this trade.

I shall lay for my foundation, that this Patent, as to restraining the trade, and excluding all other subjects, has the nature of a Monopoly, and is therefore void in that particular.

Mr. Holt and I are agreed on the description of a Monopoly, which is made by my Lord Coke, Pla. Coron. 181, viz. an Institution by the King, by his grant, commission, or otherwise, to any person, or corporations, of or for the sole buying, selling, making, working or using of any thing, whereby any persons or corporations are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade.

And the like description is made in the preamble of the Act concerning Monopolies, 21 Jac. cap. 3. where it is also declared, That all grants of Monopolies, and all other matters or things whatsoever, any way tending to the instituting, erecting, strengthening, furthering or countenancing of the same, are altogether contrary to the laws of this Realm, and utterly void, and of no effect; and in no wise to be put in use or execution.

If therefore this trade to the East-Indies be a lawful trade, then this Patent for the restraining it, must be a Monopoly. The nature of a Monopoly consists in restraining a common right; it appropriates to one, or a few, what others had the lawful use of before.

I confess, I did a little wonder to hear merchandizing to the East-Indies objected against as an unlawful trade, and did not expect so much divinity in the argument; but to that I shall endeavour to answer by and by.

Generally speaking, merchandizing was always reckoned a lawful trade; every man might use the sea, and trade with other Nations, as freely as he might use the air.

And for this trade to the East-Indies, it was lawfully used before there was a Company, or else there had never been a Company. This trade has been long, but this Company is made by these Letters Patents 22 years ago.

This is not distinguished, nor distinguishable from the reasons and rules laid down in the other cases of Monopolies.

I shall chiefly insist upon two cases in one book, Coke 11 Rep. the Taylor of Ipswich his case, fol. 53. VOL. VII.

and Darcy and Allen's case, called the case of Monopolies, fol. 86. It is the main ground of both those cases that at Common-Law no man could be prohibited to exercise his trade, for that is an avoidance of Idleness, it helps to provide sustenance for a man and his family; and 'tis a service to the King; and the consequences of restraining trade are pernicious, as raising prices of commodities and impoverishing men, bad commodities, &c.

Now that foreign trade was understood to be comprehended under this general resolution, I desire your Lordship to look upon the report of the Taylor of Ipswich's case, in 1 Rolls rep. 4. where it is said, that no trade of Merchandize can be hindered by Patent, and a Charter to hinder trade at Sea is void; as that a hundred men shall have the sole trade or the like.

The King's prerogative cannot make this good; it is not lawful for a man to restrain himself from his trade, 5 Moor 242. 2 Leon. 210. a bond not to use his trade of a Dyer or a Smith is void, so a bond not to plough his land.

And so a bond that a man shall not go out of his house, for a man must serve the King, and do his duty with his liberty and his labour; and if Merchants and Mariners should enter into a bond or a covenant not to trade, or not to trade to the East-Indies, it were void. And if it be unlawful for a man to restrain himself from it, the King cannot restrain him.

Another reason is, the King cannot by his Letters Patents take away the subjects property, and I do not know a greater property than freedom of trade and labour; the King cannot take away six-pence that a man has got by his trade, much less can he take away his whole trade: if the profit which a man gets by his trade be his own, the liberty whereby he acquires it is his own; otherwise the whole property of Traders were precarious.

Mr. Holt would expound the Statutes that are pleaded, to signify that the King shall not lay an imposition upon Merchandize, though that be not the true meaning of the Statute, yet even that were sufficient for our purpose, and will prove that the King cannot totally prohibit a man to trade; for if he can prohibit absolutely, he can prohibit sub modo, and require that none shall trade unless they pay so much and so much for licence; and so by that means he might lay that imposition, which, it is agreed he cannot.

In Darcy's Patent there was a rent of a hundred marks per annum, reserved to the Queen; and they that drew, and they that argued that Patent, supposing the Grant of the sole trade to have been good, made no doubt of the consequence, that the reservation was good.

It is truly said by my Lord Coke, Co. Mag. Cha. 47, & 63. that all Monopolies concerning trade and traffick, are against the Common-Law, and divers Statutes; and tis as truly said by him, Co. Placita Corona. 182. that though these Monopolies were ever without Law, yet they were never without friends.

Several attempts have been made for them, Mr. Holt has cited some; for the most part, they lurked private, sometimes they have appeared in Courts of Justice, but there they have always been disappointed.

Rot. Parl. 50 Ed. III. nu. 33. It appears there had been a Patent granted to one Peasby, for the sole selling sweet Wine in London: this concerned a thing thing of delicacy, and was a matter of small moment then; yet the Patent was brought into Parliament, and adjudged void, and the party punished.

Co. Mag. Charta 61. and Pla. Cor. 182. A Patent granted by Philip and Mary (in respect of Philip's landing there) that all Malmseys should be imported at Southampton, and not elsewhere, adjudged void. 14 H. VIII. was the College of Physicians erected by Letters Patents; wherein there was a clause, that none without their allowance, should practice Physick in, or within seven Miles compass of London. Coke's 8. Rep. p. 114. Dr. Benham's case; but they were well adviced that that clause in the Letters Patents was void. And therefore 16 H. VIII. they procured an Act of Parliament to make good their Letters Patents; and the very reason of making that Act, was to give that force to that restraint, which could not be by the Letters Patents only.

151b Jacobi, was granted a Patent for sole printing of Law-books, the validity of which happen'd to come in question in 1668, in Chancery; between the Patentees and some Booksellers, who had acquired copies of Law-books to be printed, and it was referred to all the Judges.

Many specious reasons were given to maintain it; as; that the Invention of Printing was new, that it concerned the State, and was matter of publick care; that it was in the nature of a proclamation, and none could make proclamations but the King. That the King had the making of Serjeants and Officers, and Judges of Law; that they were printed in a particular language and character, with abbreviations, &c. But it was the opinion of all the Judges, certified to my Lord-Keeper, that those persons who had acquir'd Copies since the Patent, could not be restrain'd by the Patent from printing them.

Lord Chief-Justice. It received another Judgment in the House of Lords;

Sir George Treby. Not this case, my Lord.

But besides the Common-Law, our point is most strongly establish'd by particular Statutes, and it has been the wisdom and care of Princes and Parliaments in all times to assert this freedom of trade.

Magna Charta, cap. 30. All Merchants (if they were not openly prohibited before) shall have their safe and sure conduct to depart, come and tarry, to buy and sell without any manner of evil toll, by the old and rightful customs, except in time of War.

It is true, as Mr. Holt says, that this provides against Mala soluta, but 'tis plain too, that it establishes their liberty of trading, and coming and going with their Merchandize.

My Lord Coke says, indeed, that this respects Aliens only, but more strongly proves that the English had this liberty; for they would never have extended it to Aliens, and have left the English without it.

From this exception (nisi antea publice probiti fuerint) it cannot be inferred that the King may restrain his subjects from trade; for my Lord Coke in his Comment. fol. 57. says, that this prohibition must be intended by Act of Parliament, for that it concerns the whole Realm, and is implied by the word publicè.

Besides that this prohibition must relate to Aliens only, and that likely in respect of War too.

Subsequent Statutes make it most clear, 2 Ed. III. cap. 9. Merchants Strangers shall go and come with their Merchandize. 6 Ed. III. (Stat. 1.) cap. 1. all Merchants, Strangers and others, may freely buy and sell their commodities, from whence soever they come, without interruption; notwithstanding Charters or Usage to the contrary. Which Charters and Usage (if any be) the King, Lords and Commons hold to be of no force, as being to the damage of the King and his great Men, and the oppression of the Commons.

14 Ed. III. (Stat. 2.) cap. 2. All Merchants, Aliens, Denizens and Foreigners (except those which be of enmity) may without let, come with their Merchandize, tarry and return.

25 Edw. III. (Stat. 4.) cap. 2. If any Charter, Proclamation, Command, Usage, Allowance or Judgment be made to the contrary, it shall be void.

28 Ed. III. (Stat. 1.) cap. 2. establishes the like freedom, as in the time of that King's Progenitors, and there is used the word English Merchants, as in other Statutes the word Denizens.

I observe that it was then look'd upon as an ancient right, it having been in the time of his Progenitors.

2 R. II. cap. 1. 11 R. II. cap. 7. and 16 R. II. cap. 1. are to the like purpose.

When there has been occasion to prohibit any Merchandize, it has been done by Acts of Parliament.

27 H. VI. cap. 1. confirmed 28 H. VI. cap. 1. prohibits Merchandize, growing or wrought within the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy, and the like, 4 E. IV. cap. 5. till that Duke revoked his Proclamation concerning our cloths.

3 E. 4. cap. 4. Forbids importing woollen caps, cloths, laces, &c. and many other Statutes of like nature; whereof some in his present Majesty's reign, as concerning Irish cattle, French goods, and concerning our Foreign Plantations: all which were vain and needles, if the King alone could have restrained the same.

26 H. VIII. cap. 10. Gives power to the King during his life, to restrain or set at liberty traffick beyond Sea for certain Countries. Now Henry the VIIIth, as my Lord Coke (Inst. co. 361.) observes, stood as high upon his prerogative, as ever any King had done; and would never have accepted his power from a Grant of Parliament, if he had had a prerogative of this nature before.

35 Eliz. cap. 7. It is enacted that the Queen may prohibit transporting of corn, by proclamation; and so it is 1 Jac. cap. 25. which shews that a proclamation, which is an Act of Prerogative, was not sufficient for the purpose, without the authority that was derived upon it from the Acts of Parliament.

My Lord, I shall now answer Mr. Holt's Arguments and Allegations.

First, He says, that by the Law of the land, no subject can trade with Infidels without the King's licence.

But I say this is gratis dictum, and I must deny the Law to be so. He cannot find any Statute, Judgment or Resolution in all our Law-books to this purpose.

All the authority he has is a casual saying of a single Judge in Michelborn's case.

For in Darcy and Allen's case, there is not a word spoken by Dodderidge, or any other concerning trade with Infidels.

Dodderidge

Dodderidge says nothing of foreign trade; cites and affirms the Law of Mag. Charta, cap. 30.

Michelborn's case is in 2d. Brownlow 296. and it is in these words. Hill. 7 Jacobi, in the Common Bench, upon a motion made for consultation, upon a prohibition awarded, it was said by the Lord Coke, that no subject of the King may trade with any Infidels without licence of the King; and the reason of that is, he may relinquish the Catholick Faith and adhere to Infidelism. And he said, he had seen a licence made in the time of Edw. III. where the King recited that he having a special trust and confidence that his subjects will not decline from his Faith and Religion, licenced him ut supra; and this did arise upon a recital of a licence, made to a Merchant to trade to the East-Indies.

First, To this slender authority I answer,

If the Law had been according to this concept, there would have been much said and done about it in divers cases; there would have been proceedings against persons that had traded to Granada, (of which the Moors lost the Dominion within these 200 years) to Barbary, to Turky, and other Infidel places in Asia, Africa, or America, but we never heard, or read of any till now.

Secondly, 'Tis an apocryphal case; that Book, called Brownlow, is of little authority, it was printed without approbation of the Judges, or any legal licence.

And the concept is of less authority, it is reported as dictum obiter, upon a motion, a casual saying of the Judge; which the Clerk took, and likely mistook, for it is no where said in my Lord Coke's own Books, though they are voluminous. And the ground of his saying (if he did say it) is, that he had seen a licence in Edw. III's time, but I cannot learn that it has been seen by any man else. Neither Mr. Holt nor I can find it, nor does my Lord Coke tell us where it was; perhaps it was taken upon trust, and mistaken, perhaps not authentick, and perhaps a sufficient answer to it would have been found in it: however, it was but one, and certainly if the Law had required it, there would have been more than one licence from the beginning of our Records till that day.

Una Hirundo, &c.

Thirdly, The reason there given makes strongly against this Charter; the reason is, lest men should decline from the Faith; so that it seems there is a special trust in the King, that he should suffer none to go into Infidel parts, but such as are orthodox, sound and firm in Religion; such of whom the King is specially assured that they will not fall from the Faith, which is to be exercised by the King only; and he is to grant licence to particular and known persons of whom he has this confidence, the King cannot grant his royal care to the Company.

But now this Charter would have this trust deputed and transferred, for it contains a licence not only for the then Members of the Company (who were twenty-two or twenty-three years ago) but their unknown successors, and to their sons begotten, and to be begotten, and their Servants, Factors, Apprentices, and Licensees.

Mr. Holt also gives a reason for this trade being unlawful, namely that the Law has judged Infidels to be perpetual enemies, for which he relies upon another singular saying of my Lord Coke in Calvin's case, fol. 17. and recites two authorities cited there, namely the Register, 282. and 12 H. VIII. 4.

And he takes notice that the children of Israel were perverted from the true Religion by converse with the Nations round about them. And he cites Grotius de Jure belli & pacis, lib. 2. cap. 15. par. 11. where he says, Cavendum est ne nimia commixtio contagium adferat Infirmis.

As to this singular opinion of Infidels being perpetual enemies, it is not easy to understand what my Lord Coke means by it; his words are these.

All Infidels are in Law, perpetui inimici, for between them, as with the Devil, whose subjects they are, and the Christian, there is perpetual hostility, and can be no peace; for as the Apostle says, 2d Corinthians 15. What agreement is there of Christ with Belial, or what part has the Believer with the Infidel.

It seems by these words, that it is to be understood of a spiritual discord in respect of Religion; and not a temporal between the Nations: for he says, 'tis because they are the Devil's subjects, and he relies upon the Texts of Scripture: and if this perpetual hostility be taken in a political and proper sense, and the Law be so, it destroys the licence and privilege of the Company, and their action brought, and all possibility of such a thing for them. There is not nor can be any peace, treaty or intercourse between the English and the Indians, but a constant never-ceasing state of war; and especially if it be founded upon a Divine Precept: for whatsoever prerogative the King may have, he cannot have a prerogative to dispense with the Canon of the Scripture.

But, my Lord Coke himself does much clear this matter, Jur. Co. 155. where he says, that there may be peace and leagues of commerce with Infidels. All that the Register says, is that the Hospitallers were instituted for defence contra Christi & Christianorum inimicos; which is an expression of the enemies of Religion, not of the State. In the book of Henry the VIII. he said indeed, obiter, that a person out-law'd, a Traitor, or a Pagan being beaten, shall not have an action; it is true in case of an Out-law, or a Traitor, it may be pleaded in abatement: but no other Book says, nor can any man maintain that the Law is so in case of a Pagan.

A Pagan, Turk or Jew, may maintain an action of debt or battery, or other personal action here; were it otherwise, there could be no trading of the Jews here, nor of the Turks; the contrary whereof is implied and admitted in the Act of Navigation, 12 Caroli II. cap. 18. paragr. 18.

By the like reason that there shou'd be no trading with Infidels, there ought to be no foreign trade at all, for there is no Country where the Religion does not differ in somewhat or other, from the religion establish'd in the Church of England.

And whatever he says of the children of Israel, I think there are many instances in the Old Testament of commerce with the Heathen, though I not foreseeing such use of Divinity here, am not so well furnish'd.

As to the citation out of Grotius, it is by way of caution only; but the whole drift of that chapter demonstrates, that commerce and leagues with Infidels are lawful, and he expounds that text of 2 Cor. which my Lord Coke bottoms upon, to refer only to joining with them in Idol worship. And to shew clearly the mind of that Author, he has writ a whole Book, intituled, Mare Liberum, to manifest the right and lawfulness of trade to the Indies; and he

he says, that God in nature appointed all people to resort to and trade with others, for that he hath given several commodities to some, which others stand in need of.

I must take leave to say, that this notion of Christians not to have commerce with Infidels is a conceit absurd, monkish, phantastical and phanatical.

'Tis a-kin to Dominium fundatur in Gratia.

The Indians have a right to trade here, and we there, and this is a right natural and human, which the Christian Faith doth not alter.

I agree with Mr. Holt, that an Act of Parliament made against the Christian Religion is void; but I think a Charter against natural and civil right is as certainly void.

Mr. Holt further says, that publick safety and policy are concern'd in this trade, and therefore it should be restrainable by the Common Law; and he cites Courteen's case, Hob. 270. where several Merchants were punish'd for buying and transporting great sums of money, because (the Book says) it was against the State-Policy and safety of the Kingdom; and so punishable, and not permitted by the Common Law: and Mr. Holt says, that trading with Infidels is in like manner against the State-Policy too.

Answ. That was in the Star-Chamber, and perhaps it was one of the errors for which that Court was dissolv'd, 16 Car. I. cap. 10. in which Act it is said, that the Judges of that Court had undertaken to punish where no Law did warrant.

If transporting of money had been prohibited by Common Law, the Statutes 9 E. III. cap. 1. and 5 R. II. cap. 2, &c. had been needless; but before those Statutes every man might dispose of his own private money as he wou'd. And in that case of Courteen's the offence seems to have consisted in ingrossing great quantities, and so it more fully appears in a contemporary report of the same case, in the select cases added to Popham, 149, and 150. where it is said, that as one shall be punish'd for ingrossing commodities, so another for great quantities of money, all other commodities being thereby ingross'd. And this point of Courteen's case is a good authority against the privilege claimed by the Company, which in truth is nothing else but to ingross to themselves all the commodities of India, &c.

But if the Common Law would have all the treasure kept within the Realm, it does not follow that we must keep all other commodities, and have no trade at all; at least without special licence, I know no State-Policy or Law for that.

In the next place, Mr. Holt considers foreign trade, and says, the subjects have not a right to trade abroad, ad libitum.

Answ. This is against the former argument and the ground of the Plaintiffs declaration, for that was, there shou'd be no trade to those places, for a special cause, (viz.) because they were Infidels; but this argument imports, that there ought not to be any trade at all abroad, no not with christian countries without the King's licence.

The reason, with which he would support this argument, is, because trade depends upon treaties, and upon the accidents of peace and war, which the King has the power of.

But this too thwarts the former argument, for Infidels he says are perpetual enemies; and if so, there is no peace nor treaty with them, and therefore no trade to be (as not by the Company) with them.

Besides, allowing there may be peace and treaties with them, I cannot see how this consideration can conduce to the present question; for it cannot be pretended, that the King makes leagues with Indian Princes, that one part of his subjects should trade thither, and the rest should not, or that the King is, or can be in amity with them, as to one part of his subjects (namely the Company) and in enmity with them, as to the other of his subjects.

The King has, and is to preserve the highways, but it is to keep them for the passage of himself and his people; not to shut them up against any of his people at least, except in case of war.

He cites the Statute 12 H. VII. cap. 6. where the Merchant-Adventurers say, they had commerce with Spain and Portugal, and other places in league and amity with the King.

No doubt they had, and beyond this is truly said in the same Statute, that of right they ought to have it, which shews that it was not by the King's grant or licence. And in like manner the Defendant of right ought to have trade with the Indians, there being no war betwixt this Realm and them.

He cites out of Roll's Abridgment, 2 Pars. 214. a note of Rot. Parl. 1 H. V. nu. 41. where the Commons pray that all Merchants may export and import to and from any place, any goods at their pleasure, paying the customs and other dues, any proclamation notwithstanding; the King answers, that he will be advised by his Council.

And Mr. Holt takes this to be an acknowledgement by them of the legality of the proclamation.

Answ. It is not so, for it was the course then, to propose and pass declaratory and confirming (as well as other) Laws, by way of Petitions to the King; and tho' they thought the proclamation illegal, yet it was more proper for them to endeavour to obtain redress by prayer, than contest. But their Petition was a Petition of Right, and the proclamation (especially if there was no war a-foot) was void, being against the Common and Statute Law. And to cite and set up such a proclamation, is to set up grievance to the Law: and yet I take it there was an extraordinary occasion at that time, Hen. V. having occasion to lay an embargo on ships, in order to his proceeding to his great war in France.

He says that foreign trade may be mischievous, it may be a nuisance, so the importing Irish cattle and French goods have been declared to be by the Parliament, and the King may restrain such evils.

Answ. These Acts of Parliament were enacting, and they enact it shall be adjudged a common nuisance. They did not find and declare it to have been one before.

If it had been so, there had been no need of these Acts, and we know the reason of that clause was to make the matter dispensable.

If the importing East-India commodities be a nuisance, it is not licenceable, and the Company cannot maintain their trade, much less their action; unless it should be thought that the bringing in of those commodities by the Defendant is a nuisance, but the bringing in the same by the Plaintiffs is not.

He inforces this with a reason, that there may be mischief from the abundance of the importation exceeding our exportation, and resembling it to what is said 10 Rep. 141. that by the Common Law the the King ought to save and defend his Realm as well against the Sea as against enemies; that it should not be drowned nor waſted; and as the King may prevent inundation of water, ſo he ſays, he may as to trade.

Anſw. This is a ſimilitude in words, but not as to the nature of things, and if there be any force in it, it is againſt the Plaintiffs; for there is not in their Charter any limitation, the Company may bring in as much as they will, nay, it ſeems by their allegation, that this trade is to be managed moſt largely by means of the Company, and therefore thence is rather the danger of the glut.

Mr. Holt makes it a great argument to maintain the Charter, that it is a neceſſary regulation of the trade, and that the trade could not have been ſettled but by ſuch a Company; and ſays, if it ſhould be laid open, it would ruin the trade both of the Company and the Defendant.

And it is averred in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed, but per hujusmodi Corpus Corporatum.

Anſw. This contradicts Michelborn's caſe, for that was upon a licence granted to a ſingle Merchant to trade to the East-Indies; and it is known that this trade has been managed by private perſons before, and ſince there was a Company.

And this is to ſet up convenience or pretence of convenience againſt Law; the Statute, which we have pleaded, ſays that all trade ſhall be open; the Plaintiffs ſay, it ſhall be open to them only, becauſe they can manage it beſt.

If other men ſhould ſay that they could manage it better, the pretence were as fair for them to exclude the Company from the trade.

But I except againſt this averment, it is a frivolous and impoſſible averment, no iſſue can be taken upon it, unleſs iſſue ſhould be taken upon a ſimilitude, (viz.) hujusmodi Corpus Corporatum.

If a licence were granted (as it is ſaid to be in Michelborn's caſe) to one man to trade to the East-Indies; and he ſhould bring ſuch an action, and aver that the trade could not be managed but by ſuch an one as he, it would not be good, and yet as good as this is. In an action for words, it is not allowable to alledge that the Defendant ſpoke ſuch words, or hujus ſimilia.

Moreover, the declaration as it is penn'd, contradicts itſelf; for it ſays, that the trade cannot be managed but by the Company, and yet charges the Defendant, that he did manage a trade there; which is not poſſible, and it is penal enough upon the Defendant, that he attempts to manage trade where he cannot.

Mr. Holt objects, that the Statute we plead, ought not to be taken univerſally, that the Sea ſhall be open to all Merchants; for then it would extend to give liberty of trade to the King's enemies who are Merchants.

Anſw. True it is, neither this, nor any ſuch Law extends further than to Alien Armies and Subjects, there are jura belli, as well as jura pacis; and it is underſtood, that enemies who are foreigners may be taken and proceeded againſt according to martial Law; but the Defendant is a ſubject, and cannot be an enemy.

He ſays further, that this Statute ſhould not extend to this trade, becauſe that in Edw. III's time, when it was made, trade was driven with Chriſtians only, and not with Infidels.

If this be ſo, it deſtroys the only authority he has (viz.) Michelborn's caſe, where the only ground of the opinion is, that there was a licence granted to trade with Infidels, in the time of the ſaid Ed. III.

But this Statute muſt be taken as it is penned univerſally, and not confined to thoſe countries; places and parts which were then uſed; the Statute does not diſtinguiſh, & ubi lex non diſtinguit, ne nos diſtinguimus, otherwiſe no man muſt trade, but to thoſe few places that he can prove were traded to before, 18. E. III.

He ſays (as ff. n. b. 85.) that the King may reſtrain men, by Ne Exeat Regnum, from going beyond Sea; and cites Davis, 9 b. that one reaſon of the King's being intitled by preſcription to the great cuſtom, was for his leave to Merchants to go and carry goods out of the Realm.

Anſw. It is true, that Book of Davis does ſay ſo, but he cites to prove the opinion, Dyer 165. and this Statute, 18 E. III. which we have pleaded; ſo, that that Book is of no further uſe, than the authorities upon which it is founded do warrant; which, if we examine, we ſhall find that in Dyer it is among other things made a quere, in a caſe referred to the Judges concerning a new impoſition ſet by Queen Mary on Merchandize, whether by Common Law, Merchants were, or might be reſtrain'd from going out of the Kingdom, without leave of the King or Queen; to which the Judges give no reſolution: which ſhews, they thought the Law was, that there was no ſuch reſtrainment or need of leave, for when Judges give no reſolution, in the caſe of the King, it is a ſign that in their opinion the Law is againſt him, and for the Statute, 18 E. III. which we plead, it is flat againſt it.

F. N. B. 85. a. is expreſs, that by Common Law, every ſubject may go out of the Kingdom for Merchandize, or Travel, or other cauſes as he pleaſes, without leave, V. Co. pl Cor. 180.

5 R. II. cap. 2. Reſtrains people paſſing out; but it excepts Merchants, and even that Statute is repeal'd. 4 Jacobi, cap. 1. 'tis clear that the King may reſtrain his ſubjects from going out of the Realm, by his Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum. But that Writ was originally for the Clergy only, and is properly granted for matter of State only; and the words of it are, Quam plurima nobis & Coronæ noſtræ præjudicialia ibidem proſequi intendis. Of late indeed it has been extended to confine a perſon to abide the Juſtice of a Court here, but I think no further. It is always to reſtrain a man from ſomething unlawful, and againſt the duty of a ſubject; never to reſtrain from a lawful Act, as trade is.

Neither is it general or univerſal, but always particular, and granted upon oath, made concerning a particular perſon; and ſince there needs ſuch a ſpecial Writ to reſtrain an obnoxious perſon, it proves the Law to be, that all other perſons are at liberty to go.

And there was no Ne Exeat Regnum againſt the Defendant, nor cauſe for any; and if there had been, and he had gone againſt it, though it were an offence to the King, it would not give cauſe of action to the Plaintiffs.

He cites Co. Litt. 5. a. That no ſubject can build a caſtle or a fortrefs without the King's licence, and 11 Rep. 87. b. and Co. Magna Charta 199. that no man can make a park without the King's licence; and 11 H. VII. 13. that the King may licence; where if one kill another, it is no felony.

Anſw.

Ans. These instances agree not to our case; a man may not build castles without the King's licence, any more than raise forces, or appropriate beasts, which are feræ nature, and the King's game; much less take away the lives of the King's subjects; but there is no parity of reason, that a man should not use an innocent trade.

It is more suitable thereto, to instance, that a man may without licence build a house, or make a hedge, and inclose a garden or field, and thereby preserve the lives of himself and his family.

In the next place, Mr. Holt says there's a great deal of difference between trading in a Company, and trading out of a Company; that this Charter is good because it gives the trade to a Company, and being a Company, and Christians, they will take care that their Agents and Factors keep up to the Christian Religion; but other people will converse only with Infidels, and cannot have Divine Offices.

Ans. It is not required by the Charter, that the Members taken into the Company, should be Christians, and their sons, servants, and factors may be no Christians, nor are they bound to have Divine Offices. And the Defendant and others are likewise Christians, and may have Divine Offices as well as they; and in this trade, the Defendant and those with him, converse with the same persons, as the Company and their Agents do, or if not, then there is no interfering, no cause of complaint.

He observes out of the Journal of the House of Commons, 43 Eliz. that the House of Commons fell vigorously upon Monopolies; and there was brought in a catalogue of them, but therein is nothing of the East-India trade, tho' there was such a Charter then in being.

Ans. I know not whether there was such a Charter then in being; but if there were, possibly it was not taken notice of, or possibly no grievance then appear'd from it; and likely that Company was better advis'd, than to endeavour to restrain others from trade.

Besides I have heard a Vote of the House of Commons cited sometimes, but never knew the silence of the House of Commons cited for authority before; doubtless in that Parliament, as in others, the Members complain'd of those grievances, which then affected the Boroughs and Places they serv'd for: they undertake not to enumerate all the Monopolies, that were or might be, and it is most prudent, in order to obtain redress, to limit their complaints to the present occasion.

First, Mr. Holt mentions three Statutes, 3 Jacobi, cap. 6. there having been a Charter obtained by some Merchants for sole trade into the Dominions of Spain and Portugal. It is enacted, that it shall, and may be lawful, for all subjects to trade thither, notwithstanding that Charter or any other; and thereupon he infers, that the Parliament takes the Charter to be good, and therefore enact that the trade shall be laid open.

Ans. There is no just ground for this inference.

First, It were a strain beyond the Plaintiff's own foundation, for that it related to a trade to Spain or Portugal, which are Christian Countries.

Secondly, The preamble of the Act sets forth reasons enough, to destroy the Patent at Common Law, (viz.) that all subjects ought to enjoy equally the benefit of peace and free trade; that otherwise the subjects of England would be in a worse condition than those of Scotland and Ireland; that it was attended with the impoverishing of Merchants, Mariners and Manufacturers, lessening the price of their commodities, and enhancing foreign, &c.

Thirdly, The Act calls it a common traffick, and does not only say it shall be lawful, but that there shall be free liberty to trade there, in such sort and manner as was accustomed: so that the Act did not make the Charter illegal, but found it so, as being an innovation against what is used and ought to be.

Also he mentions the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi, cap. 3. wherein he observes, there is a proviso to save the Companies or Societies of Merchants. And the Statute 14 Caroli II cap. 24. which in the preamble declares the putting in of Stock into the East-India Company to be for publick good.

Ans. That last Statute indeed in the preamble says, it is for publick good, but it is the publick good of the Company; and the same preamble says, that divers Noblemen, Gentlemen, and other persons of quality, not bred to trade or merchandize, did put in Stock there; and enacts, that they shall not in that respect be reckon'd Traders, and so liable to a Commission of Bankrupt: whereupon I might observe, that this Company is not to be reckon'd a Company of Merchants, and therefore not within the proviso, 21 Jacobi, above-mentioned.

But I give this further answer, concerning that proviso: the words of it are, Provided also, and it is hereby further intended, declared and enacted, that this Act, or any thing therein contain'd, shall not in any wise extend, or be prejudicial to the City of London, &c. or to any Companies, or Societies of Merchants within this Realm; erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering of any trade, or merchandize, but that the same, and their liberties, privileges, powers and immunities shall be, and continue of such force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and of none other, any thing before in this Act to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

Now first this is but a general saving; and supposing, as Mr. Holt does, that there was such an East-India Company then in being; if the Parliament had had as favourable an opinion of their Charter, as they had of Mansell's or Maxwells, or the other there mention'd, they would have sav'd it by particular mention, as they did those, which would have been some countenance to such a Charter.

Secondly, Admitting it saved generally or particularly by the proviso, that does not make it better; the proviso only says, it shall continue of such force and effect, as it was before of the making the Act, and none other: i. e. If notwithstanding the body of the Act, if it were a Monopoly and void before, it shall remain so; and if it were good before, it shall remain so, notwithstanding the proviso.

If it be asked, to what purpose the proviso was made, it is answer'd clearly thus; the Statute giving an additional penalty of treble damages and double costs against any person, that should after forty days, after the end of that Session of Parliament, hinder, grieve, disturb or disquiet any person, or any ways seize, attach, distrain, take, carry away or detain his goods, by occasion or pretext of any Monopoly, or of any such Commission, Grant, Licence, Power, Faculty, Letters Patents, &c.

Now the proviso, appointed that nothing in the Act shall extend to any Society or Company of Merchants, it saves persons that shall hinder, grieve, disturb or disquiet others by occasion or pretext of such such a Society, or Company from that penalty; so that the Plaintiffs have this advantage from the proviso (if they are at all within it) that they shall not be liable to the Defendant's treble Damages and double costs for bringing this present Suit against him.

6 Car. Jones 231. Mounson versus Lister, was a case concerning an office granted by Letters Patent, 4 Jacobi, for sole making all Bills, Informations and Letters missive in the Council of York. Now the next proviso in the Statute, does save Officers in the same manner, as this proviso does Societies or Companies of Merchants. It was adjudged; that tho' this grant of this office were saved by the proviso, yet it was still a Monopoly and void; it being unreasonable that one person should have the making of all bills, &c. which is proper work for Counsel or Attorneys, and that (in case of cross-bill) both parties should be obliged to disclose their evidence to that person; but by reason of this proviso, this Grantee should not be liable to the treble damages and double costs; the proviso saves us against that Statute, but does not establish against the Common Law.

Besides, this proviso does not at all extend to this Charter, it only concerns such as were then in being, and says, they shall continue in such force, as they were before the making of that Statute. But this Company that is now Plaintiff, was made not long since, viz. by Charter 13. of this King.

Mr. Holt cites seven precedents of Grants by Queen Eliz. of sole trading to several Infidel parts.

To which I answer, that the more there are of this kind, the stronger the argument is for us; for the greater occasion has been administered to bring actions or informations of this nature, but none was ever brought; and the reason why none has been brought, is, because none could be upon this score.

The clauses in this Charter, for forfeiting ship and goods, and imprisonment, &c. may as well be cited for precedents hereafter; and yet it will not be denied, that at least some of these clauses are void: it has been frequent to insert clauses in Charters, which will not hold water, they serve for a flourish and in terrorem, like the penalty of 1000 l. in a Sub-pena.

Also these Charters were temporary, and they were bottom'd upon some new discovery of a trade or a passage; and in truth that is the only good foundation, upon which such a Charter can be granted, Godb. 254. when a new invention or discovery has been made, or is making by any person, by his skill, charge, and perhaps peril of his life; the King may remunerate him with such a Grant, but that must be only for a reasonable number of years, and no further by the Common Law: and before the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi adjusted that reasonable time to fourteen years. And I take it that the first Grant made in England, to persons for sole trade to the East-Indies, was upon suggestion and consideration of their being first traders there, and that was for fifteen years, which is long since expired. Though it seems, trade to the East-Indies was known to other Europeans many hundred years ago.

Impiger extremos currit Mercator ad Indos, Per Mare.

Hor.

I shall mention two or three Acts of Parliament, which do countenance and encourage free trade by any person to the East-Indies.

VOL. VII.

17 Caroli I. cap. 21. it is made a Premunire to hinder any persons from importing Salt-Petre; the Defendant did import Salt-Petre in this Ship, and so do all Ships that come from the East-Indies; it is their usual ballast.

12 Caroli II. cap. 18. parag. 3. (confirm'd and re-enacted 13 Car. II. cap. 14.) forbids the bringing in of any goods of Africa, Asia, or America, and in any Vessel, but such as belong to the people of England, Ireland, Wales, and Berwick, or of the King's foreign plantations. And parag. 13. mentions East-India commodities. Here was just occasion for the Parliament to take notice of the Company (for this present Charter was in being in 13, when the last Act passed, and a like former Charter in being in 12, when the first passed) and so they would, if they had thought the trade restrained to the Company. But they seem to allow, that these goods may be imported in any English or Irish Vessels, whether of the Company or of other persons.

22 and 23 Car. II. cap. 11. 'tis enacted, That all and every person or persons, that shall build or cause to be built any ship or vessel of three decks, with a fore-castle, and five foot between each deck, mounted with thirty pieces of ordnance, and other ammunition proportionable; shall for the first two voyages, which the said ship or ships make from his Majesty's Dominions to any foreign port, have and receive to their own proper use and benefit one tenth part: and all persons that shall build any ships of two decks, above three hundred tons and thirty guns, shall have one twentieth part of the Customs, that shall be paid to his Majesty for all such goods or merchandize, as shall be exported or imported on the said ship or ships, to and from this Kingdom.

'Tis known, that such ships used to be built and employed for the East-India trade, and not for trade to any Christian Country; but the Act takes no notice of this Company, or of a licence to be from the King; but allows and declares, that all and every person or persons may build any ship of three decks, and make a voyage with her to any foreign part, and encourage people so to do, with a reward; to which reward (if the Defendant's ship be within the circumstances) the Defendant might be entitled, for this voyage for which he is now sued. And certainly no Law appoints a reward and a punishment for the same thing.

I will establish this point with two authorities, not of a private nature, like dormant Patents, but the judgment of Parliaments, and of the Court of King's Bench.

1 & 2 Ph. & Mar. the Muscovy Company was erected by Letters Patent, and therein a clause, to restrain all others from trading upon a like penalty as here; but notwithstanding that, other people did trade thither: and thereupon, 8 Eliz. an Act of Parliament was made, reciting the Charter, and that other persons did trade thither notwithstanding; and therefore enacts that the Charter shall stand, and no other person shall trade thither, which shews the judgment of the Parliament, that without this Act, the restraint was not good.

The other concern'd the late Canary Company.

It is Mich. 20 Car. II. Rot. 403. Banco Regis, Horn 118, &c. Ivy.

They had a Charter with like restraint and penalties as in this; and in trespass brought for seizing the ship, the Defendant justified by virtue of the Charter,

T t t

Charter, and judgment was given for the Plaintiff against the Charter, by the uniform opinion of the whole Court.

That case indeed was not the same with this, as to the manner; but as to the matter and substance it is the same.

I shall conclude this point with an observation of my Lord Coke, Jur. Co. 31. that Acts of Parliament against the freedom of merchandize never hold long.

If that be the fate of Acts of Parliament, which are Laws, certainly a Charter made to such purpose, ought not to be allowed.

The Second Point.

I take the Law to be clear with F. N. B. 85. a. that every subject may go out of the Kingdom for merchandize as he pleases, and whither he pleases without asking leave of the King, and shall not be punish'd for it.

But now taking it by admission, that persons are restrain'd, and that the Defendant ought not to have traded to the East-Indies without licence; yet I conceive this action upon the case can never be maintained.

In maintenance of it, Mr. Holt says, that this privilege of trade granted to the Company is a franchise; and if another violates it, the Grantee may have an action of the case against that person, as 22 H. VI. 14. and 11 H. IV. 47. where the King has granted a Fair or Market, if a man set up another Fair or Market to the damage of the former, he that has the Grant shall have an action in the case.

I observe, that in the arguing of the first point, Mr. Holt all along called this a licence, which now (to support this second point) he would have a franchise; but these two things differ greatly. A franchise (understood properly) is an Hereditament, a thing of interest, and assignable and transferrable. But a Licence is only Relaxatio Juris, a dispensation with the Law, a privilege to certain persons to do an Act with impunity. When the King grants a market, he creates or grants a real thing; but when he gives liberty to trade, he does not create or grant a real thing, but only discharges or prevents a penalty inflictible for trading without such leave.

When the King creates or grants a Market to any person, if he makes a Grant of another Market to another person; to the damage of the first, it will be void, because the Grantee has a franchise that is a real interest; and the Grantee may have an action of the case against him that sets up a Market under pretence of such a Grant, as well as he may against a man that sets up a Market without any pretence of Grant.

But if the King license any person to trade, he may notwithstanding license others too, although that be to the damage of the first; for he has not convey'd any interest to the first, that should hinder him from dispensing with others.

There is no bottom for this action to stand upon, there are but two things in the Charter towards it; first, a licence to the Company to trade; secondly, a prohibition and restraint to others, whereby the Company is to have the sole trade.

If the King had only granted a licence to the Company to trade to the East-Indies; the Company could not thereupon have an action against the Defendant, for trading thither. Now when the King in the same Charter, adds a restraint and prohibition to the Defendant and all other subjects; this Mr. Holt would have to be no more than the Law said before; but if it be more, this does not add any real interest to the Company, or better entitle them to an action.

Suppose it to be an offence, and punishable for the Defendant to trade to the East-Indies without the King's licence; the King dispenses to the Plaintiffs, so that they may trade there freely; then the Defendant trades there without licence, this may (according to that supposition) subject him to penalty at the suit of the King, but this gives no title to levy money upon the Defendant for trading without licence, there is no privity, no cause of action.

The resolution at the end of the Case of Monopolies, 11 Rep. 88. b. is a clear authority to this purpose: Cards were prohibited by Act of Parliament to be imported; and the Queen grants to Darcy that he should have the sole importation of Cards, non obstante that Statute; and during that Grant, another man imported Cards, against whom Darcy brought an action on the Case for it, and therein alledged too that he had been at great charge to make and provide Cards sufficient. But resolved that the action would not lie; but for punishing the party, the remedy which the Statute appointed against importing must be follow'd.

It is insisted upon, that the Plaintiffs have been at great charge to carry on this trade, and by others interloping they should lose the fruits of it.

The Defendant has as much to say, that he has been at great charge, and by restraining and prosecuting him he should be a loser.

But I say, this is damnum sine injuria. In the mention'd Books of 22 H. VI. 14. and 11 H. IV. 47. it is held, that the action on the case would not lie, which was brought by a Schoolmaster (or two) for that he had an ancient school in a town, and one set up another near, so that whereas before he had two shillings a quarter for a boy, now he could have but one shilling; so for erecting a mill, that withdraws custom from a former mill, no action lies.

In every action on the case, there must be damnum & injuria, there must be a wrong to the party plaintiff: it is no wrong to the Plaintiffs here, that another offends against that Law, which is dispens'd with to them.

If the Defendant's trading without the King's leave, be an offence against the King, it is punishable by the King still, and that way of punishment must be follow'd, if there is to be any; besides, all the foundation the Plaintiffs should stand upon is the Charter, but they do not follow that; the Charter appoints the penalty to be forfeiture of ship and goods, whereof one half to the King, but no action on the case is given, or meant, wherein the carriage may be more or less, and wherein the King is excluded from any share.

If an Act of Parliament prohibit under forfeiture of ship and goods, the one half to the King, the other to the party, that must be followed, there shall never be an action on the case; for the Common Law shuts it up with a strong negative, and says there shall be no other penalty. And in all cases of Statutes, By-Laws and Charters, the method of punishment prescribed must be observed.

To obviate this the Plaintiffs have been cautious, and have misrecited the Charter in their declaration; they, to let in a pretence for their action, recite cite the prohibition or restraint, and stop there, as if the prohibition were absolute and general; whereas it is sub modo, under a special penalty of forfeiture.

And this appears upon Oyer, and therefore for this variance, judgment ought to be for the Defendant, if there were nothing else in the case.

But waving this concerning the form of the Suit, I insist upon the main matter.

There is a natural necessity that every man that will live must eat, and thence a necessity and obligation to labour; and there is a property in this means of livelihood as well as in life.

The King's power and prerogative is to establish and preserve this to all his Subjects.

Traffick is one of the honestest and justest sorts of industry, and is more especially proper for an Island.

The King cannot prohibit merchandize, nor lay a penny imposition upon it; therefore our Kings have received tunnage and poundage from the Grants of Parliaments: whereas if they had such a power (as the Plaintiffs Counsel speak of) over all trade, they might by the means of that, have made an undeniable title to such a revenue, without the consent of the Lords and Commons.

Restraining of trade (though but for a time or place) is one of the great things which has been always reserved to, and exercised by authority of Parliament, as we find almost in every Session.

This which is now before your Lordship, is the greatest Monopoly that has been attempted. It monopolizes Africa, Asia, and America, at least on the South; it devours above half the trade of the Nation, the trade of Linnens from Hamburg, Flanders, and Holland; Silks from Italy and Turky, and when the prohibition expires, from France; and affects our Manufactures at home, upon all which the livelihood of many thousands depends.

It is against the Common Law and many express Statutes.

No man was ever punished, in any Court, for using foreign trade, no, not in the Star-Chamber, which extends the prerogative most. It is Causa prime impressionis, although there has been great occasion to have had precedents, if any such accident could have lain.

But as this is the first that has been brought, I shall presume it will receive that just discouragement from your Lordships, that it will be the last. And I pray your Judgment for the Defendant.

The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

MR. Justice WILKINS. Mr. Solicitor-General, do you argue that case to-day?

MR. Solicitor-General. Yes, Sir.

MR. Justice WILKINS. Mr. Pollexfen, do you argue on the other side?

MR. Pollexfen. I do, Sir.

VOL. VII.

MR. Justice WILKINS. Then, Gentlemen, let him come down to the Bar.

MR. Solicitor-General. My Lord, this is an Action upon the case, brought by the East-India Company against Sandys; wherein they do set forth that the King, reciting former Letters Patent granted to this Company to incorporate it, did grant a Charter to such particular men, and made them a Corporation by the name of the Governor, &c. and did grant to them the sole trade in all the parts upon the Coasts of Asia, Africa, and America, from the Cape of Good Hope to the Streights of Magellan. And further that he did likewise grant to this Company and successors the sole trade; and granted to them, that no other of the King's subjects should trade within those limits, and did expressly prohibit all his subjects to trade thither, not being of the Company without a licence from them. Then they say, that Mr. Sandys, being one of the King's subjects, did take upon him to trade within the limits of those Letters Patent, to-wit, at Mesopotam, not having a licence from their Company, or any other authority to do it. And this, they lay to their damage of 1000 l.

MR. Sandys to this, after he prayed Oyer of the Letters Patents, which are set forth in hac verba, pleads the Statute of 18 E. III. which says, that the Sea shall be open, and all Merchants shall go with their merchandize, where they please. To this Plea we have demurred.

Upon this Record, the Questions will be these two.

First, whether or no the Patent to the East-India Company, with a prohibition to all others to trade within their limits, therein set forth, be a good Patent. The next is,

Secondly, Whether, admitting it to be a good Patent, this action will lie; that is, whether it be a bare licence to the Company, or whether it pass such an Interest to the Company with that licence, as will entitle them to an action against any, that shall intrude or incroach upon their trade.

First, My Lord, I am to prove that this Grant is good, and here these considerations will fall in.

First, Whether the King had power at Common Law to have made such a Grant.

Secondly, Whether that power be any ways abridged by any Act of Parliament, as it is much insisted upon by the other side.

Ans. First, That the King had such a power at Common Law, I conceive is plain for these reasons.

First, Because no subject at the Common Law had a right to trade with Infidels, no nor to go thither without licence from the King, first had and obtained.

Secondly, No such trade can be established without precedent treaties, and no such treaties can be made by subjects, without licence from the King to make them. If therefore this Patent does not restrain any natural liberty or right, that the subject had, but is introductive of a new one, they had not before; it will not fall out to be within the definition of a Monopoly, in which it is one essential part, that it restrains people from that liberty; they had before.

Now that no subject had a right at Common Law to trade with Infidels, or go into an Infidel Country, without licence from the King, will be evident thus. And,

First, It will be very considerable, before we enter upon that question, particularly, to see how all right right in general to trade stands circumstantiated; and there it is plain,

First, That there is no trade, but what depends upon the good will and pleasure of the foreign prince with whom it is, whether he will admit it or no; that is pretty clear.

Secondly, This may be restrained by a total prohibition of any commerce with that Prince or Nation, by the King here.

Thirdly, Tho' every man now, and Merchants always were at liberty to go abroad without licence; yet the King may restrain any man by the Writ Ne exeat Regnum, from going out of the Kingdom; and that without shewing any particular cause why, or alledging any matter that is traversable and triable with the King. And,

Fourthly and Lastly, If any foreign Prince, upon concluding any league or treaty with the King, should restrain trade to any number of persons, or any particular qualification of manner of proceeding in it; I see not how any man can pretend to a right, to act contrary to that, in breach of such a league or treaty made with the King by such a foreign Prince.

Then we say further, by the Statute of 3 and 4 Jacobi, which opens the trade to Spain and Portugal, that does show plainly that that trade was before inclosed; and it does not show that the Inclosure of it was illegal, but gives a right that was restrained before: and yet I am far from affirming that the subject has no right to trade, tho' it has been objected that this clogs it, and makes it as none. And therefore, they held it absolutely necessary to disaffirm that power and prerogative, which the Law, for the publick good, does repose in the King, and that upon reasons that will not hold, nor are so fit to be urged in decency: for I take it, the possibility of the abuse of power, is no objection against that power. For by this argument, tho' the King has a power and prerogative by Law, to restrain subjects from going beyond Sea, by a Ne Exeat Regnum, no, say they, he cannot; for then he may restrain all his subjects from going out of the Kingdom, and so imprison and hinder every one from going out of the Nation. It is the same argument with this, that they urge the King claims a prerogative to restrain such trade upon occasion; they say this argument cannot hold, for by this rule he may restrain all commerce and trade whatsoever: so that this way of arguing does strike at all power, and I need give no other reason for it, for there can be no power at all, which is not accompanied with some trust; and there is no trust, but it possibly (morally speaking) may be broken. So that this is no argument against the right of the subject to trade on the one side, nor against the prerogative of the King on the other, in whom the Law has reposed a trust to regulate and qualify trade.

But, My Lord, in this case the question is not of so large an extent, nor so general as this is: but only here it is a question, how that right stands with respect to Infidels, and that is the question before your Lordship.

And I cannot but observe, in my entrance into the question, that unless the Law had once been held clear in this matter, this could not have come to be any subject of debate now, for no such trade as this, could ever have been gained to the Nation; for none could have ventured upon so hazardous an enterprise, or so chargeable a project as this was, if it had been any doubt whether those that run no such adventure should be admitted to reap the first fruits of it.

So that this question, as it tends to overthrow this trade, if the Law be taken to be as they would have it, so it overthrows the Turky trade too, which stands upon the same foundation, with respect to the prohibition by Letters Patent as this does: for the question is not, upon how easy terms the privileges are to be obtain'd, as it is confessed the terms are easier in the Turky Company, than in the East-India Company; but whether any terms at all are requisite: if any terms can be impos'd upon it, then those are good; if none, then that will overthrow the Turky trade, and all the trade of the Nation. And surely if they can prevail in this question, the subjects, for whose right they pretend so much to stand up, will have little cause to thank them for standing up for a right, as they call it, against the very Interest of the Nation. But to return to our argument.

The subject can have no such right to trade with Infidels without licence from the King; for they are looked upon as enemies, not only in a spiritual sense as they are of a contrary Faith and Religion, but they are so treated in Law; and the resolutions of the Law are such as we may see in Calvin's case, and the 12 H. VIII. which is a Book they cited, and was quoted here before, upon the first argument of this case; where it is held, that a Pagan tho' he be beaten, cannot have or maintain any action at all, because he is perpetuus inimicus: so an Alien enemy can neither maintain a real or personal Action, as it is said in the 1st Inst. 129. B. so a Jewess, tho' born here, and marrying a converted Jew, shall not be endowed, and so is the same Book 32. So that they are look'd upon no more than common Aliens; for we see that tho' they are born here, yet they have not the capacities so much as of Denizens, for they shall not be endowed as Denizens may. And tho' my Lord Coke, by the way, says in that Book, no Alien can be endowed: yet I find in the Parliament-Rolls a Petition of the Commons, it is in 8 H. V. m. 16. they pray that Female Aliens may be endowed, and the King's answer is, let it be as it is desired. But I mention that only by the by, for it is not at all relating to our question, but for that the other resolution goes to it, that an Infidel is always to be treated as an enemy.

But, my Lord, further, that all Infidels are likewise Aliens and Enemies, in respect of their properties which they gain here; it is to be gather'd from what I find in Rot. finium 50 H. III. m. 5. the King releases a debt, that was owing to a Jew, and in the same Roll, 49 H. III. Rot. finium, there are divers pardons of debts owing to Jews, some in recompence for service done, and others in compassion of the poor, that they had drawn in to be engaged for great sums to them.

Rot. Parl. 13 E. I. m. 4. A Jew died, and the King granted away his goods, and his Widow redeem'd them for 1000*l.* and the King granted to the Jewess, that he would not discharge any debts, that were owing to her. This shews their properties were all at the King's mercy; and sometimes the King granted licence to them, and gave them leave to assign their debts, Rot. Parl. 3 E. I. m. 6. which recites that it was provided by King Hen. III. that no Jew should sell his goods without licence. The King grants a licence to Judeo Nostro to sell a debt debt of 20 l. that was owing him from the Bishop of Bath and Wells; and doubtless the reason of that Law in Hen. III's time, was, that the King might prevent any mischief, that might follow upon an unlicensed commerce between his subjects and those Infidels: and this appears plainly by considering, that by the ancient Law of the Land, no Jew could inhabit any where within the Kingdom, but where by custom they were permitted to dwell; and so is Rot. Claus. 1 E. I. m. 7. in dorso; they had gone and inhabited at Winchester, but they were removed thence, and the Record tells you the reason why, Amoti, &c.

They had particular Justices assigned over to them, to determine their causes, and that you see Rot. Claus. 49 H. III. m. 4. the King constitutes two Justices ad Custod. Judeorum, and gives them power to determine their Pleas in the places, where they were accustomed to inhabit.

And there is in Rot. Parl. 13 E. I. m. 7. a very remarkable Record to this purpose, Rex dilecto, &c.

My Lord, I find another Record like this in the Patent-Rolls of that year; for we see what care the Law took, that christians should not be circumvented by the Jews; and the Government had an eye upon them, that they should not have commerce one with another; that recognizances should be enter'd in the presence of Christians. That Record is thus, Rex omnibus, &c.

We see a man here, that deals with a Jew, and buys things of him without licence, and the King grants that he would not trouble him, or proceed against him by Law for that offence.

By the ancient Law it appears, that if a Christian marry'd to a Jew, it was felony, and the party offending was to be burnt; so is the 3d Inst. fol. 89. and there my Lord Coke cites Fleta for his authority in it.

From all this it appears, that Infidels have no right to trade and traffic here, and surely then no subject has a right to trade with them in their country; for the restraint certainly must be mutual. And, my Lord, for this, I must remember you of a case that has been before cited in this case, and that is Michelborne's case in Brownlow, where my Lord Coke declares the Law to be as we say, and that he hath seen a licence in Edw. III's time; and that he says was for the safety of Religion.

And surely, my Lord, it is upon some such grounds as this, that the Law provides that no excommunicate person shall bring an action, no not in auter droit, because no person must converse with them; therefore, they cannot sue as Executor to any person. Then if the Law be cautious for the safety of Religion, as to restrain converse in our country; a fortiori it may restrain the subjects liberty of trading in an Infidel country, where they must be under the Laws of the place; and the inconveniencies in the one case, are sure much greater than in the other.

For we see in Calvin's case, if the King conquers an Infidel country, their Laws actually cease till the King gives them new ones. But 'tis otherwise of a Christian country, for there the Laws remain till the King is pleased to alter them.

Another reason, my Lord, is this, the King's prerogative in making leagues and truces, is sure as large and unlimited as the subjects right to trade; and yet in the case of Infidels that is restrain'd, as to some sort of leagues that a Christian Prince cannot make with them, &c. For that you may see in the 4th Inst. 155. where my Lord Coke says that the Law of England is so, that the King can't make Fœdus mutui auxilii aut amicitie, with an Infidel Prince. And there he reckons up four sorts of leagues; three of which he says may be had with Infidels, that is, Fœdus Pacis, Fœdus Congratulationis, & Fœdus Commertii; but Fœdus mutui Auxilii, he says, by Law is not allowable: and herein these leagues are grounded upon the Law of God.

Therefore, my Lord, the Law surely does not give the subject an unlimited freedom to trade, but it must depend upon such cautions and security, as nothing but such leagues can provide for; which leagues I am sure none but the King is capable of making.

This then, one would think, were enough to clear our Patent from that objection, that 'tis a Monopoly. But there are no other things, that make it yet more evident it is not so. As first, in all the complaints that have been of Monopolies, this Patent was never counted to be one among them, nor thought to be illegal; if it ever had been thought so, the Statute of 21 Jacobi, cap. 3. which is a Statute made for regulating of trade, would never have been made.

In the next place, I say either the first patent for this trade was a Monopoly, or this is none: the first was none, not only for the reasons I gave before, but because it was a new trade. Patents for new Inventions are not made good by the Statute of 21 of King James, but left as they were before; only they are restrain'd to a number of years, and were always good, because they were for the encouragement of trade, and of useful inventions to increase them.

A fortiori therefore in this case, what is of much greater consequence to the Nation is a point of trade, than any little slight Invention of a particular thing, must be allowed to be good; then I say, sure if the first Patent be not a Monopoly, then neither can this Patent be a Monopoly, for there is no Law that hath declared how long such a trade as this is may be inclosed, as the Statute of 21 King James has set limits for, as new Inventions.

And again, this Company is for the advantage and benefit of the Nation, which a Monopoly can never be: and that it is for the benefit of the Nation, appears by the Statute of the 14th of this King, cap. 24. which recites it to be of great advantage to the publick, and for the encouragement of the publick Trade and Navigation. Here then, my Lord, is both the judgment of the Parliament concerning Companies of this kind, and an encouragement of this particular Company by the whole Parliament.

And again, they are taken notice of in another Statute, made in the 29th of this King, ch. 1. where they are taxed 20 s. for every 100 l. capital Stock in the Company.

Another reason is this, because of the absolute necessity of a Company to manage this trade, not only in respect of the Indians themselves, but also in respect of other foreign Nations, who are rivals to us in this trade, and are ready to take all advantages against us about it. But this part of the case is much more fit to be discourf'd of by Merchants and Statesmen, than Lawyers.

Yet thus far the Law falls in to consider this matter, as they are a Corporation under stipulations and leagues with other Countries for the carrying on of their trade; and so are in the nature almost of foreign Plantations, under a regulated and Christian Government within themselves, whereby those mischiefs chiefs are prevented, that would have fallen upon an unlimited and unregulated trade with Infidels, that are enemies to our Religion and Nation; which the Law, as I have already shewn, takes so much care to prevent.

For other considerations, whether this trade be driven to the full extent of it, or may be more advantageous to be enlarged, as it is proper here to be discoursed of in a court of Law, for the application for that must be made elsewhere; for I do not know any Law that hath made the Defendant a Reformer among us.

My Lord, in the next place, the next question is, whether this prerogative of the King is abridged, or restrain'd by any Act of Parliament, as is insisted on by the Defendant's Counsel; I think not. For,

First, In general the chief trade of this Nation, consisted anciently most in Wool, Wool-Fell and Leather, and with our neighbouring Nations only; and yet,

Secondly, Even that trade was restrain'd in the exercise of it; for none must buy and sell, but he must do it at the Staple, as appears by 2 Edw. III. chap. 9. that abrogates the Staple, and afterwards it was erected again. And then in the Third place, there was no such trade as this or any other ever establish'd with Infidels in those days, and so there was no occasion for such a Law to restrain them.

The best rule therefore to interpret this Act of Parliament, will be to apply the remedy to the inconvenience and mischief, that was before it. If then there was no such inconvenience as this complain'd of, the restriction of the trade with Infidels; then all may reasonably conclude and insist upon it, there was no such remedy as the laying open of a trade, as they alledge, intended to be introduced. But if we consider the Act itself, we shall see some particular reason for the making of it, either for the taking off some cloggs, that were upon the trade then in use, or the providing some remedies which were introduced to obviate the present inconveniences and mischiefs.

First then, for Magna Charta, which hath been cited chap. 30. that gives liberty to Merchants, Quod nisi publicè antea prohibiti fuerint, babeant saluum & securum conductum exire de Anglia & venire in Angliam, & morari & ire per Angliam, tam per terram quam per aquam, ad emendum & vendendum sine omnibus malis tolmetis, &c. præterquam in tempore guerra.

This helped Merchant Strangers in this particular, because before that they could come but at four times in the year, and must stay here but forty days at a time; as my Lord Coke observes in his comment upon that Statute, and cites the Mirror of Justice for it. And if this Law proves any thing relating to this question, it is, that before that Act, Merchants cou'd not go out of the Kingdom, and still they may be prohibited publickly; which, tho' my Lord Coke says must be by Act of Parliament, yet he cites no Law for that opinion, and with submission, the word Publick doth not necessarily import that it shou'd be by Act of Parliament. My Lord, that Law that comes nearest in words to this case here before you, is that of 1st E. III. which is pleaded by the Defendant, that is part of the Act, the latter clause of it; that the Sea be open to all manner of Merchants, to pass with their merchandize whither they please.

This is part of that Law; but, My Lord, the meaning of this Law is quite and clear another thing, as I shall shew with submission most plainly: and I will beg leave, my Lord, a little to introduce it, by giving you a History of this Law, how it comes to be made; for it is but a short one, and 'tis only the last clause of it, that is pleaded by the Defendant.

By the Statute of the 11th of Edw. III. it was made felony to transport Wool, and this my Lord Coke observes in his Comment upon Magna Charta, upon chap. 30. King Edw. III. took advantage of it, for exacting money of the Merchants, for dispensations with the Law, and for licences for transporting of Wool. Hereupon several complaints were made in the Parliament; and particularly, in the 17th year of Edw. III. Rot. Par. nu. 28. the Commons complain, that the Grant of 40 s. upon a Sack of Wool made by the Merchants only, was not to bind the Commons, and therefore pray it may be revoked. The King answer'd, this cannot tend to charge the Commons; for that there was set a certain price upon Wool in every County, which the King willed shou'd stand; and that all Wool sold under that price should be forfeited in the hands of the buyer.

This was in 17 E. III. and this matter, my Lord, among other things, was represented to the same Parliament, by the same Merchants, by way of advice, as a thing fit, 17 E. III. in dorso nu. 58. of the Parliament-Rolls of that year. And they set forth, whereas they were summon'd to Nottingham, to inform the price of Wools, which they did not, regarding the times to come as they say, and that was abused; they pray liberty to buy Wools as freely as other merchandizes, as they can agree between buyer and seller: and that all Indictments and Proceedings contrary to that Law might be stayed; and further they add their advice, that the King would ordain the Staple in some place in England, rather than beyond the seas.

Then comes the 18 E. III. Rot. Parl. nu. 12. among other Petitions of the Commons, there are these which refer to the first part of the Act of Parliament: That the prices set upon the sorts of Wools in every County, which run more to the damage than advantage of the people, might be ousted, and that every one may buy freely, as he can agree with the seller, and none be accused for doing the contrary.

This, my Lord, explains the first part of that Act of Parliament; that the ordinances before this time made upon taking sorts of Wool, which was imprinted in Rastall, and all the Statute-Books; (for the Roll is, sur pris.) and defeated, and that every man as well stranger as Denizen, may henceforth buy Wool as he can agree with the seller, as they were wont to do before the said ordinances.

Now, my Lord, you shall see the latter part of the Act, which is that they plead: among the Petitions of the Commons in the said Roll, there the 5th Petition is, reciting, That whereas the King had granted to them of Flanders, that the Staple for Wool should be held at Bruges; at the time of which Grant, all manner of merchants, that is, Lombards, Genoese, Catalonians, Spaniards, and others, who used to buy the greatest part of the Wool, and carry them out of Flanders by land and sea where they would, to the great profit and increase of the price of Wool, thither coming: yet the Towns of Bruges, Ghent, and Ipres, have of late ordained, That

That no wools coming to the Staple, be sold to strangers, nor carried out of the said Country of Flanders, as they used to be, to the damage of the merchants of England, and of all the commonalty; and therefore they pray remedy hereof.

This is granted by the King, that they may buy wool as they were wont to do; and that a Writ should be sent to the Sheriff to make Proclamation accordingly. Then they pray, that the effect of these answers may be put into writing, in the manner of a Patent under the Great Seal; and this is done, in which there is this very Statute of 18 E. 3. in terminis, as it is printed. And this plainly shews, that the Sea being to be open, and merchants to pass wherever they please, was only in answer to that petition and representation, and to redress the mischief; that they might buy here, and go where they would, and not be necessitated to go and buy at the staple; which was so abused by those of Bruges: And this is likewise pursuant to the advice and petitions of merchants before the 17th E. 3. That the King would establish a staple somewhere in England, and not in parts beyond the Seas.

My Lord, for the rest of the Acts of Parliament that have been cited on the other side, I shall not enter upon them particularly; but this every body at the first sight may see, they carry their own answer along with them, and the occasion of their making does appear in themselves, tho' this did not, and very few of them come up to this Question now before you, or any thing like it, as will appear plainly upon the bare reading of them.

The only Question then my Lord, that remains, is, whether the action lies for the Company? For I think I have made it out, that the King had such a prerogative at Common Law, and no Act of Parliament hath taken it away. Then I say, the Question is, Whether an action lies for the Company? that is, whether it be a bare licence, or coupled with an Interest. And as to that point, I shall be very short, for to me it seems to be no Question at all. For,

First, They are at a great charge and expence to support this trade, and therefore surely they ought to profit by it.

Secondly, They are looked upon by the Parliament to have an interest in this trade, or else they had never been taxed so high as twenty Shillings for every 100 l. in their stock. Then if they have an interest in the trade, this trading of the defendant is an encroachment upon that interest, and then here is damnum & injuria; which will intitle them to an action.

For so it is in other things: A Fair, in some sense, is but a licence to hold a market at such a time, in such a place; but because of the profit that tends to that liberty, and the charge that the party is at in keeping of it, an action does lie against any Man that sets up another Fair, to the prejudice of him that had the first Grant.

In the common case of Patents for new inventions, an action lies for using the invention without licence, because of the interest conveyed by the Grant, and the charge that the party that invents, is at. So that I think, my Lord, with submission, we have here an interest in this trade; and an interest, I say, as well as a licence, well founded upon the King's Letters Patent; which the King had power to make by prerogative at the common Law; and that power not restrained by any Act of Parliament. And therefore I humbly pray your judgement for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Pollexfen, (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) his Argument.

De Term. Pasch. Anno Regni Regis Caroli Secundi xxxvi. Die Lunæ xxi. Aprilis, Anno Dom. 1684, Banco Regis. The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

Mr. Pollexfen.

MAY it please your Lordship, the Governor and company of Merchants of London trading to the East-Indies, they are plaintiffs, and Thomas Sandys is the defendant. If your Lordship please, I will open a little more of the Record than has yet been opened: And the Case upon the Record stands thus:

These plaintiffs bring their action against their defendant, and do declare, That the King by his Letters Patent, in the 13th year of his reign, did grant to them the sole trade, between the Cape of Good Hope and the Streights of Magellan, in the East-Indies: And did also grant unto them, that they, and no body else, should come thither, nor trade there; and they do say, the defendant did come thither, and did trade; and that this is to the plaintiffs damage.

This defendant has prayed Oyer of the Letters Patent; and there are some things that are not mentioned in the Declaration: but not being upon the Record, and appearing upon the Oyer, I crave leave to open them, that I may make use of them in the discourse I am to make; and I desire your Lordship would please to take notice of them.

In the Letters Patent, when they come to the Prohibition and Restraint, the Prohibition and Restraint is in this manner, which they have left out in their declaration, The Letters Patent do prohibit the trading without a licence, upon pain that every such person that shall trade to or from the East-Indies, shall incur the forfeiture of his merchandize, and also of the Ship; one moiety to the King, and the other moiety to the East-India Company.

And then there follows another clause, which is omitted also out of the Declaration; and that is a clause of Grant to the Company, that for any consideration of benefit to their own use, they may grant licence to strangers or others, to trade to and from the East-Indies.

And then there is another clause that is omitted also, and that is this, That the King grants to the Company, that the King will not, without consent of the Company, give licence to any persons besides the Company to trade thither.

And there is likewise another clause which I would take notice of, That no body of the Company should have a vote in the Company, unless he have a stock of 500 l.

These clauses now being in the letters Patent, and the Letters Patent being set forth upon the Record, they are become parts of the Cause.

The defendant has pleaded the Statute of 18 E. 3. and thereupon there is a demurrer.

My Lord, the Questions that are in the Cause are only these two.

First,

First, Whether or no this Grant of the sole trade to the plaintiffs, be a good grant or not? And next,

Secondly, Supposing it should be a good Grant, Whether or no the plaintiffs can maintain this action, as now it is brought?

My Lord, in the argument of this Case divers Things have been said in which I shall differ from the other side; but only take notice how far they may be of force in point of argument, to make the Questions that are in the Case, to turn, as to the Law, one way or other.

My Lord, it is no Question but that the King, by Law, can restrain any of his subjects from going out of the Kingdom: For the King hath a particular interest in the services of his subjects; and therefore it is most reasonable, and an undoubted Rule, I think, in the Law, that the King may restrain any particular subject pro hic & nunc, as the King takes it to be most necessary and convenient for his service to restrain.

Next, my Lord I do not deny, but think it also to be a Law, That the King may restrain all his subjects from a trade to such a particular Country or City, upon some reasons or occasions; as in times of war, and times of plague, that I reckon by law may be done very well.

But, my Lord, that is not the Question in our Case; for the Question in our Case is a Question concerning a sole trade granted to a particular person, or body politick, (which is but one particular person in consideration of Law) with a restraint upon, and excluding all his other subjects. Now from what has been granted already, to argue that the King may grant such a sole trade, is no consequence at all from these positions that have been agreed, i. e. from the authority and power the King has to restrain his subjects from going out of the Kingdom, or to restrain them from trading in such a place. For,

First, As to the power the King has by Law to restrain his subjects from going out of the Kingdom; tho' by Law his power be such, yet first of all it is not a power universal to restrain all his people, but to restrain this or that Man for his particular service, for this or that particular Time. But to make a universal restraint, that none shall go out but you ſ. S. or you such a body politick, will go a great deal further than ever it has been before, or can be conceived.

Next, my Lord, That because the King can restrain trade in time of war, or in time of plague, that therefore he can restrain all his people, and for ever; except such and such particular Men, or a Corporation: that must needs be further than ever any thing I have heard yet to be Law, or could find any foot-steps of.

So that I think there are no inferences can be drawn from these things, that can conclude any thing as to its particular point that now we are upon, i. e. That the King can grant a sole trade to any particular person and body politick, and their successors for ever; and restrain and exclude all his other subjects from that trade. My Lord, that will not be, I think, a consequence that can be drawn from any of the positions that I have laid down.

And, My Lord, further I would observe this in the arguing of this Case, That when they lay down this as a general position, That the King can restrain his subjects; there is no distinction, nor is there any foundation in Law for it, betwixt going to an Infidel Country, or going to a Christian Country. For it is as undoubted, the King may restrain any of his subjects, as the King's pleasure shall be, or as there shall be war or plague, and such other occasions as may require it, from going into a Christian Country, as well as he may from going into an infidel one. And therefore if the argument have weight in it in this point, it hath weight as well to affect Christian Countries, and the whole trade abroad with them, as Infidel Countries, and trading with them.

And there is no difference at all from this reason or foundation, that can be inferred, as I can make.

Next, my Lord, when they argue and make use of the Statute of 3 Jac. Cap. 6. which enacts, That the King's subjects shall freely trade to Spain, and Portugal, notwithstanding the Charters of incorporation granted to some Merchants, and the prohibitions in those Charters: If they will say that those Charters of restraint were lawfully granted, then they do argue for a power in the King to restrain trade even to Christian Countries; which is a thing, under favour, that never was yet affirmed, as I remember, but rather the contrary admitted: And if they say, those Charters that were granted for restraint of trade to Spain and Portugal, were not lawful, because they were christian Countries, then the Statute makes nothing for them: for sure it is no argument, that because an unlawful Charter was granted, therefore another unlawful Charter may be granted; or because that was void; therefore the other should not be void; no, rather the contrary.

My Lord, these things I have taken notice of, because they are matters that have been insisted on in the argument on the other side; and I would lay what is not necessary out of the Case. And I now come to the great point of this Case, and which indeed is a great point in the consequence of it.

First, Whether the Grant of sole trade to the plaintiffs, be a good Grant or not?

And I humbly conceive, such a Grant of a sole trade to any particular person, or body politick, with a restraint to all others, is against the Law of the land, and by the Common Law void; and this I shall endeavour to prove from good authorities.

1. By the Common Law, trade is free and open for the King's subjects; and for that the Books that I shall cite are these, 3 Inst. 181. Commercium Jure Gentium commune esse debet, & non in Monopolium & privatum pauculorum Quæstum convertendum; iniquum est alios permittere, alios inhibere Mercatorem.

The next Book, my Lord, is Fitzb. Nat. Br. fo. 85. that says thus; Note, That by the course of Common Law, every Man may at his pleasure go out of the Realm for merchandize, or to travel, or other cause, as shall please him, without demanding licence of the King; and shall not be punished for it. And the Stat. of 5 R. 2. c. 2. which prohibited all but the great Men and Merchants, to pass out of the Realm without licence, has therein declared the Law, when it excepted Merchants, that they had a right to go without licence: But this Statute is repealed afterwards by the Statute of 4 Jac. Cap. 1.

Then,

Then, my Lord, there is Rolls, 1 Rep. fol. 4. the taylor of Ipswich's Case against Sberring. The words and sense of the Books are, That no Trade, Mechanick, or Merchant, can be hindered by the King's Patent. A Patent to hinder trade at sea, is a void Patent; a Patent that only a hundred persons shall use such a trade, is not good.

Dyer 165. That every one may at his pleasure go with his Goods; and cites F. N. B. for it. And F. N. B. 85. saith thus, Note, That by the Common Law, every Man may at his pleasure go out of the Realm for merchandize, or to travel, without demanding licence of the King.

These, my Lord, are the Books; and thus they speak generally at the Common Law: and I offer it to your Lordship as a further reason, That the Common Law is such, notwithstanding all their arguments, in regard that the Common Law, as far as it is against ingrossing, is also against all sole trade. For, my Lord, all sole trade is ingrossing, as I take it, with submission; appropriating trade and merchandize to a particular person or persons, or body politick, excluding others, is ingrossing such trade. Now that ingrossing is against the Common Law, and against the very fundamentals and principles of the Common Law; that, I think I need not labour much to prove, nor shall I go about to cite many Books to prove that.

That ingrossing any sort of merchandize is an offence at Common Law, vide 3 Inst. 196. And in the Case Dominus Rex vers. Crispe & al. here was lately an agreement betwixt copperas-makers and copperas-merchants, for the buying of all copperas: These copperas-makers should for three years make at so much a Ton; and restraining them from selling to any others. It was here adjudged an ingrossing, upon an information.

And if a Company of Merchants shall buy up here in like manner, all the merchandize of Spain, or Portugal, or the Canaries, or other town or place, for three years to come; this, I think, would be an ingrossing, and the contract against law.

But then, my Lord, to prove that sole trade is ingrossing, that the nature of the thing must speak; for whosoever has the sole trade of buying and selling of such a sort of commodity, or whosoever has the sole trade to any particular Country or Place, has thereby the sole ingrossing, and sole having of all the commodities of that place; so likewise has he the sole buying: and all the people that have to deal about the commodities that are to be vended and vented in that Country or Place, are at his will and pleasure; and thereby he makes all those his own, and he makes what price he pleases, and orders and disposes of them, both as to value and every thing else, as his own. And thereby, my Lord, I take it, it must be ingrossing; and every monopolizing of buying and selling, or of trade, is ingrossing. But that only ingrossing is by particular agreement and contracts between particular Men, among one another, without the King's authority, or help of his Letters Patent; but monopolizing is ingrossing under colour of authority, by help of those Letters Patent that create them: for the consequence of it must be, that they would sell at their own prices, and thereby exact upon the King's subjects: And their Patent for the sole trade to the East-Indies, invests them in all the merchandizes of these Countries, and ingrosseth all in their hands. Then if ingrossing by the Common Law be forbidden, and it is unlawful to do it, all Letters Patent to authorize and help Men to ingross, must needs be as void as that, which is the end of ingrossing; and that is monopolizing.

My Lord, in the 3d Inst. 181. the Case of John Peachy, in 50 E. 3. who was severely punished for procuring a Grant or Licence under the Great Seal, that he only might sell sweet wines in London, is a strong case for us. For, my Lord, this was ingrossing by colour of the King's Grant, and punished as a great offence: And the case of Monopolies, that are reported 11 Co. 84. Moor 673. and in Noy, do prove that monopolizing is ingrossing, and the same law that is against ingrossing is against monopolizing; and the same law that makes the one void, makes the other void.

In Darcy's case, where a Grant by Patent was made to him, for the sole importing from beyond sea, and the selling of cards under a rent, and prohibiting all others to sell; there it was adjudged a void Grant.

And the Stat. of 21 Jac. cap. 3. does declare all Monopolies to be void at Common Law; so then if this Grant be a Grant to you, to ingross or monopolize, I think it will be easily concluded to be against the Common Law, and made void thereby.

Next, my Lord, that this Grant of the sole trade to the East-Indies, is against the ancient Statute Laws of this land, I think is plain also. As for the Statute of Monopolies, I shall crave leave to speak of it by itself, by and by: But I say it is against the ancient Statutes of this Kingdom. Magna Charta, 9 H. 3. cap. 30. all Merchants, if they were not prohibited before, should have their sure and safe conduct to depart out of England, and come into England, and stay, and go thro' England, as well by land as by water, to buy and sell without any evil tolls, by the ancient and just custom, except in time of war. And my Lord Coke says, That in this Act, Nisi publice prohibiti fuerint, is intended of a prohibition by the publick council of the Kingdom, by Act of Parliament. So that this Act does in these words make our case: It says, They shall, if not openly prohibited, have safe and sure conduct: And if that open or publick prohibition must be by Act of Parliament, so it is probably a declaration of the Common Law. Then here is no such in this case, no prohibition by Act of Parliament to restrain from going to the East-Indies, but the defendant may go thither if he please. The Stat. of 2 Ed. 3. cap. 9. That all Merchants, Strangers, &c. may go and come with their merchandize into England, after the tenor of the Great Charter.

The Statute that is pleaded 18 E. 3. cap. 3. That all Merchants, Strangers, and Denizens, and all other and every of them, of what estate and condition soever they be, shall sell their merchandizes from whencesoever they come, freely, without interruption; and shall have the Sea open to them, to pass with their merchandize where they shall please, without interruption, excepting to the King's enemies; and that this Act shall be observed and performed notwithstanding any Charter to the contrary; and that Charters to the contrary are of no force, but are to the King's damage, and to the oppression of the Commons.

Stat. 14 E. 3. cap. 2. recites Magna Charta, and enacts, That all Merchants, Aliens, and Denizens, may without Lett, safely come with their merchandize, safely tarry, and safely return.

U u u

Now

Now, if so be, all Merchants, Strangers, &c. shall sell their merchandize wherever they come, without interruption, and that enacting clause be large enough, as sure it is; then it has an express clause, That all Charters and Patents to the contrary are void, as being to the King's damage, and the oppression of the people; and therefore they are all by the Parliament declared to be void.

The Stat. of 25 E. 3. cap. 2. confirms the former Stat. of 9 E. 3. and has the same clause in effect; If any Proclamation or Commission be to the contrary, it shall be void. The Statutes of 2 R. 2. cap. 1. and 11 R. 2. cap. 7. confirm the two former Acts, and enact, That all Charters, Letters Patent, and Commands to the contrary, shall be void. So that, my Lord, those many Statutes, as most of the old ones being penned in general, (but short) words, and being in favour of trade, have been taken to extend generally, for the general and most large advantage of trade; tho' perhaps some particular trades were by construction mostly concerned; as the Statutes of the Staple might be the occasion of making some part of them. But they do enact, as your Lordship sees, in general words, That all Grants and Letters Patent to the contrary, shall be void; and surely this would have never been put in, but that in all times Grants have been made, which the King has been deceived in, and found them contrary to his real advantage, though they have been otherwise pretended, and were to the oppression of the people, and therefore void.

In the 2 Inst. 63. my Lord Coke, in his observation upon the consideration of Magna Charta, and the several Statutes that were after that made in reference to trade, says, That upon this Chap. of Mag. Chart. (to wit) the 30th, this conclusion is necessarily gathered, That all Monopolies concerning trade and traffick are against the liberty and freedom granted and declared by his Great Charter, and against divers other Acts of Parliament, which are good Commentaries upon it. So that, my Lord, I do not offer it only as my present thoughts, but what has been taken for Law heretofore; that those Acts are of general extent, and all Charters made to the contrary, are ipso facto void, and of no force.

Obj. My Lord, they say it is true, if we are a Monopoly, then the Law is against us; but we are no Monopoly.

Resp. My Lord, to prove they are a Monopoly, that is the next thing, which, with your Lordship's favour, I shall go about.

And for that I shall first take the description that is of a Monopoly, made by my Lord Coke, in his chap. of Monopolies, in the 3d Inst. 181. and if it is possible to exempt them out of that description, I confess then they have a stronger Case than I do hope they have.

A Monopoly, (says he) is an institution, or an allowance by the King, by his Grant, Commission, or otherwise, to any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, of or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of any thing, whereby any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade.

First, My Lord, I think by their Patent, they have the sole trade granted to them; that is, the sole buying and selling (for merchandizing consists in buying and selling) and therefore they have the sole buying and selling in the East-Indies; and they have consequently the sole selling of the commodities when they come home; for none else can bring them home but them, if their Charter be good.

The sole using of any thing, is a general word; and another part of this description, sole trading, is sole using of merchandizes, in a particular place to which they trade; and so they are within all the words sole selling, sole buying, sole using.

Secondly, They are also within the latter part; whereby any person is hindered or restrained from any freedom or liberty they had before, or in their lawful trade: For that it is lawful for them, as I hope I shall make it appear, as I think, upon the Patent granted to seize the Ships and Goods of those that trade thither; and the bringing of this action is a sufficient proof that you were hinderers of this trade, and peoples going thither to traffick. So I think, my Lord, they come within every part of the description that's given in that Book of a Monopoly.

Next, my Lord, I think that all the evils and mischiefs that are in the Books taken notice of to be in Monopolies, are also in this case; and whatsoever hath the evils and mischiefs attending Monopolies, it is a great and shrewd argument, that that which hath the effect, hath also the cause.

The evils and mischiefs that attend Monopolies, are, first, That the price of the commodities they sell, shall be kept up, and raised higher than otherwise it would be: He that hath the sole sale, will keep up the price as high as he pleases; this is one of the evils mentioned in the case of Monopolies, reported by my Lord Coke, lib. 11. fo. 86. b. the truth whereof I think is evident enough in that Company; for the price and value of things they bring from thence, are of their own setting, and at their own disposal. Nothing among men is more evident than that, and indeed it must be a most wonderful virtue, and a mighty contempt of riches, that a Man who hath the sole commodity in his hands, will not sell it for the most he can; or not keep up the price, and make the most of it; and in things that he buys, to be sure he will buy as cheap as he can; and in things that he sells, he will sell as dear as he can; and I think that he that has such a power must be a man of an extraordinary virtue, if he do not execute it.

Secondly, Another evil of Monopoly is, that it is pro privato pauculorum questu, which is likewise mentioned in the margin of the Book cited before, 3 Inst. 181. Now whether this trade be for particular private gain of a few or no, I think any Man that knows any thing will be satisfied about it in his own mind, who considers the present state and condition of this Company. It is not upon Record indeed, but sure it is easily gathered as a consequence; and it will appear plainly by this reason to be pro privato pauculorum questu: for trade is not in its own nature fixed and stable, but varying and altering, sometimes better, sometimes worse, sometimes beneficial, sometimes detrimental, according as the times of war and peace, sickness, scarcity of this or that commodity, in this or that Country; or the modes and customs of the Country, or the manners and habits of men do occasion it: And the Merchants by their education and observation, are those that govern and manage this trade for the maintenance of themselves and their families, and the general good of Men; and direct and employ their their Estates and Traffick into this or that part of the World, as time and occasion shall give them best encouragement.

But a sole trade granted into this or that part of the World to one Company, and of another part to another, sets up particular men that head that Company, but destroys all other Merchants and inferior people; all shipping must be subject to the prices these Impropriators of trade will allow them, or else lie still and be destroy'd, for none else must employ them, nor can do it; and so must all Masters of Ships, for it is necessary to them in order for their livelihood, that they go such Voyages, and these cannot go, except upon the terms that the Company will allow of. So all Mariners, Artificers, Factors and all other persons, whose employments depend upon this trade, must be subject to their will and pleasure: and of how great consequence that may be to the Kingdom, my Lord, does deserve consideration.

Thirdly, A third evil and mischief in Monopolies is, that they are to the oppression of the King's people, and any body, I think, that has known any thing of late years about this Company, that is, that knows their dealings with and handling of their factors and servants, that get any thing in their service, and other people that they employ, will find instances enough of their oppression; and that will be enough to satisfy any man, what kind of people they are: for what a work is there, when they have any factor or servant, or any body else, that has got any thing in their service? Those things indeed are not upon the Record, but they are consequences that are visible to every body: and the truth of it is, in all Patents for sole trade, so it will be. So that if the evils and mischiefs, which the Common Law forbids, and endeavours to prevent, by judging all Monopolies, Ingrossings and sole Trade unlawful, be to be avoided, the evils and mischiefs attending their Patent and sole Trade are perhaps the greater, because their trade is the greatest that ever England knew.

My Lord, in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, 222. there is this said, and I urge it for this reason; because, if so be these are consequences of a sole trade, it cannot be denied but these are oppressions of all the King's people. Now there it is said, that every Grant of the King has a condition implied in it, Quod Patria per Donationem non magis solito oneretur seu gravetur; so the Book of 13 H. IV. 14. Grant le Roy, to the charge or prejudice of the subjects, is void: and therefore the King is deceived in this Grant; and the Grant is as well by the Common Law, as all these ancient Statutes void.

Obj. Ay, but say they, this is not a Patent granted to the advantage of a few, or for the raising of the prizes and monopolizing of commodities; but for good government and order, and the preservation of this trade, that otherwise would be destroyed: and say they, there have been such Grants heretofore, to Turkey, Barbary, and other places.

Rep. It is true, my Lord, this is said; and that Patent does say, that it is for good order and government, and the advantage of trade. But I pray, my Lord will also remember, what our Books say concerning such Grants and Monopolies, in 2 Inft. 540. that new Corporations trading into foreign parts and at home, tho' under the fair pretence of order and government, yet in conclusion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies. This is an old observation, for in the 11th Rep. 88. b. in the end of the case of Monopolies, there are these words: Privilegia quæ re vera sunt in Præjudicium, Reip. magis tamen speciosa habent Frontispicia, & boni publici prætextum, quam bonæ & legales Concessionēs, sed prætextu liciti non debent admitti illicitum. Those are the words of that Book; and there it is also taken notice of, that Darcy's Patent had a most glorious and specious preamble; for there it is mention'd, that the subjects might exercise themselves in husbandry and lawful employments, and that Cards-making had made Cards playing more frequent, and principally among Servants and Apprentices; and therefore the sole making, and trade of Cards selling, was granted to Darcy. Observe, says the Book, what a glorious pretext and preamble this odious Monopoly had.

There is the case of Horn and Ivy, Mich. 20 Car. II. Rot. 403. A patent made three years after the Patent given to the Company, and in imitation thereof, the Patent is to the Canary Company; and recites, that the trade to the Canaries was of great advantage to the King's subjects at that time; and by reason of too much excess in trading of subjects there, our merchandizes were decreased in their value; so that the King's subjects were forced to carry Silver there to get Wines: and all this happened for want of regulation and good government, and thereupon the Patent did constitute Sir Arthur Ingram, and about sixty persons more by name. And all those, that had been traders there within seven years, for the value of 1000*l.* a year, should be a Company and Body politic and corporate by such a name; that there should be a Governor, a Deputy-Governor, and twelve assistants, and names them, but to be continued by election, and should have the sole trade to these Islands; that no other shou'd haunt or visit these Islands, and prohibits all others under pain of forfeiture and imprisonment, and indeed follows very much the frame of this Patent, with a non-obstante to the Statute of Monopolies. But notwithstanding this glorious preamble, this Patent was soon after condemn'd, both in this Court, and afterwards in the Parliament for the abuse of trade, and the regulation of it for the general good, which is the thing that is pretended; but few men can doubt what is really intended by that; and no one I think can doubt, what is the real intention of this Patent under the name of regulation and government: to ingross all into the hands of ten or twelve men, is most excellent regulation and government.

My Lord, as to the other Companies and Charters that have been granted, supposing that all these Grants were such as this, and used and practised as this is, it is no argument that they are legal, or that this was good. For, my Lord, it is well known, both by the ancient Statutes that I have cited, and by common experience, that there have been in all ages and times Patents granted, that were not by Law grantable, but the King was deceived in them, and those Patents were void and of no force; and therefore it is no argument, because there have been many such Grants and Patents in former times, that this should be good.

I agree, my Lord, if ever this Grant or any Grant like this had come in question, and had receiv'd any judicial allowance to be good, it had been something; but otherwise it can be no inference at all, because there are others, this is a good one.

U u u 2

But,

But, my Lord, to keep myself close to the point of Monopolies; Monopolies have been granted in the best of times, in Queen Elizabeth's time, there was Darcy's Patent granted then; and it appears there had been grants to divers others of the sole making and felling of Cards, but when it was question'd, it was condemn'd. Statute 9 E. III. cap. 1. and the other Statutes before cited, the clauses that say all Patents granted or to be granted contrary to the freedom of trade in these Statutes mentioned, prove,

First, That such Patents have been.

Secondly, That they did foresee, and provided against, those that would be.

The Proviso in the Statute of 43 Eliz. cap. 1. sect. 9. shews also that Monopolies were granted; but so far were they from receiving any allowance, or approbation, that that Statute, that was made in the end of her reign, for confirmation of the Queen's Grants by a special Proviso, does except and provide that it should not extend to make good any Letters Patent, that did concern any licences, powers or privileges, commonly called monopolies.

The Statute of Monopolies and this Statute sufficiently shew, that there were such Grants, and that they were not allowed; so that even in Queen Elizabeth's time, and during her reign, divers such Grants it seems had been made. But, my Lord, if so be there had never been any judicial allowance in times past for any sole trade, or sole buying or selling, tho' there have been in all times such Grants made, yet that will be no argument that they were good; but on the contrary; and further the practices of these Companies have been to the contrary, till within late years; no sole trade practised among them.

But, my Lord, on the contrary, since that Patents have been so granted, since that there is no judicial allowance of such; I would appeal to them to shew whether there has been any practice of these things. I do not suppose, but that in Turky and Barbary, persons have traded, that have not been licensed by the Companies, and that continually in all times; but yet I think no-body will find any judicial opinion, that has been given against them for it, or that ever any such Patent was of force to restrain the subjects freedom of trade in those places.

My Lord, I am apt to think, that the Grants to those Companies, that is, the Turky-Company, the Barbary-Company, and the Russia-Company, are like to this of sole trade; but yet if it never has been practised to restrain others in this manner, it is rather an argument against them of the other side; but they have never dealt thus, nor used the clause of prohibition as these men do. For, my Lord, whoever thinks to make any conclusion for the preservation of such a sole trade by a Company, with a restraint of others, because such Patents and Charters have been granted to other Companies, will have but little reason so to do, if he consider what a difference there is between this Company and them: for, my Lord, these Companies did never set up for a sole trade, tho' there be such words in the Patents, they never used them, but have always used their trade quite contrary, and in another method in a commendable way, and I think in a legal way; but not so as to warrant any thing of this, that is here pretended. Therefore, if your Lordship please to give me leave, I would observe the difference betwixt the way of trading, that those other Companies have, and the trade of the East-India Company. The Companies of Turky, Barbary, Russia, Muscovy and Hamburg, nor any other, till of late years, did ever trade with a Joint-Stock; but the Members of the said Company, every man used his own trade, bought and sold his own commodity, used and employed his own factors and servants; and the Company took care to send out a Consul, or some one to be their Agent, to preserve the trade, and by small imposts upon the commodities traded for, to provide for such Officers: which Imposts or Assessments were made by By-Laws and Regulations among themselves. They take care the Markets shall not be over-clogged by the commodities they send out, which they do also by their own Orders and By-Laws that are made among themselves; they only order what Ships shall go, but leave the particular Members of the Company, every man to send what he will upon his own account, and appoint who he will to be his factor, and to bring over what commodity he pleases: they trade not upon any Joint-Stock, or the Stock of the body politick. If you deal with any of them, you know the particular person you have to deal with: no man is refused to be of their Company, that has a mind, paying some small sum of money for his freedom; and whoever is of the Company, has a Vote in ordering the affairs of the Company. But now you of the East-India Company ingross the sole trade into the body politick; you have a Joint-Stock, every man whether Merchant or not, if he can buy such a share in their Stock, is of their Company. The Committee manage, and the rest must submit to their pleasures and distribution: those few of them which have the most shares, have the disposal of the whole Stock; no Member trades, buys or sells, or has any thing that he calls his own, but only such a share in the Stock: you suffer not the Members to trade with their own money, at their own discretion, or to employ whom they please, this you do not do; you suffer no man to have a Vote among you (and your Letters Patent have such a clause that none shall) but he, who has 500*l.* Stock; which 500*l.* no man can acquire, unless he pays 14*l.* or 15*l.* for it, two and a half per Cent, or some great sum. So that by the very foundation, they can have no more persons in their Company, than they that have 500*l.* shares; and these shares being ingrossed into few hands, they have all, and call themselves the Company. So that man that will not be deceived by words, but distinguish things different one from another, will distinguish between one Company and Society, and another; who are Ingrossers, Monopolizers, and who not.

The Turky Company, and the rest like it, may be truly said to be Managers, Regulators and Improvers of trade. They have no Joint-Stock, that they trade upon, they ingross not, they admit every man that will to be free of their Company; to trade with his own money, his own credit, and buy and sell his own, and to employ whom he pleaseth; and none among them under pretence of government, regulation and preservation of trade, makes unreasonable advantages.

But this invisible East-India Merchant; the Body politick, covers and countenances some few men among them, to ingross, buy and sell at their own rates, and that exclude all others for the great and excessive advantages of the few.

The other Companies, as the Turky Company, &c. have not any sole buying or selling, nor exercising any sole trade or ingrossing.

Every Member of these Companies, which are a multitude, and every one that is not, may if he will be a Member, and no man is excluded.

But this Company is quite contrary, and therefore (if ever any was) are great Ingrossers and Monopolizers of trade. I do not argue nor speak against Companies, nor regulating, nor managing trade, which was the true intent of the Patent; such as I have mention'd, and is virtuously and commendably practis'd in the great Companies of Turky, Muscovy, Hamburg, and others; where the Members of the Companies trade upon their own particular Stock and Estates, and no Merchant hinder'd or denied to be a Member, that desires it, paying it's ordinary fees of admission: but against the invisible Merchant, this politick capacity trading in Joint-Stock.

Suppose a like Patent to any one, or two, or three men, Farmers or Partners in their private capacity of this sole trade; and they had the management of it, and hereby possessors of such vast wealth and merchandize:

What wou'd this politick body (I mean the principal Members, for the Body cannot think or have sense) judge of this?

Perhaps yours is much worse, there a man should know with whom he dealt, who were his debtors, and how to come at them; but dealing with you is a kind of dealing with spirits, an invisible body, only subsisting in Intelligentia Legis.

Therefore being so unlike the other Companies, and so contrary to them, you have no countenance from them; but tho' they are good and commendable, you are Ingrossers and Monopolizers.

This shews the great and vast difference between the one and the other; this shews that you, that are the East-India Company, have the sole trade as a Company; and whoever buys in many Stocks, has as many votes as he has 500*l.* in the Stock.

There is no such thing in any other Company, but quite otherwise in all these respects; but hereby it comes to pass, that he that has so many shares in the Stock, has an absolute power, by having so many votes.

The invisible Body or Corporation perhaps trade for 1000000*l.* per Ann. they get into their hands to sell 7 or 800000*l.* worth of merchandize at a time; the three last sales they made came to 1800000*l.* no body hath these commodities but they. Is this trading, and no ingrossing or monopolizing? It is their wonderful virtue then, hatred and contempt of riches, that makes them not to raise and increase values and prices, and be as rich as they please, if they do not do it. Never was there such an instance of so great a trade in England, but none of your Members buys or trades at all; any man among you whether he be Merchant or not Merchant, Citizen or Gentleman, or what he will, if he has a Stock, his Stock goes on by this joint-trade, but it is a few men that manage the whole as they see best; no man employs ships or workmen as he thinks most convenient; but you are one great trader in this vast trade, which is indeed one quarter part of the trade of the whole World.

My Lord, this being then the great difference between this trade by a Joint-Stock, and in the Company as a body politick, which is but as one entire person, having the trade entire to himself, and the trade of particular Members, under orderly regulations:

It is quite a different and distinct thing from any thing, in any of the other Companies; that they would be liken'd unto, to obtain their own ends; nor is there any reason to make them like one another; for the whole matter is carried on distinct in both; the one is a sole trade by a body politick, the other dispersed thro' the Members, according to their own discretion and occasion, under regulation. No man, if he comes into the East-India Company, can trade among you, or vote among you, unless he have 500*l.* Stock; and if he do not come in, (since it is according to your constitution; that every man should have as many votes as he has 500*l.*) his vote is like to do him little good, if some few men in the Company agree against it.

And besides this, my Lord, in the Turky Company, where they trade as distinct Members, every man knows his creditor and his debtor, because they deal in their natural capacities; but you trading in capacity of a body politick, every man that trades with you has a creditor or a debtor, he knows not whom.

And it is a great mischief, when persons know not how to sue or how to deal with them; for take them all apart, they are as just and as good people to deal with, as can be; but take them together as a body, what more hard to deal with than a Corporation?

My Lord, we have seen the instance of these things in this Company, in a few days they having so great power, that none could contend with them, and soon after so invisible as well as low, that no dun can find them. This we all know very well, my Lord; and I instance in this to shew, that whereas they would be likened to other Companies, which were created for the preservation and benefit of trade; and the Members of it are under the regulation and government of the Company, but not as you are; they are traders, your Members are none, you are only the Body politick, the invisible Merchant; that no one knows where to find; and a Body politick, in judgment of Law, has neither Soul nor Conscience, and yet forsooth are traders.

I only instance in these things, to shew that signifies nothing, which you did insist upon, that there are other Companies for trade; for I say, that they are good and regular, and not Monopolizers, for they do not trade in such a manner by sole buying and selling, but every one trades as a particular Merchant; but you are otherwise, your body politick is the sole Merchant, and none of your Members can trade, unless a particular servant, perhaps to save charges, you give him leave to buy or deal in some little things; but all others are quite excluded.

My Lord, having thus shewed you the way of their trade in sole buying and sole selling, I shall now in the next place come to the Statute of Monopolies, which is the Statute of 21 King James, chap. 3. and I hope I shall plainly shew you, that they are within the words and meaning of that Statute.

By that Statute, my Lord, it is enacted, that all Monopolies, Commissions, Grants, Licences, Charters and Letters Patent granted, or to be granted to any particular persons, Bodies politick or corporate, of, or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of any thing within this Realm; and all Proclamations, Inhibitions, Restrain's, Restraints, Warrants of Assistance; and all other matters and things whatsoever, tending to the instituting, erecting, strengthening, furthering, or countenancing the same contrary to the Laws of this Realm, are and shall be utterly void and of none effect.

And that all Persons, Bodies politick and corporate, which now are, or hereafter shall be; shall stand and be disabled to have, use, exercise or put in ure any Monopoly or such Commission, Grant, Licence, Charter, Letters Patent, Proclamations, Inhibitions, Restraint or other matter, or thing tending as aforesaid; or any liberty, power or faculty, grounded or pretended to be grounded upon them.

Then, my Lord, there follows the clauses of forfeiture of treble damages to the party grieved, by the using of any such Monopoly: then there is the clause about new Inventions and some other things; then comes the Proviso concerning Corporations, of which some use being made in this case, I shall crave leave to consider it distinctly.

Provided also, and it is hereby enacted, that this Act or any thing therein contain'd, shall not in any wise extend or be prejudicial to the City of London, &c. or any Corporation, Company or Fellowship of any Art, Trade, Occupation or Mystery, or to any Companies or Societies of Merchants, within the Realm, erected for the maintenance, enlarging or ordering of any trade or merchandize; but that the same Charters, Corporations, Companies, Fellowships and Societies, and their Liberties, Privileges, Powers and Immunities shall be and continue of like force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and no other, any thing in this Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The next Proviso extends to Patents granted, or to be granted for Printing, making of Salt-Petre, and Offices, which do not concern the case in question.

By the description of a Monopoly, which I have before, out of my Lord Coke, stated and express'd, this sole trade granted to you, and the exclusion of all others, is a Monopoly within that description, as I have before shewn that their Charter is directly contrary to this Act. My Lord, first, that they are within the enacting clause of this Act, this I think, by comparing what they claim with the enacting clause, will plainly appear. I need not now stand so much upon the word Monopoly, whether by what I have said, I have proved them a Monopoly or no; but by the other words of the Statute, supposing that word Monopoly was out of the Act, yet they are within it: for the Act of Parliament having the words of sole selling, or sole buying, or sole using of any thing; if they have the sole buying or sole selling, or sole using of this trade, then they are most plainly, I think, within the enacting words of this Act of Parliament.

Now, my Lord, that their Charter is directly contrary to the enacting words, I must also therein refer my self to the words of the Charter, which has sole buying; for all others are prohibited so much as to come and go from and to the East-Indies without their licence. It has also sole selling; for all others are prohibited to import any commodity from thence into the Realm; and they cannot sell them, except they import them. They have likewise the sole using; for they have granted to them the sole trade, which includes all buying, selling, sole using, that appropriates all to themselves, and excludes all others.

How then, my Lord, can any man read this Act of Parliament and their Charter, and compare them together, but he must at the same time conclude, that their Charter is contrary to what is enacted there? For the Act of Parliament does say, That all Letters Patent granted to any Person, or body politick, for the sole buying, sole selling, or sole using any thing, and all Proclamations, Restraints and Inhibitions to the contrary, and all other matters and things touching thereunto, are contrary to law, and utterly void, and of none effect; why then they have by their Grant, the sole buying, sole selling, and sole using of this trade; therefore they are quite contrary to what is in the enacting words of this Act of Parliament. Then, my Lord, if they are contrary to the enacting clause of the Act, then their hopes must be, that they are saved by the Proviso.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Act, in 3 Inst. 182. does say this Act is forcibly and vehemently penned for the suppression of all Monopolies; and the word sole using, is there said to be so general, as no Monopoly can be raised but will be within the reach of this Statute.

The word, any-thing, shews also the general scope and intent, that nothing should be excluded that was a Monopoly: For Monopolies in times past, were ever without Law, but never without friends. And if it be so penned for the suppression of all, it ought to have a large and general construction.

Obj. But then let us see whether they are in the saving of this Proviso.

The Proviso excepts Charters to Companies or Societies of Merchants within this Realm, erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering of trade or merchandize.

Resp. This Proviso extends not to this Charter, or any Letters Patent that were not at the time of the making of this Act; and that is the first thing that I offer, why they are not within the reach of the Proviso. Because this Proviso does not extend to any Letters Patent after the Act of Parliament made, but only the Letters Patent before. For the Proviso says, It shall not extend, or be prejudicial to any Town corporate, concerning any Charter granted to them, &c. or Customs used by them, or to Societies erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering any trade or merchandize. This does extend to those that were granted or erected at the time of the making of the Act; and there are no words of saving, for any that should hereafter be erected. And the word hereafter would as well have been in the clause of saving, as in the enacting clause, if it had been intended. But the following words concluding this Proviso, shew it further; for the Proviso goes on, and says, That the same Charters, Customs, Corporations, Fellowships and Societies, and their Liberties, &c. shall be and continue of such force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and no other. This shews, that that which is within the Proviso, was that which was before the making of the Act only; and this governs and concludes the whole Proviso. Now that only extending to those that then were, and to leave them as they were, to leave their Charters and Companies, their Powers and Privileges, in the same state and condition as they were before the Act; can never have any reference to what should be after.

can

The beginning of the Proviso says, this Act shall not prejudice them: the conclusion says, they shall be as they were before the Act was made; therefore they must have had a being before the Act, but no words herein extend to those that then had not a being.

And, my Lord, the next Proviso for printing, salt-petre, offices, &c. that is to this, further shews this to be the meaning of this Proviso; for that expressly provides, That this Act, or any thing therein contained, shall not extend to any Grant or Privilege heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, of, for, or concerning printing. If then the former clause had intended to include any Letters Patent that were after to be granted, it would have had these words, To be granted as well here as in the clause that comes afterwards.

But, my Lord, suppose this not to be a sufficient answer to this Proviso, but that this Proviso shall be construed to extend to Companies, Charters, Privileges, and Immunities, granted after this Act; yet the plaintiffs are not within this Proviso, nor the saving of it: For it extends only to Companies that are for the maintenance, enlargement, or ordering of any trade or merchandize, and to their powers, &c. that they have to that end not two Companies, that are erected to have a sole trade by a joint stock, or stock of the corporation, to exclude all others from having any thing to do in that trade. It does, and reasonably may be intended to extend to all Companies that are for the maintenance, increase, and well ordering of trade; as the Turky Company, the Muscovy Company, the Russia Company, and Hamborough Company; and those that I have been speaking of, that trade not as bodies politick, or a joint stock, but every Merchant that will, may be thereof a Member; and every member thereof trades upon his own private stock and account as a Merchant: but not to this Company, who instead of ordering the trade, endeavour to bring the sole trade unto themselves.

Therefore, my Lord, these are the Companies that are within the exception saved from the penalty of this Act; but we must be as silly as the Infidels they deal with in these matters, not to distinguish betwixt these corporations, and their management and yours; they exclude none from trade, they trade not in a politick capacity in a sole stock, but every man is a trader upon his own peculiar; but you take upon you in your politick capacity, as you have expressed it in your declaration, totum, integrum & solum Commercium & Negotiationem habere, uti & gaudere; and to exclude not only all strangers, but all your own members, to have any distinct or separate trade upon his own account, except a little to pay and excuse you of charges, and thereby ingross all that vast quantity of merchandizes, the many hundred thousand pounds worth you bring in or carry out. In whom is the property? In the corporation. Who buys and sells all? The corporation. Who are the debtors for the money that buys and provides these merchandizes? The body politick, the corporation, the invisible body. Who shall be sued for all these debts? The body politick; sue them as you can, they will be either too great and too rich to contend with, or else in that condition as you know not how or where to have them.

An invisible body, subsisting only in Intelligentia legis, a body politick without soul or conscience, as the Law says it to be.

We have seen them in a year's time, in both these qualifications, so great as scarce any man would contend with them, so invisible at another time, as a dun would scarce find them; this surely cannot be for maintenance or enlargement of trade, to deal with I know not whom, where no security or person subsists.

It is indeed for the maintenance of the Company's trade, to enable some of them to get 10 or 20000*l. per annum* by it, and to keep this vast trade in a few hands.

But sure that is not of the trade the Proviso intends; restraining to the body politick, which is but one person, or many in partnership, is quite contrary to the enlargement of the Proviso mentioned.

And therefore to say you are within the saving by this Proviso, a Company erected for the maintenance and enlargement of trade, when you restrain all but yourselves to trade, seems to be a contradiction.

And for the following words in the Proviso, Or ordering of any trade or merchandize; if you say you are saved within the extent of these words, then you must make a construction of these words in this sense:

That ordering trade or merchandize, is excluding all others, and taking the whole to ourselves. A most excellent Ordering that is.

But the sense of these words in the Proviso is, to save to the corporations and fellowships of arts, trades, occupations and mysteries, and to Companies of Merchants, the powers and authorities that they had for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering of trade;

By taking care that commodities were honestly and rightly made, without fraud or deceit, as to the goodness or excellency of the commodity, or deceit in their measures or quantity;

That the servants and younger sort were honestly and industriously educated in their trades and mysteries, by the masters and elder sort;

To place and keep good order and decorum amongst those of the same mystery and trade;

For assembling and consulting for the common good and management of their respective trades and employments.

This is that which the Proviso excepts and provides for, not for a sole trade in a Company, in a joint stock, excluding all others, as this is.

For the same exception is also for the manufactures that are mentioned just before, as new inventions, and the society of any craft or mystery; these also are under the exception, which does still expound them to be meant of that regular due order and government in companies, for the due regulating of trades and mysteries, that is by making by-laws to take care that their wares be well and substantially made, that the younger sort be obedient to the elder, and the elder instruct the younger, and not oppress them. These are the laws that they have power, (and 'tis fit they should have) to make for the management and increase of trade. But to have a sole power over trade, and an interest in it by a joint stock, to ingross it into one man's hands, or into the hands of a body politick, which is but as one person in law, and in this manner to trade under the pretence of order or good government;

this,

this, under favour, was never meant or intended by this exception in this Act. Therefore that which I have before expressed, is the sense and meaning of this Proviso, and not the having the sole trade, excluding all others, as here is endeavoured and designed to have.

My Lord, in the taylor of Ipswich's Case, 11 Co. 54. that company of taylors made a by-law, to exclude taylors from exercising or using their trade, within the town of Ipswich, unless they present themselves to the master and wardens of the Company, and three of them admit them to be sufficient workmen, and proved they have served seven years at least, as apprentices, and then admitted by the master and wardens, and Company; and if any did offend in any part, they should forfeit so much to the Company. In this case there seemed to be a good end and meaning, to exclude insufficient workmen, and to encourage good ones: a good order, one might think. Yet so zealous and careful were the Judges then, lest under any pretence they should exclude men from their lawful trades, that they adjudged this a void by-law, as tending in the purview of it, to restrain men of their freedom in using their trades, and introducing oppression of the young tradesmen by the old and rich tradesmen, and to subvert the liberty the law gives. And in that very Case it was adjudged, fo. 54. That ordinances for the good order and government of men, of trades and mysteries, are good; but not to restrain any in their lawful mystery. Norris and Stap's Case, Hob. 211. to the same purpose.

Therefore, my Lord, this is the sense and meaning of that exception that is in the Statute of Monopolies, That it saves such as were for the ordering of men in their trades and good government, but not to enable a corporation to have a sole trade, to hinder or exclude others from using it. That is the true sense of the Proviso: But for the other sense that they would have, 'tis the way to make it the most repugnant and contradictory Act that can be: For, my Lord, to shew that this is so, give me leave to compare them.

The sense they would have, is, That it should save to bodies politick, the having the sole buying, selling and using, any merchandize or trade, as a corporation, that such should be excepted out of this Act.

Now let us compare the Proviso with the enacting clause, and taking the Proviso in that sense they would have it; that a body politick may have the sole buying and selling, or using any merchandize or trade, as a corporation: Then the enacting part, with the Proviso, will run thus, enacted, That Letters Patent to any person or body politick, for the sole buying, sole making or using of any thing within this Realm, are contrary to Law, and void; and no body politick shall be capable of having, using or exercising of any such Letters Patent, Inhibition or Restraint, provided that bodies politick may have the sole buying, selling and using of any trade or merchandize.

Is there any thing can be put in words and terms, more contradictory than this is? And yet thus it must be if their sense prevail. So that, my Lord, there is not a more repugnant and contradictory thing can be made, than this Proviso to the body of the Act, if you take it in the sense they would have it.

Suppose the Statute of _____ that enacts, That no man shall use a trade that he has not served an apprenticeship to by the space of seven years; had a Proviso, that a man may chuse a trade that he had not served an apprenticeship to by the space of seven years; this had been a void repugnant Proviso. This is as plainly repugnant, that no body politick shall be capable of having a sole trade. Repugnant Provisos are in law void.

My Lord, If so be a Proviso be repugnant and contradictory, then it will be void; and so are all our Books, 1 Co. 46. Plowd. Com. 563. A Statute gives the lands of J. S. to the King; and then a Proviso comes to save the right of all persons: This shall be construed, all persons besides J. S. not to destroy the premises.

Therefore when this Act says, That all Patents granted to a body politick, of the sole buying, selling and using of any thing within the Realm, shall be void; and a Proviso says, that it shall not extend or be prejudicial to any company of Merchants erected for the ordering, maintenance and increase of any trade or merchandize, if construed in their sense, to give the company sole buying, selling and using of any thing, is directly contradictory and void; then that cannot be the sense. But taking it in the other, which I apprehend to be the true sense, that order and government is provided for; that is the meaning of the Proviso, and nothing else: and this is the general practice of the Societies and Companies allowed in all times. But a sole trade, under the pretence and colour of order and management, never, as I believe, had any judicial allowance: And then you are within the enacting clause of this Act of Parliament, and are a Monopoly; or because, it may be, you do not like that word, you have the sole buying, and sole selling, and sole using of this trade, which is contrary to the express words of this Act of Parliament, and so your Patent and Charter is void.

But, my Lord, they endeavour to answer this objection with another sort of answer: They say the Proviso is, That the Act shall not extend to companies of Merchants erected for government and order of trade, but that their Charters, Privileges and Immunities, shall be of like force and effect as they were before the making this Act; and therefore, say they, Patents to Companies of Merchants for ordering of trade, if good before this Act, shall be good still; and therefore, say they, this Act cannot hurt us.

My Lord, the objection is nice, as I apprehend, but so it is, if I take them right; this, under favour, is but the same thing again in other words; for the conclusion of this Proviso extends no further than the Charter mentioned in the beginning of it; it extends but to the same Charters (so are the very words) shall be of as good force, &c. Why then what Charter or Patent is it, that shall remain as they were before the Act? why those that are excepted. What are excepted? those that are for order and management, as I have before shewn; not those that are for a body politick, to use a sole trade, that is repugnant to the enacting clause; therefore these, as I have said, are not excepted, or within the Proviso, and so we come back again where we were. Are you excepted out of the Act? If you are, I agree the Act hurts you not; if you are not excepted, then you cannot be in the same condition as you were before, or as such Charters were before the making the Act; for the conclusion and latter part of the Proviso is to be taken in no larger sense than the words that went before in the beginning; nor can extend further than these words extend: so that I say it retorts just back again where it was. If they be excepted, they be not within the Act; but then the Proviso will be repugnant, as I have said before, before, and contradictory; if they are not excepted, they have no benefit by the Proviso.

So, my Lord, taking it upon what I have said, I do hope that the words of the Act of Parliament, plainly do extend to bodies politick, and to inhibit the ingrossing sole trade by bodies politick. They say themselves, and it appears they are a body politick, and they have this sole trade; and so the enacting clause extends to them.

Next, I say, the Proviso extends to Charters granted before, not to Charters to be granted after the Act of Parliament: and as to those Charters that are excepted, it leaves them just as they were before; but if their sense takes place, then it is, as I conceive, with submission, most palpably contradictory and repugnant to the Act; and then it is as lawful at this day to grant to any corporation any sole trade or manufacture, yea, downright to grant them a Monopoly, as it is to make any other Grant; and so this would be rather a countenance, than an Act made against them.

But then, my Lord, they come to another thing; this is an infidel Country, this is a sole trade with Infidels, and such a trade the subjects never had any right to have without the King's licence; and now being so, that differences the cause: and to prove it, they cite Michelborn's Case, in 2 Brownl. 296. wherein Mr. Brownlow being Prothonotary, recites what my Lord Coke said in that Case, That no subject might trade into infidel Countries without the King's licence; and his reason was, because he might relinquish the catholic faith, and adhere to Infidelism: and that he had seen a licence in the time of Ed. 3. wherein the King recites the confidence that he had in his subject, that he would not decline his Religion, and licensed him; and that this did arise upon the recital of a licence made to trade to the East-Indies.

And they do cite Calvin's Case, in Co. 7 Rep. fo. 17. wherein 'tis said, That Infidels are in law, perpetui inimici, and between them and Christians there is perpetual hostility, there can be no peace; and 12 H. 8. fol. 4. where it is holden, that a pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all, nor have any thing within this Realm; and to prove this, Register 282. and 12 H. 8. fo. 4. are there cited.

My Lord, I have the more fully recited what this is, because I hope I shall give very full answers to all: But, my Lord, before I do answer those Books;

First, Let us see what the consequence of it will be: Supposing the Law to be as these Books say, and as these Gentlemen would have it; and the consequence will be, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action, but the Charters granted to them will be void.

First, Upon the reasons given in these Books; for if the Books are of authority, the reasons there given must be of authority (says that Book of Brownlow's). The King has the care and preservation of Religion, by the Law vested and reposed in him, that the subject should not trade with Infidels without licence, that they may not renounce their faith; and the King will take care to give licence to traffick, to such only as he can have confidence will never waver from their profession.

Supposing this to be true, then their Patent must be naught; for then it is only grantable to persons in whom such confidence may be. My Lord, then see how this will stand with their Charter. Their corporation and body politick is indefinite, as to persons, and the members changed continually; some sell their stocks, and go out, or die; others buy their stocks, and come in that way to be members of the company, or as executors to those that die, and many new members are every year. I doubt they do not much examine, or take care to be satisfied, how fixed those are in their Religion they daily take in; and how then can there be confidence in a body politick, which the law says has neither soul nor conscience? What confidence can be reposed in such a person about religion?

Secondly, Besides, it is not only the members of the company, that at the time of the incorporation were incorporated, and their successors, that are thus privileged; but their sons and apprentices, their factors and servants, have licence by this Patent to trade there: and what security can there be, that such may not (by conversing with Infidels) change their religion? If this licence be a trust and prerogative in the King, to be given to such persons in whom the King can have confidence, that they will not, by converse with Infidels, change or prejudice their religion, &c. this cannot be granted to a body politick and their successors, which may have continuance for ever; and to their sons, factors, apprentices and servants, persons altogether unknown, not born, nor in rerum natura when these Letters Patent were made.

Suppose such a licence to you, to trade with enemies, and supposing that the Law has established such a power and prerogative in the King, in the preservation of religion, to license; the King cannot grant this prerogative to you of the East-India Company, that you should have a power to grant licences to whom you will: yet all this is done by your Patent; for you have thereby power granted you for your sons, apprentices, factors and servants, which are persons that you yourselves nominate and appoint at your discretions, and undoubtedly very religious, and others that you bring into your Company.

Next, besides this power that you have expressed for those that are your apprentices, &c. which are at your discretion, to make whom you please; there is another express clause, That the Company for any consideration, or benefit to themselves, may grant licence to any servant, stranger or other, to use this trade. So the Patent expresses what the meaning was of the word Consideration, by adding the Words, Or benefit to themselves; and that the King, without consent of the Company, will not grant licence to any other to trade there.

Can this then be a good Grant? Can the King grant from himself his kingly care, and the trust in him reposed for the care of religion to you, to manage it as you will, and that he will not use it himself without your consent? Surely, you cannot say so. So that supposing by law there is such a trust reposed in the King for preservation of religion, as you would have, to give licence to his subjects to trade with Infidels; and that none without his licence can do it: yet this grant to you will be void in itself, and then you have no more right than we, and can maintain no action against us.

But then a little to consider the authorities upon which this great matter relies, to prove this religious point or piece of law.

First, That Book of Brownl. is a Book that was printed in the late times, and not licensed by any Judge or Person whatsoever; but truly I have got a copy, and a note of the Roll of the Case there reported; and it is this, Mich. 7 Jac. B. C. Rot. 3107. Michelborn against Batburst; it is in a prohibition, setting forth, That the King had granted to the plaintiff his commission to go with the Ship Tyger to the Indies, to spoil and suppress the Infidels, and to take from them what he could; that the plaintiff, in the Prohibition, having this commission from the King, did enter into articles with the defendant, to give him a share of what he should get in the adventure: and thereupon there was a suit in the admiralty by the defendant, against the plaintiff, and he comes and moves for a Prohibition, suggesting that the articles were made upon the land, and not upon the high sea, and so the Court had no jurisdiction. Now upon the debate of this Case, it did appear, there was a kind of Letters of mart, a commission from the King, in a warlike manner to spoil the Infidels, and get what he could from them. But now, how this would come in debate to make a resolution about the business of trade, I do not know; probably it might be as is there related; but what is in the Book is only an occasional saying of my Lord Coke's, upon the motion for this prohibition. So that a man that will lay any great stress upon such an authority, must be mighty willing; for it is only an occasional saying, and nothing relating to what was there brought in judgment, which was about a commission to take away Goods, perhaps from enemies, by Letters of mart, not about trade; and so I hope there is no great matter in that Report.

The next Case, my Lord, is that of Calvin, where it is said, that an Infidel is perpetuus inimicus, can maintain no action, or have any thing; and that there is perpetual hostilities between Christians and such, and no peace can be made with them.

My Lord, 'tis true, that this is said in Calvin's case, but I must also say, as there was no occasion in the former Report for saying of that, no more is there in Calvin's case for saying of this; for it made nothing to the matter in question about the Post-nati, or were they any wise led to it in the debate of that case; there was nothing there in judgment, that gave occasion for it, so that I cannot think it was much considered of before it was spoken.

The Books that are there cited, I have looked upon, to see if they would prove any such thing as they are there cited for, and I think they do it not by any means.

There is first the Register 282. and all that I find there is, that in a writ of protection granted to the Prior and Brethren of the hospital of St. John at Jerusalem, and their agents, it is said, That that hospital was founded in defence of holy Church, against the enemies of Christ and Christians: but truly, how to conclude out of that Book this, that Infidels should not have any property in trade, or be perpetui inimici, with whom no peace can be had, I know not, or that can maintain no action.

Then fo. 12 H. 8. 4. they also cited, that is only this, The original case in an action of trespass for beating his servant, taking away his dog, called a blood-hound: And there it is said, If a Lord beat his villain, or an husband beat his wife, or a man beat one out-law'd, or a traitor, or a pagan; they shall have no action, because they are not able to sue an action. I must confess, my Lord, this comes in very oddly, from a dog to a pagan, and there is nothing to lead to it in all that case, that I can see; and yet this is all the authority that is cited in Calvin's case, to prove that they can have no action. So that all that a man can make of this, is only discourse, and sudden thoughts and opinions, and sayings of counsel; nothing of debate or judgment in the case.

It is true, my Lord, the christian religion and paganism are so contrary to one another, that it is impossible they should be reconciled any more than contradictions can be reconciled; but because the religions cannot be reconciled, that therefore there should be a partition-wall between us, as to property and commerce, perhaps is a doctrine as irreligious as can be, and does destroy all means of coming to convince and reduce them to the faith. But now, besides these extrajudicial and occasional sayings in these Books cited, which are of little authority, I cannot find any Books or Cases, much less judgment or authority, for such opinions in so great a point as this is: but on the other side, if a man considers the general cause and practice of trade and commerce, and legal proceedings in all times and ages, one would think my Lord Coke could not be in earnest in what he has said in Calvin's case about Infidels. Let a man consider what a great part of the world we have commerce with are Infidels, at this day, as the Turks, the Persians, the Moors; and other places in Spain and Portugal were possessed by the Moors, who were Infidels, till about 200 years since: for till the year 1474, the Moors had possession of both these Countries for the space of near 700 years before, and have we not always had trading with all those? Have we not leagues and treaties with the Princes of infidel Countries? Do we not receive ambassadors from them, and send ambassadors to them, and ministers residing with them? Have we not, from time to time, and this in all times and ages, and that in Q. Elizabeth's time, in the best and most religious time, for many hundred years? Have we not likewise war and peace with them, in like manner as with Christian Kings and Countries?

And let a man consider the consequences of this doctrine. If they are perpetui inimici, then we may justify killing of them, as those we are in hostility with, wheresoever we meet them, and justify the taking away what they have from them, as 17 E. 4. fo. 13, 14. it is adjudged, that a man may seize and take to his own use, the goods of an alien enemy, wherever he can find them; for it is the price of his adventure to take them, and of his victory over his enemy, if he have taken him. And 2 H. 7. 15. if an Infidel be an alien enemy, then any man may take away the goods of an Infidel, and have them to his own use; and this would be a good trade, if this be so; any man may kill and beat him, if this be so.

Mr. Solicitor, in his argument, was pleased to use many ancient Rolls and Records out of H. 3. and Ed. 1. and about those times, concerning these Princes dealing with and handling of the Jews; and I believe he might have cited many more.

Mr. Prynne, in his Book which he calls The second Part of a short Demurrer to the Jews, discontinued and barred Remitter into England, printed in the year 1656; has a long treatise, in which I believe an hundred Records and Histories are cited to this purpose, That the Jews did exact and enrich themselves by usury, to the great impoverishing of the people; and that the Princes of those times polled them, taxed them, and took away the estates of the Jews from time to time; and thereby a man might think that these Kings used them but as sponges, to make them gripe what they could from others, and then squeezed it from them into their own treasury: and it must in all probability be so. The Story is true, my Lord, as he relates it, and in the Rolls there are a multitude of them cited to that purpose.

But besides Mr. Prynne, there is a Statute of Morton, ch. 5. made 20 H. 3. my Lord Coke in the 2d Inst. 89. says, was principally designed against the usurious Jews. The Statute de Judaismo 18 E. 1. relates, that the King's people had been disinherited; much injured and impoverished by the usury of the Jews, and enacts, That no Jew thereafter should take usury upon Lands, Rents, or other Things. And in the 2d Inst. 507. my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon that Statute, says, That 15060 Jews thereupon went out of the Realm.

So that, my Lord, we do not dispute but that the fact alledged may be true; that the Jews were extorsive, and the King took away their estates: But the matter is the use and application of that fact.

For, first, I think, if it be known law, and taken to be according to any known law which we have, that they were as alien enemies, then as the King might take away their estates, so the subjects may take them away too; so there is no such use to be made of it as the other side would have, as I perceive. They say as Infidels the King would take away their estates, because they are perpetui inimici; and I say, if they were alien enemies, then the subjects might take them away too; for so the book says.

But next, my Lord, I do use it another way; That all these dealings with the Jews, shew that they were not alien enemies, but treated as alien amies, so long as the King pleased. For, my Lord, if they were alien enemies, and the Books they cite are true, as Calvin's case mentions them, all their contracts and dealings were all absolutely void, they could never have any property; how could they then be guilty of usury? how could any man living be extorted upon by them, to pay any money due to them upon contracts or bargains, unless these men were treated as alien amies? How could they have the benefit of their contracts, as other alien amies have? So that I take it, that is a strong evidence that they were treated as alien amies; otherwise it is impossible that which you say could be true, That they could hurt the King's people by extortion and usurious contracts; when, according to your law, they were not able to make any contracts, or have any property at all: Is it possible the King could take away their estates that had none? And they had none, if your doctrine be true. If any man owed them money, they could not recover it, because they could not bring any action; and the King could not have it, because it was a void contract made with one not capable of making a contract. So that, my Lord, the instances they make use of, are, I hope, instruments and strong arguments against them, not for them. They were taken notice of as alien amies, capable of making contracts which the King's subjects were never bound to perform, unless they were legal, and they obliged by them by law. As for these ancient Records in general, time had hidden the knowledge of the laws, and transactions of those times. It is not possible to know what the laws and transactions of those times were, or rightly to distinguish between legal and violent acts.

And so being references from thence, to conclude in judgment now, is notum per ignotius; or like dependencies, which unless latter times have concurred or agreed with, are only fit to make disorder and confusion.

Secondly, But that which is deducible from hence, is not, as I conceive, what has been endeavoured;

That they had no property, because the Princes of those times took from them their estates, when they pleased, and taxed them how or in what manner they pleased.

But perhaps the reason was, that these people being under the curse, and being a vagrant people, without Head, Prince, Governor or Country, it was no difficulty to tax or take from them at pleasure, being hated of the people where they lived.

But it could not be as they would have it, that they should be amongst us alien enemies; for an alien enemy can neither make bargain nor contract, nor be capable of property;

But the subject may, at will and pleasure, fall upon and take all that he has to his own use, as upon the King's enemy; and what he can take from him is his own acquisition, as the price of his adventure, and conquest over his enemy.

The Books cited 17 E. 4. 2. & 7. prove this.

But by what is admitted by them, that they were great usurers, and had great estates, it is evident, that they were here treated as alien amies: how could they else in such multitudes live amongst us? how could they be usurers, and get estates, if they could not make contracts? how is it possible they could preserve their bodies or estates against the King's subjects, unless they had the King's protection, and were treated as alien amies? And of latter times, how many of them have lived amongst us, driven great trades, have had, and have at this time, considerable estates?

Let it now be adjudged, that any man that will, may take away their estates; that they can have no remedy or action for their debts owing to them, but instead thereof may be beaten or imprisoned as enemies to the King;

And we shall probably see, what the success of such a judgment will be.

My Lord, that they are taken notice of and handled as other aliens, without any distinction between alien enemy and alien Infidel, I would offer this as an argument. The question, I confess, is new, and so there is not much that I can find in our Books about it; but the Act of Navigation made in the 12th year of this King, a year before this Charter now in judgment before you, concerning trade, shews, that Infidels have the same liberty of trade as Christians; that Act being made for increase of shipping and navigation (it is ch. 18.) prohibiting goods to be imported by any foreign ships, except ships of that same Country where the goods do grow; and distinguishes not between infidel and christian Countries, but expressly says, That no currans, nor commodities of the growth, product, or manufacture of any of the Countries, Islands, Dominions or Territories, in the Ottoman or Turkish Empire: And does enact, That no goods shall be imported from that Country, but in our Ships, or Ships of the Country of which the Goods are; and those Ships to be sailed by a Master, and three-fourths of the same Country. This must be an admittance and an allowance, that the masters and mariners of that Country have the same freedom and privilege of trade that other foreign aliens have; and shews plainly, that the Infidels of the Turkish Empire have liberty of trade here.

My Lord, the Act for tonnage and poundage has general rates and impositions set upon the commodities of all infidel Countries, without saying, brought in by, or with any manner of distinction. So that I think, that this opinion of a difference between alien Infidels and alien Christians, was not taken notice of, nor known, nor thought of, till now: For, my Lord, if it had, it is unlikely the Act of Navigation should provide and give allowance, for the masters and mariners of infidel Countries to come hither with Goods, when by Law they could never come in, but were enemies, and to be knocked on the head, if they did.

My Lord, pray let us consider of late times what a number of Jews have lived among us; should we declare this for Law at this day, that the people ought to use them as alien enemies, strip them, plunder them, knock them on the head, kill them and slay them, what would be the consequence? What work would this make! For if this be true, what they assert, that they are perpetual enemies, then we can have no peace with them; whoever owes a Jew any thing may play the Jew with him, never pay him; whoever has a mind to any thing he has, may take it away from him; if he has a mind to beat him, and knock him on the head, he may, there is no protection for him, nor peace with him.

My Lord, I do believe that 'tis true, that the Jews being under the curse, and having been a vagrant people for so long a time, and having no Prince to defend them, it is probable, they have been made havoc of, and our Kings and Princes have made bold to do with them according to their own pleasures; tho' what is recorded of it, is so long ago, that it is hard to know the whole truth: But I think they are no precedents to be followed now, unless they had been followed by a succession of practice and authority in our Books of Law: for otherwise many times a man might argue of old Books from dark things to darker, as long as he will, and never make any thing clear. In the case of Southern and Ilow, there was occasion for this to be taken notice of, if this opinion had been true Law. It is reported in 2 Cro. fo. 469. A man employed another to sell Jewels in Barbary for him, and the other person did sell them as true Jewels, when indeed they were counterfeit, and not above 100 l. value, to the King of Barbary for 800 l. and thereupon the King finding himself cheated, imprisoned the plaintiff that sold them to him, till he repay'd him his money; and he brought an action against the person that employed him to sell them. It would have been of use in this case, if the contract and sale, and the lawfulness of conversing in trade by Christians with Infidels, had been questionable, for the Defendant in that action to have urged against the Plaintiff, What reason had he to sue him? for what had he to do to go amongst the King's enemies? And he ought not to recover damages for any such thing. I say, it would have been of use, if any such point of Law had at that time been thought of.

In that case, it was of all sides admitted, and not so much as objected, that this contract was void, because the King of Barbary was an Infidel.

So that this opinion, that Infidels are perpetual enemies, and in perpetual hostility, can maintain no action, nor have any property amongst us; has no authority for its foundation, but only some extrajudicial sayings, without debate or consideration; and it is against the continual practices of Princes and People at all times.

Perhaps it is no small part of religion, that men should speak, and deal plainly and uprightly one with another.

We know that religion too often has been made a cloak and veil for other ends and purposes. It should not be so, and I hope will not be so used in this case.

My Lord, the Statutes that I have cited, they have made no manner of distinction between Infidels and Christians in matter of trade; and it is hardly to be thought, especially as to some of the latter ones, but that there was trade with Infidels then: For it is scarce to be thought that our Princes should go thither only with swords in their hands, to make war upon them, and afterwards to make peace with them, and no notice be taken of the law about trade concerning Infidels.

The Statutes I have cited of Magna Charta, cap. 9 E. 3. 25 E. 3. 2 and 11 R. 2. all declare and enact the freedom of trade, in all general words, except only such as are in war with the King: In none of them is there any exception of trade with Infidels.

Can it be imagined that in those days we had no trade with Turky or Barbary? Our Kings went with armies to the Holy Land, and Richard had made war and peace with the Turks: Had we no trade there but with our swords?

But to look nearer home, Spain and Portugal were Infidels, and in the hands of the Moors, in the year 1494, which was 14 E. 4. can it be thought that in all these times between Magna Charta, H. 3. and E. 4. we had no trade with Spain and Portugal?

Stat. 12. H. 7. cap. 6. was made in the year 1497, which was but 23 years after the Moors were driven out; and in that Statute 'tis recited, that the Merchant adventurers, dwelling in divers parts of England, out of London, did shew, That whereas they had their free passage, course and recourse, with their Goods, Wares and Merchandizes, in divers coasts and parts beyond the Seas, as well into Spain, Portugal, Venice, Dantzick, Lapland, and Friesland, and divers and many other Regions and Countries, in league and amity with the King; that they were imposed upon by a Company of Merchants in London, and forced to pay duties.

I only make use of the recital, to prove the free passage there mentioned to Spain and Portugal, and to other Regions and Countries.

There is no distinction of infidel Countries from christian Countries, though Spain and Portugal had been so lately Infidels.

'Tis most probable the trade they had then was with Turky and Barbary, as well as with Venice: The words other Regions and Countries seem to imply as much, and the freedom equal.

So that, I think, as to this objection, That Infidels are perpetual enemies, that we can have no peace with them, nor they maintain any action, or have any property by our law; I think the authority to maintain it none at all. The constant practice, as well by Princes as People, is constantly against it.

The Charters that they have cited to Barbary and other places, some of them are before the last of these these Statutes, that is the Statute of K. James; and yet there is no difference taken notice of there between christian and infidel Countries: So that, my Lord, taking all together the light, or at least the weak authority of these sayings and occasional discourses, for this distinction of infidel or christian, in point of trade, will signify but little; and the constant practice of all our times, wherein we have any sort of trade; and the arguments drawn from the Records that have been cited of the Jews having property and allowance to live amongst us, and our dealings with foreign nations taken notice of in our Acts of Parliament, without such distinction, seems to be a practice so quite contrary to those sayings, that are perhaps taken out of some zealous catholick Authors of those superstitious times, rather than consonant to the rules of Law, that they can be no foundation for this distinction; especially considering that Spain and Portugal, as I said, 'till the middle of Edward IVth's time, were possessed by Infidels: and yet I can't but think they must be traded with, and no man can find any thing of the distinction but only out of these occasional sayings in Calvin's case.

But be that point of trading with or without licence (which I mentioned before) how it will, yet I conceive that point will never be sufficient to ground this same sole trade, or to found a Monopoly upon, that cannot warrant a Grant of a sole trade, sole buying and sole selling, to be granted to you and your successors, your sons, servants, apprentices, factors, and such as you shall licence for ever: There is a licence and grant in perpetuity, not only to those that then were, but to their sons and successors, and those whom they shall licence; and this into a very great part of the World.

And by the same reason all Turky and Barbary, a great part of the West-Indies, and other places of the World, may be monopolized; and perhaps all christian Countries.

The Statute of Monopolies has no allowance or exception for Monopolies to infidel Countries; that is, against all sole buying, sole selling, or sole using of any thing.

And the Turky trade was used long before that time, as by Charter, granted 23 Eliz. So was the Bourbon trade, as by the Charter thereof; and I believe to the East-Indies also.

And the Statute of Monopolies being so general (the Proviso not reasonably construable to except this Company out of the extent of that Statute, unless all Patents that may be granted to Companies of Monopolies, are by that exception or Proviso, out of the Statute) and deserving for the suppressing so great evils as Monopolies are, and always have been accounted:

I hope it will not be avoided upon any imaginary difference in Law, betwixt infidel and christian Countries, to monopolize thereby the trade, perhaps of the greater part of the World, as Turky, Persia, Barbary, East and West-Indies; for the West-Indies, I think the greater part are pagans.

My Lord, I have looked over the cases, that were here, and the debates that have been printed in 3d and 4th of King Charles I. about the King's Power of imposing rates and subsidies, and impositions upon merchandizes, in Bates's case in the Exchequer, 4 Car. I. 2 Inst. 63. and Mr. Rushworth's account of the debates in Parliament at that time about that matter: many things are there said concerning the King's Power of restraining and prohibiting of trade, and the Writ Ne Exeat Regnum. And from these reasons, they that argued for the King, urge reasonableness of impositions upon merchandize. That case arose from an imposition upon Currants, and methinks if there had been known any such distinction, as they would here insinuate, it had been of great use in that case as well as this; but throughout the Arguments and Reasons there debated, they did never make any distinction between Infidel and Christian, but native and foreign commodities; and did endeavour to have a prerogative to impose rates upon them: and the reasons were these, and all the Arguments run thus; The King can prohibit and restrain any Merchant to go out of the country by Writ, Ne Exeat Regnum. The King can prohibit any foreign commodities to be imported; then none can go out without licence, nor import without licence, and consequently it is a legal thing, when this licence is granted upon the payment of such a duty or imposition, or under such a rate as can be agreed on between the King and the Merchant; and therefore such an imposition or farm is lawful.

These were the arguments in that case, and in these arguments it appears that a restraint in consequence does import a tax, rate or farm, for a dispensation with that restraint.

For if licences be requisite, it is worth consideration, whether that will not introduce the imposing of rates without Parliament, or otherwise than in a Parliamentary way. This, I say, is worthy consideration. Suppose it true, there have been licences to go into Infidel Countries to trade; so there have been to go beyond the Seas, and have been to other trade besides this: yet it does not follow as a true consequence, that it is unlawful to go or trade without licences; much less does it follow from thence, that such a Patent as this to any one or few Subjects, or to such a Corporation, to have the whole and sole trade into any place, and power of licensing others, can be warranted by it.

I don't question but the King may restrain the passage of Merchants and Merchandize in some cases, and to embargo Ships in some cases.

But these are upon special reasons; as

First, In the case of War.

Secondly, In the case of such Merchandizes, as are necessary for the defence or safety of the Kingdom, to restrain their Exportation.

Thirdly, In case of a plague from particular places to import.

But then these prohibitions are general, and their particular reasons and grounds are apparent.

But if under any pretence any sole trade to some one person, body politick or natural, be granted, excluding all others; that Grant I conceive is in deceit of the King, and to the prejudice of his Subjects, and void.

Never has such a Grant hitherto had any judicial allowance; nay, so far from that, that as far as I could observe, no opinion has been till within four or five years, that such Grants were good to exclude others, nor any action or suit ever adventured before now, to be brought upon any such ground.

So that, my Lord, as to this great point, both the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and the Statute of Monopolies, with submission, are against this Grant of the sole trade; and the distinction between Infidel Countries and Christian, is so thin, and upon so weak a bottom, that I hope it will never be strong enough to bear the weight of so so great a consequence as this is. For tho' at present Infidels be distinguished from Christians; yet from their arguments and kind of reasoning about restraint of going beyond Sea and trading, Spain and Portugal may be brought in, and France too; and so the argument will run from Infidel to Christian at length, and I know not where it will stop.

So I humbly leave that point to your Lordships judgment, whether such a Grant of a sole trade, appears to be such a Grant, as is good according to Law; and whether or no, notwithstanding what they have said, it does not appear by the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and by all our late Acts of Parliament, to be in Law a void Grant.

The next thing my Lord, I come unto, is the second point, which I shall be but short in: about the first, I have taken up most of your time, and I beg your Lordship's pardon for it; because, if I mistake not, it is a most weighty point in the consequence of it. But then supposing and admitting their Grant to be a good Grant, whether or no, can you maintain this action? If the Law should be so, that the Defendant ought not to have traded there without licence, then he may be punishable at the King's suit, by fine and imprisonment; but that you should maintain an action against him, what cause of action, what damage or loss to you, have you laid in your declaration? You say in your declaration, that the Defendant Sandys, not being a Member of your Company, nor a Son, Factor or Servant, nor Assign of your Company, traded into the East-Indies in the places within the limits of your Charter; and has there bought wares, and bargain'd and sold merchandizes, and imported and sold them in England, against the will of the Company, and to their prejudice and impoverishment, and against the form of their Charter, and to the Company's damage 1000*l*.

First, You have not alledged in all your declaration, whether or no he had a licence from the King, and that is naught: for I think, tho' the King is pleased to say in his Letters Patent, he will not grant licences without leave of the Company, yet he may do so if he please notwithstanding that Grant.

Secondly, Then you have not shewn any loss or damage you have had by his trading thither: did he buy so much of the merchandize of the country, as not to leave there sufficient for you to furnish your Ships withal, so that they came home empty? No such thing is alledged. Did he hence export to sell there so much merchandize, as not sufficient left for you here to buy? Or, did he bring home here so much, as that there were not buyers sufficient for his Goods and yours also? There are no such things alledged; or is the truth so, as that hereby your imposing your prices, upon your commodities, selling at your own prices and exacting what you thought fit, was hindered; and for this you would maintain an action.

I think it will be the first time, that ever a man recovered damages for being hindered from imposing and exacting his own prices, or having the advantage of his Monopoly, or for another's having an earlier or a quicker trade, and under-selling his own commodities and merchandizes lower than the Plaintiffs can afford them.

You agree by your own declaration, that there are many others that are concern'd as well as you: you say, you have the sole trade to your selves; your Factors, your Servants and your Sons, as soon as they come to twenty-one; all that are of your Company, all that you grant licences to, all that you shall assign your trade to; all those have an interest, if you can maintain an action. Other people have trade there as well as you, can they maintain an action?

A Commoner may bring an action upon the case against a stranger, for putting his Cattle into the Common; provided that the Common thereby be impaired, and the Commoner have not sufficient Common as before, and have a damage, otherwise he can maintain no action.

In Robert Mary's case, 9 Co. 113. it is there resolved, that for every feeding of the beasts of a stranger in a Common, the Commoner shall not have an assize or action upon the case; but an action does lie, if the feeding be such, that the Commoner cannot have common pasture for his own beasts; and then it is the consequence, the loss of his Common, that gives him cause of action.

It is not alledged in the declaration, that your trade was any thing the worse. No damage appears to you by it: what reason, that you should recover damages, where you have not sustain'd any loss? And you have alledged none in your declaration; how can your declaration be good? It then contains no cause of action.

You should now, if you would have made a declaration, that should have intitled you to a cause of action, have shewn how you suffered by Sandys a stranger trading to the East-Indies; that he bought up all, and you could have nothing; for if he left enough for you, what hurt have you. What reason is there you should recover damage, if you have not sustain'd any loss? And if you alledge none in your declaration; how is your declaration, that shews no cause of action, maintainable?

In the case of Monopolies, 11 Co. 88. b. Rolls Abr. 1st part. fol. 106. The last point in that case is a full authority in this point: That admitting the Patent to be good, for the sole making and selling of Cards, that was granted to Darcy for 12 years, yet no action would lie in that case, though the Defendant did contrary to this Patent sell Cards. Adjudged that it was a Monopoly, and Patent void: that if the Patent had been good, yet no action would have lain against the Defendant upon it.

My Lord, If that be so as it is declared to be in that case; in the last point resolv'd by the Judges, if that action would not lie there, this will not lie; supposing his Charter to be never so good, and the Defendant has done contrary to it.

My Lord, there is only one other reason for which the action will not lie; and that is grounded upon the Letters Patent, as they are granted to you. For by the Letters Patent, it is not absolutely, but sub modo granted, that you shall have the sole trade; and that no other person shall trade there, under pain of forfeiting ship and goods; one half to the King, another half to the Company. So that, my Lord, the words of restraint are not absolute, but only under such a penalty and forfeiture.

Now, my Lord, if I should suppose this Patent to have all the force and strength, that they can desire; supposing that this Patent were in an Act of Parliament, penned in this manner, that did restrain all persons from trading to the East-Indies, except the Company, under pain of forfeiture of ship and goods; under favour, you that will have advantage of this restraint, must take it in that manner as the Act does give it; you shall not have any other penalty or punishment, but what the Act gives. For when any new Law is made, you must take it as it is, and no otherwise, till another new Law be made. And so is the rule in 7 Co. 37. 11. Co. 56, & 59. Plowd. Com. 206. It cannot be altered without a new Law.

And I would but only suppose upon the Statute of Edw. VI. that gives the owner of tithes, treble damages against him that sets them not forth; a man brings an action upon the case, would that be well? No, he must take the Law as it is, such an action never was brought, nor if brought could be maintain'd; yet here the damages are given to the party.

The like of all other penal Statutes a man must only forfeit the penalty the Statute inflicts; so that this action cannot, as I conceive, be maintain'd. So that, my Lord, taking all together, admitting (tho' I hope it is not so) that this Patent is a good Patent; yet you are not the sole persons interested, there are others besides you, your Grantees, Factors and Servants, and Sons are to trade there. You have not laid any particular damage; therefore you cannot, by the reason of the case of Monopolies, maintain any such action as this.

And if you will take advantage of this Grant, it is reasonable you should take it as the Grant gives it, proceed for the forfeiture of ship and goods? but for the action of the case, your Charter does not give it; nor, if an Act of Parliament had been penned after this manner, would such an action have lain.

So that to conclude.

First, That that, which this Company claims in this case by this Patent, to have the sole trade to the East-Indies in their politick capacity, excluding others, is a Monopoly, and ingrossing against the Common Law, and the antient Statutes, and the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacobi. And therefore they have no right to have what they claim.

Secondly, That what the Defendant has done in this case, he has lawfully done, and therefore not to be punish'd.

Thirdly, That tho' the Company had a lawful claim to the trade in such manner, as in their declaration is set forth, and the Defendant done what he ought not, yet they cannot maintain this action.

And upon the whole matter, whether best for the Company to have judgment for them or against them, may deserve their thoughts.

But this being so great in the consequence, as the whole trade of the Kingdom depending upon it, I have laboured the more.

The antient Laws, the antient ways, is what I endeavour, and against new ways upon any pretence whatsoever.

And therefore, my Lord, I humbly beg your judgment for the Defendant.

Lord Chief-Justice. Do you intend to have another Argument in it, Gentlemen?

Mr. Solicitor-General. What your Lordship pleases.

Lord Chief-Justice. It is a case of great weight and consequence, perhaps, as ever any case, that has come into Westminster-hall. I must needs say, it has been extraordinarily well argued on both sides; and it must be necessarily taken notice of as a point of great consequence, wherein the King's prerogative, and the privileges of the East-India Company, and this joint trade, are concern'd on the one side: and the benefit of particular persons, and the liberty of free uncontrollable trading is concern'd on the other: and it is fit there should be all the consideration, and all the deliberation upon a matter of this great moment, that possibly can be. I cannot be so wonderfully captivated with the differences, that have been made between the Charter to the East-India Company, and those to the Turky Company and the others; and tho' I have heard much in the defence of Charters and Corporations, I am of opinion there is no such great matter of commendation due to them: but I take the Common Law to be the best Law in the World. For that Charter, that you Mr. Pollexfen defended here so strongly after judgment given against it; the Corporation became as invisible within a few days, as you say this was, no duns could see it; tho' there were duns that went to wait upon that Corporation, but came away as empty as they went: and I wish the duns were like to be as well satisfied from the one, as they are from the other; and therefore there can be no great matter in that. But there is another thing that very much deserves consideration, it is a question wherein trade is mightily concern'd: we know we have a potent Neighbour, who has both experience and industry, and are our rival in this trade; I wish we had as much industry and were as diligent as they; they have found by long experience, that a Joint-Stock is the only way to carry on their trade, I mean Holland. And it is very well known, if it had not been for a Joint-Stock, the trade had never been so beneficial as it is. And Mr. Sandys would not have had such a desire to the trade, for it would not have been so well settled and fixed; and therefore, I take it to be a wonderful thing, and to carry a great consequence in it upon that account; that we should consider how this trade comes to be so great, and so desirable. Now that by the Joint-Stock, and Industry, and expence of the Company, the thing is become facile and valuable; for particular persons to come and sweep away the advantage of it, that ought to be well consider'd. Mr. Sandys and his partners are very zealous now to reap the fruits of the Company's labours. But suppose this question should be asked, Will you be contented to come in and pay your proportion of all the charge these people have been at, to put the trade into this capacity it is in? But is it fair, after they have reduced it into so good a condition, at a vast expence and trouble, for other particular persons to come and say, let us have the benefit of it, that have had nothing of the burthen and charge? And then there is another consequence of great concern; peace and war, no one doubts, are actually in the power of that Prince and People with whom the trade is. I would desire to know, supposing an injury should be committed by any particular person to the Infidels, and the Ship get away; will not all the rest of the Company's stock, being of the same Nation, be in danger of suffering by it? Certainly it would; and therefore since they are likely to answer for the wrong, is it not fit they should have the management of it? So we may, if we come to argue by consequences, easily find out a great many inconveniencies on both sides; but they are not to overrule the Law one way or the other; they are specious pretences by way of argument, but the Law is a certain rule, and consequences are not one way or other to over-rule it. The main point truly is a point of great consideration and weight; perhaps as considerable as ever any that has come in debate here; and therefore it is fit, that all due deliberation be taken to have it debated.

Mr. Justice Withins. Mr. Pollexfen, you seem to argue that the King's Grant to them is a void Grant, and against Common Law, as being a Monopoly in granting them the sole trade; then that does not come to the point in Michelborne's case, about trading without licence with Infidels; and therefore you go upon another ground, than what Mr. Sollicitor did.

Mr. Pollexfen. I go upon the particular case here before you.

Mr. Justice Withins. And you have not given any answer to the Petition of the Commons, cited by Mr. Sollicitor.

Mr. Pollexfen. Truly Sir, I think, it does not need any answer; for I go chiefly against this Grant, which is against Law and void.

Lord Chief-Justice. Truly, Mr. Pollexfen, I am not much in love neither with your other point about the action; for what became, pray, of all the actions that have been brought upon that Statute of Monopolies, by the Patentees of new inventions, as there has been multitudes in my Lord Hales's time, and at all times?

Mr. Pollexfen. In that case there's no-body but the particular Grantee, that has that invention; and he brings the action. But here, of your own shewing, you have intitled others to the trade, as the servants, and factors, and children; and therefore you can never have such an action.

Lord Chief-Justice. When will you have it argued again?

Mr. Pollexfen. We shall be ready for the Defendant next Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. That is a little too soon, there's but a very short Vacation, and that is but a short Term; I think you had best have another argument in Michaelmas-Term.

Mr. Sollicitor-General. Yes, if your Lordship please.

Mr. Pollexfen. What your Lordship pleases; we shall be ready, if your Lordship pleases to hear us next Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. I know Mr. Sandys is in very great haste, but the zeal and transport of any particular person, must not think to oblige us to go hand over head, in a case of this great weight and moment; there is great consideration to be had of the length of time, that this Company has continued; there has been an East-India Company in King James's time, in the late King's time, and in this King's time.

Mr. Justice Holloway. And here is a great trade settled, we must not destroy it presently.

Lord Chief-Justice. We must not gratify the zeal and transport of Mr. Sandys, by being over-hasty in this matter.

Mr. Pollexfen. My Lord, we shall be well content to stay till Michaelmas-Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. Ay, I know the Counsel will; but whether your Client will or no, I cannot well tell; nor do not much care. Well, we will consider of it, and hear another argument in Michaelmas-Term.

Mr. Attorney - General (Sir Robert Sawyer) his Argument.

The Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East-Indies, Plaintiffs. Thomas Sandys, Defendant.

De termino S. Michaelis, Anno Regni Regis Car. xxxvi. Anno Domini 1684.

IN an action upon the case brought by the Company against the Defendant, for trading into the East-Indies contrary to their Grant, in prejudice of their trade, and to their damage of 1000 l.

It comes before the Court upon the Plaintiffs demurrer to the Defendant's Plea of the Statute of 15 E. III.

The Record having been so often opened at large; I shall only put it as a Case upon the Record.

The King by his Letters Patent, 3^{tio} Aprilis, 13 Car. II. reciting that the Company had long been a Company, and enjoyed divers liberties and privileges under the Charters of Queen Elizabeth and King James, grants the Company the sole trade and traffick to the East-Indies, being an Infidel country; with a prohibition to all others of his subjects to trade thither, without the leave and licence of the Company.

The Defendant not qualified as the Charter directs, without the leave of the Company, and against their wills, trades to the East-Indies, to the prejudice and damage of the Company's trade.

Upon this case, the points which have been moved and argued, are two.

First, Whether the Letters Patent giving licence to the Company, to trade into the East-Indies, and to exercise the sole trade there, with prohibition to other subjects to trade there, be good in Law.

Secondly, Whether admitting the Patent good, this action will lie for the Company.

In debating of the first point, I shall not go about to maintain the validity of these Letters Patent, or any such of like nature; to bind up the King from granting licence to other of his subjects as he shall please: but shall content myself, to shew that all the subjects not licensed by the King, nor authorized by the Company (as the Defendant is not) are bound by these Letters Patent.

Where the question will be between the King's prerogative (and that in one of the highest points thereof, which concerns the defence and protection of his Kingdom) and the intercourse with foreign Nations, on the one side; and the general liberty of trade, which is a tender point, and meerly concerns the interest of his subjects, on the other side.

It therefore being a question of great consequence, and of greater consequence than difficulty, as I hope to shew; I shall, in examining into the point, use the utmost caution, by asserting the King's just prerogative in this matter, and not to depress the subjects true liberty of trade.

The subject matter of this question, only relating to a foreign trade with Infidels, not in amity with the King of England; doth not necessarily oblige me to enter into the consideration of any other trade, trade, or of the King's prerogative, or the subjects liberty in relation thereto.

Which would much shorten my task in supporting these Letters Patent, and the trouble the Court is like to receive thereby.

But because the great force of the arguments, made use of on the other side against these Letters Patent, have been drawn from principles and precedents of Law, which concern as well the inland trade and traffick of this Kingdom, as with other Christian Nations in amity with the King of England, with whom leagues of commerce have been made by our Kings; or to whom a common trade hath been laid open by several particular laws:

It is made necessary for me from the other side, a little to consider these trades, and how far the subjects liberty or the King's prerogative be concern'd in them.

Whereby it will appear, that the arguments and authorities produced by the defendant's counsel, will be of no great force to impeach these Letters Patent for the management of a foreign trade with Infidels.

I shall therefore briefly consider the inland or native trade within the Kingdom, and then the foreign trade with other Nations.

The inland trade is either for manufactures or merchandize.

Under the trade of manufactures falls in the husbandman, and all sorts of artificers; who have full right by the Common Law, to exercise what, and as many trades as they please; so as no annoyance happen to the neighbourhood: And with these the King's prerogative is little concerned, it cannot restrain them, it being their livelihood.

Nor is the publick weal otherwise concerned therein, than that all its members should live by their honest labour and industry. As to the trade of merchandize, or inland commerce, every man (generally speaking) might buy of any man, whether native or foreign, and as many kinds or sorts of merchandize as he pleaseth, which I take to have been the Common Law before 37 Ed. 3. cap. 5. whereby all trading Merchants were restrained to one sort of merchandize.

But that Act continued not long, being repealed 38 Ed. 3. cap. 2.

Yet this trade of inland merchandize, lay under several restrictions at Common Law. 1. Notwithstanding such general liberty of buying and selling, no man could ingross any one commodity. 2. The ancient common Law confined this sort of trade to certain places, as Towns, Cities, or other publick places appointed by the King, Co. 3 Inst. fo. 196. in the Chap. forestalling.

It was punishable to buy above the value of twenty pence elsewhere, or to anticipate merchandizes before they arrived at these places.

3. No assemblies could be held for the traffick of buying or selling, without the King's licence; for tho' some Markets and Fairs are held by prescription, (the original Grants not appearing) yet these were derived from the Crown, by some royal licence before time of memory: they all depend upon the same Crown, and may be forfeited to the Crown.

This is so frequent in our Books, I need not cite the authorities.

And here the prerogative of the Crown had a great stroke.

VOL. VII.

The inland traders, in buying and selling, might buy and sell in private places, and could not be restrained: But they could not hold assemblies for trade without the King's leave and licence; Marts, Fairs and Markets, in their true notion, being no other than royal licences to assemble for trade and traffick.

And these, when granted, cannot be resumed without cause of forfeiture: For I do admit, that a licence to trade or traffick carries an interest with it, being a matter of profit.

And I take the Law to be the same, whether the Fair or Market be erected only, and not granted to any one; and where it is granted to a subject, all the King's subjects have a liberty and right of trafficking there, and cannot be prohibited by the Lord of the Fair or Market.

The reason of these restrictions of the inland trade of merchandize, and the King's prerogative therein, is from the concern the publick peace and justice of the Kingdom hath in this sort of trade, more than in the former of the manufactures, viz. to prevent all manner of cheats by false weights and measures, corrupt merchandizes, and too great enhancing of the prices, and breaches of the peace, occasioned by publick concourses, tho' under colour of trade and traffick.

And upon this ground the Common Law provides, That to all such licences for publick Marts, which the King may grant when and where he pleases, being not to the damage of others before granted, a Court of justice is incident of common right, for preservation of the publick peace and correction of such deceits which generally attend the trade of merchandizing.

Fourthly, There was another restriction upon the inland merchandize taken notice of in our Books, which was more particular, and to certain places, viz.

The claim of foreign bought and foreign sold, by several Cities, Towns and Ports, some by custom and others by Charters; and there is no great question to be made, but before 9 E. 3. cap. 1. the Charters as well as Customs did prevail for that Liberty, but both were taken away by the Statute; and divers subsequent laws taken notice of in the case of the City of London, Co. 8. fo. 128.

And between that and 9 H. 4. there were great strugglings in Parliament between the foreign Merchants and the City of London, and other Towns, about that Custom.

'Till at length, London prevailed for a private Act of Parliament for establishing of the Customs, which they have enjoyed ever since 9 H. 4. 30.

By an ancient Record of Henry III. it appears, that the abbots, and others the religious of the County of Lincoln, under colour of selling their wool, which arose upon their demesne lands, turned Merchants, and bought up wools, and sold them with their own wools: They were prohibited to do it by a Writ out of the Chancery.

And upon the complaint of the Merchants of Lincoln, in the time of Edward I. the like Writ of Prohibition issued, Pla. Parl. in the Appendix, 609. By all which it appears, that the inland traffick of the Kingdom, which was within the care and cognizance of the Common Law, was not unlimited, nor the subject's liberty therein never so large as it is now insisted upon, to all foreign parts whatsoever.

Y y y

And

And that the managery of the principal part of the home traffick, which consists in the Marts, Fairs, and Markets of the Kingdom, depends upon the King's prerogative, and is managed under it; the Law having entrusted the King with that power, for the benefit of his people, and the peace of the Kingdom.

In the next place, I will take a view of the foreign trade.

The Common Law, and our Law-Books, take notice of but two sorts of foreigners, alien friends, and alien enemies; Calvin's case, Co. 7. 17.

Neither can there be any other sort of foreigners, generally speaking: For if the question arise, whether alien friend, or alien enemy? it must be tried by the leagues with the Prince, whose subject he is; which is, or ought to be enrolled in Chancery. And tho' there be not actual war or fighting between the two Princes and their subjects, yet they are in Statu belli, and may assume arms when they please, and seize the Goods and Persons of each other's subjects.

I shall first consider what the Common Law determined as to the subjects trade and traffick with alien friends, beyond the seas, and upon what foot that trade stands. And then particularly consider how it determines in case of commerce with alien enemies, and incidentally of Infidels.

I conceive the Common Law hath made no express provision, nor given any absolute right for the subjects to trade with any foreigners beyond the seas.

It will be of little use to discourse how far the law of Nations interposes in this matter: whether every Nation be obliged to entertain trade and commerce with another Nation.

And antecedent to all leagues and treaties for commerce, little will be found, besides the laws of hospitality, which do not give any demandable right.

Bodinus, in his Book de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 6, 7. says, Que tametsi jure gentium esse videantur prohiberi, tamen sæpe a Principibus videmus.

And in his Book de Republ. lib. 1. cap. 6. holds, That it is lawful to forbid foreigners from entering the borders, not only if a war be on foot, but in time of peace; that the manners of the Inhabitants may not be corrupted by converse with strangers.

And in his Book de Republ. lib. 1. cap. 6. and 7. That the Laws of commerce are contained in the particular compacts and agreements of People and Princes.

What Bodinus declares to be the Law of Nations, exactly agrees with the Laws of this Kingdom; for all strangers came hither under safe conducts, which contained both the King's licence and protection of them.

The King might inhibit foreigners from coming into the Realm, and might remand them when here.

Magna Charta, cap. 30. which is a general safe-conduct to merchants-strangers, reserves this prerogative to the King, nisi publice prohibiti.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Chap. 2 Inst. 5, 7. admits they might have been prohibited before this Statute, but construes the saving of this Prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Which construction, as it is without any former precedent or authority, so it is against the constant stream of precedents and practice ever since.

Rot. Claus. 24 H. 3. dorso, which was after this Statute, the King sent his writs to several Mayors, commanding that all the Merchants, ultra montem, should depart the Kingdom within a month.

And in the same Roll, dorso, there is another Writ to the Mayor of London, giving leave to Roman, Florentine, and some other Merchants, to stay till the feast of St. Martin in the year following.

And the constant practice in every King's reign since, hath been both by proclamation and orders of council, to command foreigners to depart the Realm.

Besides, the construction my Lord Coke puts upon it, makes the clause idle and elusory.

That one Act of Parliament should provide for a saving by a subsequent Act, which of itself would be repealed by the former.

So where an Act of Parliament prohibited foreigners to come in, the King by his safe-conducts might license them.

The Commons, in the Parliament, 1 H. 5. pray, That the Statute made by Henry IV. for avoiding of strangers out of the Realm, might be put in execution. The King grants it, saving his prerogative to license whom he pleases. The Commons replied, Their intention was no otherwise, nor ever should be by the Grace of God, 1 H. 5. No. 15. Rolls Pre-rogative, 180.

This might further appear by the several Statutes made for the inviolable observation of the King's safe-conducts, which are in express words mentioned to extend to alien enemies, as well as alien friends; 2 H. 5. cap. 6. and 20 H. 6. cap. 1.

It is held in Horn and Ioy's Case, Hill. 21 and 22 Car. Secundi, Banco Regis, Syderfin. That at Common Law the King might prohibit the importation of foreign commodities, before the Statutes therefore made.

So then as the case stood at Common Law, foreign Princes and Nations might prohibit the subjects of England to trade with them, as the King might prohibit foreigners to trade here.

The King might inhibit any of his subjects from going beyond sea: And this might have been by particular Writ or general Proclamation.

Our Books and Precedents are so full in this point, that it was admitted on the other side; for there could not be produced any authority that renders it the least questionable, but multitudes are for it.

Rot. Claus. 7 Ed. 2. mem. 10. A Writ to the Sheriff of York, to seize the bodies and lands of such as had gone beyond sea, contrary to the King's Inhibition.

Rot. Claus. 41 Ed. 3. mem. 24. dorso, Writs to all the maritime towns to take care that a Proclamation prohibiting all his subjects (except noted Merchants, and those unarmed) be put in execution.

Hereby it is evident, that it was penal to go beyond sea, contrary to the King's Inhibition, before the Statute of 5 R. 2. cap. 2.

All that that statute adds to strengthen the King's Inhibition, is only a point of further penalty, viz. A forfeiture of the Goods of the passenger, and of the Vessel of the Master exporting: And though there be three sorts of persons excepted out of that Statute, viz. Lords and other great Men, true and notable Merchants, and the King's soldiers; yet that Law gave those persons no other liberty than they had before, only leaves them out of the Penalty provided by that Statute.

That

That before this Statute, Noblemen and other great Men might be prohibited, appears by my Lord Coke's opinion, 3 Inst. 179. in the case of fugitives; and the Records there mentioned, especially that of the 25th of Ed. 3. Rot. claus. memb. 15. dorso, where the King by his proclamation, prohibits, that, Nequis Comes, Baro, Miles religiosus, sagittarius aut operarius, extra Regnum se transfretet, sub pena Arrestationis & Incarcerationis.

And for the King's soldiers, it is plain they could not depart the Realm without the King's leave: but his raising of them for his foreign service, was a sufficient licence for them to depart the Realm with their several captains.

And for the true and notable Merchants excepted in the Statute, they are the same with the noted Merchants excepted in the proclamation of 41 E. 3. who were the Merchants of the Staple, who were admitted and sworn to observe the laws of the Staple; and were bound to repair thither, and not elsewhere, without the King's special licence, as I shall afterwards shew.

By the Statute of 27 Ed. 3. which settled the laws of the Staple, cap. 23. all Merchants as well aliens as denizens, repairing to the Staple, are required to be sworn before the Mayor and Constable of the Staple. After the Staple was at Calais, as it was 41 E. 3. & 5 R. 2. the same laws of the Staple continued; and these Merchants are in many Records taken notice of.

37 H. 8. cap. 15. All persons are prohibited to buy wool in Kent, and some other Counties, except the Merchants of the Staple.

And 1 Eliz. cap. 13. provides, It shall be lawful for the Merchants, called Merchant-Adventurers, and Merchants of the Staple, out of the River of Thames only, and twice in the year at most, to ship out and in foreign bottoms.

Now 41 E. 3. & 5 R. 2. the Staple was at Calais, and all the Merchants of the Staple were bound to repair thither only, and had a general licence so to do, without taking of Passports, as the form of the Statute of 5 R. 2. directed.

But these notable Merchants were restrained to trade to any other place than the Staple, as I shall after shew.

As the King may inhibit any of his subjects going beyond sea, so he may at any time recall any of his subjects, under penalty of forfeiture of Goods and Lands, during life, Dyer 12. 8. parag. 10. & 276. & 375. 3 Inst. 179. in the chapter of fugitives, & 25 & 26 Eliz. Cater's case in the Exchequer-chamber, Leon. fo. 9.

Upon these grounds, it is evident, that the Common Law did not give any absolute right to the subjects to trade beyond sea with foreigners; for no man can have a full right by law to any thing which others have a right by the same law to hinder him of, or to obstruct him in the using or enjoyment of it.

And Mr. Pollensfen did rightly observe, that this fundamental right of the King, of prohibiting his subjects from going beyond sea, equally respects the trade with christian Nations as with Infidels; for both have a right to debar the English from trading with them, as the King of England had a right at Common Law, to restrain his subjects within the Realm from passing over the sea to trade with them.

Which is founded upon the King's right of protecting his Kingdom, which could not be discharged if the subjects had such general right as is pretended of withdrawing their persons and estates as well to infidel as christian Countries.

And if such general right were by the Common Law, it is marvelous; and that no Record or Book-case can be found, where it was ever so resolved.

Notwithstanding great occasion has been given in all times, by prohibition, for the subject to have asserted such right;

The only authority produced is the opinion of Fitzberbert in Nat. Brev. fo. 85. where the words of Fitzberbert are, That by the Course of the Common Law, every man may go out of the Realm for merchandize, or travel, or any other cause, as he pleases, without demanding licence of the King, and shall not be punished for it.

By this opinion, the liberty the subject had to travel, or to go for any other cause beyond sea, is the same as to trade.

And this opinion imports no more than a bare impunity, that the Common Law made no express provision against it, so as to punish it as an offence at Common Law, but left it to the discretion of the King to prohibit, or permit as he should see cause.

That this was the meaning of Fitzberbert, and that he did not intend any right the Common Law gave the subjects to go beyond sea, but only that the Common Law was silent therein, and left it as a thing indifferent, antecedent to the King's Inhibition; is evident both by Fitzberbert, in the same place, and the co-temporary opinions of the Sages of that time.

For immediately Fitzberbert explains his opinion, That because every subject is bound to defend the King and the Realm, the King at his pleasure may command the subject not to go out of the Realm without his licence; and if they do contrary thereto, they shall be fined for their disobedience.

Here, by Fitzberbert, that liberty which he had asserted for the subject to trade or travel, as it was equal, so it might be equally restrained by the King, at his pleasure.

All the Judges at that time were of the same opinion.

Mich. 1 Eliz. Dyer 165. in an assembly of the Judges and others, the question is fully stated, Whether a subject generally might withdraw his person out of the Kingdom, for merchandize, travel, or other cause, by the sole licence or permission of the Common Law?

The question is not put upon any right the subject had to go, but upon a bare permission at Common Law.

For all the Judges agreed with Fitzberbert, that the King might prohibit them.

And Fitzberbert's opinion for such permission only is urged; and at that time left with a Quare upon it, without any allowance of such permission from the Judges, but seemingly to the contrary.

But afterwards Mich. 12 & 13. Eliz. Dyer 296. a particular case of a Merchant that went beyond sea to live, and not for merchandize, without the King's licence, came before the Judges; and 'twas debated before the Judges of both benches, and the Chief Baron, upon this point, Whether it were an offence punishable at Common Law?

Two of the Judges held it to be an offence, and that the Common Law did prohibit it.

The rest of the Judges concurred with Fitzberbert, and held, that before an exprefs prohibition by the King, by Proclamation or Writ, it was not an offence or contempt, but left by the Common Law as a thing indifferent, which imports no right, but a bare impunity.

But all the Judges, after a Prohibition, held it an offence and contempt, punishable at Common Law; whereby that point is settled by the opinion of Fitzberbert and the Judges of that time, That at the Common Law licence was but a bare permission, importing only impunity, in that the Law was silent before an exprefs Prohibition of the King, which is the lowest degree of permission taken notice of in Books of Law.

Grotius, in his Book De Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. fo. 3. No. 9. defines permission, properly so called, Permissio autem propriè, non actio est Legis, sed actionis negatio, nisi quatenus aliud ab eo, cui permittitur obligat, ne Impedimentum ponat.

But this permission of the Common Law goes not so far as to oblige or debar others from obstructing the action, which may be impeded both by the King and other Nations, as I have shewn.

It carries only impunity with it, and this liberty of haunting or visiting strangers in amity, something resembles that liberty which the Common Law allows one subject towards another, viz. a free passage to his house, to speak or treat with him, which sounds only in excuse of trespass, and may be prohibited by the owner.

9 Ed. 4. fo. 4. par. 15. In trespass for breaking his house, the defendant pleaded a licence from the Plaintiff; who replied, That after the licence he prohibited the defendant to come.

For be the licence exprefs from the party or implied by the law, the owner might determine it by an exprefs Prohibition.

But tho' the Common Law did not exprefsly prohibit the going beyond sea without licence, so as to punish it as an offence criminally, yet it did discountenance all going beyond sea without the King's licence, in adjudging their issue born there, after such a departure, aliens, and not inheritable to the English Laws; as was resolved inter Hide & Hill. Hillar. 25 Eliz. B. Rs.

3 Cro. 3. That if Baron and Feme go beyond sea with licence, and tarry there after the time limited by the licence, and have issue born, they shall be aliens, and not inheritable.

Besides those Powers or Prerogatives wherewith the Common Law entrusts the King, for the defence of the Realm, viz. to prohibit and remove aliens, to restrain them from going, and to recall his own subjects when gone beyond sea.

The Law rests the sole power of making leagues with foreigners in the King alone,

Which is the first step towards a foreign trade: The Common Law admitting of no trade with enemies, and enemies are made friends only by publick leagues to be made capable of being traded with.

And as the making of all leagues, so the modelling and limiting of such leagues, are by the King alone.

As it is to be observed, that no leagues were ever yet made for an unlimited and universal trade, but in all leagues the particular municipal laws of each Country, are excepted; as for example, salt cannot be imported into France; and most French commodities are restrained from being imported hither.

So it was resolved, Pasch. 36 Eliz. (4 Inst. 5.) 3 Inst. Henry de Vale and Tomlinson, upon a seizure of French Goods, and a complaint to the Council upon it, That the Laws of either Kingdom were excepted in the league.

Much less doth the King in any league conclude or build up his own prerogative towards his own subjects, in granting them licences to trade, or in restraining of them from going beyond sea, tho' in order to trade.

Moreover, the rules of the Common Law are not adapted to determine matters of foreign trade, neither can foreigners be presumed to have cognizance of the municipal laws of this Kingdom.

The principal part of foreign trade is transacted beyond sea, where the Common Law can have no cognizance, but is confined within the compass of the four seas.

The Law was so strict, that an obligation bearing date at a certain place beyond sea, could not be tried in England, 21 E. 4. fol. 74.

Service of a privy seal upon a subject beyond sea, commanding him to return, when certified into Chancery, and sent by Mittimus into the Exchequer for seizing of Goods and Lands, is not traversable, because not triable in England, 2 Eliz. Dyer 176.

In the Case of the King and Cusack, 17 Jacobi, Rolls Rep. 2 part. fol. 112. Serjeant Davies argues, that the municipal laws of any Realm are not sufficient for ordering the affairs and traffick of Merchants.

And upon this ground, when the Staple was removed from beyond sea to several Towns in England, by the Statute of 27 E. 3. it is provided, That the trade should be governed by the same laws it was before.

And by 7 Chap. it is enacted, That all Merchants coming to the Staple, shall be ruled by the Law-Merchant of all things touching the Staple, and not by the Common Law of the Land.

Whereby, in negative words, the Common Law was excluded from intermeddling in the affairs of Merchants; as not proper to decide those controversies, and whereof foreigners could have no cognizance.

By all which it appears, that the Common Law made no provision for foreign trade.

The Common Law therefore having given no right to the subjects to trade beyond the seas with foreigners, nor prescribed any rules for the managing of that trade, but left that matter solely to the King, for the best profit of his people:

It may be proper to consider upon what foundations the foreign trade stands.

The foundations are two.

1. Leagues made by the Kings of England with foreign Princes and States.

2. Royal licences, which are either solely by Grant, or by Act of Parliament.

For all Acts of Parliament in matters of prerogative, and which move only from the King, are by the King's Grants in Parliament, ratified into Law.

By leagues, foreigners are bound by publick compact to admit the King's subjects to a freedom to trade with foreigners beyond sea.

I have already spoken of leagues, as the necessary preparatory to all foreign trade, and without which no foreign trade could be enterprized by the subject.

What I shall add, is only concerning the necessary dependance of that trade upon leagues, in its continuance and regulation; if the league be broken let the subjects right be what it will, to trade either singly by Grant, or by Act of Parliament, it is suspended, and after Proclamation made, becomes unlawful and punishable, as trading with enemies.

The leagues and treaties with foreign Princes for trade and commerce, where of the sole power is in the King, to bind the subjects of England.

They are the only Laws betwixt Nation and Nation to direct their trade and commerce by.

And by the said leagues, trade may be limited to certain places and commodities, or other restrictions, as the two Princes shall agree upon, who are the only masters of their leagues.

A clear and full instance of this, is in the leagues for trade with Flanders and the Low-Countries, between the Kings of England and the Dukes of Burgundy; whereby the Staple was settled at Bruges; and that no Wools should be sold in Flanders, but what came out of England; and that no English Cloth should be sold in Flanders, on pain of forfeiture.

21 E. III. Complaint was made in Parliament by the Merchants, of several abuses committed by the men of Bruges, in restraining our Merchants from selling their Wools to whom they pleas'd at Bruges; and pray'd remedy.

The King's answer was, that the ordinance of the Staple should be view'd, and that Thomas Michelborne, with whom the Patent touching that ordinance was, be call'd to bring the same with him, and some of the Merchants of the country, who best understood this matter: and the King by advice of his Council wou'd provide remedy; Rot. Parl. 21 E. III. nu. 10.

22 E. III. Another complaint is made in Parliament against the men of Bruges, for prohibiting the Merchants to buy staple Wares here, and pray redress.

The King answers that he will speak with the Flemish Ambassador about it, 22 E. III. nu. 13.

8 H. V. A grievous complaint made in Parliament against the men of Flanders; that tho' English Merchants observed the ancient league, that no Wools but English should be sold in Flanders, and no English Cloth sold there; yet they permitted the Wools of Scotland, Catalonia, Aragon and Spain, to be sold there, and pray remedy.

The King answers, that search shall be made for the alliance.

And upon the like complaint, 9 H. V. the Commons pray, the King would please to treat with the Duke of Burgundy, that no other than English Wools should be manufactur'd there, or that the English might sell their Cloth there.

The King answers, he would treat that the English Cloths might be there sold. Rolls prerogative, 1. fo. 14. title, League.

But this treaty came to little purpose, till after the Acts of Parliament were made, 27 H. VI. cap. 1. (20 H. VI. cap. 4.) 4 E. IV. cap. 5. for excluding all the commodities of Flanders, until the Duke of Burgundy recall'd his proclamation for banishing Cloths out of his Dominions.

Those Statutes produced a firm league between the Kings and the Duke of Burgundy, who in the Record is call'd the Duke of Hans, or of the Stillyard, from the Merchants his subjects, who had long in England obtain'd those names.

By that league a free trade for Cloth was agreed upon for the English Merchants in Flanders, to continue for ever; and the King confirm'd to the subjects of the Duke, as well the liberties granted by Edw. I. to Merchants-Strangers in general; by his Charta Mercatoria: as those granted by Edw. II. to the Merchants of the Stillyard in particular: which league was confirm'd in Parliament, 13 E. IV. nu. 2.

These leagues may suffice to shew the dependance foreign trade hath upon leagues, as to its continuance and regulation.

By this league the Staple at Bruges was taken off, and liberty granted to the English Merchants to sell their Cloths in any part of the Duke's Dominions.

Who these English Merchants were, I shall in this place only make a short remark; That they were the Company of Merchant-Adventurers, erected and licenced for the better regulation of trade for Wool and Cloth, beyond the Seas by Letters Patent; 1 Feb. 8 H. IV. and confirm'd by other Letters Patent, 1 Oct. 1 H. V. which I shall speak more largely to, when I come to shew the constant possession the Crown hath had of licensing Corporations for foreign trade, exclusive to others.

The other foundation, upon which all foreign trade stands, are royal licences.

I before shew'd that the licence, which the Common Law gave to trade with foreigners, was no sure foundation of trade; because it might by Law be interrupted by the King, and did in its nature import no more than a bare impunity.

But where the King grants licences to his subjects to trade with foreigners, they gain a right or interest to trade according to such licences;

Which are either by Grant only, or by act of Parliament. I will first consider those, that are singly by the King's Grants.

That as the King may at Common Law prohibit any of his subjects to go beyond sea, so that he may license them to go for trade or otherwise, is unquestionable.

The Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, and several forms of licences in the Register, fol. 190. and multitudes of other authorities make it out.

The King may grant such licences, not only where himself may prohibit, but where the Common Law, and Acts of Parliament do prohibit.

Alien Enemies are prohibited by the Common Law to come within the Realm; yet the King may license them to come by his safe conduct, as fully appears by the Statutes made for the observation of safe-conducts.

And it is observable, that such safe-conducts put the Alien Enemy into the condition of an Alien Army, as fully under the King's protection, during the continuance of his safe-conducts.

No subject could seize his goods or injure his person, but he was punishable for it, both at the suit of the King, and of the party.

For before the Statutes made, conservators for truces and safe-conducts were appointed, appears by a Record of this Court, Pasch. 13 E. III. Banco Regis Rot. 12. which I shall have occasion to make use of to another purpose.

And that such an Alien Enemy may bring his personal action for debt, or any injury, appears by the case of John Douglas a Scotchman, 20 E. IV. fol. 6. Pl. 6. and Moore 431.

The King may license his subjects to trade with enemies prohibited by Common Law.

And for licences to come, go and trade both within and without the Realm, against express Acts of Parliaments, the instances are infinite.

But for the better methodizing of these, I shall make use of precedents and authorities, to make out the exercise of the King's prerogative in all times, as to matters relating to Foreign Trade.

I shall reduce what I have to offer under these heads;

First, That the Staples, which were the publick Marts for all Merchants to resort to, were at first settled only by the Kings of this Realm, antecedent to any Act of Parliament.

Secondly, That after the Staple was established at Calais by Act of Parliament; the King gave licence to trade to other places, which no subject could do without such licence.

Thirdly, That the regulation and managery of Foreign Trade in all cases, where Acts of Parliament have not particularly interpos'd, have been guided and governed by the King's prerogative, both in point of licence and inhibition.

First Head; As to settling the Staple in the Dominions of foreign Princes, as in the instance of Bruges; that must be done by leagues, nor can it otherwise be.

But the appointing of the Staples in England, or in the Foreign Dominions of the King, was at first by the King alone.

This is expressly so declared in the recital of the Statute, 2 E. III. cap. 9. whereby Merchants-Strangers, &c. have liberty granted them to trade in England, according to the form of the great Charter.

By Merchants-Privy, distinguished from Merchants-strangers, in this Law are plainly intended the Merchants of the King's foreign Dominions.

The Irish who by Ordinatio pro Statu Hibernie, 17 E. I. had liberty granted them to traffick into England, so as they gave security not to go unto, nor commerce with Scotland, nor other the King's enemies.

And the Gascoigners, and other the King's subjects in France, who had divers liberties of trade granted them by the King; as appears by a difference between them and the Londoners, decided judicially in Parliament, 20 E. I. Parl. fol. 180, and 130.

That by Merchants-Privy is to be understood of the King's foreign subjects, I collect from the reference, this Law hath to Magna Charta, which concern'd only foreign Merchants; whereby the King's power to restrain them was reserv'd, and consequently was reserv'd by this Law; as is taken notice of by an Act not printed, 8 E. III. num. 20. that the Staple was during the King's pleasure, and the King revoked the Staple, giving Merchant-strangers liberty to buy any Staple-wares, 1 E. III. Parl. Rot. pars 2 and 3. Mem. 24.

A Commission issues to the Mayor of London to put in execution the orders made by E. II. for establishing the Staple in several Counties of England, and for the rule and government of Merchants.

By 27 E. III. cap. 1. the Staple was settled in several Towns in England.

But that Law had no words to bind the King's prerogative to remove it, and of that opinion was the Parliament, 38 E. III. where the Commons pray that the Staple may always continue in England.

The King answers, it shall continue till the next Parliament.

The first of March in the same year, the King remised it to Calais; but 43 E. III. cap. 1. because of a war that broke out with France, it is brought back: the Act recites, that it had been removed to Calais by the King, for the profit of the Realm and ease of the Merchants of England.

47 E. III. nu. 17. The Commons pray that the Staple may be only kept at Calais, and that no Grant be made to the contrary.

The King answers, that he will appoint the Staple, as by the Council he shall think best.

1 R. II. nu. 98. The Commons pray to know where the Staple shall be, if Calais haply be besieged.

The King answers, in such places of the Realm, as were last used.

By the constitution of these Staples, Merchants were not only licensed, but obliged to repair thither, and restrained to export their Staple-wares to any other place.

And altho' many Statutes were made to fortify and strengthen the Staple, by creating a forfeiture of all Staple-wares, if carried to any other place; yet by the Records I have produced, it is manifest that the sole appointment and ordering of the staples was in the King, and that by the acknowledgment of several Parliaments.

2 H. V. cap. 6. provides that merchandizes of the Staple shall not be exported to any other place without the King's licence, before brought to the Staple, on pain of forfeiture.

2 H. VI. cap. 4. provides that all Staple wares shall be carried to Calais, so long as the Staple is there.

And 8 H. VI. cap. 17. provides that if Merchants export the merchandizes of the Staple to any other place, the merchandizes shall be forfeited; except the Merchants of Jeane and Venice. And cap. 27. several licences granted by the King to export to other places are revoked.

What these Staple-wares were, is fit to be known, they comprehending the greatest part of the native commodities of this Realm; that were merchandizable in foreign parts.

By the Statute of the Staple, 27 E. III. the Staple-wares are Wools, Leather, Wolfels and Lead; to these are added, by a Statute made 50 E. III. Tin, Worsted, Butter, Cheese, Feathers and many other commodities.

This Statute, tho' it be not printed, yet is taken notice of as a Statute and a Law of the Staple, by the Statute of 3 H. VI. cap. 4. whereby Butter and Cheese are recited to have been made Staple-wares by this Law.

The Record is 50 E. III. nu. 20. (or 200.) where the Commons of the Town of Calais pray that the Staple may be holden only there:

Which the King grants, that it shall be holden only there, and no where else beyond sea; as well of all ancient Staple-wares, as of Tin, Worsted, Butter, Cheese, Feathers, &c.

The Staple was several times remov'd by R. II. but from 21 R. II. it continued at Calais, till that Town was taken by the French.

By all which it is manifest, upon what slender grounds the Statute of 15 E. III. cap. 3. that the Seas be open to all Merchants to pass where they please, was urged and insisted upon to be a Law in force, or to have any influence upon this case.

For besides, what Mr. Solicitor truly observ'd, that it was made for a special purpose, to take off the present Staple; to which all Merchants as well foreign as English, were confin'd to carry their goods, and was of the same purport, as the Statute of 8 E. III. nu. 20. I before mention'd, which open'd the then present Staple.

For by the several Laws I have mention'd, for fixing and strengthening of the Staples, the Statute of 15 E. III. was absolutely repeal'd and set aside.

As to all English, Welsh and Irish, by the Statute of 27 E. III. for settling the Staple in England, by chap. 1. whereof all Englishmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen are expressly prohibited to export any Staple-wares; and liberty given only to Merchants-strangers to do it.

And by 3 chap. it is made felony for the English, Irish or Welsh to export.

And when the Staple was return'd to Calais, it was a forfeiture, as I have shewn, to export those wares to any other place without expreis licence; for that the Mare Liberum, by the Statute 15 E. III. became Mare Clausum long since by many subsequent Laws, and not to be open'd but by a royal licence.

1 H. V. nu. 40. The Commons pray all Merchants may export to any place beyond the Seas, or import any goods except goods of the Staple.

The King answers, he will advise with his Council.

The Parliament did not insist upon any right, by 15 E. III. but pray'd it as an act of Grace, and were modest in their request, that the general licence desired might be restrain'd to merchandizes, which were not Staple Commodities, yet it was denied by the King.

17 R. II. nu. 15. Several Towns in the West prayed they might carry their Wool into Normandy.

The King answers, let them repair to Calais, as is appointed.

18 H. VI. nu. 50. The Commons pray that every Merchant may lawfully transport all manner of Hides, Calves Skins, Coney Felts and Tallow, to what place him liketh, other than to Calais.

Which is denied by the King.

By 18 H. VI. cap. 6. Liberty is given to export Butter and Cheese to any other place besides the Staple, in amity with the King, provided the King may restrain the same when it shall please him.

Where was the force of 15 E. III. if so minute a thing as Butter and Cheese, could not be freely exported without an expreis Statute?

And that is obtain'd upon such urgent reasons as are mention'd in the Statute, and granted too but conditionally, with a saving of the King's right to restrain.

This may suffice for making out the first head, that the Staples to which all Merchants are obliged to repair, were principally instituted and appointed by the King alone; and that the Statute of 15 E. III. is wholly repealed by the Laws for settling the Staples.

Second Head; In the next place, I shall offer some authority to make out the King's undoubted right to grant liberty of trade to other places, after the Staple was fixed at Calais.

My Lord Coke in 4 Inst. 282. is much in the right, in affirming the Staple was continued at Calais above 200 years, tho' he be mistaken in another assertion, as I have fully shewed,

That it could not be removed but by Act of Parliament.

But I will admit the Staple at last fixed at Calais, by 21 R. II. and strengthen'd and fenced under the penalty of forfeiture of the goods, by the Statutes, 2 H. V. and 8 H. VI.

Yet the Kings, by their prerogative, did and might lawfully grant licences to trade to other places.

I will not here trouble you with the general learning of dispensations with penal Laws, tho' our Books are full of it, and determine in favour of the Crown.

But I shall confine myself to instances of foreign trade, wherein it will appear, by what I have already said, and shall farther offer, that the Crown had a peculiar prerogative not disputed, or drawn into question in any times till of late.

The men of Berwick and Newcastle have had such licences granted them, which being found detrimental to the King's revenue, arising at the Staple, were revoked by Act of Parliament, 8 H. VI. cap. 31.

20 H. VI. cap. 4. Denizens, who shall take licences to export to any place but the Staple, shall pay Alien duties.

Here the King's right to grant such licences is acknowledged by the Parliament; 27 H. VI. cap. 1. upon complaint of the King's Officers in Parliament, that by the multitude of licences to export elsewhere than the Staple, the revenue of the Staple was sunk from 68000 l. per Ann. to 12000 l. per Ann. all licences before granted are vacated.

In the year-book, 2 R. II. fol. 12. Park. 16. and 1 H. VII. fol. 3. A licence granted to the town of Waterford, to carry goods of the Staple where they pleased, is allow'd; the Irish being bound to the Staple as well as the English.

1 H. V. n. 15. which I before mention'd, the Commons allowed of the King's prerogative to license strangers to come into England, tho' prohibited by act of Parliament.

Where the Statute 15 H. cap. 3. prescribed a form of safe conduct, yet it was resolved the King might grant them, as before at Common Law: Edw. IV. fol. 32. L. 340. and 13 E. IV. fol. 9.

Where by 31 E. III. cap. 20. the exportation of all sorts of Corn was prohibited, except to Calais and Gascoign.

Several Indictments were preferred, 36 Edw. III. against John Lamb, Andrew Taverner, and several other Merchants, for exporting great quantities of Corn and Grain. They severally pleaded the King's licences, mentioning the quantities, and in some of them the certain places to which the Corn was to be carried; but in others generally, ad quascunque Partes exteras, præter illas, quæ de Munitione Regis existunt.

Which are allowed, Treasury, Int. Pl. Corone & totum, 36 E. III.

Whereas 5 Eliz. prohibited the exportation of Sheepskins.

Hillary, 3 Jac. I. Shaw brings his action against Hawes upon that Statute.

The Defendant pleads a licence, 19 May, 31 Eliz. to Gilbert Lee, his factors, executors, deputies and assignees, to export Sheepskins for ten years, not exceeding 200000 in any one year; if it happen'd by any restraint, or any other cause, they should should not export that number; and pleads that Lee assigned to, and nominated Scot to execute the Letters Patent, with the contingent clauses: And

That Scot assigns to the Defendant, without any express mention of the contingent clause, and pleads he was hindred during the Term; and justifies for the exportation afterwards.

All the Court held, that this was a dispensation the King might grant to Lee the first Patentee.

But judgment was given against Hawes the Defendant upon these reasons:

First, Because being a dispensation, it is not assignable.

Secondly, That tho' Scot might have the benefit thereof, as nominated, yet he could not nominate over.

Thirdly, The advantage of the future contingent is not assignable, Hillar. 3. & Pasch. 4 Jac. Banco Regis, Ro. 128. Hale's Common place, tit. Monop. cu. 3.

Third Head; In the last place I shall shew, that the regulation and managery of the foreign trade, in all cases where Acts of Parliament had not particularly interposed, hath been guided and govern'd by the prerogative of the Crown, both in point of licence and prohibition.

That the foreign trade was at first transacted and carried on by foreigners, is most evident from Magna Charta, which as to this trade, provides only for foreign Merchants.

And if any English had at that time exercised such craft, or had had the least pretence thereto; no doubt can be, but the great Charter of their liberties would have made some provision for them, as well as foreigners; which it doth not.

The Statute of Aiton Burnell, 13 E. I. introduced the Statute-Merchant for the benefit of Merchant-strangers, for the more speedy recovery of their debts.

For the only mischief the Statute takes notice of, was, that the Merchants withdrew themselves from coming into the Realm with their merchandize, because there was no speedy Law provided for recovery of their debts.

I have not met with any footsteps of any Record to make it out, that in the Reigns of E. I. or E. II. or before, any English Merchants ever enterprized the foreign trade.

But in those Kings reigns, the foreign trade was managed by the King's Charters to foreigners; for tho' Magna Charta gave a general safe conduct to Merchant-strangers, yet the King might prohibit them, and after such prohibition might license, as I have shewn he did.

And therefore the foreign Merchants had a recourse to the King's Charters, viz. Charta Mercatoria; by E. I. and the Charter to the Merchants of the Hans, or the Still-yard, which I have mention'd.

And 6 E. II. the Gascoigners founded themselves in their difference with the City of London, 20 E. I. upon their privileges granted them by the Kings of England.

Indeed the men of Guernsey, 32 H. III. obtained a licence from the King, to them and their heirs, freely to fish and to sell their fish in any of the King's Dominions thrice in the week, between the feasts of Michaelmas and Easter; Par. Roll. 32 H. III. mem.

The earliest attempt towards a foreign trade, I find enterprized by the English, is the fishing trade upon the seas, 11 E. III.

At which time the King granted licences to the men of Yarmouth, Scarborough, Whitby and Dun- wich, to them and others repairing to those towns to fish; to fish in the sea with vessels of thirty runs, Quibuscunque inhibition seu Mandatis MS. in contrarium factis non obstantibus; Rot. Clauso, 11 E. III. pars secunda, Membr. 35.

Tho' these licences were intended only to extend to the narrow seas, whereof the Dominion was in the King;

Yet by colour of these licences, the English about the latter end of H. IV's reign, made fishing voyages to Iceland.

Whereupon H. V. at the instance of the subjects of the King of Denmark, prohibited the English to fish there.

And thereupon the Parliament, 3 H. V. pray'd that it might be enacted, that the English might freely fish there.

Which was denied by the King, 3 H. V. nu. 33. Rolls Prerog. 170. whereby it is evident, they had no right to do it; but that the King might prohibit them, it being a foreign traffick, wherein no act of Parliament had made any provision.

Afterwards the same King, in the 5th year of his reign, granted licences to Geoffery Pamping and John Hastings of Yarmouth; John Statwill and Richard Pais of Winterton; William James and William Marriot of Carowmere; to go versus Partes exteras to take fish. And

That every one of them might employ two ships called doggers, to take fish and bring it into England by themselves, Attornies or Servants. Par. Rot. 5 H. V. membr. 34.

E. I. Before any Statute made therefore by proclamation, prohibited the exportation of Horses, Arms, Money, Gold and Silver Vessels. Some men of Dartmouth were proceeded against by information in the King's Bench, for exporting Money contrary to the Proclamation: Hill. 1 E. II. Rot. 38. amongst the Records in the Treasury.

The Crime in the Information is said to be contra pacem Domini Regis, Contemptum & Inobedientiam Coroneque sue pl. judicium & Pacis, sive perturbationem manifestam.

To which, those of the Defendants that were taken, pleaded not guilty, of whom one afterwards died, and another was employed by the King into Scotland. So the Record ends with a continuance of the issue.

Rot. Clauso, 41 E. III. membr. 25. A Writ issued to the Mayor of Hull, that he permit no Alien Ship to be freighted there, till the Ships of the Town were freighted.

It is evident upon what I produced under the other head from the Records of Parliament, 1 H. V. nu. 41. and 18 H. VI. nu. 50. That the English Merchants had not then any right or general liberty to export to what places they pleased any sort of merchandizes, tho' not Staple-wares.

But such Petitions were denied in both these Kings reigns; yet at that time there was a Company of Merchants-Adventurers, licensed to trade into Holland, Zealand, Brabant, Flanders, and other parts beyond the seas, erected for the rule and government of all English Merchants trading into those parts; and all who shou'd trade there, enjoind to be obedient to the rules of the Company.

But it was not objected to those Kings, that some were licensed, and others, unless they would be subject to the rules of the Company, were restrain'd.

The Company was erected by Letters Patent, 5 Feb. 8 H. IV. and confirm'd by H. V. 1 Oct. 1 H. V. and confirm'd by H. VI. 6 July, 8 H. VI.

That

That the Merchant-Adventurers enjoyed their privileges, and permitted none to trade within their limits, who submitted not to the rule of the Company, and who should not be contributors to their publick charges, is evident from the Stat. 12 H. 7. cap. 6. insisted on by Mr. Pollexfen; but was made use of by him, only for the historical part of it contained in the petition presented by the Merchants to the Parliament for their liberty of trade; which, by what I have already shewed, could not be true, as to the staple wares, unless they have licences from the King (which in all probability they had) to certain places.

And what is it they pretend to in their Petition? only freedom to repair to, and trade at the four general Marts, which being annually held and proclaimed, was an invitation to all neighbouring Nations to repair thither; and all English Merchants, as well as others, if they had lain under no restraint from the Company's Charter, or other Prohibition of the King, might have repaired thither with their cloth or other wares, not being staple wares, without offence, as I before admitted.

In case there had been such a right to a free trade to all Nations in amity, as the Petition suggests (for as yet the Merchants retain some modesty, not to pretend to a free trade with aliens not in amity, much less with Infidels, whom the laws of all christian Countries adjudge alien enemies:)

This had been the proper time for the Parliament to have asserted that right, and adjudged the Patent illegal, as Parliaments have frequently done with Patents which have been against Law: But the Parliament knew no such right, and therefore by the enacting clause, allowance is given to the Charter; only their immoderate demands of admittance fines are restrained, and the fine limited to 10 marks. And accordingly in their Charter afterwards renewed by H. VII. they are obliged to take no more of any person admitted into their Company than 10 marks.

Ph. & Mary, 26 Feb. 1 & 2 P. & M. erected a corporation of Merchants-Adventurers to Russia, and Parts adjacent, with licence to trade and prohibition to others, upon pain of forfeiture of Ship and Goods.

That this forfeiture might be effected, the Charter is confirmed by Parliament, 8 Eliz.

This Act takes notice that several persons, after the trade was found beneficial at the cost of the Company, for their peculiar gain, utterly to decay the trade of the Company, contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, in great disorder traded into those parts, to the great detriment of the common-wealth.

Here is a full description (mutato nomine) of the defendant, and his interloping companions.

By the Judgment of the Parliament then, a limited trade, under the order and rule of a Company, as settled by the Crown, was thought most beneficial to the King.

And those that traded contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, are reckoned disorderly traders, in prejudice of the common-wealth.

So far was the Parliament from thinking all the subjects had a right to trade there.

After the taking of Calais, in the latter end of Q. Mary's reign, Q. Elizabeth and the English Merchants, were no doubt in great streights what to do.

For by the Stat. 2 H. 6. all merchandizes of the Vol. VII.

staple were to be carried to Calais, while the staple was there, which ceased by the taking of Calais.

But by 2 H. 5. no merchandizes of the staple could be exported without the King's licence, till brought to the Staple.

The Queen had no place convenient left for erecting the staple at, beyond the seas. And tho' in R. II's time, when the Parliament demanded where the Staple should be, if Calais were besieged? the King's answer was ready (viz.) At such places in England it was last at:

Yet now when Calais was taken, such answer would not serve the turn; but the placing of it in England would be useless and ineffectual, and destructive to the Queen's revenues in her customs.

For by several laws made by E. 4. R. 3. & H. 7. most foreign manufactures were prohibited, and great discouragements put upon all foreign Merchants coming into England, but those of the Hans and Stillyard.

And few foreign Merchants would repair into England to fetch our commodities, when they can bring little to barter with, but ready money.

And to have granted to every Merchant a several licence, as it would be chargeable to the subject, so it might prove mischievous to the Kingdom, the subjects trading severally, without any rule or government, in foreign parts, upon the account of the general law of reprisals, which obtains in all Nations.

Whereby every subject and his goods are liable for the injuries and wrongs committed by any one; which, in the more barbarous Countries, is executed with great barbarity.

And therefore Q. Elizabeth in the direction of foreign trade, instead of Staples, for the rule, order and government of Merchants, at certain places, followed the precedents of the Merchants-Adventurers and Russia Companies, by erecting corporations of Merchants for the rule and government of the foreign trade.

Which companies, as they are presumed to have a better State to answer for injuries done in foreign Parts, than any single person can be presumed to have:

So in their very constitution are more responsible to the Law for their misdemeanour, by Quo Warranto's, whereby they may lose their liberty of trade.

It is very doubtful whether licences granted for trade to single persons, may be forfeited; they passing an interest, if the licence to go beyond sea, to trade or otherwise, be for a certain time, as most licences were. It is held by the Judges, 2 Eliz. Dyer, 176. in the Case of Mr. Barnes and the Duchefs of Somerset, that the licence is not revocable.

The Queen, in her reign, erected many corporations for foreign trade: I shall mention only some, which have been publicly taken notice of, and received allowance.

17 June, 2 Eliz. The Queen, by Letters Patent, incorporated several Merchants of Exeter, and gave them licence to trade into France; and that no artificer should be admitted of the Companies.

The Prohibition was not general to her other subjects, but only to the men of Exeter.

The Company enjoyed their liberties all the Queen's reign, and flourished under them till 3 Jac.

When

When by Act of Parliament the trade was opened, and general licence given to trade with France, Spain and Portugal, and the dominions thereof.

Whereupon a question arose, whether their Charter was not set aside by the general words of 3 Jac. and therefore 4 Jac. cap. 9. it is enacted, and declared, That the said general Act doth not nor shall dissolve, annihilate, or impeach the said Charter, or the said Company, in any of their privileges, liberties or immunities, granted to them by the said Charter, anything in the said general Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

This Act added no new force to the Charter, but enacted and declared it to be out of the provision of 3 Jac. for general licence to trade into those Countries.

Where, by the Judgment of the Parliament, the Queen's power to grant such Charters, is admitted. For if the Patent had been void in Law, before 3 Jac. to make an Act of Parliament only to declare it out of the provision of that Law, were idle and illusory.

The Queen's subjects, for their licence to fish at Iceland, paid the Queen a quantity of fish, called composition-fish, by the Act of Parliament, made 5 Eliz. cap. 5.

Whereby, for the encouragement of the fishing trade, the purveyors are prohibited to take purveyance of sea-fish; the composition-fish, payable by the Queen's subjects, travelling to Iceland, are excepted.

The Patent of the Greenland Company to fish there, was held good, Rolls, 1 pt. fo. 5. in the Case of the taylor of Ipswich.

This trade, notwithstanding the privileges granted to the Company, was almost lost.

And thereupon 25 Car. 2. cap. 7. that trade is opened, not only to the English, but to all foreigners residing in England.

The East-India Company was erected by Queen Elizabeth, 31 Dec. 43 Eliz. and renewed to them and successors, 13 May, 7 Jac. with prohibition to all others to trade there, and confirmed to them by this King, 3 Apr. 13 Car. 2. upon which Patent the question ariseth about a foreign trade which hath been enjoyed by the Company above 80 years.

And its consequence concerned the prerogative of the Crown, in all the Charters for foreign trade which have been granted.

Whereas I have shewn, the most considerable part of the foreign trade, hath in all times been managed under Grants from the Crown, in appointing the Staples for Merchants to repair to, in licensing trade to other places, notwithstanding those Staples; and in licensing and prohibiting foreign trade in such Cases where Acts of Parliament had not made special provision.

I now proceed to consider of Royal Licences by Act of Parliament.

It will be infinite to take notice of the several Statutes made relating to foreign trade.

And therefore I shall at this time offer some general observations upon them.

Observ. 1. Upon examining into the ancient laws for foreign trade, it will be found that there are far more laws for restraining the exercise of foreign trade, by Englishmen, than there are for opening of it.

So much, that for a long time whilst the Staple was in England, they were prohibited under severe penalties, not to export any staple ware; and when the staple was removed beyond sea, they were confined to Calais, and such liberty of trade to other places as the Kings from time to time had granted to corporations; and single persons were frequently taken off, though the King's prerogative to grant them was never yet impeached by any Statute.

The great discouragement to them by foreigners first began in the reigns of Ed. IV. R. III. and H. VII. But in those Kings reigns, the English were strictly held to the staple, unless licensed by the Kings.

This observation is made out of the several laws I have touched upon, and many others which are in the Statutes at large, that are printed.

Observ. 2. There was never yet any Statute made, that gave a general liberty of trade to Englishmen to or with all Nations; but what were made, were special and particular.

The only law that had any resemblance to any such purpose, was 15 Ed. 3. so much insisted on, which has been sufficiently already shewn to import no such thing; and the several attempts in Parliament to have introduced a greater liberty of trade with foreign Nations, in amity, and the particular laws that have been made for licensing some trades, do fully argue that the law was never understood to intend any such matter, as a general licence to trade every where.

Observ. 3. The several special statutes that have been made for liberty of foreign trade to particular Countries, or for particular commodities, are introductory of a new law, and not declaratory; and do plainly argue the King's right before to prohibit some of them in express terms, others by necessary implication.

I shall instance in some of them, the Stat. 17 Ed. 1. Ordinatio pro Statu, &c. Hibernie, opens the trade from Ireland to England and Wales, for the Irish commodities.

Whereby all Merchants have liberty granted them to import their Merchandize into England, but so that they give good security, that they shall not go unto, nor commerce with our enemies of Scotland, nor others of our enemies.

This law restrained the subject of no liberty he had before; and therefore if the Merchant had before such general liberty or right to import those commodities, his right of trading would have excused his giving any security; which is not imposed by law, otherwise than as a precedent condition to a right conferred by the Statute.

This law opened the trade from Ireland to England, as well to foreigners as Englishmen; but it extended only to Irish commodities: for the exporting of English commodities into Ireland continued to be managed under the King's licences till Edward III.

And if any did to the contrary, he was subject to fine and ransom for his contempt, as appeared by 34 Ed. 3. cap. 17. whereby the trade is opened for English and other commodities into Ireland.

By that law it is accorded, That all Merchants, as well aliens as denizens, may come into Ireland with their merchandize, and from thence freely to return without fine or ransom.

This law extended not to the English merchants, but only to the aliens and denizens.

In

In the next Chapter, cap. 18. the English are provided for, who had not so large a liberty granted them as the aliens and denizens had. The 18 chap. provides, That the People of England who have heritage and possessions in Ireland, may bring their corn, beasts, and victuals, to the said land of Ireland, and from thence to re-carry their goods and merchandizes into England, freely without impeachment.

The liberty of exporting into Ireland, granted to the English, is restrained both to such English only who had lands in Ireland, as also in the sorts of the commodities, viz. corn, beasts, and victuals only.

But the liberty to export from Ireland, is larger, extending to all commodities, according to the latitude of Ordinatio Hiberniae, which took in all Irish commodities.

38 E. 3. cap. 11. The King wills of his grace and sufferance, That all Merchants denizens, that be not artificers, shall pass into Gascoign to fetch wines; and that the Gascoigners, and other aliens, may import; always saved to the King, that it may be lawful to him, whensoever it is advised by his Council, to ordain of this Article, as best shall seem to him for the profit of him and his Commons.

This is expressed to be an Act of Grace, and contains a saving of the King's ancient prerogative, 18 H. 6. cap. 3. which I before mentioned: for liberty of exportation of butter and cheefe, expressly saves the King's right, provided the King may restrain the same when it shall please him.

To pass by many ancient Statutes of like nature, the Act of tonnage and poundage, 12 C. 2. which gives liberty of exporting divers commodities, which the Kings of England might in all times prohibit, as to gun-powder, arms and ammunition, expressly saves the King's right, to prohibit by Proclamation.

3 J. cap. 6. which is the largest licence for foreign trade that was ever given to any Englishmen in Parliament, by opening of the trade to Spain, Portugal, and France, and the dominions thereof, fully prove the King's prerogative in this matter, both in the title and body of the Act.

The title of the Act is, An Act to enable all his Majesty's loving Subjects of England and Wales, to trade freely into the dominions of Spain, Portugal, and France.

A very improper Title, if so be the King's subjects were before enabled to do it, and had a right to do it by the Common Law, as is pretended; and would not be restrained from it by the King.

And no doubt can be made, if such right had been, but the Parliament would have seen it, being very inquisitive at this time into all the subjects rights, and very jealous lest any of the ancient rights of Englishmen should be invaded by K. James coming from another Nation, and would not have complimented the King with the title of an enabling law.

The reasons from the body of the Act are strong; the reasons offered for such general liberty, are only politick, none drawn from the right or any ancient usage the English could pretend to.

The Act in its recital admits, That by the Letters Patent for incorporating the Company to trade into Spain and Portugal, his Majesty's other subjects were disabled and debarred from the free enlargement of common traffick, into those dominions.

Which were not true, if the other subjects had before a right to trade there, but the patent would have been void against them.

3. There are no declarative words of any former right, but only of enacting, and provisional for a future liberty, viz.

That it shall, and may be lawful from henceforth.

4. The Act, in express words, provides only against the mischief and inconveniences which may grow or redound upon the Patent, and to redress any injury done by the Patent.

5. The liberty granted, is restrained to be in such sort, and in as free a manner, as was at any time accustomed since the beginning of the King's reign, and before the late Charter of incorporation.

Whereby it appears, that the usage to trade freely into these Countries without licences, was but from the entrance of K. James.

The Statute referring to no other free usage: And therefore this Act did not over-reach any Charter granted by Queen Elizabeth, as was afterwards declared in the next Parliament, 4 J. cap. 9. in the case of the Charter to the Merchants of Exeter, for the French trade granted 2 Eliz. which I before mentioned.

Observ. 4. That all Acts of Parliament which grant licence of trade, do suppose the other foundation of foreign trade to have continuance, viz. according to leagues with foreign Princes.

For no Act of Parliament ever gave licence to trade with aliens not in amity; and if the league be determined, the liberty is suspended, tho' granted by Parliament, till the league be renewed.

Observ. 5. The last thing I shall observe upon the laws that give licence of trade, is, that where liberty of trade is given by Act of Parliament, without any reservation to the King of his ancient right, the King in such case hath so bound up himself, that he cannot generally prohibit or restrain that trade wherein he hath granted his subjects an interest by a law.

For a general prohibition or restraint would amount to a repeal of a law, which the King cannot do without an Act of Parliament.

The law will be the same here as in the cases where Acts of Parliament do generally prohibit, where general licences would be void, because they tend to repeal a law.

Upon this ground the licence in Darcy's case, for that part which concerned the importation of foreign cards, was judged void in law, because too general, not limited to any certainty.

But the King may in particular, and certainly, dispense and license against prohibiting Statutes.

And so he may in particular restrain the persons of his subjects from going beyond the seas, notwithstanding any of the laws which give licence of trade.

But cannot grant a restraint or prohibition generally, where Acts of Parliament have given a general licence, unless it be in special cases; and for a time, where the interest of the publick requires it, as of the plague, and furnishing out of the King's Navies, in time of war with any Prince. And therefore I shall admit, that if any publick law can be produced, which gives liberty of trade for all the King's subjects, to the Judges, that this Patent will be void, as a restraint of that liberty against law.

Upon this ground the Canary Patent was held void, because against the express liberty, granted by 3 Jac. and therein saved; or of the Common Law Monopoly, by restraining the right of others against an express law, for the benefit of a few.

Upon the same reason, the Grant of Pb. and Mary, that all sweet wines should be landed at Southampton, was against several express Statutes, and the rights of several free Ports, before granted by the Crown to the City of London, and others, as 27 Ed. 3. cap. 6. whereby Merchants strangers had liberty granted to bring their wines to what Ports they pleased; and 43 Ed. 3. whereby the English, Irish, and Welsh, had liberty granted to fetch their wines and bring them to any parts of England, Ireland, and Wales.

And therefore was repealed in Parliament of 5 Eliz. Rolls 2. Rep. 112. whereby it appears, that the Parliament in the Queen's time, were vigilant enough to take notice of Patents against law.

The like in the case of John Peachy, for the sole selling of sweet wines by retail, 50 Ed. 3. the Parliament set it aside, as against law: Upon that Grant an Inhibition under the great seal issued, prohibiting all the citizens of London to sell sweet wines in London. The Inhibition was revoked, 50 Ed. 3. No. 13. and Peachy punished for extortion, by colour of the Grant, 50 Ed. 3. No. 33.

This Grant was not only against many express Statutes, some whereof have been cited in the arguments in this Case, which gave the Merchant-Importers liberty to sell their wines and merchandize to whom they pleased; and many express Grants to the citizens of London, some whereof were confirmed in Parliament; but was against the rules of the Common Law, being a restraint and monopoly of an inland trade, as selling of wines in London and other parts of England, undoubtedly then was.

For when foreign merchandizes are brought hither to trade or traffick with, they fall under the rules and government of the Common Law, and the retailing of them here becomes an inland trade.

In Lambard 43 Ed. 3. lib. aff. fol. 276. Pl. 38. it was ruled, That when foreign merchandizes are brought in, a conspiracy to enhance their prices is punishable.

At Common Law in like manner, as a design by false rumors, or otherwise to debase the prices of our inland commodities.

The reasons of these cases, which were the principal pillars to support the arguments of the other side, prove nothing to our case, till they can produce some clearer Statute than 15 Ed. 3. for giving liberty of trade to the East-Indies.

Having considered of foreign trade with aliens in amity, and how it hath been managed in all times, I proceed in the last place to consider what the law determines of trade and commerce with alien enemies, and consequently with Infidels. Here the consideration is far different from what it was in the former; in that, the Common Law was silent, until an express Prohibition by the King.

But here the Common Law is a Prohibition of itself, and is at open war with alien enemies.

Whether the commerce with alien enemies without licence, be within the extent of aiding and comforting the King's enemies beyond the seas, within 25 Ed. 3. I shall not at this time argue. But it may be worth while for the interlopers who traffick into foreign Nations, not in amity with the King of England, without licence, well to consider that point; but before the Statute at Common Law, it was criminal.

Pasc. 13 Ed. 2. Rot. 13. B. Rs. in the Treasury, In an information against three persons for trading into Scotland, then in enmity with the King of England; the defendants pleaded a licence from Custodes Trengie, in the marches of Scotland; which was held nought, none could licence but the King: thereupon they obtained and pleaded the King's pardon. Rolls Prerogative, tit. Gaver resso. 173. Pl. 3.

I need not labour to clear a point which was not opposed by the defendant's counsel, but their endeavour was to exempt Infidels from being enemies; wherein they have a difficult task, in rowing against the stream of the laws of all christian Countries.

In the great instance of the Jews, who have been expelled, and their estates seized, as of enemies almost in every christian Country;

They call for authorities, but offer none themselves; not so much as the opinion of any one learned man, to give countenance to the least amity between the English laws and Infidels. I will not distrust the memory of the Court to repeat the authorities which have been produced to assert the enmity between Infidels and the laws of this Realm; which are more than sufficient, after such solemn proceedings against the Jews in Edward the 1st's reign.

All which have received a very short answer, That these Records are obscure.

That time hath hid the Law from us, so that we cannot distinguish whether they were Acts of Law, or Acts of violence.

And that the reason why Princes were induced to use them so, might be, because they are under no government to vindicate them.

But why the Records should be so darkened, and the Proceedings in so eminent a case as that of the Jews, so obscure, since Edward I. more than the Common Law, in the division of the right and properties of others; I could not hear any good reason given.

For I take it, the principles of law upon which the Jews were proceeded against, are as clearly laid down in our Law-Books, as any point of Law we have.

For the case of the Jews stood thus: They came over as Merchant strangers, of several Countries in amity, both by special licences of several Kings, and under the general safe conduct of Mag. Chart. whereby they were under the King's protection, and enabled to contract and sue, as any other Merchant-strangers under safe conduct: which the King might grant, as I have shewn, to an alien enemy. While here many of them were indenized, others born here, and had great possessions of lands, as well as leases and personal estates.

Then they are banished by the King, by Proclamation, as well those that were never indemnified upon the account of their religion, as infidels and enemies to the christian religion.

To whom then will their lands, leases for years, credits, and such personal estates as they had not liberty to carry out, belong?

The Law adjudged it all to the King. And the controversies that arose about their estates, did not fall out between the King and the defenceless Jews, (as the defendant's counsel terms them) for they were gone; but the King, and several doctors of the Jews, who well knew the Law, and were able to defend their right.

To the dark Records (as they were filed) I will add a case solemnly adjudged, between the King and a potent Subject, the Archbishop of York, 21 Edw. I. where the case was;

The Prior of Piddington, was indebted to a Jew in 300*l.* After the banishment of the Jews, the Jew met with the Archbishop in France, and prevailed with him to help him to the money; that Archbishop persuaded the Prior, that he was bound in conscience to pay the money to the Jew's Attorney; who did it accordingly.

And all this was after a Proclamation issued for discovery of the Jews debts.

For this concealment and trespass, the Archbishop was sued by the King, before the Council in Parliament, and laid it to his damage of 1000*l.* To which the Archbishop appeared and pleaded, and to avoid a Trial by a Country Jury; as the Record mentions, he was put upon his allegiance to tell the truth.

Whereupon he confess'd the Information, and Judgment was given against him, and the taxing the fine referred to the King.

The reasons of the Judgment fully declare what the Law was; Quia idem Episcopus bene cognoscit quod post exilium Judeorum a predicto Judeo intellexit, quod pecunia predicta sibi in regno debebatur, & post eorum exilium omnia quæ sua fuerunt, & in regno remanserunt, tam debita quam alia bona quæcunque, ipsi Domino Regi remanserunt, & catalla sua fuerunt.

That he did not only conceal, but contrary to his faith, wherein he was bound to the King, persuaded the Prior and Convent, for saving of their souls, to pay. Pla. Parl. 173.

The Archbishop did not doubt of the Law, tho' the Defendant's Counsel do; but a recourse to Conscience against Law, in deceit of the King, against his faith and allegiance.

This I hope will be allowed to be a Judgment, and a Judgment that declares the Law as plainly as ever Judgment did, and of a higher nature, than any Judgment in Westminster-hall.

In the same year several mean Lords petition the King in Council for the arrearages, in rent and services, of the lands the Jews held of them before their banishment.

The Council answered, that for the time the Jews held it, it was their fault not to collect them; for so long as the King held them, he would pay them; for the time they were in any Grantees hands, they should have recourse to his Grantees, Pla. Parl. Riley, fol. 129.

Here the King's title, to the real and personal estates of the Jews in England, is asserted by Judgment of the highest Court of Judicature in England.

The principles of Law, upon which the Judgment past against the Jews, are frequently laid down in our Book.

If an Alien Army or Enemy purchase lands, the King shall have them, and may seize them at any time; and tho' the Alien died seized upon office found, the King shall have them, and not the Lord by Escheat.

This my Lord Coke reports to have been resolv'd by all the Judges, Pasch 29 Eliz. in Sir James Croft's case, 1 Inst. fol. 2.

There it was also held indeed, that if a Denizen died seized without heir, the Lords by Escheat should have the land, and not the King; but that is in case of a compleated Denization, where the issue of the Denizen is capable of inheriting. But in case of Jews or Infidels, the Denization was void, being made to them as strangers, without taking notice of their enmity to the Christian Religion; and so the King deceiv'd in the Grant.

And an Infidel, though born in England, is not inheritable to the Laws of the land; if he should, the land might soon be over-run with Jews and Infidels, and no redress to be had: so that neither denization nor birth did alter the state of the Jews as to Inheritances within England, but they remain'd Aliens under safe-conduct only.

If an Alien Enemy had a lease of lands, or of a house for habitation, the King should have it, within the same resolution in Sir James Croft's case, and not any subject that shou'd enter upon him.

Nay, if an Alien Friend, who shou'd take a house for habitation, should die, or leave the lands, the King should have the lease.

But then, how stands the Law for the goods of an Alien Enemy without the Realm?

Mr. Pollexfen, to argue Infidels to be no Alien enemies, urged from the mischief that might ensue, that then every man might seize the persons or estates of Jews and Infidels; because by Law every person might seize the persons and goods of Alien enemies: and for that, cited the authority of 7 E. IV. fol. 13. Co. 2 H. VII. fol. 15. b. which are but the same case, the authority of 7 E. IV. being only mention'd in course; argument in the Book of H. VII. The authority of 7 E. IV. is good Law, but misapplied, in not observing the difference between the times of the enemy's, or his goods coming into the Realm.

After open War proclaim'd, whereby all the subjects have notice whom the King hath declared his enemies, and against whom they are to join in defence of themselves and the Kingdom; if the persons or goods of such enemies come into the Kingdom, any subject may seize them, and gain property in the goods, as a prize taken in open War, according to the authority of 7 E. IV. And indeed the Laws of all Nations; and that not only of enemies goods, but of Englishmens goods taken by the enemies; (whereby the property was left) and brought hither by the same authority of 7 E. IV.

Which plainly shows the meaning of the Book, to be of goods taken in open War; whereby the property of the goods rests in the Captor, as lawful prize.

But when the persons or goods of Aliens are in, or come into England under safe-conduct; and the safe-conduct be not determined by the King, either by Proclamation of open War, or otherwise, no subject can seize the person, or goods of such Alien enemies.

Upon this difference the Law was settled, 36 H. VIII. by the Judges, Bro. Property, 38. in the abridgment of the case, 7 E. IV.

That where a Frenchman inhabited in England, and a War was afterwards proclaimed, no subject could seize his goods, because they were here before.

But if he came after the War, any man may seize his person and goods, and shall have a property in them, and in such case the King shall not have them.

And so was it put in practice, saith the Book, tween the English and the Scots.

And when Bulloign was taken by the King's subjects, 19 Ed. IV. fol. 6. pl. 4. where a debt was owing by a subject of the King of Denmark's, and a war

war breaks out, the subject shall not retain the debt, but the King shall have it.

22 or 2 E. IV. fol. 4, 5. pl. 9. In false imprisonment, the Defendant justifies under the King's Commission for apprehending a Scotchman; there being a war between the King of England, and the King of Scotland.

I before shewed, that an Alien enemy, which came over by the King's safe-conduct, was as much under the protection of the Laws, as any Alien Army whatsoever; and no subject could seize or molest his person or goods.

And the determining the safe-conduct by the King, left the Alien Enemy in the same condition as other Alien enemies, after war proclaimed; who were here before under the general safe-conduct of the Laws.

In which case the subjects had no liberty to seize either the persons or goods of Alien enemies; but that power was reserved by Law expressly to the King.

Which, besides the authorities I have produced, expressly appears by Magna Charta, chap. 30. which provides, that if the Merchant-strangers be of a land which makes a war against us, and be found in our Realm at the beginning of the war, they shall be attached, without harm of body or goods, until it be known to us or our Chief-Justice, how our Merchants be intreated there.

So that the disposal of their persons and goods was wholly in the King. And the liberty the subjects had to intermeddle with foreign enemies, extended only to such who came here after a war proclaimed.

By all which, the King's title to the lands, debts and personal estates of the Jews, after the King had determined their safe-conduct, by banishing them out of the Realm as Infidels, evidently appears; and those dark Records refined in some measure from their obscurity, by the constant tenor of the Common Law, practised ever since.

But doth not the making leagues with, and sending of Ambassadors to some Infidel Countries, argue that Infidels are not Alien enemies? No, certainly.

But the practice of the Kings of England, and other Christian Princes, fully argues the contrary; for the making such treaties, in order to trade, proves that no trade could be managed with them, before the treaty concluded.

My Lord Coke (who was of opinion that an Infidel is perpetuus inimicus) yet agrees with other learned men, that a league of peace, (which is only a cessation of all hostility) and a league of commerce (which amounts to no more than a reciprocal and general safe conduct to each other's subjects) may be made with an Infidel Prince, 4 Inst. fol. 155.

But he is called perpetuus inimicus from the practice of the Kings of England, and other Kings and Princes, not to make any leagues of friendship or alliance with Infidel Princes; whether restrained from making such leagues by the Municipal Laws of the several Christian Countries, or the general Rights of Christianity, is not to my purpose to determine.

But either a cessation of open hostility, or a general safe-conduct, by a treaty of commerce, binds up the subjects hands from intermeddling with the goods or persons of Infidels.

And therefore the Act of Navigation, that mentions the goods of the Ottoman Country, makes nothing to the case.

For by the treaty of commerce with the Ottoman Empire, they might be brought in, and by his subjects before, under a general safe conduct. But as to the Mogul and other Indian Princes, there is no league of peace or commerce between them and the Kings of England.

Which makes the case of the East-India Company stronger yet, than that of the Turky Company.

Though I conceive, that upon these principles I have laid down Law strong enough.

And herein the case of the East-India Company is particular, for the King hath made no league for them.

But by the Letters Patent, hath given them special power to make war or peace, with any Infidel Prince, for the benefit and better advantage of their trade.

So that all other subjects are meerly precarious, and have no pretence of taking any advantage of any Peace made by the Company.

So as to them, the Indians remain to all purposes Alien enemies.

Having now shown, that all foreign trade depends upon, and hath been managed by leagues and royal licences, either by Letters Patent, or special Acts of Parliament; and

That the King may prohibit generally, where no Act of Parliament hath intervened to the contrary; and the Common Law prohibits trade with Infidels, and no Act of Parliament has provided for it.

That that trade cannot be managed but by the King's licence, in some such manner as is directed by these Letters Patent to the Company.

That the answers to all the authorities and arguments made use of by the Defendant's Counsel, which I have not answer'd, lie open for the authority of the Taylors of Ipswich case; and the several other authorities of mechanick trades, and of inland merchandize, to which the subjects have a right by Common Law, make nothing against our case of foreign trade, and to an Infidel country, to which I have argued the subjects have no right, but were prohibited.

The opinion of the Taylors in Ipswich case, that a Patent to hinder trade at sea is void; that generally to hinder all trade at sea, is no doubt good Law; because many licences then in being, and several Acts of Parliament in many cases had granted liberty of trade.

But in the same case the restraining of trade to a particular country, for which no Act of Parliament had made provision, is allow'd of in the case of the Greenland Patent.

There was no authority produced, and I believe cannot be, that gives the least countenance for liberty of trade with Infidels, or to impeach the King's prerogative of prohibiting trade to foreign countries, whereto licence for trade hath not been granted by the King's Letters Patent, or by Acts of Parliament.

The arguments drawn from the reason of the Common Law were two.

First, From the liberty the subject had to go and trade into all foreign parts, for which were cited Fitzherbert and Dyer.

That liberty, and those authorities, I have already examined, and shewed that the subject had no liberty, but was prohibited by the Common Law to trade with Infidel countries.

And

And the liberty to trade with foreigners in amity, was but a bare permission, till the King prohibited.

Secondly, The other ground insisted on was, that all ingrossing of merchandize was unlawful at Common Law: and therefore a Patent leading to authorize an unlawful ingrossing is void, as a Monopoly at Common Law, and declared so by 21 Jac.

Here I will join issue with Mr. Pollexfen, and do admit, that if it be an unlawful ingrossing, whether by the Common Law, or any Statute in force, the Patent will be void.

And he must admit unto me, that if it be no unlawful ingrossing, it is no Monopoly at Common Law.

As he did in his argument ingenuously admit, that if it were no Monopoly at Common Law, it is not within the Statute 21 Jacobi; so that the question between us will turn upon this single point:

Whether the ingrossing the foreign merchandize of India, be unlawful?

Upon what I have already said, it appears it is not. For I have shown that the Common Law regarded, and made provision only for merchandizes within the land; and though when foreign merchandizes came thither, they fell under the rules of the Common Law; yet the ingrossing or sole buying of foreign commodities beyond the seas, and selling in gros, or by the Merchant-Importer, was no offence at Common Law.

Neither is there any Statute that makes it an offence at this day.

It is true the Statute of 37 E. III. cap. 5. prohibited English Merchants to ingross merchandizes.

But the Merchant-stranger was not bound by that Law: and that Statute was the next year repealed, as to the English Merchants, 38 E. III. cap. 2. And that at present the Law is, that any Merchant may buy in gros, and sell in gros, appears by the resolution of all the Judges, Mich. 39 & 40 Eliz. Co. 3. Inst. 196. in the chapter of ingrossing.

And the resolution goes a step further than the Merchant-Importer.

That any person may buy in gros of the Merchant-Importer, and sell by retail.

And it follows by a clear consequence, that if English Merchants in such places, where by Law they have a right to trade, may ingross the commodity of the place without offence; the ingrossing foreign commodities of any place, where the subject cannot trade without licence, can be no argument to invalidate such licence.

Because ingrossing of foreign Merchandize, by any Merchant-Importer, is no crime, but lawful for every trader.

And then the consequence of all ingrossing, will be the raising the price of the commodity.

Yet it being a commodity of foreign growth, and not such as the Law hath any where determined necessary for the support of life, as victuals and such like;

The Common Law hath no regard to the price, but leaves the Merchant free to make his advantage of his dangerous adventure.

The advantages that some subjects may receive by the trade, and others may be debarred from; which are alike hazardous, and depend upon a multitude of accidents, are no measures of right or wrong, to pass a legal judgment upon.

But if the Company have a right to trade, and others have not, as I have argued, whatever their advantage may be, which cannot be estimated till they have wound up their bottom:

The ingrossing of the Indian commodities, can't be infected with the taint of a Monopoly, which always supposes something done against common right, which is altogether inconsistent with having a right due to the King.

For it is of the essence of a Monopoly, according to the definition thereof propos'd by Mr. Pollexfen, and taken out of My Lord Coke, viz. that it tends to restrain such liberty and freedom the subject had before, or to hinder him in his lawful trade.

So that every sole buying and selling a commodity, if it be lawful, can be no Monopoly, in the legal sense of the word; which is evident in several land commodities, where the sole buying and selling is coupled with a right.

The King may grant to farm his pre-emption of Tin, whereby the Grantee hath the sole buying and selling, if he pleaseth, of the whole commodity.

Such a grant to Tidman a foreigner, was complained of in Parliament, 21 E. III. and prayed by the Commons, that no such merchandize be sold, but to the commonalty of Merchants.

The King answers, that it was a profit belonging to the Prince, and every Lord may make his profit of his own; 21 E. III. nu. 29.

That this sole right of buying and selling, was ever enjoyed, appears by the case of the Stannaries, 4 J. Co. 12. fol. 10 & 11.

So of all Gold and Silver dug within the Realm, and of all royal fishes taken; the King and his Grantees shall have the sole disposal, or right of selling them.

It is no just answer to these instances, that they are inheritances and rights vested in the Dukes of Cornwall and the Crown:

Which they may dispose to whom they please. So is his prerogative of licensing foreign trade. And as to the question of a Monopoly, which implies a wrong in restraining the rights of others; there is no difference between having a right existing, which may be granted, and having a power or prerogative to confer a right on others.

For 'tis the having the right to do the thing, that makes it no Monopoly.

And therefore, if the King have a right to license some of his subjects to do a thing, which other of his subjects cannot do, or are rightfully prohibited to do; whether the thing granted were before in esse or de novo constituted, it is all as one to the validity of the Grant. This is proved by the instance of Fairs and Markets.

Whether anciently in the Crown, or de novo erected and granted to any subject, the case will be the same, as to the subjects sole right of holding the Fair and Market exclusive of others.

And rights conferred by the King's prerogative, are every whit as strong as any right granted out of the Crown, which was before in esse there.

So that the Pretence of an unlawful Ingrossment and Monopoly being removed, by Mr. Pollexfen's admittance, 'tis not within 21 Jacobi.

And it is plain, it is not within the words of the enacting part of the Statute, without the aid of the Proviso: for it is expressly limited to grants made, or to be made, for the sole buying and selling, or using of any thing within the Realm. So that it was only the liberty of the inland trade and traffick, to which the subjects had right before, that was fenced fenced and secured by this Statute. And this Patent is not for the sole buying of any thing within the Realm; and though the selling be here, yet such sole selling was, and is lawful, notwithstanding any Law or Statute made, as I have shewn.

And the Proviso was only added, to manifest the plain intention of the Parliament, not to intermeddle with any just prerogative of the King, which he might and lawfully had exercised and used for the benefit of his subjects.

Besides, to put it past all scruple, this Company is within the express words of the Proviso.

It was a Company in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, as is recited in the declaration.

And by their Charter 7 Jac. had the sole trade granted, with the exclusive clauses to others.

And if the Parliament had not adjudged this Company, to be for the maintenance and enlargement, or ordering of that trade, as well as the other Companies, they would undoubtedly have made a difference between them, upon that Charter of 7 Jac.

For this very Parliament was inquisitive into all illegal Patents, which in the least tended towards a Monopoly.

And if they had thought that Charter such, they would not have been tender of the point at that time.

The objection made from the different managery, by joint and separate stocks, is of no great weight, because it touches not the question of right; whether a Company may have a sole trade granted, exclusive to others.

For every Company draws a charge with it, which those not of the Company are not liable to.

And if the subject have a right to trade without being of the Company, he can be no more compelled to be of the Company, which manages and trades upon separate Stocks, than of one which trades upon a Joint-Stock.

And the objection, that ordering of trade within the Statute, cannot be intended of licensing of some, with exclusion of others, is of no greater force; for it could not be intended of any others.

All the Patents for foreign trade before that time, and then in being, were Patents of exclusion of others than the Company.

And if it be well consider'd, all the authorities, that allow there may be Companies erected for well-governing and ordering foreign trade, do admit, they may be exclusive to others;

It not being possible that a foreign trade can be under any rule or government, by any Letters Patent whatsoever, if carry'd on by persons not subject to that rule and government.

And it is evident, that no rule of any Company, binds farther than those of the Company; and if every man, not of the Company, may trade, such trade will not be under any rules made for the Company, or by the Company.

So that such Patent will be only for keeping some few persons within rule and government, but not at all of the Foreign Trade.

Which of necessity must produce the ruin of the Company, and in all probability of the trade itself.

For if others trade without limitation, discharged of all the rules of the Company, and not be liable to the charges and expences, whereby the trade must be supported; they may and will both undersell the Company, and forestall and anticipate the Markets, than which nothing can tend more effectually towards the destruction of a trade, of that great concern both to King and Kingdom.

Besides, the Factories and Stock of the Company in foreign parts, are obnoxious and liable for all injuries committed, either to the Natives or Government of the place, by any Interloper trading without rule, by the general Law of reprisals.

I will not further pursue the arguments of convenience or inconvenience, but do rest upon the right, which I have endeavoured to make out by these steps.

First, That the subject had no right to this trade at Common Law, as a foreign trade, but might be prohibited.

Secondly, That no league or royal licence hath introduced or given such general right.

Thirdly, That foreign trade hath in all times been licensed and managed by the undoubted prerogative of the Crown, in licensing some, and prohibiting others. And that in all cases not provided for by Act of Parliament.

And that such Grants and Licences have received allowance in several Parliaments.

Fourthly, That no Act of Parliament ever gave a general liberty of trade, much less to trade with Infidels.

Fifthly, That the Common Law prohibits this trade with Infidels, as with Alien Enemies.

Sixthly, In the last place, I have applied answers to principal authorities and arguments made use of to impeach the Company's Patent.

Upon all which, I conclude the chief point of the case;

First, That the Grant to the Company, of the sole trade to India, exclusive to others, is good in Law.

Secondly, As to the second point, whether the action will lie, admitting the Company have a right to the sole trade there, by these Letters Patent;

I shall spend but a little of your time about it.

Because if the Company have by Law the sole right to the trade, the Law will give them a remedy to redress injuries done to their trade, for recovery of their damages.

Which is properly by an action of the Case, they having no other remedy to redress themselves. For a prosecution for a contempt to the King, cannot be in satisfaction of the Company's damage.

I shall therefore rest that point, upon the authorities already produced by the plaintiffs Counsel.

I shall only apply answers to the objections made by Mr. Pollexfen.

Obj. 1. 'Tis not alledged the Defendants had no licence from the King.

Ans. The Complainants case is sufficiently set forth, that they had the sole trade to the Indies granted to them; and that the Defendant had notice thereof, and yet traded contrary to their Grant.

If the Defendant had had the King's licence to come on his part by Plea, then the validity thereof, as against the Plaintiff, wou'd have come into question; but he rests upon the licence, by Statute of 15 E. III.

Obj. 2. They have shewn no special loss or damage.

Ans. Neither need any be shewn, no more than in all other actions of the case, where the right of any person is injured, 18 Rep. 113. Mary's case.

of a Commoner who hath no estate in the land, nor the sole right in the profit apprender, comes not to the case; the Law denies such Commoner liberty of bringing his action, without a special damage; to prevent a multiplicity of actions, which upon the same ground every Commoner would be intitled to.

But otherwise it is, where any hath the sole Piscary or Profit apprender; after setting forth the special case, and wherein his right is invaded, a general declaration to his damage is sufficient, and the examination of the particulars will belong to the Jury.

Obj. 3. That the action is grounded upon the restraints in the Letters Patent; and that restraint is not absolute, but upon pain of forfeiture of ships and goods.

Ans. The first part is mistaken; for the action is grounded upon the Grant of the whole, entire and only trade and traffick to the Indies, inforc'd with the King's covenant, not to grant licence to any others.

And besides this clause of the prohibition, there is a distinct clause of Grant, that none of these countries or places shall be visited, frequented or haunted by any of the King's subjects, during the continuance of this Patent, which hath no penalty annexed to it.

Upon these Grants the action is grounded, and if there were no clause of prohibition, the trading to these Indies by others without licence from the King, is enterprizing a trade not only against the prohibition of the Common Law, but the King's expresse prohibition.

But the action is not founded upon this clause, but upon other clauses of conferring a right to the sole trade.

The authority cited by Mr. Pollexfen, as an authority in point, against the action out of 11 Rep. 88. and Rolls Abridgment, fol. 106. nu. 6. in Darcy's case, that admitting the grant or dispensation to Darcy, were good for importing foreign Cards, contrary to the Statute of Ed. 4. yet the action would not lie; reacheth not our case of a right conferred by the King's prerogative, and not of any dispensation from a penal Law.

Before the Statute of Edw. VI. every subject might import foreign Cards; the Statute restrains that liberty under penalty of forfeiture.

The dispensation of one subject from the Law, works no Interest but a bare exemption from the penalty.

Which in the case of Shaw and Hawes, was held could not be assigned over; and therefore Grants that are merely Dispensations, convey no Interest against any other subject, who is no otherwise restrain'd from doing the thing, than by the Statute under a penalty.

But where the King by his prerogative may grant the sole use of a thing, (as in case of new Inventions) the Grantee hath an Interest sufficient to support an action upon the case, as Rolls is of opinion. The next Paragraph, fol. 106. nu. 17. That if the King grant that none shall use such a thing, (whereof the King hath power to grant,) but the Grantee, reserving a rent, if another use it, an action upon the case will lie.

Which is a stronger authority in point for the action, than that of Darcy's case of a mere dispensation is against it.

And therefore having proved the Grant of the sole trade to be good, the action is well brought for damages.

And pray Judgment for the Plaintiffs.

VOL. VII.

Mr. Williams's Argument.

De termino S. Michaelis, Anno Regni Regis Car. Secundi, xxxvi. Annoq; Domini 1684.

The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

THE Questions in this Case, are two.

1. Whether this Grant of sole trading to this Company, excluding all others his Majesty's subjects who are not members of this Company, or within the qualifications of this Grant, be a legal Grant?

2. Admitting it a legal Grant, if this action be maintainable by the Company, against the Defendant?

That this Grant is legal in all its parts, I do not find that the counsel that argued for it, have endeavoured to maintain.

Mr. Attorney hath admitted in his argument, it is not.

That some parts of it are against law, is manifest, viz. it inflicts illegal penalties upon persons offending against it, by creating a forfeiture of their goods and merchandize, which shall be brought into the Realm; or any of the dominions thereof, contrary to this Grant.

It also creates a forfeiture of the Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein such goods shall be imported or found; the one half to the King, the other half to the Company.

It grants, That the offenders against it shall be imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and not to be delivered out of prison until the offenders become bound to the Governor, in the sum of 1000*l.* at least, that such person shall not at any time after sail or traffick into any places mentioned in the Grant.

It gives the Company liberty to license persons to trade within the limits of this Grant; and that the King, his heirs and successors, shall not, during these Letters Patent, license any person to sail or trade there.

In these things the property and liberty of the subjects, are put into the power of the Company; and they are to dispose of the liberty and property to serve their own Company, and not the publick.

If this Company may seize Goods and Ships, and imprison the King's subjects, according to their Grant, they will have a greater prerogative over the subject than his Majesty hath; they have power to seize goods, and imprison persons; without trial; without legal proceeding, which the King cannot do; and I humbly conceive, cannot grant to any subject or corporation.

The Judgment upon the Canary Patent, which I shall have occasion to mention more largely herein, by the opinion of all the Judges, damned the penalties of that, agreeing in substance with these: The substance of this was admitted, at least not defended, by Mr. Attorney General.

This Grant does not only give this Company dominion over the properties and liberties of the subject, and invest the Company with the prerogative of the Crown to license men and ships to trade in these limits, but it doth divest the Crown, the King, his heirs and successors, of a high prerogative; That the King shall not license, as I take it, the King shall not trade in these limits without the licence of this Company. For as this great and mighty Charter is penned, it doth not only invest the Company, but divest the King of his prerogative.

Mr. Attorney and the King's counsel could not argue for the Company in this matter, without arguing against the prerogative of the King. They are of the King's counsel that argued for this Grant, but 'tis not to be believed they were of the King's counsel, or friends, that drew it or advised it.

We that argue for Mr. Sandys, argue for the King's prerogative: That the King, notwithstanding this Grant to this Company, may license Mr. Sandys, or any other subject, to trade in these limits; and it doth not appear upon this Record but Mr. Sandys hath the King's licence to trade in those places; he may license any other subject to trade there.

And that the King by his Grant cannot exclude himself of his prerogative.

It will serve our turn, for the defendant in this case to avoid the plaintiffs action. If the plaintiffs ought not by law to have the sole licensing of traders in these limits; for the stinging part of their declaration is laid in this, That the Defendant traded without their Licence.

There was greater care had to greaten this Company, than to preserve the prerogative of the King in this Grant; and the prerogative is named in this case, to serve the Company, and not the King: and they that drew this Grant, did neither consult the honour nor prerogative of the King, the liberty or property of the Subject, the trade of the Kingdom, nor the law of the land: But their business was to greaten this Company, to the detriment of the King, the Law, and the Subject; as I hope to make out in this case.

In my way to the particular Questions in this case, I shall observe, 1. That the plaintiffs in their declaration do alledge, That they have established and managed, and do manage a great trade of merchandize to the East-Indies, with the inhabitants there, who at the time of the making the Letters Patent, were not, and ever since are not christians; but then were, and now are infidels, and enemies to the christian faith.

Yet they do not alledge, nor can say that these Indians are in enmity with the Crown of England, or that they are alien enemies to England.

2. Tho' the present inhabitants of these places are Infidels, and enemies to the christian faith, yet it may be, and we hope there may be an universal conversion to the christian faith; and we are taught by the Church to pray for it, and to use all manner of means to bring it to pass.

Why may not these places, or some of them, become inhabited with christians, as Spain and Portugal are now inhabited by christians, where infidels did inhabit about 200 years ago?

3. This Grant doth not exclude a trade with infidels only in these places, but with all persons in these places.

I do not observe, that any of the Company's counsel that argued before Mr. Attorney, have denied Englismen the liberty of trading with christians in any part of the world, without licence from the King. Herein I take him to be alone.

4. They say, this trade cannot be managed but per corpus corporatum.

Yet have they an exclusion of all persons, and bodies politick and corporate, to trade, or manage a trade in these places without their licence; and by this means exclude the King from constituting any other company within the limits of their Grant, or in any part of it, which may be very necessary for the Government, and publick trade of the King.

1. It may be; the Indians may insist upon some such Company to be instituted by the King, by some treaty of commerce.

Now hath the King by this means, not only excluded his subjects from the trade of this Place; but he hath excluded himself of the liberty of making or constituting any other Company for trade or commerce, in all, or any of these places.

2. Perhaps the government and good management of trade in these places, may in time require more companies to be instituted, in all, or some of these places; and the Company's counsel, except Mr. Attorney, are now arguing the King by his prerogative, out of his prerogative:

That the King had prerogative enough to make this glorious Company the sole traders, and managers of trade in these places, and to exclude himself and his successors, and all the rest of his subjects, from this trade and management:

3. And by this means constitute a sort of Republick for the management of trade in these places, borrowing perhaps from Hamborough and other republican places, the ways and methods of managing trade upon a common stock, in fraternities and companies; and by this experiment alter the constitution of England in the management of trade, by altering the nature of our Englisch properties in our goods vested and placed in persons, and placing our properties in companies and fraternities; and by fixing the mystery of trade in companies, to the prejudice of single persons; and may in time turn to ill example, and endanger the Government in its other parts, as well as the trade of England.

The main question in this case doth turn upon the power of the King;

If the King by his royal power may appropriate this trade in these Infidel places to this Company?

First, That the King hath power to do this, by the advice of his great Council the Parliament, is not doubted. So there is no defect or want of power in the King to do this by the Law of England, the exceptions in the Statute of 21 Jac. cap. 3. do except such Grants out of that Statute.

The question is only a question of the manner of doing this by the King.

Secondly, Whether he may do it, without the advice of his great Council in Parliament?

As there is no defect or want of power in the King, so there is no defect in the Law of England.

Thirdly, But if there be a necessity or a convenience to the doing of this for the Crown, or for the government, for the subject or for trade?

Fourthly, It is not to be supposed but that the Lords and Commons in Parliament, will and ought to assent to such a Grant in Parliament as much as the Privy-Council, or any other of the King's Council, are obliged to advise it out of Parliament; and it ought to be so presumed by the constitution of England.

And I take this to be one of the Ardua Regni, which is a subject matter fit and proper for the consideration and deliberation of a Parliament, and ought not to pass by any Grant without them.

The trade of England, the property and liberty of the subject, the King's revenue by Tonnage, Poundage Poundage and Customs, the prerogative of the King, are under great restrictions by this Grant.

This work is too heavy for the pen of an Attorney, or Solicitor, to put into a bill for the Great Seal, without the deliberation of a Parliament.

The King cannot naturalize an Alien, but by Act of Parliament, the Law doth intrust the King by his Letters Patent, to make Denizens of Aliens, but not to naturalize them.

It may be too much for me to give the reason of this, why the King hath not power to naturalize Aliens, as well as to denizenize them.

I humbly take the reason to proceed from the interest of the Subject, that the right of the Subject is immediately concerned in letting in Aliens to have the same right, liberty and freedom with English subjects in England, and that this ought not to be granted to Aliens, not by the King under his great Seal, without the consent of the Lords and Commons, the Representatives of the Subjects in Parliament.

There may be high State-Policy, sometimes to naturalize an Alien, and that perhaps it cannot always wait the meeting of a Parliament, yet hath the Law placed this trust in the King; to be exercised by the King, with the advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, and no otherwise.

The right of every Englishman in his freedom of trade in these parts, is concerned in this Grant, and every Englishman not admitted to trade by this Grant, is excluded of his freedom; and the King disables himself to license any other English subjects to trade in these parts.

If the King had made such a Grant to Aliens, and excluded all his English subjects from trading in these places, or if the King had granted only to his Irish or Scotch subjects, and excluded his English subjects, had these been good Grants or legal?

If the King has the prerogative, the Company's Counsel urge in this case, all this might have been done, and these grants had been legal, tho' exclusive of all his English subjects.

It is enough, I humbly conceive the King hath the prerogative of granting and constituting such Companies, and making such Grants in Parliament; and the Law allows no more in cases of this nature, which concern the right of every subject in England, and therefore ought not to be taken from him, but by his consent in Parliament.

I think it may be admitted, the King may by his Great Seal, without the advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, constitute a Company for the good management of trade in these parts, or any part of the world:

But he cannot, as I humbly conceive, by any Grant under his Great Seal, totally exclude his subjects of their right and liberty of trading, in any place upon the seas or beyond the seas.

Rolls 1. Rep. fol. 4. The Taylors of Ipswich case; the King may grant a Charter for good ordering of trade; this is for the benefit of the subject, 2 Ed. III. Briton's case.

The good management of trade is for the benefit of the subject.

I shall endeavour to maintain, that the subjects of England had a right to trade in these parts, before the making of this Grant, or the constituting any Company by the Crown in the East-Indies, and without any licence from the Crown; and by consequence this Grant appropriating this trade to this Company, and excluding the rest of the King's subjects from their right and liberty of trade there, is an illegal Monopoly in trade, condemned both by the Common Law and Statute Law of England: and the Infidelism of the Inhabitants of these places, is no bar or impediment to the trade and commerce of English subjects in these places, without leave or licence from the Crown, no more than in Christian Countries.

That the prerogative of the Crown, to grant and issue out writs of Ne Exeat Regnum, against this or that subject, is no argument for this power to make such a Grant as this, or to exclude his subjects from trading in Infidels Countries.

The Ne Exeat Regnum, is a writ that may be granted by the Keeper of the Great Seal, without any express warrant or command from the King, upon some suggestion, that the party may be required to give caution not to leave the Kingdom, till he answers such a suit or the like.

This writ is never granted without some special reason or cause in a particular case; the subject complained of, may appear in Chancery, and answering the cause, may discharge the writ.

Such a Grant under the Great Seal, for some of the King's subjects to go abroad, and for the rest to stay at home; I conceive, would not be good in Law. No parity of reason, because the King may by his writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, stay a subject from going out of the Kingdom; that therefore the King may by his Grant hinder him to trade out of the Kingdom. Men may, and do trade by their factors and correspondents, and do not stir out of the Kingdom; their personal attendance in their trade in places remote is not necessary.

The subjects of England trading in merchandize, have, and always had a right to trade upon the seas, and beyond the seas, without licence from the Crown.

That they had such liberty to trade with all Christian Countries, I do not find it denied by any of the Company's Counsel, but Mr. Attorney; he hath yielded something the other Counsel have denied, and denied what others have admitted; and in something in his argument, he is, as I conceive, inconsistent with himself.

That trade is as free to all men as the air, that the seas are like the highways, free and open to all passengers.

By his opinion there's a community for all loyal subjects to trade on the seas, and not to be appropriated to a few.

I do agree that the King hath a prerogative in the sea, and that the sea is within the King's leigeance; and that by this prerogative, Wrecks and Sturgeon and other great fish in the sea belong to the Crown. Stat. 17 Ed. II. cap. 11.

And that the Statute de prerogativa Regis, among other things, does reckon Wrecks, Whales and great Sturgeons to belong to the King by his prerogative.

But the King hath not any prerogative that I meet with, to exclude the subject from the benefit of his right of community in the seas, as fishing and trade.

As the King hath his sovereignty upon the seas, and his subjects owe him leigeance there; so have they their rights and properties in and upon the seas, and they are not to be invaded.

Stat. 1. Mary, cap. 18. and Eliz. 19. the same renewed.

Stat. 45 Ed. III. cap. 4. And all rates and impositions upon ships, trade and traffick upon the seas, and beyond the seas, are laid by the King in Parliament, and can't be laid by the King alone, by any prerogative out of Parliament. 3 Inst. fol. 181. Commertium jure gentium commune esse debet, & non in Monopolium & privatum pauculorum questum convertendum, iniquum alios permittere alios inbibere Mercaturam.

Dyer, fol. 296. 13 Eliz. That a subject of England, being a Merchant, may depart out of the Realm without the Queen's licence, to live there, tho' not to merchandize; and such going out of the Realm is no contempt to the Queen, before a Ne Exeat Regnum, an express prohibition or proclamation issue.

Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 2. Doth affirm this by the exception in that Statute.

Dyer, fol. 165, & 296. agrees with Nat. Br. and says further, that no Merchant pays at the Common Law, any Custom for any wares or merchandize whatsoever, except three, viz. Wool, Woolsells and Leather, express for all Merchants, and confirmed by Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 1, & 2.

Rolls 1. Rep. fol. 4. Taylors of Ipswich case, 12 Jac. Banco Regis; no trade mechanick or merchandizing, ought to be hindered by the King's Patent in any sort, but by Act of Parliament.

9 H. III. cap. 30. A Charter to hinder trade at sea is void; a Charter that only 100 persons shall trade is void in itself; and he was Chief-Justice at this time. 2 Inst. 57. The Patent to Greenland was allowed, because the trade was found at the peril of the party's life, who first discover'd it.

Taylors of Ipswich case, where there is no new Invention, the King by his Charter cannot hinder trade.

The Patent to the College of Physicians, that no person shall practise Physick without their licence, would have been void, had it not been confirmed by Act of Parliament; yet this concerned not all the subjects of England: and is a mystery, and the professors thereof, fit to be approved by persons of skill in it.

It may be admitted, that the King for special causes may prohibit this or that subject, perhaps, to trade in some certain places.

As the King may inhibit a subject's going beyond the seas; and if a person goes beyond the seas after such an inhibition, it is a crime in the subject, for which he is punishable.

But it is hard to infer from such particular inhibitions of particular persons, to trade in particular places or countries, or to inhibit particular persons from going beyond the seas, to infer universally that the King may inhibit all his subjects to go beyond the seas, or that he may inhibit all his subjects except some few to trade.

There is a great difference between an inhibition from the Crown, to this or that person to go beyond the seas, and an inhibition for all persons to trade, except such a Company.

This Grant imports a restraint upon trade, and upon the common liberty of the subjects, for the benefit of some few of the subjects, without any benefit to the Crown, or security to the Kingdom, as in the case of Ne Exeat Regnum.

The Company may license aliens only, and exclude subjects. No trust is placed in the Company, which the Law places in the Crown.

For the allay that is offered to this exclusion of trading for Englismen, and Englisch Merchants in these places;

Obj. 1.

Obj. That they are excluded only from trading in the East-Indies with Infidels, and the Inhabitants there, who are enemies to the Christian Faith and Religion.

And that it is for the common safety of the Christian Religion, that this is done to avoid the danger of corrupting and perverting Christians to Infidelism.

I do not meet with any authority for this power given to the King.

But that English subjects have the same freedom of trade with Infidels as they have with Christians in places beyond the seas; so they be not in enmity with the Crown of England.

Michelborne's case, Brownlow 2d Rep. 296. that case hath been observed already to have no authority, nor the Book authentick, and at best but some sayings of my Lord Coke, in a matter not then in judgment before the Court, and that perhaps mistaken by the Prothonotary.

I oppose to the probability of this saying, the report of the Taylors of Ipswich case, in Rolls Rep. fol. 4. 12 Jac. The Lord Coke was then Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and says in the resolution in that case, that no trade mechanick or merchantable can be hindred by the King's Patent, not in any place, without an Act of Parliament; a Charter to hinder trade at sea is void.

How can this stand with what is published in Brownlow, that my Lord Coke should say in the Common-Pleas, before this time, that an English subject cannot trade with Infidels, without licence from the King; and that he had seen a licence in the time of Edw. III. to that purpose?

The reason given for that saying, is as weak, because they are common enemies to the Christian Faith.

They may be enemies to the Christian Religion, and not enemies to the Crown of England, or to the trade of England.

The Law denies trade and commerce only with enemies to the Crown, not with enemies to the Christian Religion.

It is sufficiently observed already, by the Counsel that have argued on this side, that there are treaties of trade and commerce between the Crown of England, and these places of Infidels; and that there are leagues and embassies between them. 4 Inst. 155. allows leagues of commerce and trade and peace with Infidels.

And what may be the consequence, to declare that to be Law, that they are incapable of the benefit of the Law of England, allowed to other Aliens, and that they are not to be protected from personal injuries by our Law?

12 H. VIII. 4. A Pagan beaten in England, cannot sue, quia perpetuus inimicus.

And to put them in the same condition with outlawed and excommunicated persons, how doth this consist with the common justice of Nations, or with the policy of trade in an Island?

Obj. By Mr Solicitor, 5 Inst. fol. 32. A Jewes born in England, marrying a converted Jew, not dowable.

Mr. Solicitor hath cited many cases and Records out of Mr. Prynne's Collections, and from the Rolls themselves, how the Jews were treated in England in trade; what restraints and taxes were laid upon them by the Crown.

I do not take it that any of these Records reach the reason of restraint of trade, imposed upon English subjects by this Grant.

There's no restraint but that English subjects might trade with Jews in their own countries.

That Jews were used thus in England, is no argument that the East-India Company may use English subjects like Jews abroad in other Countries.

St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, cap. 6. reprehends the Christians for going to Law one with another before Infidel Judges, who were their enemies; calling it a fault, and he speaks it to their shame, that they would not rather receive wrong, or make Arbiters of their own to judge between the brethren, than to go to Law one with another, and that before unbelievers; but there's no reproof to the Christians for conversing or trading with Infidels.

4 Inst. fol. 155. Darcy and Allen's case, Moor's Rep. fol. 674. and 675. are Authorities for leagues and commerce with Pagans, which signify leagues of commerce with Infidels.

Lord Coke cites several texts out of the holy Writ to justify it, out of the Books of Joshua, Kings and Chronicles.

If it be true, there was such freedom of trade by the Common Law for all English subjects with Infidels and Christians in all parts of the World, and that without licence from the King;

To restrain this freedom of trade to a Company of English subjects, excluding all others the King's subjects, from their ancient liberty and freedom of trade; I take to be a Monopoly, and comes within the description and reason of the odiousness of Monopolies, so largely argued by Mr. Pollexfen, that I shall not take up the time of the Court in repeating what he hath said, and I cannot add to it.

Neither will I trouble the Court, with mentioning the authorities he hath cited for that purpose; but refer myself to the same authority in that matter.

Yet I take it under correction, that it is fit to be very well considered, if this Patent be not a Monopoly, and an ingrossing and appropriating of trade to few persons; which did belong and was common to all Englishmen, tho' a licence from the Crown was necessary for their exercise of this trade; yet every Englishman was capable of such licence, and was intitled to such licence from the Crown, and had a right to it.

Now hath this Grant put it out of the King's power to grant such licences, and hath placed this power, and the exercise of it in this Company, and by this means hath by this Patent granted and appropriated a trade to this Company, which was common to all his subjects; and hath given to this Company the sole licensing of traders in these parts, excluding all the subjects of England, which shall not be licensed by this Company, to trade in these parts: I conceive this makes this Patent and Grant illegal and void;

And makes this restraint in trade, which was common to all with the King's licence, now peculiar to this Company; and doth monopolize the trade and the means of trading, by placing it in the sole hands and power of the Company, even the sole licensing of traders; and they may by this Grant license Aliens only to exclude English subjects.

My Lord Coke's description of Monopolies and Monopolists, Projectors and Propounders, doth sufficiently illustrate this, with reflecting upon what Mr. Pollexfen hath said in his argument, without repetition of them to the Court.

The Statute of Magna Charta declares the liberty and freedom Merchants have to buy and sell without restraint, by the old and rightful Customs, except in time of war.

2 Inst. cap. 29 & 30. Stat. 9 H. III. 30. Nisi publicè prohibentur, saith my Lord Coke, is intended a prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Yelverton, 10 Jac. is of the same opinion with Lord Coke in his book about impositions upon trade; as I have it from a Gentleman in our profession. Vide his Manuscripts.

21 Jac. cap. 3. Declares all Monopolies to be against Common Law.

Coke 11. Case of Monopolies, 84 Moor's Rep. 673. nay, Darcy's Grant for the sole importing of Cards from beyond the seas, and selling them for twenty-one years, 44 Eliz. prohibited and judged a void Grant.

Stat. 2 E. III. cap. 9. confirms Magna Charta, for going and coming with merchandize to and from England, according to Magna Charta.

9 E. III. cap. 1. Damns all Charters to the contrary, as illegal and oppressive to the people. 4 E. III. cap. 2. confirms also Magna Charta 25 E. III. cap. 2. doth the same, and makes Letters Patent to the contrary void.

11 R. II. cap. 7. 12 H. VII. 6. for free passage, &c. such Letters Patent restraining trade have been pursued in Parliament, with hue and cry, in all Parliaments and Ages.

Obj. This Grant is made to a Company for good government, and for the ordering of trade, and no Monopoly, and it is within the Proviso of the Statute, 21 Jac.

Ans. Allowed in Darcy's case by the arguments for that Grant, and if it be not for public good, the Grant is illegal.

If this Grant be neither good for the King, nor for the subject, nor for the trade of England; it cannot be said to be for the publick good.

It cannot be good for the King, for it restrains him in his prerogative, as you would have it the King had power to license every subject; by this Grant he hath excluded himself of all power of licensing. He can license no subject to trade in these parts.

The King suffers in his Customs and in his Navigation.

The subject is excluded from trading in these places, without the licence of this Company.

Trade itself is restrained, for it is reduced and appropriated to a Company, and to few persons, which was common to all the King's subjects.

2 Inst. fol. 57. Lord Coke's reason against it, for all the subjects are concerned in trade, therefore all ought to consent to it in Parliament.

Tho' they are a Company, they are not constituted by this Grant, to regulate and manage trade for England, but for themselves and their Company.

The heightening, the lowering of commodities, the raising, the lessening the rates of all the commodities of these places, the ingrossing of all the trade of these places, is in their power and in their pleasure.

There are no rules or qualifications in this Grant, injoining to admit numbers into this Company, or directing or requiring their licences for this trade. They have the trade in themselves without any check or controul from his Majesty or the Government; they are independent from the Government by this Grant, they are without appeal.

Obj. That they are a Company, and that this Grant to them, is within the exception of the Stat. 21 Jac. cap. 3.

Ans. 1. Because that exception doth not reach to Letters Patent made to Corporations, after the making of that Act.

No words of saving to any Corporation, that should be afterwards erected or granted.

2. This Proviso doth not make them better than they were before the making of the Act, onyl leaves them as they were before, and as it found them.

If they were legal before, they continue so; if illegal, they are so notwithstanding this Act.

Obj. That many Grants of this nature, have been made to several Companies; to the Turky Company; Muscovy and Hamborough Companies.

Ans. They do not trade in Joint-Stock, and monopolize as this Company doth; they do not exclude persons from their Company, as this doth. Mr. Pollexfen hath differenced them at large.

That there have been many Monopoly Grants in all ages from the Crown, appears by the Statute of Magna Charta, by other Statutes made in E. III's time, R. II. H. VII. and King James's time; and by the judgments given on Monopoly Patents in all ages.

In the case of Monopolies. In the Taylors of Ipswich case.

Peacby's case, 5 E. III. severely punished for procuring a licence under the Great Seal, that he only should sell sweet Wines in London, &c.

Inst. 3. fol. 181. Darcy and Allen's, Mar. Rep. 44. Eliz. Oppression is older than the Law made to punish it; Monopolies are as old as the Laws made to punish them; it is no argument to justify injuries by their ages.

Sir Arthur Ingram's Patent, 17 Car. II. for the Canary Company, granting them the sole trade there. There are glorious recitals in that Patent, of advantage to the King's subjects, and for the regulation of trade; making the Company a body politick, that they should have the sole trade to those Islands, excluding all others under pains and forfeitures, with a non obstante to the Statute against Monopolies; Judgment was given against this Patent, Mich. 20 Car. II.

11 Rep. fol. 54. Taylors of Ipswich case, compare this case with the Company of Taylors case; for the good of Trade and Company, and the Orders and By-Laws fair and plausible, yet damned, because a restraint on trade.

The Company had the profit of the reformation. No other difference between the cases, than that this is a mighty, that a petty Company.

14 Car. II. cap. 24. That Statute provides, that persons by having Stocks in this Company, shall not be adjudged traders within the Statutes against Bankrupts, which is called by Mr. Solicitor the Judgment of the Parliament for this Grant.

Says Mr. Solicitor, Stat. 14 Car. II. cap. 24. takes notice of this Company, and that it is an advantage to the Nation and Trade of it.

Stat. 29 Car. II. 1. takes notice of this Company, and taxes every Capital Stock in the Company at 20s. for every 100l. Capital Stock in the Company.

Ans. This Poll-Act taxes all Guilds and Fraternities, Bodies Politick and Corporate; this doth not make them legal Corporations, Guilds or Fraternities.

The Judgment the Parliament had of this Grant, doth better appear upon the Journals of the Houses of Parliament, of the complaints made to the Parliament, that this grant was a grievance.

It is no new thing to mention proceedings upon Journals of Parliament: and the Judges take notice of them. Hob. Rep. & Rolls.

And in a cause of this consequence it may be proper to adjourn it to Parliament, where it may receive the Judgment of his Majesty in Parliament.

This will be a safe establishment of the Law in this great case, which concerns the King's prerogative, the right of the subject, and of the whole Kingdom in the trade of the Nation.

It will meet there with a Judgment that will certainly establish it, if it be for the Interest of the King and Kingdom; but if for the enlarging of this great Company, it will meet with the common fate of projecting Patents, against the interest of the King and Subject.

It is a mighty argument for the reputation this Patent had with the Parliament, and the opinion they had of it, by taxing their Capital-Stock, at 20s. per Cent.

So they do reputed Esquires, at 5*l.* by the head.

Sollicitors, Attorneys, and oppressive Usurers; have the like esteem with this Act of Parliament.

Stat. 3 Jac. cap. 6. This Statute is but declaration of the Common Law, and made to avoid questions and suits in Law; which might be occasioned by Charters of impropriating the trade of Spain and Portugal, and then in making for the trade of France.

If the mischiefs recited in that Statute, and the evils happening to England and the King's subjects be true, without all hesitation;

Those Charters mentioned in that Statute, and condemned by that Statute, were not only grievous, but illegal, and Monopolies.

It appropriating the trade of these dominions to few Merchants, and excluding all other his Majesty's subjects from the trade;

Debarring the King's subjects in England from that free and common traffick, which his subjects in Ireland and Scotland had;

To the manifest impoverishing of Masters, Owners of Ships, Mariners, Fishermen, Clothiers, Tuckers, Spinsters, and many thousands of handicrafts men.

The decrease of his Majesty's Customs, Subsidies, and other Impositions.

The ruin and decay of Navigation.

The abating of the prices of our Wool, Cloth, Corn, and such like commodities.

The enhancing of all French and Spanish commodities, that all Owners and Mariners, with divers others, shall be cut off from the ordinary means of maintenance, and preserving their estates.

And all French and Spanish commodities shall be in a few hands;

To the hurt and prejudice of all the subjects; therefore enacts, it shall be lawful for all his Majesty's subjects in England and Wales, to have free liberty to trade into, and from Spain, France and Portugal, in such sort as was accustomed at any time in his Majesty's time.

Stat. 4 Jac. cap. 9. Made to confirm the Charter to the Company of Exeter Merchants, upon singular reasons recited in the Act of Parliament, declaring the Stat. 30 Jac. cap. 6. should not impeach that Charter, being for publick good.

Stat. 45 Ed. III. cap. 4. That no imposition shall be charged upon Wool in no sort, without the assent of the Parliament: this Stat. was not made out of necessity, for it was the Common Law; yet it was thought fit by the Parliament at that time, to declare the Law by an Act of Parliament.

Stat. 1. H. IV. cap. 16, 17. Against Letters Patent made to ingross trades, &c.

So ancient was the Monopoly, and ingrossing of trades by illegal Letters Patent.

When illegal things turn to a grievance, 'tis usual to suppress them by Acts of Parliament, and not to leave their Judgment to the ordinary Courts of Justice, without declaration first had in Parliament.

Stat. 21 Jac. cap. 3. This Statute takes notice, tho' the King's Disposition, Judgment and Declaration was, that all Monopolies were against Law; and that no suitors should move for such Grants, yet upon misinformations and untrue pretences of publick good, many such Grants have been unduly obtained, and unlawfully put in execution to the great grievance and inconvenience of the subject, contrary to the Laws of the Realm.

For the avoiding whereof, that Statute is made against all Grants to any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, of any Monopoly; and declares the same illegal.

This Statute doth quadrate with the description of a Monopoly.

So doth the East-India Company's Charter in all its points and parts, and in the exercise of it, quadrate with these Monopolies, and their descriptions in our Law-Books and Cases;

With my Lord Coke's description of a Monopoly, in his 3d Inst. cap. Monopolies.

If Mr. Sandys be pictured in Mr. Attorney's argument, I take it the East-India Charter is pictured in this Statute.

The Act of Tunnage and Poundage, 12 Car. II. says, The Commons in Parliament reposing trust and confidence in your Majesty, in and for the safe-guard of the seas, against all persons intending, or that shall intend the disturbance of your Commons, in the intercourse of trade, and the invading of this your Realm; give and grant for every Tun of Wine of the growth of France, that shall come into the Port of London, by your natural-born subjects, 4*l.* 10*s.* by strangers and aliens, 6*l.*

The like notice taken of Poundage, to be paid by subjects and aliens.

Fol. 67. Rates in Wares, Silks imported in Ships English-built, directly from the East-Indies, the pound weight containing sixteen ounces; Subsidy duty 15*s.*

Of the Manufacture of Italy, imported from thence in English-built Ships, the pound weight containing sixteen ounces; Duty 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

This Act distinguishes between Subjects and Alien Importers, between English and Foreign Ships, not between the East-India Company only, and Aliens: shall this Law made for England, be now appropriated to this Company, and the rest of England excluded by this Grant against this Statute?

This Law is made for all the King's subjects and their English-built Ships.

The consideration of this Subsidy moves from all the subjects, the Grant is by all, and the benefit ought to be for all the subjects of England.

The Law is the same as to foreign Importation from the Indies, as to importation from Italy, to which this Company doth not pretend.

The

The Act for encouraging and increasing of Shipping for Navigation, 12 Car. II. the best Law, that ever was made for England in that Parliament; except the Laws for the prerogative:

The Proviso in it follows: Provided that this Act, nor any thing therein contained, extend not, or be meant to restrain the importing of any East-India commodities, laden in English-built ships; and whereof the Master and three-fourths of the Mariners at least are English, from the usual place or places of loading them; in any part of the seas, to the Southward or Eastward of Cabo Bona Speranza, although the said parts be not the places of their growth.

This Law made for the increase of English Shipping and Navigation, doth this Company invade and appropriate this Shipping and Navigation to themselves, by excluding all other English subjects.

Is this for increase or decrease of English Shipping and Navigation, to confine it to few hands, excluding many?

There is neither common nor Statute Law can hold this Company.

I hope the Judgment of this Court will bind them; and that this Act of Parliament will prevail against this Company.

The Proviso is for all Englishmen to carry in all English-built Ships, any East-India commodities brought from Infidels.

The Charter says, this Company, and the Ships and their men shall only carry; which shall prevail, the Act of Parliament or the Charter? These last mentioned Acts of Parliament distinguish between Subjects and Alien Importers, between English and Foreign Ships.

Not between the East-India Company only, and Aliens: shall these Laws made for England, be now appropriated to this Company?

Shall they have the benefit of it? Can the King's Grant take from his subjects, the advantages given by Acts of Parliament, and appropriate to some, what is granted to all?

I crave leave to observe some things, by way of answer to Mr. Attorney's positions and inferences in his argument yesterday.

He distinguishes between inland and foreign trade, he did allow the subject the benefit of a home trade without restraint.

That the Husbandman might plough.

That one Englishman might privately sell to another by the Common Law, without licence from the Crown.

Yet one subject could not buy, sell, or trade with another publicly in an open fair or market, without licence from the Crown, and this for the preservation of the peace, to prevent publick assemblies and meetings: And that no Fair or Market could be kept, but by licence from the Crown.

I think there are Fairs, Markets, and Corporations in England by prescription, and their beginning is not known, and such are allowed by Law.

And prescriptions are compared to the head of Nile, which could never be discover'd.

And that such ancient prescriptions are as ancient as the Grants of Kings or Inhabitants in the World.

And for foreign trade: He laid it down for a position, that no subject could trade abroad without the King's licence in any part of the Christian World.

I do not find any authority for this, practice is against it.

The rest of the Counsel that argued for the Company did not insist upon it; nay, they did seem to admit a trade for English Merchants with Alien Christians, without the King's licence.

This is against the authority of F. N. Br. 85. Dyer 165, 296. against Lord Coke's opinion, Rolls Rep. Taylors of Ipswich, Stat. 9 H. III. cap. 30. Magna Charta, 2 E. III. cap. 9. 18 E. III. cap. 3. 25 E. III. cap. 2. 38 E. III. cap. 2. 5 R. II. cap. 2. 12 H. VII. cap. 16.

Stat. 26 H. VIII. cap. 10. Rastall 566. which gives the King for a limited time, power to licence trade and traders in some measure; in some parts, in some commodities. Vide the Statute.

His distinction for Merchants to trade, without coming to the staple: and therein he distinguishes between Merchants and Traders, who are obliged to come to the staple.

What warrant hath he for this distinction? The prayer of the Commons to the King in Parliament: the petitions of Merchants to the King: the King's restraint of Merchants in their trade, notwithstanding Acts of Parliament: the continuing of the Staple, notwithstanding Acts of Parliament seeming to the contrary, give him a handle for this argument.

1 H. V. 7. The prayer of the Commons to the King, to send foreign Merchants out of the Kingdom: the King's answer, Roy adviser. 2 H. V. cap. 5.

Those were Bills in Parliament presented to the King for the royal assent; so were many of the Rolls of those Ages, presented to the Kings for their royal assent, especially in things which any way concerned the King in his prerogative.

The Commons did not demand their rights in their Bills, but by Petition claim their right.

Such answers of Roy adviser, are no argument against the right of the subject.

Neither is the petition or prayer of the Commons in Parliament, in any matter that is their right, to the Crown, any argument against their right.

This was the usual method, and ancient course of presenting Acts of Parliament to the Kings, especially in Rich. II.'s time; H. IV. and part of H. V. then corrected upon some complaints in Parliament, tempore H. V. and H. VI. which may be read at large in the Rolls of Parliament.

It is their usual way to secure their rights thus, so is the Petition of right in Car. I.

The Prince's case, Co. Tit. 8. fol. 19. shews the various forms of Acts of Parliament, in the several reigns of Kings, sometimes by way of Grants, &c.

That the Staple did continue till lost, by the loss of Calais.

Stat. 2 E. III. cap. 9. That the Staples beyond the seas, and on this side the seas, ordained by Kings in times past, and the pains thereupon provided shall cease, &c.

This Statute took away the Staples set up by the Kings.

But there was a Staple set up by Act of Parliament, and reformed and altered by several Acts of Parliament, did continue notwithstanding the Act of 2 E. III.

But English Merchants are not within any of those Statutes, or the meaning of them.

And

And I do not find that Mr. Attorney gives any account how these Staples were taken away by Law, but vanished at the taking of Calais; he hath not told us the beginning or ending of the Staple by Law, I know no common Law for them, or his distinction.

Rolls Abr. Prerogative, Title Proclamation, pl. 6. 27 E. III. by the Statute of the Staple, it was ordained, that Merchants Aliens might bring from beyond seas, merchandize of the Staple, but not Merchants Denizens.

Because Merchants Denizens doubted to be impeached in time to come for their merchandize, which they passed by virtue of such Grant and Proclamation, forasmuch as they were made out of Parliament.

Idem it is granted in Parliament, 34 E. III. cap. 2.

Stat. 5 R. II. cap. 2. This Statute prohibits the exportation of Gold or Silver, and that no person other than Lords and great Men of the Realm, true and notable Merchants, and the King's soldiers, go out of the Realm, without the King's licence.

This is declared to be after publication of this ordinance, which implies such licence was not necessary before the making of this Statute.

Mr. Attorney was pleased to allow, licences to particular persons to trade were not revokable; but Companies having such licences may be dissolved by Quo Warranto.

Therefore more safe to fix trade in Companies than persons.

Then doth this Charter do the greater wrong to particular persons, who by Law may have such licences which cannot be taken from them.

And it doth not appear, but Sandys hath such licence, or may have, and ought not to be restrained therein by any Grant.

Mr. Attorney did turn this matter upon a question of fact, which will, or will not make this Company and their Grant a Monopoly:

Viz. Whether this Company and their Grant be a publick good and advantage to the trade of England?

This is a matter not to be decided in this Court, I suppose, and we cannot come at this question in this case; therefore not fit, safe or wise to determine the Law in this case, till the fact be cleared and settled, and that in such a Judicature where this question may be determined and settled, and the Law thereupon declared and established.

It appears to the Court, there are many illegal things in this Grant.

That the Grant is a restraint to the trade of English Merchants.

That it is a new Grant.

That it may be dangerous to establish such Grants by Judgment in a Court of Law.

That there are some things in the Canary Patent, in Darcy's Patent, nay, in the Patent for sweet Wines, that were commendable and useful; yet that little good did not prevail, but the whole perished, and was poisoned in the Monopoly of those Grants.

It is advisable how this Court, in this action, can adjudge for the Plaintiffs upon this Record, where the whole Grant is set forth upon Record in pleading; and it appearing to the Court, that some parts of this Grant are manifestly illegal, and may occasion oppression to the subject, and that the best parts of this Grant are doubtful, if good or useful for England, or the trade of it:

VOL. VII.

It cannot appear upon this Roll, for what part of this Grant, the Court shall adjudge for the Plaintiffs, and against the Defendant.

And it cannot appear what part of it doth appear to the Court to be illegal.

This may turn to a precedent for the whole Grant in after-ages, since we judge by precedents: And this precedent may occasion more Monopoly-Patents, and this Judgment give them sanction.

As for the second point in this case; whether this action be maintainable by the Company against the Defendant Sandys, admitting their Grant to be good:

1. To allow such an action in a Court of Law for this Company against a single subject, will be to give them opportunity to ruin any subject, that shall oppose them in trade.

They that are too great for all other Companies in England, must be too strong for any private subject in contest.

2. If their Grant be a legal Grant, they have sufficient pains and penalties in it to reduce any person to compliance with their Grant, without the aid of actions in Westminster-hall.

And the Grant which makes them a Company, and doth constitute them and their power, doth direct the remedies, ways and methods to support and maintain them in their power and Company, in all the things granted them; and there being no remedy given them by action, I think it may be hard to adjudge, that an action will lie for them in this case, against the Defendant.

In cases of new Injuries created by Grants, or by Act of Parliament, and remedies created to repair such injuries in the Grants and Acts that create them, such remedies are to be pursued, and not new remedies to be given in Courts for such new-created Injuries.

This is an action brought upon the Grant, where no such remedy is provided by the Grant, and other penalties are provided by the Grant.

The Grant directs and gives forfeiture of all the goods imported against it, and the Ship wherein they are imported; but the Grant doth not express the offender to answer damages to the Company, which is required by this action, and no special damages are laid in the declaration.

This is like a penal Statute, which creates an offence, and adds a penalty.

The party ought to sue for such penalties, and not to sue for damages in an action upon the case.

This may be the case upon the Statute, 2 E. VI. for tithes, it gives debts and no damages; so the case doth not lie upon that Statute.

Upon the Statute for forcible entries, and upon all other penal laws, which give penalties by single, double, or treble damages;

It was never practised to bring actions upon the case, upon such Statutes, unless in Darcy's case, which action miscarried, Moor 671.

I humbly conceive this action is not like actions upon the Custom of London, or upon Duties to the City of London, which have been brought by way of Indebitants for the duty.

In all these cases there was a certain duty created by the Grant, Custom or Charter, which made the party Debtor to the Corporation; but in this case here is no duty created.

Only an injury declared, and a penalty directed, which ought not to be turned to an action upon the case, in my opinion.

I

I hope the Court will not make a precedent, for the Company to multiply actions, against all persons that they conceive to be interlopers or aggressors upon their Grant, Company or Trade.

There is no special damages laid in the declaration to accrue to the Company:

Only in general, that the Defendant, contrary to the form and effect of these Letters Patent, did trade within the limits of their Grant, without licence of the Company, with a Ship called the Expectation, to the prejudice of the Company.

Williams's case, 2 Co. 5. fol. 72. Defendant being Vicar of Alderbury in Com. Salop. is obliged by himself, or his Chaplain, to celebrate divine service at Woolaston, and within the parish of Alderbury every Sunday, and to administer the sacrament to the Plaintiff, his servants and tenants within his said Manor, time out of mind:

And that the Defendant had not celebrated divine service, or administered the sacrament to the Plaintiff, his servants and tenants for a certain time, ad damnum of the Plaintiff. Non cul. pleaded, verdict for the Plaintiff, moved in arrest of Judgment, that an action upon the case doth not lie. Had this been a private Chapel for himself and family, an action upon the case had lain; for then no other person could have brought an action but himself, his servants could not.

But in this action, his tenants might bring their actions.

Which may occasion multitudes of suits, for one default in the Plaintiff.

The same may happen in this case; every Member of this Company may bring the like action against this Defendant.

And as in that case the Plaintiff had his remedy in the Ecclesiastical Courts;

So hath the Company their remedy, as the King had against offenders, in trade without licence.

If licence was necessary by Law, by contempt to his royal prerogative, or proclamation:

Compare it to the case of a nuisance in the highway, no action lies for it, without special damages.

They do not aver in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed without their Company.

If there be any legal punishment provided for such offenders, such punishments are to be pursued, and not new remedies by actions created, to the grievance and oppression of the subject.

Darcy and Allen, Action on the case, brought by Darcy against Allen, for selling Cards, contrary to his Patent; Judgment pro Def.

Williams's case, 5 Co. p. 72. Mary's case, lib. 9. publicum damnum is not to be reformed by action upon the case, but by publick proceedings, by indictment: or the like case lies pro privato damno.

The proceeding of the Company in this action, is supposed to be to right the publick in the name of the Company; not for the reparation of private damage, but to repair the publick in their Company.

The Company is in the nature of the late fancy'd Custodes Libertatis Angliæ; a notion to serve the publick, as they would have it;

And not to be used to recover damages for private injuries, but to support and save the trade in publick actions.

This Charter restrains the King in his prerogative, the Kingdom in its trade, the subjects in their freedom to trade; the King is concerned in his revenue, the subject in his right in this question.

What the Company cannot accomplish by the forfeitures, powers and penalties of their Charter; they design to establish by the Judgment of the Court, in this action for the Company.

I know the Justice of this Court is superior to this Company, and it is placed in safer and better hands than trade or regulation of it in the Company for England.

I therefore pray your Judgment against the Company, and their action, for the Defendant.

Term. Hill. 36 & 37 Car. II.

This Term the Judges * delivered their opinions seriatim in this great cause. Walcot was but short, and his reasons being included in those of Holloway's, &c. who spoke after, I have omitted them, to avoid repetition.

Holloway said, all might be reduced to one single point, which was, whether the Charter granting a sole trade to this Company, exclusive to all other, be good?

That this was a great point, both in regard of the King's prerogative, and the People's liberty.

He divided all trade, ut supra was done per Sawyer, Attorney-General.

Foreign trade with Christians, hath been opened by several Acts of Parliament; and at Common Law 'twas an inherent prerogative in the Crown, that none should trade with foreigners without the King's licence. And the King having this prerogative at Common Law, an Act of Parliament is necessary to divest him of it? which none hath done but to some particular places.

Michelborne's case, cited by those that argued for the Company, hath not in any sort been answered by the other side.

This is a trade not to be carried on but by a Company; and none can erect a Company but the King.

The King hath the sole power of this trade, as of war and peace; and by declaring a war, he may determine a publick trade, tho' settled by Act of Parliament.

No Parliament ever look'd on this as a Monopoly, nay, so far from it, as in the 14 Car. II. cap. 24. this Company, &c. are said to be an advantage to the publick; and that Act was made, that the persons of this Company, &c. should not be discouraged in those honourable endeavours, for promoting publick undertakings; then how can this be a Monopoly?

It never hath been questioned as such by Parliament, though they have look'd narrowly into the King's prerogative, even to the questioning some things that were his undoubted right; and concludes pro Quer.

Withins. Here are two points;

First, Whether Letters Patent giving a sole trade to a Company, exclusive to others, be good?

Secondly, Whether, in case if they be good, an action lies?

He thinks there is but one question, and that whether the action will lie or not, as the Company hath an interest or not. For if they have an interest by these Letters Patent, then the action will unquestionably lie.

The

The case depending solely on foreign trade with Infidels, he shall apply to that, and not meddle with inland trade.

'Tis a great point as to the King's prerogative, and the people's liberty.

First, He takes it, that by the Common Law the King has a prerogative to restrain all his subjects from going beyond sea, as F. N. B. 85. 'Tis true F. says, every subject may go out of the Realm to merchandize, &c. but that is to be understood, he shall not be punish'd for so doing, but the King may prohibit him, as appears by the same Book; and that three ways, (i. e.) by the Great Seal, the Privy-Seal or Signet, or by Proclamation. And tho' in Dyer 165. cited by Mr. Williams, 'tis said, that before R. II. subjects may go beyond sea, yet 'tis there agreed, the King may prohibit; and a quære is made, if a going over without a licence be not a contempt, though there was no prohibition. Afterwards in the same Book 296. 'tis holden such departure before express prohibition is no contempt; but all the Books say, when there is a prohibition, then it is a contempt.

As none may go against, or without the King's licence; so if they are gone, the King may recal them, as appears by Dyer 375.

'Tis objected, the King may prohibit some particular persons by writ; but he cannot prohibit all his subjects.

Answered, There are several ways of prohibiting by writ, which is directed to particular persons; and by proclamation, which is general.

And all the King's subjects are bound to take notice of the King's Great-Seal and Privy-Seal.

Secondly, The King hath the controuling power over all trade with Infidels; he may say, over all foreign trade in general: he saith, Michelborne's case goes farther than Fitzberbert's N. B. and he hath not heard any authority offer'd against Michelborne's case, as to trade with Infidels; and the opinion in that case seems to be given upon such a question as this. So that it is the judgment of the Court in a like case, for he who was then Chief-Justice deliver'd it, and none of the Court oppos'd it.

The prerogative of making leagues is in the King, and he may make them as he pleases; then it would be hard, the Law shou'd give the King a power to make leagues, and yet the subjects should have a right to do such things to break them. But though the subjects may not trade with Infidels, yet the King may license them, or trade himself; as the Jews were prohibited commerce with the Nations, yet Solomon traded with Hiram King of Tyre for Gold.

The several Licences and Petitions, cited and shewn by the Plaintiffs Counsel, tho' they prove no right in the Crown, yet are evidences of it; for to what purpose shou'd there be so many licences from the Crown, and petitions from the Commons to the King, for liberty to trade, unless the King had such a right? Therefore, unless where the Parliament hath open'd it, the King hath power to controul all foreign trade, especially with Infidels.

Objection. But though the King had such right, yet now the prohibiting part of the Patent is void by the Statute of E. III. which is pleaded; and the enabling part of the Patent is void by the Statute of Monopolies.

Answer. As to the first, that Statute relates not to this trade.

VOL. VII.

First, Because no such trade then in being; so that the Parliament could have no regard to it, unless by prophecy, neither could they know whether it would prove hurtful or beneficial to the Kingdom. But take the Act at the largest, yet you must take it to relate to the subject matter, which was for Wool; so that the words shall be open, may be taken free from Custom, and to have no other impositions upon them.

As to the second, whether a Monopoly; he says; a Monopoly is no Immoral Act, but only against the politick part of our Law; which if it happen to be of advantage to the publick, as this trade is, then it ceases also to be against the prohibiting part of the Law, and so not within the Law of Monopolies.

The Company hath been in possession of this trade near one hundred years, and that possession will in time give a right; and cited Grotius de Jure Pacis, &c. and concludes pro Quer.

The Argument of the Lord Chief-Justice Jefferies, at the Court of King's-Bench, concerning the Great Case of Monopolies.

The East-India Company Plaintiffs, and Thomas Sandys Defendant; wherein their Patent for trading to the East-Indies, exclusive of all others, is adjudg'd good.

Entred Trin. 35 Car. II. B. R. Rot. 126. and adjudged Termino S. Hilar. Annis 36 & 37 Car. II. & Primo Jac. II.

P L E A.

1. Defendant demands Oyer of the Letters Patent which are set forth in hæc verba: In which (as it hath been observ'd) the penalty of forfeiture of ship and goods, one moiety to the King, and the other to the Company, and imprisonment, is omitted.

2. There is a clause, that the Company may license strangers or others, and that the King will not without the consent of the Company give licences, &c.

3. That none shall have a Vote in the General Assembly, but he that hath 500*l.* Stock.

4. And there is another clause, which hath not been mention'd by the Counsel on either side; that if it shou'd hereafter appear to his Majesty or his successors, that that Grant, or the continuance thereof, shall not be profitable to his Majesty, his heirs, and successors, or to this Realm, that after three years warning, under the Privy-Seal or Sign Manual, the same shou'd be utterly void.

For Plea, the Defendant says, by an Act of Parliament, made 15 E. III. it is enacted, that the sea shall be open for all Merchants to pass with their merchandizes where they please; and that the Defendant by virtue of that Act, did traffick within those places mention'd in the declaration, without any licence, and against the will of the Company, as the Plaintiffs have declar'd, prout ei bene licuit.

Plaintiff demurrs.

In the debate of this case, at the bar, there were several matters discours'd of; but at length by the consent of both sides, as I apprehend, the case was resolv'd into these two points:
B b b b 2

1. Whether these Letters Patent giving or granting license or liberty to the Plaintiffs, to exercise the sole trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, with prohibition to all others, be good in Law?

2. Admitting the Grant good, whether this action be maintainable for the Plaintiffs?

Now to let me into the debate of these two points: I think not amiss to remember some things that have been mentioned by the Counsel, that I think are no ways in question.

I. At this time I conceive, therefore, that whether the King may prohibit his subjects from going beyond seas by writ or otherwise, by his absolute prerogative, without giving any reason, is not the question; nor sure was it ever thought a question, till it was lately stirr'd at the bar. For the writ in Fitz. N. B. 85. and the Register import no such thing; and our Books say, the surmises mention'd in those writs are not traversable: so is Dyer 165, & 296. For surely the King may restrain his subjects from going beyond sea, and is not bound to give any reason for his so doing; but that is not now in question.

II. In the next place, I do not conceive there is any difference (tho' much discourse hath been about Indians and Infidels) whether the East-Indies were, at the time of the Grant of this Patent, inhabited by Christians or Infidels; tho' by the way, in the debating of this case, I shall shew perhaps that matter may in some measure affect the Defendant, but will not at all affect the Grant to the Plaintiffs. So that I conceive, that whether this country or place, or any other inhabited by Christians or Infidels, that is not otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament will make but the same question.

III. Whether every clause and article in these Letters Patent, viz. touching forfeiture of ship and goods, imprisonments, or divers other clauses contain'd in the Charter, be legal or not, is not now in question. For surely it would be hard to maintain them all, and therefore the Plaintiffs Counsel have avoided those questions, by bringing this action; and tho' the Defendant's Counsel have mention'd them, yet surely it was only intended to sully the cause, and not that they thought them to affect the question.

IV. Nor is it the question, whether by this Grant to the Plaintiffs, the King has fetter'd or confin'd his prerogative, by putting in a covenant to exclude himself from granting licences to others of his subjects, to trade within the limits of the Plaintiffs Charter; tho' Mr. Williams (always a friend to the King's prerogative) in tenderness and care thereof, seem'd to be surpriz'd by the inconsiderate extravagancy of the Grant; and wou'd have us believe, that he was afflicted with the dismal consequences that must necessarily ensue by the King's parting with so great a prerogative; and that either by the advice, consent, or the inadvertency of his Attorney-General, and the rest of his Counsel, by having a greater regard to the East-India Company for the sake of their money, than they had to the King in discharge of their duty. To acquit them and us, therefore, of that dilemma, I am of opinion, though it makes nothing to the question that is now before us, the King may grant licences to any of his subjects to trade to the East-Indies, notwithstanding the Charter, or any article, clause or condition therein contain'd, to the contrary; and notwithstanding any caution or advertisement, that in his argument he gave to the King, or his reflection that he made upon his Counsel, either for their ignorance or hasty inadvertency in the passing of that Grant. And I am the rather induc'd to be of that persuasion, for that the most learned of our Profession, whose opinions have been quoted by him and others that have argu'd on the Defendant's side, were then of the King's Counsel, and were privy to, and advis'd both these Letters Patent, and all others of the like nature, that have been granted for these hundred years last past. I therefore think fit to say, that I believe Mr. Attorney-General, and the rest of the King's Counsel, have discharged their duty as well to the King, by maintaining of this Grant, as Mr. Williams has in this instance manifested his loyalty, by endeavouring to destroy it. In short therefore, as I said before, every clause in this Charter is not to be maintain'd, and therefore is not to affect the question now to be determined.

V. Whereas it has been objected, that though upon the pleadings it is agreed, that the Defendant never was a member of the East-India Company, nor had any licence from them to trade to the Indies, yet he might have a licence from the King; which, as I conceive, the King is not debarr'd to grant by any clause in the Letters Patent; yet I am of opinion, that if the Defendant had any such licence, it ought to have been shewn on his part, which not being done, it ought to be taken by us, as I believe the truth of the fact is, the Defendant never had any such licence.

VI. It was observ'd, that the Plaintiffs in their declaration had alledged, that this trade cou'd not be manag'd but per hujusmodi Corpus Corporatum; and by this means they had excluded the King from constituting any more Companies to trade within their limits, tho' perhaps the advantage of this Kingdom might hereafter require it. Nay, tho' the Indians might desire a further treaty of commerce, or that the trade of these places might require more Companies to be erected; yet say they, this Grant hath made the Plaintiffs a mere Republick, and thereby has alter'd the constitution of England, in the management of trade by Commonwealths, by placing it in Companies, who (were they independent upon the Crown) are truly so call'd. Yet in as much as I did before observe, that the King is not by this Grant either excluded from making any new treaties with the Indians, or from making any Corporations, or granting any other licences to any of the rest of his subjects, notwithstanding any of the clauses in the Charter; so I am of opinion that that objection also does not affect the question now to be determin'd: and for that reason, amongst others, I thought it not improper to mention that clause in the Charter that was omitted at the Bar, which the King has annexed as a condition to his Grant; that if it should hereafter appear to his Majesty or his successors, that that Grant, or the continuance thereof, in the whole or in any part, should not be profitable to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, or to this Realm; that after three years warning by warrant, under the King's seal or sign manual it should be made utterly void. So that it appearing that the King hath neither divested himself of the power, nor at the time of the Grant did design to be prevented to shew his inclination for the promoting of the advantage of his Kingdom, has given himself scope enough to obviate all those emergencies. Yet by the way I cannot but observe, that Mr. Williams, to shew his dislike to a Commonwealth, declared it to be absolutely opposite to the interest of a single person; but the single person he concern'd himself for, was not the King and his prerogative, but his Client the Defendant, and his trade; who, tho' I cannot in propriety of speech call a Commonwealth, yet I cannot but think this opposition of his seems to proceed from a Republican principle. For he by his interloping has been the first subject, that within this Kingdom for near an hundred years last past, hath in Westminster-hall publickly opposed himself against the King's undoubted prerogative in the Grant now before us: and I hope, by this example, the rest of his Majesty's subjects will be deterr'd from the like disobedience.

There were some other superfluous objections made against the clauses in the Charter, and against the formality of the pleadings, which I think not necessary to remember; and therefore having thus premised, I shall now descend to those points I think only material in this cause.

1. The first and great point in this cause, is, whether this Grant of the sole trade to the Indies, to the East-India Company exclusive of all others, be a good grant in Law or not; and I am of opinion it is. And by the way, I cannot but make the same remark in this case, as my Lord Chief-Baron Fleming made in the great case of Bates in the Exchequer, Lane, f. 27. that it is a great grace and eminent Act of condescension in the King to this Defendant, that he does permit this great point of his prerogative to be disputed in Westminster-hall; but by this he does sufficiently signify to all his subjects, that he will persist in nothing, tho' it seem never so much for his advantage, but according to the Laws of the land. I shall therefore endeavour to make it appear, that he is invested with this prerogative by the Law of this nation: but by the Law I do not only mean the customary Common Law or Statutes of this Realm, which are native and peculiar to this Nation, which, as Mr. Attorney well observed, are not adapted to this purpose; but such other Laws also as be common to other Nations, as well as ours, and have been received and used time out of mind, by the King and People of England in divers cases, and by such ancient usage are become the Laws of England in those cases; namely, the general Laws of Nations, the Law-Merchant, the Imperial or Civil Law; every of which Laws, so far forth as the same have been receiv'd and us'd in England time out of mind, may be properly said to be Laws of England.

And for the better communicating my thoughts upon this subject, I will proceed by these steps:

1. I will very briefly consider of the inland trade within this Kingdom, and the foreign trade with other Nations; and therein observe, that the King's prerogative is concerned in both, and that there is a great difference between both, allow'd by the Municipal Laws of this Kingdom.

2. I shall shew that the liberty of foreign trade may be restrain'd.

3. That foreign trade and commerce being introduc'd by the Law of Nations, ought to be govern'd and judg'd according to those laws.

4. That by the Laws of Nations, the regulation and restraint of trade and commerce is reckon'd inter Juris Regalia, i. e. the prerogative of the supreme Magistrate.

5. That tho' by the Laws of this Land, and by the Laws of all other Nations, Monopolies are prohibited, yet Societies to trade, such as the Plaintiffs, to certain places exclusive of others, are no Monopolies by the Laws of this Land, but are allow'd to be erected both here, and in other countries, and are strengthen'd by the usage and practice of both, in all times.

6. I shall shew the authorities that are extant in our Books, together with precedents, and reasons both publick and politick; for, as my Lord Fleming says, that such reasons are good directions for our judgment in such cases as these, being demonstrations of the course of antiquity; and therein also observe the necessity and advantage of such Societies, and by the way endeavour to answer the several Acts of Parliament, precedents and authorities, with all other the objections that have been made against my conclusion.

First, then to consider the difference between the inland and the foreign trade allow'd of in our Books, and that the King's prerogative doth affect both. As to manufactures, under which all sorts of Artificers are concern'd, I think they remain with the most liberty by the Common Law; and, as Mr. Attorney observ'd, the publick weal is little concern'd therein, only to preserve every one in the quiet enjoyment of the fruits of his own labour and industry, yet even in that the King's prerogative hath not been totally excluded: for as it is taken notice of in our Books, all things that are at this day enjoy'd by custom or prescription, had their commencement by royal Grant; and by that means no Artificer within the city of London can at this day use two trades, i. e. a Carpenter cannot use the trade of a Joyner, or a Bricklayer of a Plasterer.

2. As to the trade of merchandize or inland commerce, generally speaking, it had the next freedom by the Common Law, but was subject nevertheless to be limited or restrain'd by the King's prerogative in several particulars; as for instance, to prevent all forestalling and ingrossing. So Mr. Attorney did well observe, that numbers of people could not meet to traffick or merchandize, without being in danger of being punish'd as unlawful assemblies: the Crown therefore granted the liberties of Fairs and Markets, for the sake of commerce and trade; all which did originally proceed from the Crown, and therefore by abusing those liberties may still be forfeited to the Crown; and passing by all other instances, I shall only instance one, taken notice of in our Books, which well consider'd may go a great way in the case at the Bar. Register, fol. 107. the King grants to the Abbot of Westminster and his successors, that they should hold a Fair at Westminster thirty odd days together, with a prohibition that no man should buy or sell within seven miles of that fair during that time; and the King does there command the Sheriffs of London by his writ, to seize the body of an inhabitant of Salisbury, for selling cloths in London within the time of the Fair. Now here is a Charter granted to a particular person exclusive of others, for a time subject to more objections than the Charter now in question, yet approved of by our Books. Hence it came, that Corporations were erected, and trade confined to places and persons exclusive of others; for all such came originally from the Crown, and, as I said before in the case of Fairs, so I may now say in the case of Corporations, that tho' they claim liberties and privileges by prescription, yet these originally proceeded from the Crown, and are therefore forfeitable to the Crown: an eminent instance hereof, is that that case of the City of London, for abusing their liberties, which they claimed by prescription, confirmed by divers Charters and Acts of Parliament; by Judgment of this Court, their liberties and franchises were seized into the King's hands, and therefore remain as a Vail to all intents and purposes, till his Majesty shall be pleased of his bounty to restore them. Now that the inland traffick is most concern'd, either in Corporations, Markets or Fairs, which all proceed from the Crown; does plainly evince, that the King's prerogative has a more immediate influence over dealings in merchandizes, than it has over other mechanick crafts and mysteries: and that, as Mr. Attorney did well observe, to prevent frauds, deceits, and other abuses either in weight, measures or otherwise, which would certainly interrupt such commerce. But our Law goes yet a step further, and allows further difference between inland merchandize and foreign, and allows a different way of determining controversies that arise thereupon; the Common Law and Statutes of this Realm, allowing the Law-Merchant, which is part of the Law of Nations, should decide such controversies. Decimo tertio H. IV. fol. 19. a complaint made to the King and Council of some goods taken away from a Merchant; it was moved in that case, that the matter might be determined at the Common Law: but the Lord-Chancellor said, that the suit being brought by a Merchant, who is not bound to sue according to the Common Law, to have his cause tried by twelve men, and to observe the other solemnities of our Law; but shall sue in Chancery according to the Law of Nature, which is the Universal Law of the World. And it is in that case agreed by all the Judges, that if foreign merchandize were stol'n or waived, they could not be seized, as other English merchandizes might be by the Rule of the Common Law, as waifs and strays: which shews plainly there is a difference in the consideration of our Law, between foreign merchandizes that cross the seas, and other inland goods and commodities. If two Merchants be partners in merchandizes, one shall have an action of account against the other, secundum Legem Mercatoriam, says the Register, fol. 135. and F. N. B. 117. D. And yet by the rule of the Common Law, if two men be jointly possessed of other goods, which are no merchandize, the one cannot bring an action of account against the other; if one of the Merchants die, the Executor may bring his account against the survivor, for his moiety, Reg. 135. F. N. B. 177. But if it were a copartnership for other goods, it would survive per jus accrescendi, according to the rules of the Common Law.

In an action of Debt upon a simple Contract, the Defendant may wage his Law; but it is otherwise in a Contract about Merchandize, in Lane's Reports Bates's Case agreed, Reg. 260. A. at Common Law, the Goods of Ecclesiastical Persons were excused from toll; but says the writ, Dum tamen Merchandizas aliquas non exercitat de iisdem. It shews, that then they fall under another consideration. If one man wrongs another man of his goods, here an action of Trespass will lie: But if a Merchant's Goods be taken upon or beyond the Seas, there must be a Writ of Reprizal to obtain satisfaction; the Parl. Roll. 3 Ed. 1, M. 19. in Archievis Turris Londini, where the Bailiffs of Southampton are commanded by Writ, quod omnes Mercatores Leodienses ad partes Angliæ accidentes per bona & catalla sua distringantur secundum Legem Mercatoriam & Consuetudinem Regni, ad satisfaciendum Mercatoribus Florentinis, &c. Where, by the way, observe, that Lex Mercatoria, which differs from the ordinary Common Law, is said to be Consuetudo regni Angliæ; by which we may observe, that foreign merchandizes and trades differ from others in the eye of Law, even by the allowance of Common Law it self.

Several Acts of Parliament have been also made for the more speedy recovery of debts contracted for merchandizes, as the Statute of Alton Burnel, the Statute de Mercatoribus, and the Statute Vicesimo Septimo. Ed. 3. cap. 2. amongst other things it is enacted, That for merchandizes taken away, the Party shall be arrested, and speedy and ready Process shall be against him from day to day, and from hour to hour, according to the Law-Merchant, and not at the Common Law. So the Statute for erecting the Court of Insurance, designed for the speedy ease of Merchants, has left the determination according to the Law of Merchants; and therefore hath ordered the Judge of the Admiralty Court always to preside in those commissions. By all which I think I may fairly conclude, there is a great difference allowed of, between the inland and foreign commerce, and that.

2. I shall endeavour to prove, that the liberty of foreign trade may be restrained.

And here I must premise, that as at first all things were promiscuously common and undivided to all, so the free exercise of this universal right, was then instead of property; but as soon as the number of men increased, and they found by experience the inconveniency of holding all things in common, things were reduced into property by agreement and compact; either express as by partition; or implied, by premier Occupancy.

After this Government was established, and laws were made, even for the ordering those things to which no man had any right; as for example deserts, places uninhabited, islands in the seas, wild beasts, fishes, and birds; the former were usually gained and disposed of, by him that had the sovereignty over the People; the latter by him that had the dominion over the Lands and Waters, who might forbid all others from hunting, fishing, &c.

And in virtue of this universal Law, his Majesty and his Predecessors have always disposed of the several Plantations abroad, that have been discovered or gained by any of their subjects, and may do for the future, in case any other be discovered and acquired. For tho' the laws of Nations can command nothing which the law of Nature forbids, yet they may bound and circumscribe that which the Law of Nature leaves free, and forbid that which naturally may be lawful. Now to apply this to our present purpose of trade and commerce, Mr. Williams quoted that Common saying, Commercium debent esse libera; from whence he infers, that by the law of Nature and Nations, the sea and trade, and traffick ought to be free as the air; and for that he has cited Grotius de Jure Belli ac Pacis, cap. 3. Welwood's Abridgm. of the sea-laws, in his Epistle to the Lord Admiral; Grotius de Mari libero, where he says, Mare & Littora Maris Jure Gentium sunt communia. Britton, cap. 33. De purchas. le Mere & le air sunt thores Common; Sir John Burrough his Sovereignty of the Seas; Baldus de rerum Dominiis. But I think none of those Books can warrant his conclusion; for surely that expression, Commercium sunt libera, cannot possibly be understood in such a literal sense, That every man in every Nation should be at liberty to trade, either in what commodities, or to what place, or at what time soever he shall think fit. For I took it to be granted by all that argued for the Defendant, that trade and commerce must be subject to some laws; and Grotius, in his book de Mari libero, proposes this main design, to prove, that any one Nation had not power to hinder another Nation from free commerce; and that the Spaniards therefore had no right to prohibit the Dutch from trading into such parts of the Indies, whereof the Spaniards were not possessed, upon pretence that they had the dominion of those seas: Inter nos & Hispanos, says he, hæc controversia est, sitne immensum & vastum Mare regni unius nec maritimi accessio? Populone unquam jus sit volentes populos prohibere ne vendant, ne permutent, ne denique comment inter sese. And for the benefit of his Countrymen he doth therefore assert, licere cuivis genti quamvis alteram adire, cunque ea negotiare; which, taking that to be true, which by the law of Nations is certainly otherwise, yet nothing can be inferred from thence, but only the question of commerce between one Nation and another. And how that was before leagues and treaties were made, little may perhaps be found, as Mr. Attorney well observed, besides the laws of hospitality, which do not give any demandable right; but surely Grotius there hath no particular respect to particular subjects, of this or any other Nation, how far the supreme power of any Nation may erect a society of trade to a certain place, and for certain commodities, exclusive of all other subjects of their own.

And that plainly appears, both from the scope of his Book, as also for that for several years, both before and at the time of publishing that Treatise, the Dutch East India Company was established; which I shall have farther occasion to discourse of by and by.

As for Welwood's Epistle, I have seldom observed that Epistles have been cited in Westminster-hall as authorities: Yet supposing it to be so, That all loyal subjects shall have their Petitions granted to safety and security in their trade; I suppose Welwood little dreamt of Interlopers, when he talk'd of loyal subjects: if it can be meant only of such who may trade by law, that is to beg the question in respect of the Plaintiff and Defendant. As to that of Britton, That the sea is common, it is answer'd by what hath been said before; and Welwood, pag. 66. says, That by Commune or Publicum, is meant, a thing common for the use of any one sort of People, according to that Saying, Roma Communis Patria est, but not for all of all Nations; Welwood, pag. 66. That passage of Burrough is only observed to prove the King's prerogative within the four seas; and though Mr. Williams would have insinuated, as if the Sturgeons, and other great fish, and wrecks, and the like, had come to the King by the Stat. of 17 E. 3. c. 2. that Act was but a declaration of the Common Law; for he had it by the right of his prerogative; Plowden's Commentaries, in the case of Mines; Coke 5. Sir Henry Constable's case; these things were vested in the King, by his prerogative by the Common Law. Yet I cannot but observe, that the Treatise of Mare Liberum, on which Mr. Williams so much relies, was craftily writ, to overthrow the King's prerogative in that beneficial part thereof, relating to the fishing on the English coasts; and contains a plain Proclamation for all persons of any Nation, indif-ferently to fish in all kinds of seas; for, says cap. 5. fol. 10. Que autem navigationis eadem Piscatus habenda est ratio, ut communis maneat omnibus. And herein tho' Mr. Williams intends to make good the premises, I presume that Mr. Pollexfen, that argued on the same side, has a greater concern for his friends in the West, than to join with him to make good that conclusion. And before I go off from this point, I think it not amiss, the better to clear the way to my conclusions, to give some instances wherein other Nations, as well as our own, have not only thought it legal, but necessary for their several publick advantages, to put restrictions upon trade, and did not think it injurious to natural equity, and the freedom of mankind, so much discourd of on the other side. To give some few instances; Videmus Jura Commerciorum, says Bodin de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 7. non solum omnibus populorum principumque inter se conventis, verum etiam singulorum Statutis, &c. And after he has enumerated the compacts for trade between the Pope and the Venetians, between the citizens of the Hans Towns, and the Kings of England, France, and Spain, and several other Countries; Illi, says he, inter se Commercium multis modis personarum, mercium, locorum, temporum atque omni alia ratione coarctarunt. So is Marguardus, fol. 155. and Buchanan in his 7th Book de Rebus Scotiæ; and in all Countries, the importation and exportation of some commodities are prohibited, as salt from France, horses from other Countries, wool from hence. In whomsoever that power of restraint does remain, the power of licensing some, and restraining of others, surely does also remain by parity of reason; but of that more by and by. And as Mr. Attorney did truly observe, upon perusal of the Statutes that are now in print relating to trade, the Parliaments have in all ages, even to this King's reign, since his restoration, thought fit to make more laws to prohibit foreign trade, than to increase it; as looking upon it more advantageous to the common weal. And thus having observed that other Nations, as well as we, have not only thought it legal, but necessary, to make laws for the restraint of trade; and thereby thought they did no injustice to the liberty of mankind:

3. I proceed to the next step. I shall therefore, thirdly, endeavour to prove, that foreign trade and commerce, being introduced by the laws of Nations, ought to be governed and adjudged according to those laws; and I do not know of any Statute or Book of the Common Law now in print, that doth oppose this assertion. Coke 3 Inst. fol. 181. in the margin, cited by the Defendant's Counsel at the bar: Commercium, says he Jure Gentium esse debet; nay, it is the express text of the Law, ex Jure Gentium Commercium sunt instituta: which being laid down as undeniably true, and so admitted to be by the Defendant's counsel; I would infer from thence, since commerce and traffick are founded upon the law of Nations by the natural reasons of things, all controversies arising about the same, shall be determined by the same laws, especially where there is no positive and express law in that Country where such controversies do arise, to determine them by: and Mr. Williams seems to allow, that there are no such laws in this Kingdom; for he thinks that the controversy now before us, is not to be decided but by Parliament.

All other Nations have governed themselves by this principle; and upon this ground stands the Court

Court of Admiralty in this Kingdom, viz. That there might be uniform Judgments given there to all other Nations in the World, in causes relating to commerce, navigation, and the like. And in as much as the Common and Statute Laws of this Realm, are too strait and narrow to govern and decide differences arising about foreign commerce; and can never be thought to bear any sort of proportion to the universal law of all Nations, as the interests of all foreign trade do necessitate them to contend for: It will become us that are Judges in Westminster-hall, for the better determining this case, to observe the methods used by our Predecessors in determining such like causes, and take notice of the law of Nations.

The Common Law, by the several authorities I cited before, takes notice of the Law-Merchant; and as the Book of Ed. 4. before cited, says it is part of the Law of Nations, and leaves the determination to be according to that Law; the several Acts of Parliament I before cited, make a particular provision, that matters of this nature should be determined according to the Law-Merchant, which is part of the law of Nature and Nations; and is universal, and one and the same in all Countries in the World. And therefore Cicero speaking of this law, says, Non erit alia Lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac; sed & inter omnes gentes & omni tempore una eademque Lex obtinebit. And I the rather thought my self obliged, more industriously to search into the Law of Nations, the better to enable me to give judgment in this case; the consequence whereof will affect the King's subjects in all parts of the World; and I was minded thereof, particularly, by my Lord Chief Baron Fleming, in the giving Judgment of the great case of Bates, about the imposition upon currans, Lane, fol. 27. and does not only affirm it as necessary, but the common practices of all Judges, in all Ages.

Do not we leave the determination of Ecclesiastical causes, to be decided according to the Ecclesiastical Laws; foreign matters, matters of navigation, leagues, truces, embassies; nay even in the case at the Bar, the stopping of the Defendant's Ship by an Admiralty Process, was left, by the opinion of all this Court, and afterwards by the Courts of Common Pleas, and Exchequer, to be decided in the Admiralty; and by virtue of a process out of that Court, his Ship is detained to this day. And as I said, that Court proceeds according to the law of Nations, and the matters before specified are not to be controuled by the rules of the Common Law.

And if customs make a law, then the custom of Nations is surely the law of Nations; which brings me to my next particular, which is the main thing upon which this cause will turn.

Therefore, 4thly, I conceive, that both by the Law of Nations, and by the Common Law of England, the regulation, restraint and government of foreign trade and commerce, is reckoned inter Jura Regalia, i. e. is in the power of the King: and 'tis his undoubted prerogative, and is not abridged or controuled, by any Act of Parliament now in force.

This question is not concerning the consequences of this power, or any inconveniencies that may happen thereupon; because upon inconveniencies arising, the King is to be supplicated to redress them: which I shall farther take notice of, when I come to answer the particular objections made against this Grant.

Commerciorum Jura sunt privilegiata, ac non nisi iis concessa qui exercendorum Mercatorum licentiam Principis indultu & auctoritate meruerunt, is the very express Text of the Civil Law; and so is Carpzovius, Const. n. 5 Bodinus de Republica, lib. 1. c. 7. says Quæ tametsi Jure Gentium esse videantur prohibere, tametsi sæpe à Principibus videmus. And in c. 6. quoted by Mr. Attorney, That the Laws of commerce are contained in the particular compacts and agreements of Princes and People. So Salmasius, pag. 236. Mercatura est res indifferens, in qua Magistratus vel in vetando vel permittendo suam pro Commodo Reipublicæ potest imponere auctoritatem. So Carpzovius, a famous German Lawyer, in his decisions, lib. decis. 105. N. 13, & 14. Exempla baud rara sunt, ubi Privilegio & Edicto Principis commercia ad certas personas certave loca restringere videmus. These Rules and Principles, asserted to be the Laws of Nations, agree with the Principles of our Laws. Mr. Attorney, in his argument in this cause, cited many Records and Precedents to make good this assertion; which I think he did with great clearness. I therefore will content my self with as few of them as I can; and only remind you of such as I think absolutely necessary to make good my assertion, which I will do by these steps. I conceive the King had an absolute power to forbid foreigners, whether Merchants or others, from coming within his dominions, both in times of war and in times of peace, according to his royal Will and Pleasure; and therefore gave safe-conducts to Merchants-Strangers, to come in, in all ages, and at his pleasure commanded them out again, by his Proclamation or Order of Council; of which there is no King's reign without many instances. And the Statute of Mag. Chart. c. 30. so much insisted on by the Defendant's counsel, is but a general safe-conduct; Omnes Mercatores nisi publicè ante prohibiti fuerint, habeant saluum & securum conductum, &c. Where by the way I must observe, that Mercatores, says my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon the Chapter, is only intended of Merchant-Strangers; for I cannot find, that in those days any of the subjects of this Kingdom did apply themselves to foreign trade; or at least the trade was not so considerable, as to be taken notice of in any Book of Record that I can meet with. And before the making of that Statute, my Lord Coke, 2 Inst. fol. 57. does agree, that the King might, and did prohibit Strangers at his pleasure: But he conceives, and, with great respect be it spoken to his memory, I think without any colour of reason, would make these words, nisi publicè prohibeantur, to intend only a prohibition by Parliament; and his reason is, for that it concerns the whole Realm. Now did the coming in of strangers concern the Realm after making of the Act, more than it did before? Surely no. Doth not the power of making war and peace, absolutely belong to the King by his prerogative? And is not that of public concern to the Kingdom? And is not the prohibition of strangers a natural dependant upon that prerogative? if the word publicè there had been out, there had been no colour for that conceit; and surely the King's proclamation will make the matter as publick, as an Act of Parliament can do: nay, and I may say more, for Acts of Parliament anciently were made publick by Proclamation; for in our Books we have many instances of Writs directed to Sheriffs of Counties, to cause Acts of Parliament to be published by Proclamation; and so was the constant and ancient usage. And is it not more natural for strangers that are abroad, to take notice of the King's publick Edicts, which are known to be of great importance in all Countries, more than they would of an Act of Parliament that affects the King's own dominions only? Besides, it appears more impertinent, if you turn those words into a Proviso; and then it will amount to no more in plain English, than this, provided that this Law shall continue, except it be hereafter repealed; which surely would be very ridiculous.

Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor, both in their arguments, quoted several Records and Precedents, where the King, in all times after the making of that Act, did prohibit strangers from coming in, and did command them out when they were here, at pleasure. I shall not trouble you with the repetition of the Records, for they were many; nay, the King, when Acts of Parliament had prohibited, did grant safe-conduct; and of that sort, in Rolls Prerogative, 180. you will find several instances; and in the several Acts of Parliament cited by Mr. Attorney, to confirm the King's prerogative, as to safe-conducts, it doth appear. Syderfin. fol. 441. it is said, that the King by the Common Law, might prohibit the importation of foreign goods; and whoever acted against such Prohibition, forfeited his Ship.

The King might prohibit any of his subjects from going beyond the seas at pleasure, and recall them again as he thought fit; and that, as I have said before, without giving any reason. The Books of Fitzherbert's N. B. and Register, before recited, make this evident. Mr. Attorney indeed cited many instances wherein the Kings had made use of their prerogatives, as 7 Ed. 2. M. 10. Quadregesimo Ed. 3. M. 24. Stat. 5 R. cap. 2. which confirms it, 3 Inst. 179. Vicefimo quinto Ed. 3. M. 10. with many more*; and indeed I think it was not denied, but that after a Prohibition it was an offence admitted of by the Defendant's counsel, for any subjects to go beyond the seas, Dy. 165 & 296. agrees it.

And that is sufficient for the present purpose, there being a Prohibition in the Charter in question, to all persons that are not there mentioned. What influence the King's prerogative must necessarily have upon foreign trade and commerce, appears by his frequent granting Letters of Mart and Repriſal; These are not allowed of by the Law of Nature, Civil or Common Law; for thereby no man is bound by another's act, without his consent, but by the general consent of Nations, humana necessitate exigente. The King only has the power of making leagues and truces with foreign Princes, upon which only all foreign trade does depend; and those leagues are made upon such terms and conditions, and under such limitations, as both Princes think fit: Many instances to this purpose were also cited by Mr. Attorney, to which I refer myself; and the differences that arise from Merchants beyond the seas, are to be determined according to those leagues, and cannot be decided by the municipal laws of this Realm, which cannot be put in execution in foreign parts.

Fourthly, The King is absolutely Master of war and peace; which he could not be, in case he had not a power to lay restraint upon his own subjects in relation to foreign commerce; since eo ipso, that war is proclaimed, all publick commerce is prohibited: and the counsel that argued for the Defendant, admitted, That the King might prohibit his subjects to go or trade beyond the seas in cases of wars or plagues. How strangely preposterous then would it be for a man to imagine, that the King should have an absolute power of war and peace, and yet be denied the means to preserve the one, and prevent the other! Is not that therefore the great reason why the King is at so great expence in maintaining ambassadors and envoys in all the trading parts of the World, without which we should be in a perpetual state of war? Would it not be monstrous, that when the King is entered into league with any sovereign Prince, in a matter of trade very advantageous to his People, to have it in the power of any one of his subjects to destroy it? As for instance, suppose a league between our King and the Emperor of Morocco, for a trade to Tangier, were made upon condition, That no English Ship coming there for commerce, should be above a hundred ton, and a fleet of merchant ships within that condition, were in Port at Tangier; and Mr. Sandys, with the same obstinacy as he seems to appear in this case, should have gone with a Ship of above a hundred ton to Tangier; that would have been an absolute breach of the league, we should have been immediately in a state of war, the merchant-ships and goods absolutely forfeited to the Emperor by the law of Nations, and they and their families thereby undone, without any remedy, till Mr. Sandys should be pleased to return into England; and also bring with him an estate sufficient to make them a recompence: and then also perhaps it would be difficult to contrive such an action in our Law, to compel Mr. Sandys to do it. Besides, the King has no other way, if his ambassadors and ministers in foreign parts cannot prevail that right should be done to his subjects; or if Mr. Sandys's interloping Ship, and all its cargo, had been wrongfully taken away from him by any foreign Prince, but by the King's declaring of a war, and compelling them to make restitution by force; the consequence whereof will affect more than foreign traders, who would be then concerned, both in their persons and purses; and it would be very hard for all the King's subjects to lie under the burthen and charge, and the profits and advantages accrue only to a few. And here by the way I think it not improper to take notice of an objection that was made by the defendant's counsel, of the unreasonableness that the King should be entrusted with this prerogative; for as well as he may restrain persons trading to the Indies, he may also restrain them from trading into any other part of the World. The very objection seems to carry an unsavoury, as well as unreasonable mistrust in a subject to his Prince. For as it is a maxim in our Law, the King cannot be presumed to do wrong; and I am sure the constant practice of our present King has not given us the least umbrage for such diffidence; and I think I may truly say, we are as safe by our Prince's own natural inclinations, as we can be by any law in this particular. The King has the absolute power of pardoning all offenders, by his inherent prerogative, which an Act of Parliament cannot deprive him of, the case of murder is a full instance of that;

VOL. VII.

that; nor was that prerogative ever disputed in any age, tho' never so troublesome; saving in that single case of the Earl of Danby, and that without any reason, that I could ever hear of. Is it therefore to be objected and presumed, that the King will pardon all the traitors, murderers and robbers, and other felons, and make use of his prerogative to let all malefactors escape?

The King is the fountain of honour, as well as of justice, and in virtue of that prerogative, may ennoble as many of his subjects as he pleases; and thereby exempt them from arrests, and other common processes of the Law, by means whereof men do more speedily recover their just debts, and have redress for injuries. Is it therefore to be presumed the King will make such a glut of noblemen, because he may do it? And as this is against his inclination, so certainly it is against his interest, to make such Grants as the defendant's counsel seem to fear; for it is more for the King's benefit than it can be for his subjects, the greater the importation of foreign commodities is; for from thence arise his customs and impositions, those necessary supports of the Crown: and therefore in some sense the King is the only person truly concerned in this question; for this Island supported its Inhabitants in many ages without any foreign trade at all, having in it all things necessary for the life of man.

Terra suis contenta bonis, non indiga mercis, says the Poet. And truly, I think, if at this day most of the East-India commodities were absolutely prohibited, tho' it might be injurious as to the profit of some few traders, it would not be so to the generality of the Inhabitants of this Realm. And therefore as I have offered these few instances to prove the King should have such a prerogative; in the next place I come to shew, that the Kings of England have exercised this their prerogative in all ages: and as the King has the power of restraint of foreign trade, so he is the only Judge when it is proper to use that power, which seems plainly to be for the same reason. And I think Mr. Williams's remark of the difficulty of this case, that it should necessitate the King to call a Parliament to assist him with power to determine this question, is not to be passed by without some observation.

God be praised, 'tis in the King's power to call and dissolve Parliaments, when and how he pleases; and he is the only Judge of these Ardua Regni, that he should think fit to consult with the Parliament about. And Mr. Williams would do well to save himself the trouble of advising the King of what things are fit for him to consult with his Parliament about, 'till such time as he be thereunto called. But it hath been too much practised at this and other bars in Westminster-hall, of late years, to captivate the Lay Gens, by lessening the power of the King, and advancing, I had almost said, the prerogative of the People: and from hence comes the many mischiefs to the King's subjects in parts abroad, by making the power of the King thought so inconsiderable, as tho' he were a mere Duke of Venice, being absolutely dependant upon his Parliament. Would it not be mightily for the honour and dignity of the Crown of England, think ye, that the Emperor of Fex and Morocco, or any Prince of the remote parts of the World, should be told, That Mr. Sandys, one of the King of Great Britain's subjects came into the Emperor's Territories against his Prince's consent, and that he had no power to hinder him unless he would consult with all his Nobles, and the Representatives of all his common subjects, to assist therein? Would not the Emperor believe Sandys to be the greater Prince of the two? But tho' such sort of declamations are so much for the service of the Crown, and for the honour of the Kingdom, as they would have it believed; yet I think they have the same tendency of duty and service to the King, with some other matters that of late have happened amongst us, viz. Some have been so concerned, as well for the safety and security of his Majesty's sacred Person, and to make him formidable to his rebellious subjects at home, as to desire that his guards might be discharged, because it looked as though he designed to rule by a standing army; and to shew their tenderness to his sacred Life, would have him removed from the assistance of evil counsellors, as they called them; and put himself into the hands of assassins, as tho' one murdered Prince were not sufficient to satisfy that piece of state-policy, in one and the same age. And in order that he might have sufficient to support the necessity as well as the dignity of a Crown, which all good subjects are zealous for; some, of late, have industriously endeavoured to have prevented him from being able to borrow any money upon the credit of any part of his revenue, a privilege that the meanest of the persons concerned in that question, would think themselves highly injured to be debarred of.

These and the like attempts, if not prevented, will render the King and his Government low and despicable in all other parts of the World: And as for the instance between a Denizen and a man naturalized, I think it rather makes against, than for Mr. Williams's conclusion, as to the main question. For tho' the King cannot naturalize a man, and thereby give him inheritable blood, as a natural-born subject to inherit lands; yet he may make an Alien a Denizen; and by that means he becomes to have as much privilege as any of the King's natural subjects hath, as to trade and commerce, which is the only question now before us: And I cannot help being of opinion, that this Kingdom was in greater regard abroad, and the Inhabitants thereof more prosperous at home, when the prerogative of the Crown was more absolute than now it is: therefore it is our duty as good Judges, as well as good Subjects, to endeavour to support it as much as we can by Law. And so I proceed to mention some precedents and authorities, whereby the Kings of England have in all ages exercised this part of their prerogative, of restraining, disposing and ordering matters of commerce and foreign trade, by Royal Licences, Charters, and Dispensations.

And herein I shall content myself with as much brevity as I can, only in producing some few of those many instances, which were with great care and industry found out by Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor; and by them so learnedly and properly applied to the case in question.

1. Therefore it has been well observed, that the Staples, which were the common and publick Marts for all Merchants to resort to, were first erected by the King's prerogative, without any Act of Parliament; as it doth plainly appear by the several Acts of Parliament mentioned at the Bar, either for setting the places, or enlarging the commodities that were permitted to be brought to the Staple; for surely in all times, when the Staple was fixed in the dominions of any other Prince, that must be done by league; which none can make but the King. To instance one authority for all, the Stat. 2 Ed. 3. cap. 9. expressly says, It is enacted, That the Staples beyond the seas, and on this side, ordained by Kings in time past, &c. Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor cited several Records, and other Acts of Parliament, that allow this to be the King's prerogative absolutely; which I shall only name, they having opened the particulars at large, viz. Vicesimo E. 3. Plac. Parl. Rolls Abr. fol. 108, 130. Octavo E. 3. num. 20. 27 E. 3. cap. 1. 43 E. 3. c. 1. 47 E. 3. N. 17. Prim. R. 2. N. 98. with many more; which did not only license Merchants to repair to their several Staples, but prohibited them from carrying their staple commodities to any other places, and the several Acts of Parliament made touching the Staple, only inflicted greater forfeitures upon the persons offending, more than the King by his prerogative did inflict; but neither added to, or diminished any part of the power of the Crown: the truth whereof will also farther appear by the consent of the Parliament, plainly declared in several Statutes following, viz. 2 H. 5. c. 6. 2 H. 6. c. 4. 8 H. 6. c. 17, & 27. by which, and several other instances, both by Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Attorney, I do conceive it does plainly appear, that the Statute of 2 Ed. 3. c. 9. Nono Ed. 3. c. 1. decimo quarto Ed. 3. c. 2. the Stat. of decimo quinto Ed. 3. mentioned in the Defendant's Plea, decimo 8 Ed. 3. c. 3. which the Defendant's counsel have much insisted on, for the opening the liberty of trade, only concerned Merchants of the Staples; and by the Acts of Parliament made relating to that trade, since particularly mentioned by Mr. Attorney, stand now repealed.

And tho' the place of the Staple, as well as the commodities, were ascertained by Acts of Parliament, yet the King granted to merchants, licences to trade elsewhere; which prerogative is allowed of by Acts of Parliament, and other authorities in our Books: for instance, amongst many others, the Stat. 8 H. 6. 21; 22 Hen. 6. c. 4. 15 Hen. 6. c. 3. 27 H. 6. c. 1. 1 H. 7. fol. 3. A. 13 Ed. 4. fol. 3. l. 5. E. 4. 33.

And as the King, before those Acts of Parliament mentioned, ordered the merchandizes of the Staple; so all other foreign trade, not taken notice of by Acts of Parliament, were begun and absolutely disposed of by the King's prerogative; for as my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon Mag. Chart. c. 30. does truly observe, That by Mercatores there, only is meant Merchant-Strangers; for as I said, I do not find that any of the subjects of this King meddled in foreign trade, in many years after the making of that Act: The first instance I meet with, is in Malin's Lex Mercatoria, fol. 150. of the society of Merchants, which is the Staples Adventurers, made by a Grant from K. Ed. 3. and were called the Brotherhood of St. Thomas a Becket of Canterbury, till the time of Hen. 7. who confirmed their Charter, but changed their name to that of Merchant Adventurers, by which name they continued a corporation.

And that the King did shut and open foreign trade at his pleasure, by many instances mentioned by Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor, does farther appear, 33 Hen. 3. mem. 1. 2 E. 3. pars secunda memb. 35. 3 Hen. 3. N. 33. Rolls Prerogative 170, & 214. before cited, primo H. 5. 41. decimo octa- vo H. 6. N. 60. and the Stat. of 12 H. 7. c. 6. which I have caused to be searched. And in Plowden's Commentaries, in the great Case of Mines Royal it is set down as a Rule, That ancient Charters and Grants of the Crown, are the best evidences of the Prerogative. Phil. and Mary erected the corporation of Russia Merchants, by Charter, with a prohibition to others, with the like conditions within mentioned in the Charter at the Bar; and was afterwards approved of in Parliament, in 8 Eliz. and the forfeiture mentioned in the Letters Patent made more effectual. And as Mr. Attorney did truly observe, that when Calais was taken, and thereby the Staples unsettled, Queen Elizabeth thought, according to the precedent of the Russia and other Companies, it was most advantageous for the carrying on of Trade and foreign commerce, to erect societies and corporations; which was well approved of in those times, and so has continued ever since undisturbed, until this present question; which I shall more particularly insist upon, when I come to discourse of the next Head.

And here by the way, I shall only remember, that there were many Records and Books cited by the counsel at the Bar, to prove the difference between alien enemies, and alien amies; and how these infidels are in law looked upon as perpetual enemies, and the many cases that were cited about the Jews, and others; I think will not be necessary to be farther insisted upon; for I conceive they do not concern the question that is now before us. For were not the Charter now in question, in being, it would be worth while for Mr. Sandys to consider, how far he might be obnoxious to punishment, for trading with infidels, who are in law called perpetui inimici. And therefore I conceive, it is as penal for any of the King's subjects to trade with infidels, who are alien enemies, without a royal licence, as it is to trade with alien amies, contrary to a royal prohibition. And I cannot conjecture how he will avoid this rock, notwithstanding his pretended skill in navigation, without making use of this Charter as a safe conduct to him, by implication; though he seems here so much to struggle against it: and how far that would prevail for his benefit, may be also considered. But as I said before,

4. The true question is, Whether this be a good Grant to the Plaintiffs, of a sole trade to the Indies, were the Inhabitants thereof christians or infidels, exclusive of others?

And therefore I proceed to the next step, That though unlawful engrossing, and Monopolies, are prohibited by the laws of this, and all other Nations; yet I do conceive, that the Charter now in question, of a sole trade exclusive of others, is no such unlawful engrossing, or Monopoly, but is supported and encouraged, as conducing to publick benefit by the Law, Practice and Usage, of this and other Countries. And herein by the way, though the word Monopoly, or Engrossing, generally spoken of is odious in the eye of our Law, yet some Engrossings, and so some Monopolies, are allowed of in our Books; and so I desire to be understood, when I say a lawful or unlawful Monopoly, or a lawful or unlawful Engrossing. And in as much as this is the great, and as I think, the only objection that either hath, or can be made against the present Charter, I shall be the more particular in giving my opinion therein; with the reasons and authorities that have induced me thereunto.

I premise only this, that in all those Countries, where societies of trade are erected by the supreme Power, exclusive of all others, as the case at the Bar, Monopolies are forbidden; and are as severely punished by their laws, as they can be by the Common and Statute Laws of England, (viz.) in Holland, Germany, France and Spain, &c.

And so wherever the Civil Law prevails, Monopolies are punished with confiscation of Goods, and banishment. C. de Monopoliis & Cens. forens. part 1. fol. 497.

Now though Monopolies are forbidden, yet that cannot be understood to be so universally true, (as no general Law can ever be) that it should in no respect, and upon no occasion or emergency whatsoever, admit of any exception or limitation.

The exceptions thereof may be such as these:

1. Though no private Persons can have the sole trade to themselves, by their own private authority, yet this may be granted to a publick society, by the prerogative of the Prince; if,

2. It be upon good cause, and for the publick advantage of the Kingdom.

3. From the necessity of beginning and carrying on such trades and foreign commerce, which can be only done by Companies and Societies.

3. Such Companies and Societies ought to be continued and supported upon the natural equity and justice, that no other persons should be permitted, either to reap the profit, or to endanger the loss of what hath been begun, and been carried on by them, with great hazard and expence.

Now in as much as foreign trade can never be of advantage to this Kingdom, except the ballance be kept equal between this and other Countries; which can never be done, but by keeping up to proportionable rules for the regulation thereof, with the other Countries: And because, as I said before, the municipal laws of this Realm seem too scanty for that purpose, I will therefore first consider how this question stands, as to the Law of Nations; and then how it is considered by our Law, producing authorities in both to make good my assertion. And because I thought the former more natural and effectual for the decision of this question, made me more inquisitive than otherwise I should have been. Cujacius lib. 16. Obser. 23. distinguishes inter Monopolia licita & illicita.

Licetum Monopolium, says he, est, si certis personis vel quod potius est certo Collegio concesserit Princeps ut ei soli jus sit vendendæ certæ mercis; and therefore recites a law of the Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, by which certain Governors of Commerce were appointed; Edictali Lege sancita, ut nulli Mercatori nisi ad designata loca temporibus præstitutis ad negotiationis suæ species distrabendas passim liceret accedere.

Carpzovius, in his decisions before mention'd, lib. 2. Decis 105. N. 13 & 14. makes this no new case; Et certe (non est novum) modum commercii (quæ tamen liberrima esse debent) poni ex causa nimirum publicæ utilitatis vel necessitatis, ex quo Monopolia alias prohibita jure subsistunt.

And again, Exempla haud rara sunt ubi necessitate & Edicto principis Monopolia quandoque probari: Commercia ad certas Personas & Loca restringi videmus.

Idem, Decis. 4. N. 10. & N. 13. Nimirum Exercitium ac permissio Monopoliorum à Principis arbitrio dependet, &c. Scacca de Commerciis Q. 7. fol. 301. N. 15. Hoc non procedit in Monopolio, autoritate Principis sive Reipub. contracto, quia sicut monopolia, privatâ autoritate contracta Reipub. sunt perniciofa: Ita hæc quæ Legis Autoritate, ex justa contrahuntur, Causa Reipub. valde utilia sunt.

Grotius de J. B. & P. lib. 2. cap. 12. Sect. 16. Monopolia non omnia cum jure naturæ pugnant: nam possunt interdum à summa potestate permitti, justa de causa & pretio.

He gives amongst others these two Examples:

1. From the History of Joseph, when he was Vice-roy in Egypt; which is, says he, an illustrious instance of this matter.

2. That under the Romans, the Alexandrians had the sole trade of all Indian and Ethiopic commodities.

So Tbuanus, lib. 32. gives an instance of a Grant from the French King, Ann. 1604. for the sole trade into Canada, or New France; for which he gives this reason, Ne gravis esset ærario ad sublevandos navigationis illinc institutæ sumptus.

Which I conceive will go a great way in supporting all such trading companies as cannot be begun but by a publick expence.

C. de monopolis, the prohibition is expressly limited, Nisi Privilegium vel alia consuetudo in utilitatem publicam vergens resistat.

Mercatura est res indifferens, in qua Magistratus, vel in vetando, vel permittendo suam pro Commodo Reipub. potest interponere autoritatem. Salmast. de Fan. Trapezit. fo. 236. Hoc solum permittum est Regi ut possit prohibere, ne aliis vendat salem. Alciat. in Q. inter publica 17. in Fin. F. de Verb. Sign. as it is at this day practised in France, Tbuan. lib. 5.

Sic in Sale Vendens, Monopolia etiam hodie in Italia licite exerceri è Superiorum permissione. Scacca de Mercat. part. 4. N. 30.

Sic in Repub. Lubecensi, certis quibusdam Mercatoribus ob prædictas rationes jus coquendi sacchari, & salis speciali Privilegio concessum est. Marguard. lib. 4. c. 7. N. 29.

And then as to the usage:

Hæc est communissima omnium, nullo prorsus reluctante Doctorum sententia, quod jura hujusmodi Emporah & Regalia possunt acquiri non modo per Concessionem summi Principis, sed etiam Consuetudine & Præscriptione. Lessius de Justitia, lib. 2. c. 22. Dub. 21.

By the Imperial Laws, commerce and traffick have received several other limitations; sometimes the subjects of the Empire have been forbidden to trade to certain places, particularly named; and in general by other constitutions, forbidden to export coin, gold, or arms, to any of the barbarous Nations.

And that the law or custom of Nations is so, the practice does evince.

And first in Germany, where the Law prohibiteth all Monopolies; yet see how the Law there stands in respect of our case.

Circa Monopolia autem, quæ exercentur adversus Civēs, observandum, non esse illicitum, si non curvis quodvis negotiationis genus exercere conceditur, sed illis duntaxat qui ad idem exercendum juxta instituta Civitatis sibi jus quaesiverunt, quemadmodum in rebus pub. Europæis testâ quedam præstitisse oportet eum, qui Mercatorium aut opificium aliquod tollere vult.

This as to Corporations.

As to trading Societies thus :

Sed & fieri potest, ut à summa potestate Societati mercatorum indulgeatur certum genus Mercium & certis locis advehere, exclusis reliquis, cujus privilegii concedendi variæ possunt esse causæ.

I. Nam Commercia quæ ad loca remotissima instituerentur, priusquam rite stabiliantur magnos requirunt sumptus, & ancipiti eventui initio sunt obnoxia; ergo Auctoribus talium Commerciorum cavendum est, ne quod ab ipsis constitutum magno cum periculo, & sumptu sunt, alii gratis intercipient.

II. Ac præterea ejusmodi Societates privilegiatæ opibus suis Reipub. exigente necessitate, feliciter possunt quam singula succurrere.

III. Videntur etiam meliori fide Commercia tractari, ac majorem Copiam Mercium hoc modo posse advehi, neque de tot fraudibus & compendiis cogitare necessum habent, quorum lucrum in commune velut ærarium redactum equalibus portionibus distribuitur.

Puffendorff de jure Naturæ & Gentium, lib. 5. fol. 655.

A learned Author does more at large describe it.

It has been a question sometimes debated, whether the Society entered into by the Hanse Towns were not against Law, Quippe quod speciem Monopolii præ se ferre videtur, ut certis locis merces emant confederati quæ rursus pretio eo, quo volunt, vendant.

This is the same objection now made against the Charter at the bar.

But the answer given was twofold, and will come home to this case.

I. That the Emperor Charles IV. has given his approbation, and made it lawful by his authority.

II. That they had continued in possession of this Society so long, that now the length of time (together with the Prince's consent) removed all doubt whatsoever; Carpzovius de lege Regia Germanorum, cap. 6. sect. 10. And the Charter now in question, and other Charters of like nature granted by the Kings of England, which I shall have occasion to remember by and by, remained undisturbed without the least interruption, as long as this Society did before this question was stated.

And though, according to the rules of our Laws, such a length of time does not obtain the credit of a prescription; yet by the Law of Nations, and the practices of all other countries, which are only adapted for this purpose, it is otherwise. Prescriptio enim tam longi temporis vim legis obtinet, imo tollit omne vitium.

Prescriptio temporis immemoralis, quæ privilegiata est, & ex vitioso etiam titulo dominium & jus tribuit, omnesque Solemnitates, etiam extrinsecus, negotio accessisse præsumit tanti temporis Antiquitas, num. 10. n. Atque omnem Monopolii respectum consuetudo Immemoralis vel Cæsarum approbatio excludit, n. 10. 26.

Quia consuetudo Immemoralis Cæsarum scitu & concessu hæc antiqua Societas fulcitur, omnis Monopolii respectus etiam minimus læserat. Marg. lib. 4. cap. 7. n. 50.

And as these Hanse Towns were one of the first Corporations of trade I have read of, so was it thought the interest of England to support and encourage them. I find above sixty (some say eighty) Towns and Cities united their Stocks, making Lubeck, Brunswick, Dantzick, and Cullen, the chief places of their residence; and so great was their trade and credit under that constitution, that many Princes granted them large privileges, and they kept Courts by their Deputies and Councils at Bergen.

By the Laws of Spain, all Monopolies are forbidden, and under the same penalties appointed by the Civil Law: yet there also a right may be acquired to a sole trade, by licence obtained from the King, or by Prescription.

Quinta partida Tit. 7. leg. 2. membris hoc Commercium Maritimum exclusi cæteris ad 20. annos concederetur. Neque ulla re se magis prodidit Imperii odium Batavicæ nostris diebus, (Deo ita volente) constituti magnitudo, & felicitas, quam Navigationum in Indias Orientales susceptarum constantia & successus, ad quas ut ærario parceretur, Societates institutæ, cautumque tandem, ut sub unam Societatem omnes coirent, quod aliqui experimento constitisset, Aromatum pretia ab Insularis ob emptorum frequentiam augeri, & cum aliis aliis prævertere, & lucrum ad se aliorum damno derivare satagerent, ubi concordia maxima est opus, æmulationum & dissidii semina spargi.

I come in the next place to make it appear, that as the Law of Nations, and the practice of all other countries, warrants the like Grants and restrictions with the case at the bar; so I conceive this Charter of sole trade to the Indies, excluding others, is neither opposed by the Common Law, or prohibited by any Act of Parliament; but is supported by both, as will more evidently appear by the practice and constant usage in all times.

Therefore, tho' ingrossing be a crime, odious in the Law, and punishable, yet all manner of ingrossing is not.

Therefore in the case of foreign trade, which is only applicable to the case at the bar; it was resolved by all the Judges of England, 3 Instit. 196. That Merchants may buy beyond sea in gross, and sell here again in gross also. I say, that all Monopolies are not unlawful. Generally speaking they are, and therefore, I will admit the description of an unlawful Monopoly, made by my Lord Coke, 3 Instit. 181.

A Monopoly is an institution or allowance by the King, by his Grant, Commission or otherwise, to any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, of, or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using any thing; whereby any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindred in their lawful trade.

Now if the subjects of England had not before this Grant, a freedom and liberty to trade to the Indies, against the King's royal pleasure, the Charter at the bar will be no Monopoly within that rule.

Now that they had no such liberty hath been sufficiently proved by the several prohibitions mentioned before; and the many more instances thereof, cited by Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor; and it would be very strange, that the King might prohibit Foreigners from coming here into England, and not prohibit his own subjects from going into foreign countries.

And it is not denied, but if the King should proclaim a war with the Indians, that then it would be a prohibition to all his subjects to have any commerce with them; nay, and he might continue that war as long as he pleases; and by that means all his subjects would be as well prevented of any of the commodities of that country; and also of exporting any of our commodities thither. So that surely this Charter, with these restrictions, is much better than a total exclusion; and therefore foreign trade is not like our home trade, to which the word Monopolies

Monopolies is properly applicable; for that cannot be totally excluded for any time, tho' never so small, by any Act of Prerogative.

Object. Ay, but, say the Defendant's Counsel, tho' the King can by his prerogative prohibit all trade to any country, upon such great emergencies as war and plague, &c. yet to grant liberty to some, and exclude others, that makes the Grant at the bar be thought a Monopoly. Which is still begging the question; for if the King by his prerogative, have the power of restraining and disposing foreign trade, where Acts of Parliament have not interposed; as by the precedents already cited, I conceive clearly he has, as inherent to his Crown; therefore, as he may restrain all, so he may restrain any part by the same parity of reason.

If the King proclaims a war with any country, which is a general prohibition of trade, and should order that John a Style, or a dozen or any greater number of his subjects, &c. and give them instructions to treat for a peace, and the persons so appointed should carry on a trade; would not Mr. Sandys, do you think, have as much reason to murmur, that he was none of those Ambassadors, as he has now by being not comprized within the Charter? And would it not be thought an arrogancy and sauciness in him, to demand an account of the instruction given by the King to such Ambassadors? Or durst he trade there till a peace were proclaimed with that country?

And the gloss of that Law says, Mercatores non faciant inter Monopolium de re non vendenda nisi pro certo pretio, vel de non exercendo officium nisi per eos recipiatur Officiales & Sacios: Possunt tamen hæc facere cum consensu & scientia Regis & contra facientes perpetuo exulabunt, & eorum bona Regi applicentur. Ex privilegio ergo Regis possunt similiter & consuetudine vel præscriptione, quia quod privilegio acquiritur, etiam præscriptione acquiri potest.

And there quòtes ubi dicitur, quod potest concedi privilegium; quod quis solus piscetur in certa parte Maris, & aliis potest prohiberi.

In France Monopolies are prohibited also, Sub pena Confiscationis corporis & bonorum indiæ. Const. Fr. 1. Art. 191.

Notwithstanding which, there are established several Corporations for trade; I will name but two. Anno 1657, the French King makes a grant of the sole fishery in his Dominions, to a Society, excluding others upon pain that Interlopers shall incur the penalty, de Confiscation, des Vaisseaux & Merchandizes & de dix mille Livres d' Amende. Aytz. vol. 4. pag. 267. And in the year 1664, the East-India Company by his declaration, with an exclusion to all others, like our East-India Company, page 74, 75.

In the United Provinces, the Laws against Monopolies are the same, yet there always were several trading Corporations exclusive of all others. 3 June 1621. in the Charter of the Dutch West-India Company, it is granted thus; And in case any one shall go to, or negotiate in any of the aforesaid places granted to this Company, and without consent of the said Company; it shall be upon pain and forfeiture of such ship and goods, as shall be found to trade in those Coasts and Places, which being presently and on all sides, on the behalf of the said Company, set upon, taken, and forfeited, shall be and remain to the use of the said Company. Aytz. vol. 1. p. 62. sect. 1.

And in case such ships or goods be sold, or fly into lands or havens, the Riggers and Part Owners thereof shall and may be distrained to the value of the said ship and goods.

That the aforesaid Company shall within the said limits make Governors, Officers of War and Justice; and for the other necessary services for the preservation of the places, and maintaining of good order, policy and justice, and the advancement of their trade shall appoint, dispose and displace, and substitute others in their places, as they shall find their affairs do require.

All ships coming to any place where the Company have their Garrison and Government, shall not transport thence any men, goods or money, without leave and consent of the Council, upon the pain and forfeiture of six months wages, &c.

In the Grant to the Dutch India Company, 20 Mar. 1602. that no body, of what quality or condition soever, shall for the space of twenty-one years, pass Eastwards of the Cape of Good Hope, upon forfeiture of ships and goods. Aytz. 1 vol. fol. 157.

That the said Company may appoint governors and officers of war and justice, and for other necessary services, for the preservation of their places and maintenance of good order, policy and justice.

The said officers to take the oath of supremacy to the States-General; and of fidelity, as to what concerns trade and traffick, to the Company.

And afterwards, the 9th of Sept. 1606. a Placaert was publish'd, that no body, directly or indirectly, shall pass or trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, upon pain of death, and forfeiture of their ships or goods, which shall be found to have done or to do so. And tho' they should absent themselves out of the United Provinces, yet the sentence shall go on, and be decreed and executed, with the present confiscation and selling of their goods, actions and credits.

Idem, page 158. and surely the Dutch have been always by us esteem'd, as our greatest and most dangerous rivals in trade.

And as for the reason and necessity of establishing this way of trading by Companies, see the judgment of Tbuanus, lib. Hist. 124 and 130, where making mention of the East-Indies, he saith thus: Diversis itineribus hujus Regionis Incolarumque Ingeniis cognitis tanta frequentia à privatis hæc ipsa Navigatio & Commertium exercitum fuit, ut alter alterum fere ivisset perditum. Ad obviandum itaque huic malo visum fuit, An. 1602. quibusdam hujus Navigationis mercatoribus, præpotentium ordinum consensu certum constituere corpus, ejus tantummodo, &c.

The Indians being Infidels are by law esteem'd common enemies, and the opinion of my Lord Coke in Michelborne's case, I think, therefore, to be Law, notwithstanding the objections that have been made against it, which none of our books warrant; now the King by his Charter makes the Plaintiffs as it were his Ambassadors to concert a peace, and Mr. Sandys murmurs because he is not one of them.

The King may grant a Fair or Market to every subject he has, but because he grants that privilege to some of his subjects, have the rest any just ground of complaint? Because the King may pardon every offender, but will not pardon any Highwayman now in Newgate; must those goal-birds, therefore, think themselves injur'd in their liberty and property? Because the King granted to his town of Hull, that that no other ships should be there freighted for foreign parts, till the ships of that town were first freighted; as he did, Rot. Claus. 41 E. III. memb. 25. did London, Dover, or any other town of trade complain? Would any of these Gentlemen that contend for this liberty of trade, adventure with their fortunes to Algiers, and when they are seized upon by the Algerines, tell them we are Englishmen, and we have by the Common Law of England, and many Statutes of our Kingdom, which support the liberty of the subject, a freedom to trade wherever we please? Or would not they rather say, we have a pass from the King of England, and rely upon that, which presumes treaties, leagues and truces between Princes; and in case that will not prevail, the King will see them righted. And in the Charter that is now before us, there is a particular restriction and limitation of trade to any Prince in amity with our King. Now as the constant usage and practice of other countries warrants such societies as these, so does ours too: For as I said, the Hanse Towns were some of the first Corporations of trade that we read of in history; so was it thought the interest of England to support and encourage them.

King H. III. gave them great privileges and the Still-yards for their residence, which they enjoy'd near 300 years, managing their trade by an Alderman and Council call'd, The Guild of the Hanse, ingrossing the trade of England for Grain, Cables, Masts, Pitch, Tar, &c. and under that colour the Jacobsons at this day claim several privileges.

It is observed by many historians, that the most flourishing trades have been begun by united Stocks and Policies.

In this Kingdom a Patent was first obtained for the erecting the Staple, from E. III. before any Act of Parliament intermeddled in that trade, and proceeded under several regulations till the time of Queen Elizabeth. In the Book I cited before Malyn's Lex Mercatoria, fol. 150. says, this Company of Merchants are above 400 years standing, as that Book reckons from 1248. when the said Merchants obtain'd privileges of John Duke of Brabant; and were call'd, the Brotherhood of St. Thomas Becket of Canterbury: which were confirm'd by King E. III. H. IV. H. V. H. VI. E. IV. R. III. H. VII. who gave them the name of Merchant-Adventurers; and after him confirm'd by H. VIII. E. VI. Q. M. Q. Eliz. and King James, not without many enemies, and opposers; especially, says that Book, of late taxing them to be Monopolies and unprofitable to the Commonwealth, being that all our cloths are not dress'd and dy'd in England; yet it still prevailed, as being thought for the publick good.

And 'tis observable, that Queen Elizabeth did not only confirm what was done by her predecessors, but augmented and greatly enlarg'd the privileges of this ancient Company; and confirm'd the Charter of the Muscovy Company, granted by Philip and Mary; and set up several other Companies, as that of Exeter, mention'd at the bar; the East-India Company, and the Levant and the Eastland Company. And altho' that ancient and beneficial Company of Staplers, was often opposed by particular persons, and complain'd of as a Monopoly intrenching upon the liberty of the subject, in several Parliaments, in the time of H. IV. H. VII. E. VI. and Queen Mary: yet all parties being heard, these complaints were fully answer'd, and the Company's privileges ratified and enlarg'd.

Again, in Queen Elizabeth's time, the Clothiers having prevailed against the Company; the clothing countries were almost quickly ruin'd, and reduc'd to that extremity, that in 29 Eliz. the Lords of the Council sent for the members of that Company desiring them to resume their privileges, and cheerfully to proceed in their society; with assurance of all countenance and assistance from the Government. And in the reign of King James, after several Interlopers had endeavour'd to destroy the Company; the King publish'd his Proclamation to restore the Company to its ancient privileges.

So did King Charles I. 7 Dec. 1634. reciting, "Whereas we have taken into our princely consideration, the manifold benefits that redound to this Kingdom; and finding how much order and government will conduce to the encrease and advancement of the same; we have thought fit, with the advice of our Privy-Council, &c." There he gives an establishment to the Company, and prohibits any to intrude upon their privileges, upon pain of such punishments as the Star-Chamber shall inflict.

Since this, it may be worth consideration, whether the breaking of this Company, has not occasion'd the great decay of our trade in Wool: it being agreeable to reason, that as no Law can be effectual without Courts of Justice to put them in execution; nor a straggling army subsist without discipline: so a straggling trade manag'd by particular persons, whilst every one strives to advance his own private interest, will ruin the trade in general, especially such a hazardous trade as this to the East-Indies, which already hath been so chargeable, and can only be prevented by the conduct and government of a publick society: and surely to look after and settle these matters, properly belongs to the care and prudence of our Governors.

Now I shall observe, how the practice has been both in Queen Elizabeth's time and ever since, and that altho' many Charters like ours at the bar have been granted; and none ever demanded by a judgment in Westminster-hall, or so much as objected against, save only that of the Canary Patent, till this cause at the bar: and tho' several attempts have been made both in Parliament, and in the Courts at Westminster-hall, against Monopolies; yet this Charter, and others of the like nature, were never look'd upon under that character. For instance,

1. A Charter was granted 2 Eliz. to the Merchants of Exeter for the sole trade to France, excluding all other Merchants of Exeter not of that Company; continued undisturbed, and prevailed against a great opposition that was made against it in Parliament. King Edward VI. and King Philip and Mary, having granted a Charter like ours to the Russia Company, which continued in peace till the eighth of Queen Elizabeth; when the Parliament taking notice of that Patent, thought fit to confirm it with all the commendations imaginable; and was so far from thinking it a Monopoly, that it says, the Commonwealth before that time had received great advantages by it; and grants, and inflicts greater and other penalties than were or could be inflicted by the Letters Patent: and it is observable, that there were some Interlopers upon that trade in those days, and had been liable to the forfeitures feitures inflicted by those Letters Patent, and were therefore forced to apply themselves to that Parliament; and did obtain a special Proviso to excuse those forfeitures, which had not that Act of Parliament been made, they had been liable to; which I take to be an authority full, as to the case at the bar.

Queen Elizabeth, during her reign, granted several Charters of the like nature, which pass'd the perusal of her Attorney and Solicitor, learned men in our profession. In the beginning of her reign my Lord Chief-Baron Weston was Solicitor, Sir Gilbert Gerrard Attorney-General, and pass'd those Patents both to the Russia and Exeter Companies. 23 Eliz. my Lord Chief-Justice Popham was Attorney, and the Lord-Chancellor Egerton Solicitor, in whose time some few such Charters were also granted like to this at the bar. And then my Lord Coke was Attorney-General, and my Lord Chief-Baron Fleming Solicitor-General, who approved thereof; and it is observable, that in the 43 and 44 of the Queen, the Parliament took notice of many Patents of Monopolies, as it appears by the Book, cited at the bar; Townsend's Collections, 244, and 245. The Parliament seem'd to be as high as ever they were in any age before, and particularly were incens'd by those Patents. A list of all were brought in by Mr. Secretary Cecil, that were thought grievous or prejudicial to the Commonwealth; and though there were a catalogue of forty or fifty, amongst whom that of Darcy is one, yet the Parliament nor none other complain'd of any Charter granted to Corporations, but they continued undisturbed. And by the way it is not amiss to observe, that Darcy's Patent was not immediately damn'd in Parliament, but referred to take its fate in Westminster-hall; the great reason that guided that Judgment was, the restraint that was put upon the home trade; and so it appears in More's Reports 672. And thus stood these Charters; the China Charter, the Turky Company, the Barbary Company, the Guinea Company, all Charters of sole trade, excluding others, remained in trade during all Queen Elizabeth's time.

But in the third year of King James, was the first Act made for opening a general trade to Spain, Portugal and France, to all the King's subjects; which could not be done in Westminster-hall, as appears by the preamble to that Act; nor does that Act call those Charters Monopolies, or open a free trade to any other parts of the World, but leaves all Charters of foreign trade, save to Spain, Portugal and France, to remain as they did before. And in the 4th of Jac. cap. 9. there is notice taken particularly of the Charter granted to the Exeter Merchants of the sole trade to France; and because it was thought to be damn'd by the general words, of that Statute E. III. yet it is there enacted and declared, that the said Statute of Patents, neither did nor should dissolve, annihilate or impeach the said Charter, or the said Company in any of their privileges, liberties, or immunities granted unto them by the said Charter, any thing contained in that general Act to the contrary, notwithstanding; and from this Act of Parliament, I observe two things:

I. That the Parliament thought that the Charter to Exeter for sole trade to France, exclusive of others, was for the publick benefit, and weal of that City.

II. That the Letters Patent were good in Law, and did not want the assistance of an Act of Parliament to support them; for that Act does not confirm those Letters Patent, but provides only that the Statute 3 Jac. should not by general words be thought to impeach or destroy them. Now had the Parliament thought the Charter void or infirm, they might have confirmed or strengthened it, as the Russia Patent was; but they concluded, that had it not been for the Statute of tertio, the Charter was good to all intents and purposes: and this I take to be full authority in the case at the Bar. But to proceed, the Greenland Patent for sole fishing exclusive of others, granted by Queen Elizabeth, is held good, Rolls, part. 5. fol. 3. Taylors of Ipswich's case, and the case of the Abbot of Westminster, is agreed to be Law; in Darcy's case, More, 673. by Mr. Justice Dodderidge: and by the way he gives good advice to all persons that dispute the King's prerogative; and for the friendship I bear to Mr. Sandys and others that are now in Court, and I think need the advice, I shall read the very words of the Book: he that hews above his hands, chips will fall into his eyes; Et qui Majestatem scrutatur principis, opprimetur splendore ejus.

In King James's time, many Grants like ours were made, but particularly in 7 Jac. the Patent granted to the East-India Company by Queen Elizabeth, was, by the advice of her Council as well as by my Lord Hobart then Attorney-General, and Sir Francis Bacon Solicitor General, confirmed and allowed with the same clauses as the Charter at the Bar; and so remained undisturbed and uninterrupted all King James's reign, and was not thought to be any whit touched or aimed at, by the Proviso in the Statute, 43 Eliz. cap. 1. sect. 9. that Act only pointing at the Monopoly Patents, complain'd of in that Parliament of 43 of the Queen, which I mentioned before. Then comes the Statute so much insisted on by the Defendant's Counsel commonly called the Statute of Monopolies, Stat. 21 Jac. cap. 3. which certainly doth not at all affect the case at the Bar. For first, this Charter is not a general Grant for the sole buying, selling, making, using of any thing within this Realm, which are the very words of the Acts: nor does this Charter give the East-India Company, licence or toleration to do, use, or exercise any thing against the tenor or purport of any Law or Statute, which are the only things provided against by that Act. But the Parliament then seem'd to take the same general care of all such Charters as this at the Bar, as the Parliament did in 3 Jac. of that particular Charter of Exeter; and therefore to the end that those words in the beginning of this Act of Monopolies, might not be thought to extend to Charters to Corporations for trade; there is a Proviso, sect. 9. that that Act should not extend to any Corporations, Companies or Fellowships, &c. erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering any trade or merchandize, but leaves the same as they were before that Act, without any immutation: and it is observable, that the Parliament then thought a general saving sufficient to support those Charters that were then in being, to Corporations for trade and merchandize; but made particular Provisos for the saving of Patents for inland commodities, viz. such as Salt, Gunpowder, Ordnance, Shot, and the like.

So that this Company was in full possession of their privilege of sole trade, exclusive of others, all King James's and King Charles I's time; till all the prerogatives of the Crown were invaded, and the crown'd head too was taken off by Traitors and Rebels. But the providence of God having restored us our King, and re-invested him with all his undoubted prerogatives, as well as restored us to our ancient rights and privileges, and scarce as I may say warm in his Throne, but amongst the other considerations that he had for the publick weal of his subjects, he considers the publick advantage of this Kingdom arising by trade, and amongst them, one of his first thoughts are fixed upon this Company. For 3d of April 1661, he by his Letters Patent taking notice of the Charters of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, granted to the East-India Company, and of the injuries that were done to them by the late troubles; with the advice of his Council, and approbation of Mr. Attorney Palmer, and my Lord-Chancellor Finch, he granted and confirm'd to them all their privileges. The 27th of May, in the 20th of his reign; Lord-Chancellor Finch being Attorney, and my Lord-Keeper that now is, Solicitor, he confirms this Charter; and grants to the East-India Company other privileges, by another Charter in the 28th year of his reign; at which time the Lord-Keeper was Attorney, and Sir William Jones Solicitor; he confirms the former, and grants more privileges: and in the 25th year of his reign, by the Charter now in question, pass'd with the approbation of the present Attorney and Solicitor; men of great ability in their professions, and of whom, were they not present, I should say much more; the Charter to this Company was confirm'd with additional privileges.

Nor has this Charter pass'd only the approbation of his Majesty and Council, since his happy restoration, but the Parliament has likewise taken notice of it; the Statute 14 Car. II. cap. 14. takes notice of it to be of great advantage to the publick. The Stat. of the 29th of this King for poll-money, taxes them with twenty shillings for every hundred pound in Stock. In the great case between Skinner and the East-India-Company, the House of Commons defended them, even to an eruption between the two houses.

Mr. Jenks and some other Linnen-Drapers and Tradesmen of London, taking the advantage of the heats that too frequently possessed the House of Commons of late years, especially against the point of prerogative, did furiously attack the East-India Company, but without any success: and this Company was never assaulted in Westminster-hall till this cause at the Bar. I cannot help therefore this observation, that as the King by his Charter 1667, takes notice, that the Charters granted by Queen Elizabeth and King James remain'd uninterrupted till the late rebellion; so the Interlopers against the King's prerogative in this particular, and the horrid conspirators against the King's life, in this last hellish conspiracy, first appear'd in Westminster-hall about the same time.

As to the objections I have not yet given answer to, I think they are but few: my Lord Coke's opinion, cited by Mr. Pollexfen, 2 Inst. 540. where my Lord observes new things, which with fair pretences prove hurtful to the commonwealth; and amongst them reckons that new Corporations trading into foreign parts and at home; which under the fair pretences of order and government, in conclusion tend to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies; does not at all concern the case at the Bar. For this Charter that hath continu'd for an 100 years without any interruption till of late, can neither be thought a new Corporation, or hindrance of trade; and Sir Edward Coke, when he was Attorney-Gen-ral; and pass this Charter, was as learned in the Law, as he was when he publish'd that Book, and was turned out of being Chief-Justice, did not think this Charter needed that caution.

As to the case of the Canary Patent between Horn and Ivy, that cannot affect the case at the Bar.

I. For first, the Judgment in that case was given upon the point of pleading, and not upon the validity of the Patent.

II. That Patent was in perfect opposition to the Statute, 3 Jac. that open'd a free trade to Spain, and therefore could not be restrained by the King's Letters Patent, but there is no such objection to our case.

The Counsel that argu'd for the Defendant seem'd to allow the Charters to the Virginia, Turky and Eastland Companies, which are exclusive of others, to be good; because they are manag'd by a Regulation, and not by a Joint-Stock, which surely can make no difference: for it is a Grant of a sole trade to them, exclusive of others, as well as the case at the bar. And 'tis as hard to get into the Turky Company, as it is into this; and may be more chargeable: for you cannot be a member of the Turky Company, but you must be a Freeman of the City of London; and makes you liable to all the great offices of charge in that government. But a freedom of the East-India Company may be purchas'd at a much easier rate; the members of the East-India Company are as visible as those of the Turky. And tho' it was said, the East-India Company were sometimes invisible, yet were the Turky Company infected with so many Interlopers as the East-India Company have; they would not appear so glorious and splendid as they now do, and as I heartily wish they may long continue. But the King by this Charter has reserved to himself a power to destroy and alter the whole Charter, or any part thereof, so as to put it into a way of regulation instead of a Joint-stock, in such manner as he shall in his great wisdom think fit; therefore it becomes us in duty and modesty to wait till we receive his further royal pleasure therein. And whereas it was objected at the Bar, because the King cannot lay any imposition upon foreign trade, therefore he cannot restrain it:

I do not know to what end that objection was made, because it does not affect the question at the Bar; but lest it may obtain the effect, that I presume was aim'd at, I think it not amiss to say, that even at this day there is much more may be said in the maintenance of the King's prerogative in Westminster-hall, in that case, than can be offer'd against his prerogative in this. But in as much as that and several other objections against the Charter proceeded from an unreasonable as well as unmannerly mistrust they have of the Crown; I cannot but remember that his sacred Majesty was not so mistrustful of them. For he since his restoration has bestow'd upon his subjects more than all his predecessors, put them all together, since the conquest, ever did. Nay, he in a moment frankly bestowed upon us more than ever he desires he should be trusted with again; for by his act of Indemnity he bestowed upon his subjects their lives, liberties and estates, which were all justly and legally forfeited to him by the late rebellion; the consideration whereof will prevent all fears and jealousies, and promote in all loyal hearts a firm resolution to sacrifice their lives and fortunes, so freely bestowed upon us by him, to maintain the Crown and just Prerogatives thereof; so that it may have a perpetual tual continuance in that royal Family, in a lawful succession; which I heartily pray may be so long as the sun and moon endures.

From what has been said, I hope it doth plainly appear, that since the law of this Land, and the Law of Nature and Nations, allow the power of making Companies to manage traffick, exclusive to all others, to be in the Prince; that this is reckoned to be inter Jura Regalia; that no Act of Parliament does restrain this prerogative; that the practice of all Europe has been accordingly; that particularly such companies have been erected in England, and those companies have been in quiet possession of their privileges, for such a number of years; that they have passed the approbation of many learned men; that they have been thought for the publick advantage of the Nation, by so many Kings and Princes, with the advice of their council both in and out of Parliament; that all Statutes and Authorities of Law that we can meet with in our Books affirm it, and none that I can meet with oppose it;

That the East-India Company have solely run the hazard, and been at great expences,

In discovering places,
Erecting Forts, and keeping Forces,
Settling factories,

And making leagues and treaties abroad;

It would be against natural justice and equity, (which no municipal law can take away) for others to reap the benefit and advantage of all this:

Especially since all this has been occasioned by an Act of the publick, and by the just prerogative of the Crown, under which they claim.

So that now, supposing the matter had been doubtful at the beginning (as yet the contrary is evident) yet after so many years undisputed, and uninterrupted prerogative of the King, and the possession of the Companies pursuant thereunto; and yet the laws having always been open to any subjects who conceived themselves grieved; that speech which Josephus records of King Agrippa, to those Jews, who after many years endeavoured to recover their lost pretence, may be applied to these clamorous Interlopers:

Intempestivum est nunc libertatem concupiscere, olim ne amitteretur certatum oportuit. Non amantes libertatis discendi estis, sed subditi contumaces.

And so the Romans answered Antiochus, (to shew the injustice of his demands) That he required those Cities which his Predecessors for so many years had never enjoyed.

And Queen Elizabeth pleaded against the King of Denmark, for the rights of fishing upon the coasts of Norway and New-Island, That neither his great-grandfather, grandfather, nor father, had exacted any thing for it; and therefore concluded it to be unjust. Cambd. Eliz. sub. ann. 1600.

So that I conclude, the first, and, as I conceive, the only point in this case, that Letters Patent which give licence and liberty to the Plaintiffs to exercise their sole trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, exclusive of all others, is a good Grant in law.

2. I do conceive, that the Defendant trading to the Indies, contrary to this Charter, may be punished by information, at the suit of the King; and that this action by the Plaintiffs, is also well brought; but in as much as I have detained you so long upon the first point, I shall trespass upon your patience but a few words to this.

1. Therefore I conceive, the Plaintiff need not alledge any special damage, no more than the Grantee of a fair, market, or any other franchise.

2. The action is brought, and grounded upon the Grant of the sole and entire trade; which, as I conceive, is a franchise the King may grant, and is like the case of new inventions; upon which Letters Patent actions are brought by every day's experience; and the prohibiting clause is added, only to make the thing more notorious; and that Interlopers, in case they should be prosecuted at the King's suit should be more inexcusable. And until you can imagine there be as many East-India Companies, as there are commoners and school-masters in England, Mary's case, Coke 9, can never be thought an objection. As to the objection in the 11 Rep. 88. Rolls Abridg. part 1. p. 106. Darcy's case, that admitting the Grant or Dispensation to Darcy had been good, for the sole importing of foreign Cards; yet that being only a Dispensation to the Stat. of Ed. 4. and did only exclude Darcy from the penalty of that Act, he could not maintain the action: But if in case that Grant had vested an interest, as our Grant at the Bar does, he might have brought an action, as, my Lord Rolls says in the next paragraph, may be collected out of Darcy's case.

The case upon Patents of new inventions, are full authorities in the case at the Bar: And so is that case of the Abbot of Westminster, wherein the Grant of the market for thirty days, exclusive of others, is particularly set forth in the action. And the Salisbury man that brought cloth to London, and sold the same contrary to that Charter, is prosecuted in an action of trespass upon the case, at the suit of the Abbot; and the writ concludes, (supposing the Grant good) In nostri contemptum & prædicti Abbatis grave damnum ac Fr. & libertatum suarum prædictarum lesionem manifestam; which is an authority full, as to this point.

Upon the whole matter, I am of the same opinion with my brothers; and do conceive, that that Grant to the Plaintiffs of the sole trade to the Indies, exclusive of others, is a good Grant, and that the action is well brought:

And therefore let the Plaintiff take his judgment.

XXXVII. The Lady Ivy's Trial, for great Part of Shadwell, in the County of Middlesex, Die Martis 3 Junii, 1684. Ter. Trin. 36 Car. II. B. R. Before the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys.

Elam Mossam, Plaintiff; versus Dame Theodosia Icy, Defendant.

This Day this Cause came to be tried at the Bar of the Court of King's-Bench, by a special Jury of the County of Middlesex; whose Names follow.

Middlesex Jury.

Sir Reginald Forster , Bart.	Richard Reynell , Esq;
Sir John Cutler , Kt. and Bar.	Ralph Bucknall , Esq;
Sir Goddard Nelborp , Bar.	Thomas Austin , Esq,
Sir Michael Heneage , Knt.	Joseph Dawson , Esq;
Sir William Gulston , Knt.	Thomas Cleve , Esq;
Sir Richard Downton , Knt.	Richard White , Esq;

Who being counted, the Record was read to them by the Clerk of the Papers, in English; and opened by Mr. Holloway, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Serj. Stringer.  A Y it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel in this Cause for the Plaintiff; and the Question will be, whether the Lessor of the Plaintiff, hath a good title to the Tenements in question; which are about three or four hundred tenements, near Radcliffe, in Shadwell Parish; and the ground thereof is, say we,

the ancient Inheritance of the Church of St. Paul's, who have had the possession thereof for four or five hundred years*. We shall prove leases down for some hundreds of years, till we come to that made to the Lessor of the Plaintiff; under whom we claim. We will begin with the last lease of Dean Stillingfleet, 30 Sept. 1678. upon the surrender of the lease made by Dean Sancroft, now Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

Swear Jeffrey Willan, (which was done;) it is a Church-leave, but yet he is a witness to it.

The Lease of 30 Sept. 1678. was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. (Shewing to him another Deed) Did you see that Deed sealed and delivered?

Willan. Yes, Sir.

An Indenture quadripartite made the 25th of March, 1679. 31 Car. II. between Thomas Neale, Esq; the Lady Gold, &c. R ad.

Mr. Att. Gen. We admit the Assignment.

Mr. Serj Stringer. Then we shall prove the Lands in question were always held of the Dean of Paul's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Ay do, shew that these lands in question were so, if you can.

L. C. J. I would not interrupt you, Gentlemen, pray go your own way; but if I mistake not, you had as good begin with 5 Ed. VI. as you did last time, as I remember; I have not indeed my Book I had then, here; I fear we have not overmuch time to waste: we shall want time at the latter end of the cause, therefore pray come close to the merits of the cause.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We will shew it if they require it, they know it well enough.

Mr. Att. Gen. Shew what you can.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. In 5 H. VIII. the Dean of Paul's, Collett, leases to one John Hall.

L. C. J. But it is 5 of Ed. VI. I ask for.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. 23 Feb. 5 Ed. VI. Dean May doth make a lease to Joan Hall, and Marcellus Hall. Then Dean Fecknam, 10 Dec. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. in confideration of a furrender of that lease, lets another lease to Marcellus Hall; and fo it continued till May 1630. and then Dean Donne made a lease for three lives; and upon the furrender of that in 1636, Dean Winnet made a lease to Moor; and in 1640, he made another lease to Winterburn, which was fold to Mr. Neale, and fo came to the Lessor of the Plaintiff. First read this book.

Mr. Att. Gen. What Book is it, Mr. Serjeant?

L. C. J. Ay, tell us what it is; open it before you read it.

*Clerk reads.] A tenement with a water-mill,
cum Pertinentiis—*

L. C. J. What is it you read there?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. It is a Book that belongs to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

L. C. J. What Book is it? How do you prove it to belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's? Then Mr. Spencer was called, but could not readily come in by reason of the Crowd. Mr. Porter was sworn.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Mr. Porter, What say you to this Book?

Porter. Since the beginning of this Suit, this Book was found among the Writings of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

* The State of the question being, Whether the seven acres in Shadwell, was part of the ancient Inheritance of the Dean of St. Paul's, to whom Mr. Neale was Lessee, and so now Lessor of the Plaintiff; or part of Wapping Marsh, that had been decre'd by one Vanderdelf, and after sold to the Stephens's, under whom the Lady Ivy did claim.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago, Sir, upon your oath?

Porter. About a year ago.

L. C. J. That is but a slovenly account of such a Book as this.

Mr. Williams. It is plain, my Lord, it is not a new Book made on purpose.

L. C. J. It is plain, that in this slippery age we live in, it is very easy to make a Book look as old as you would have it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We will go on to the lease made to Marcellus Hall.

Then Mr. Spencer came in and was sworn.

Mr. Williams. Pray, Sir, when first saw you that Book?

Spencer. Seven years ago.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where, Sir?

Spencer. Among the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. What is it you would read in it? an entire lease, or what?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. 'Tis a short note of a lease.

Clerk reads.] A tenement with a water-mill—

L. C. J. See if the Book have any title.

Clerk. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Let me see it, (which was done.)

Mr. Serj. Stringer. The 23d of Feb. 5 Ed. VI.—

L. C. J. You, Spencer, have you seen in any of the Books an entry of any lease made by Dean Collet?

Spencer. I have not observed that I have seen any lease of Dean Collet.

L. C. J. Have you seen any lease made by Dean Collet, in the time of Henry VIII. about any of the Church's lands? I ask you the question, because I observe here in this Paper, in two places here is the Word Dean Collet, writ with another hand than that of the Book; but Nowell is writ with the same hand as the other. And so Nowell seems to have been put for the maker of this lease, as being put upon the top; when in truth he was not Dean till long after. Upon your oath, in whose name was that lease lett that is here spoken of?

Spencer. I know not, my Lord, that is the Book I saw then.

L. C. J. Is this lease in your Book of leases?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, Gentlemen, you did produce before your original Deed of purchase, where is it now?

Mr. Williams. That Book was produced and read at the first trial.

L. C. J. What first trial? not that last Term.

Mr. Williams. It was in Court at that time.

L. C. J. I believe not, you are mistaken in that; for I have brought the notes I took then, and I find no such thing here.

Mr. Att. Gen. They produced then the first purchase of the Dean.

L. C. J. Is there any lease of Henry VIIIth's time in that Book?

Spencer. I do not remember any lease of Henry VIIIth's time of this land; but I have seen that Book ever since I belonged to the Dean's business.

L. C. J. Have you not a Book of the succession of your Deans? When was Collet Dean?

Mr. Williams. In 1505.

L. C. J. When was Nowell Dean?

Mr. Williams. In 1560.

L. C. J. Then I assure you this Book is grandly suspicious.

Mr. Att. Gen. They threaten us with forgeries, and I know not what; I believe it will be found on Mr. Neale's side.

L. C. J. If in case you come and produce a Book, and you value yourselves upon the antiquity of it, as an evidence that this land did belong to the Dean and Chapter, and leased by them, 5 H. VIII. and in that Book Nowell is written by the same Hand as the rest of the Book, as Dean then; but because you find Collet was then Dean, and Nowell not till threescore years after, Nowell is turned by another hand to Collet; it draws a great suspicion certainly upon your Book, as set up for a purpose.

Mr. Williams. It is true, my Lord, if we did that, it were something; but we find an old Book among the evidences of the Church, and we produce it as such; we have not altered it, therefore it cannot be done for our purpose.

L. C. J. Who knows who did it? but done it is.

Mr. Att. Gen. And your title is under the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. Who keeps the evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's?

Spencer. They are kept in the Chapter-house.

L. C. J. I am persuaded there may be an ancient Book, and this may be such an one; but it looks a little untoward in this particular. You, Spencer, did you look upon those two particular passages?

Spencer. No; I did not observe it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. My Lord, our next lease in the Book recites one made by Collet.

Mr. Att. Gen. Come, upon your Oath; did not Mr. Baron, or Mr. Neale, come to search in this Book?

Spencer. Yes, they did.

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. How long ago was that?

Spencer. As to Mr. Baron or Mr. Neale themselves, I did never see them come to search; but some for them have.

Mr. Williams. Do you believe the Book was thus as it is now, before you came at first to it?

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. You say they did not come to search, what did they come for then, to drink?

Spencer. They have come to the Officer, Mr. Porter, but I never saw them search.

Mr. Williams. But I ask you again, was it so when you found it first?

Spencer. I believe it was, I know of no alteration.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. But to put it out of doubt, we have this second lease, which does recite this lease of Collet's.

Mr. North. Nay, my Lord, we have another piece of evidence that will fortify that Book to be true, as to the foundation of it; that such a lease was then made as the Book says: for we have a kind of Particular, or Catalogue of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter. It is an ancient writing—And in this there is mention particularly made of a lease made in 5 H. VIII. Pray, Sir, look upon that, and give an account of it.

Spencer. I have seen this among the rest of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago?

Spencer. I cannot directly tell.

Mr. Pollexfen. How long do you think, upon your oath?

Spencer. Two years ago.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is since this contest.

L. C. J. Ay, that is a little too lately for an ancient writing.

Mr.

Mr. Serj. Lutwich. Did you see it before Mr. Neale or Mr. Baron ordered a search there?

Spencer. I cannot say particularly I did: I have seen this paper—

Mr. Att. Gen. Paper, man? It is a Parchment, pr'ythee mind what thou sayst: How long is it since you first saw that Parchment?

Spencer. I believe I have seen it this seven years; but not that I can swear to have taken any particular notice of it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did you see it first, upon your oath?

Spencer. Among the rest of the Deeds and Evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Upon what occasion did you take notice of it first?

Spencer. Upon searching among the writings.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who did search with you at that time, upon your oath?

Spencer. Mr. Porter.

L. C. J. Read it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it delivered to Mr. Neale before it was brought hither?

Spencer. It is brought here now among the Dean's other writings, we never use to deliver any out.

Clerk reads.] This is dated 2 Eliz. 1559. Books and other writings appertaining.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Now we will read the lease to Marcellus Hall; wherein this is recited to have been made.

(The lease in the Book was read, dated 23 Feb. 5

Ed. VI. for five and forty years, at 10 l. rent.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Then the next lease is in 2 & 3 Phil & Mar. [Which was read.

10 Dec. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. from Dean Fecknam to Marcellus Hall for ninety years from Michaelmas before.

Mr. Att. Gen. There is a licence to alter the mill, which we shall prove he afterwards did.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Your Lordship observes here were grounds, and several houses at this time lett, with the mill, and ponds, and ditches to receive the water. After this, Marcellus Hall assigned to Adrian Moor; he in the year 1618, deviseth it to his Wife Mary Moor; and in 1630, she surrenders, and hath a new lease for lives.

Mr. Att. Gen. Shew your assignments, Mr. Serjeant, from Marcellus Hall.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. That we cannot do, nor need we; for we are not to derive our title that way, but the Church's title is ours. We will shew you Dean Donne's lease to Mary Moor, upon her surrender.

Which lease, dated 14 May, 1630. 6 Car. I. for three lives at 10 l. &c. was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Then Mary Moor, six years after, surrenders this lease, and takes a new lease for three lives in Dean Winneff's time, at 10 l. a year rent, and 40 s. increase.

Which lease dated 5 Aug. 1636. 6 Car. I. was read.

Then another lease dated 5 March, 1640, 16 Car. I by Dean Winneff to Samuel Whitwick, and John Winterburn, at 10 l. the ancient rent, 40 s. before increased, and 4 l. more now increased.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Thus far it stood upon leases for lives: this lease continued till 1669, till Mr. Neale bought this land, and then he renewed it from the now Archbishop, then Dean Sancroft, who raised the rent to 80 l. during the life of Freak, who was the surviving life, and to 100 l. after.

Which lease, dated 12 July, 21 Car. II. 1669. was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We have brought it home now, my Lord, to the Lessor of the Plaintiff: For we have shewn this lease was surrendered to Dean Stillingfleet; and thereupon he made a lease to Garrard and Crasford, which we have given an account of before. And so we have shewn a succession of leases from the Church, for 130 odd years.

L. C. J. The last lease is at the rent of 240 l. a year, I think.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Have you done, Gentlemen?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, we have, till you give us farther occasion, brother.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Then, may it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of counsel in this cause for the Defendant, my Lady Ivy. The Plaintiffs have given you a sort of evidence for a title; but the truth of it is, all that they say will not make a conclusion, such as they would have from their Premises: For all that they have proved, is, that the Deans of Paul's, successively one after another, have made leases. They did in the beginning tell you, they had had this land hundreds of years: But what have they had? and what leases have they made? But only a mill, a bakehouse, a trough of lead, and all houses, lands, meadows and pastures thereto belonging. We do not deny but that they are to have a mill; their leases are all so, even the new ones do mostly follow the track and words that were used in Queen Mary and Henry the eighth's times. But here is the truth of our case: That the Dean and Chapter had a mill, we agree; nay, more than that we agree that they have eighteen acres that lie on the north side of Ratcliffe high-way; and also that they have another parcel of land, called the Lynches. That this may be understood, we now crave leave to deliver maps to the Court and the Jury.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. And we desire ours may be seen too.

Mr. J. Witbins. Ay, deliver in your maps, this is the only fit place for them.

Which was done on both sides.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. Then, my Lord, I will go on. We agree, I say, they had a mill, which is now taken down and put in another place: We shall shew them where it did stand, and that was no part of the land now in question. The Jury have seen the place, and I hope have had a satisfactory view of it. There was once a mill standing, and there was once a pond, but that mill and pond do stand elsewhere. The land in question we say was anciently marsh ground, and subject to the overflowing of the Water, and it is so to this day. In H. VIIIth's time, it was by one Vanderdelf, a Dutchman, drained. This, by Act of Parliament, Richard Hill was made owner of, and he convey'd it to Stepkin, who was the Defendant's ancestor, and whose heir she is. And the boundaries are set down in that, and the subsequent conveyances, which cannot possibly stand with those that their mill is said to stand in. We shall shew by several Records the Queen had a title to it by a conveyance in way of mortgage to her; and this afterwards was conveyed back again to the ancestor of my Lady Ivy. We yield they had a mill, and they have increased the rent sufficiently upon it, not to need other mens land. They have houses built upon it, I know not indeed how much, but I think it is near 1000*l.* a year that it yields to them. If then we can demonstratively shew you where our ground is, and where there's is, and if we affirm our title by Records and good Conveyances; then by a pretence to a mill, I hope they shall not grind us, or take away all our land.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I crave leave to answer the evidence that has been given, before I enter upon our title. They have spent a great deal of time to derive down a title to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, to a mill, a bake-house, and some little ground thereto belonging. And truly, as Mr. Serjeant says, no man ever questioned the Dean and Chapter for their mill, and bake-house, and leaden trough. But the thing in question is, seven acres and an half of land, which in the memory of man was marsh-ground: If you observed it, Gentlemen, upon the view how it lies, you know the North bound is the Dean's Lynches, the South bound is the Thames Wall, the West bound Foxe's-lane, and the East bound is the Hilly ground that is called Cock-bill. And we say as to all this land, it is none of the Dean and Chapter's, nor ever did pass, or was enjoyed by this lease; but we shall shew you it was under another lease. I must observe, that it is very strange upon their own evidence, that a mill, cum Pertinentiis, should pass seven acres of ground; and a mill that was demolished so long ago as in Queen Mary's time, (for so we shall plainly shew you it was) and that these lands, containing so considerable a revenue, should not have a survey taken of them, or a boundary made of the land, that they might know what was theirs, and what their neighbours. For your Lordship and the Jury may observe in all the leases and conveyances down to this time, in Dean Collett's lease, and onward, there was nothing mentioned but a mill with the appurtenances, or a tenement with the appurtenances. But they have not one fixed boundary of their lands; and really it cannot be presumed the Dean and Chapter should be so ignorant. Besides, in the ancient lease that they produce of Ed. VIth's time, there was a covenant to pay the quit-rent, as for lands holden of the manor of Stepney. And we did expect that they would have brought some of the Rolls and Records of that manor; and out of some survey there remaining, would have given a particular testimony of what lands belong to the Dean, and what do not. But in truth, we say this is properly marsh land, for that will be your question, Gentlemen, that you are to try, I believe, at last: Whether these seven acres, thus bounded on Foxe's-lane, West; on the Thames, South; on the hilly way, called Cock-bill, or Mill-ditch, East; and on the Dean and Chapter's Lynches, North, be marsh-ground? The Dean and Chapter have given evidence of some leases, which upon the surrenders were delivered up to them; but there are none produced, they only read the entries in their Books. Now we shall demonstrate that this mill of theirs was an overshot-mill; for there is mention made of a leaden trough, which is the only proper instrument of an overshot mill. Therefore we will first settle (because they themselves will not) what is theirs; and then we doubt not to give you satisfaction that this was never any of theirs, but the undoubted Inheritance of the Stepkins; and not a foot of it belongs to any other man living. But further, since they will not, we shall produce a piece of evidence, which indeed we must thank Mr. Neale for; for he blabbing it about that he had a survey of the manor of Stepney, which would do our work, put us upon searching there for it; and we have it here; and there you will find a particular of all the Dean's lands, under 33*s.* and 4*d.* quit-rent. And the particulars are thus described in that Book, (which shews that there was a tenement that stood by the mill, and that paid a quit-rent, and the other lands came under that quit-rent) Twenty acres, called Shadwell-field, that lieth on the North side of Ratcliff high-way, known at this day; and all this piece of ground, of twenty acres, is built upon and improved; which was one part of the land that came under a quit-rent, but not pretended to be any part of this. The next is five acres, called the Lynches; and it appears by the Record to be but five acres, and so it is measured now. Ratcliff high-way went on the top of the hill, and this is called the Lynch-way, not improved nor built upon; and is exactly abutted according to our Records, and decyphered by acres to an acre. Then comes the third parcel, and that only concerns you to enquire of, whether these seven acres and an half be parcel of that: And that is described in the Record to be a tenement, called Derrick-bills, which is a bake-house with a mill, and the leaden trough, the appurtenances of the mill, at the rent of 33*s.* and 4*d.* These are all the parcels named of the Dean and Chapter's lands. And at the last trial when they produced the deed of purchase, whereby this was conveyed to the Dean, which I think was in H. III's time, it yielded but 3*l.* a year in the whole, and now in time it is come to 2000*l.* a year, without this great gobbet, which they intend now, if they can, to swallow up. And now as to this parcel, all they can claim is but a mill, and in the later leases, it is a house where the mill stood, and that we shall shew by Records where it stood; and it is said to be called Derrick-bills, and situate on the East end of the marsh now in question. And to go a step farther, we shall shew that this was altered in Queen Mary's time; for in 5 E. IV. the Book wherein their lease is, makes mention of the mill as standing; then in 10 Dec. 2 & 3 Ph. & M. there is a kind of mystery which we shall by our evidence unriddle: For then though the tenant had above forty years in being and to come, he must renew his lease from Dean Fecknam at that time. Now we shall shew that the 20th of the same December, this place where the mill then lately stood, was let to John Carter, Oar-maker. There are in that place at this day, lands and houses that yield the Dean and Chapter an hundred pounds a year, distinct from the Lynches and the North ground of Ratcliff high-way, and that is a very good improvement for a mill, and a bake-house, and a leaden trough, and a ditch for the water. Now by their lease in 1630, they recite that the mill was not worth the keeping up, and according to the power given them by the lease, 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. to pull down the mill, it was pull'd down and built upon, and it came to yield them 100*l.* a year, as it doth at this day. After this we shall call witnesses to set forth, that in this place, in the East end of Cock-bill, in the memory of man, there was found the floor of the old mill; and there are those living that can attest it. So we shall shew they are fishing in a wrong pool; they have sufficient to answer their deed of purchase; and all the evidence that hath been given you, will appear to be be only to entertain the Court with an amusing nothing; and to take up the time. But we shall go yet a step further, and shew beyond all peradventure, that this land in question was marsh-ground: And the other side must admit, that if it be marsh-ground, the Dean and Chapter have nothing to do with it, never pretended to a foot of it, nor doth any tittle of their evidence mention marsh-ground. And truly we will admit it to them, if it be not marsh-ground, we have nothing to do with it. So that, Gentlemen, your great question is, Whether this be marsh-ground; or not? And thereupon the main of the question will be about the East boundary alone, and no other: For that Wapping-marsh bounded South on the Thames, North on the Lynches, and West on St. Catherine's, is no question, nor ever was in all the trials that have been. Therefore the only point that the evidence is to be applied unto, is about the Eastern boundary. That we lay to be Cock-Hill, anciently called the Hilly-way, or Mill-bank, now Cock-Hill; and in the Records of Stepney manor, it is called Cornbill: And it is a rising hilly ground, it appears to be so to this day; I appeal to the Jury who have seen it. Now that this was marsh-ground, and the Inheritance of the Stepkins's, we shall prove by these steps. First, we shall produce an Act of Parliament made in 27 Hen. VIII. wherein the bounds appear to be plainly the same as now we say they are at this day; only now it is all built, that is all the difference; and the marsh doth thereby contain 130 acres. Now by that Act, the whole marsh is vested, as to one moiety, in Richard Hill, as assignee of Vanderdelf the Dutchman, who had drained it, and for his pains was to have one half; and he agreed with the participators, among whom Stepkins was one, and had 53 acres, and particularly this land. So that the Dean of Paul's must derive a title from this Act, if he will have the land. But we shall shew how they colour their possession. Afterwards Richard Hill, 11 Nov. 37 H. VIII. he doth make a lease to the Dean and Chapter's miller, and that for thirty-four years, wherein you will exactly see the boundaries of the Act are pursued. After he had leased it to the Dean's miller, he passeth away the inheritance to Thomas Stepkins, in time, 16 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. Marcellus Hall the miller, after Stepkins had obtained the inheritance upon agreement between them, gets a lease from Stepkins of 128 years of the lands in question, as you may see by the bounds they are exactly the same; and this was in time 20 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. So the miller had now ground on both sides the way that is called Cock-bill; on the East side by lease from Hill, on the West side by lease from Stepkins. Then in point of time we shall come to shew the lease made to Roper. For Marcellus Hall, after he had taken this long lease from Stepkins, 30 Nov. 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. doth demise the land in question to Richard Roper, for twenty-four years; and we shall shew that in all the Queen's time Roper was tenant. Then Jasper Hill, who was the Heir of Richard Hill, in 12 Nov. 5 & 6 Ph. & M. by deed, and afterwards 3 Eliz. by fine and common recovery, conveys all these lands particularly by name, and releaseth them to John and Macheline Stepkin, and the heirs of John; and so lodged the inheritance in the Stepkins's, all but that which was thus out in a long lease to Marcellus Hall. We shall prove that before Richard Hill died, he entered into a Statute to Vivold and Salvago, for a great sum of money; and this statute comes to be extended 3 Eliz. and there this land notwithstanding these leases, is seized and extended as Hill's lands. We shall shew all this land upon a commission of sewers, had a survey taken of it. When we have shewn all these Records, and proved that this is marsh-ground, and not a witness of theirs but must acknowledge it to be marsh-ground (for that part of Fox's-lane, was raised at least nine foot, and so proportionably was the rest of the ground; and it appears at this day, that upon a high tide all their cellars are overflowed) I think then you will make no doubt, whether this be our land or no: And to proceed in this order that I have opened, we will first shew you the survey. There was one thing I forgot about the eleven acres—

Mr. Ser. Stringer. What is it you read first, Sir?

L. C. J. What do you begin with, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. Your Lordship observes they shew a lease from Dean Fecknam, the 10 Dec. 2 & 3 of Ph. & M. Now on the 22 Dec. in the same year, we shall shew Marcellus Hall, by lease to Carter, butts it upon the East side of the mill.

L. C. J. I took the notes the last time of your evidence, and it began in H. VIIIth's time.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, when we come to our title, we shall go on in the same method we did then; but now we are only shewing where the lands are.

L. C. J. Go your own way.

Clerks reads.] This Indenture, made the 22d day of December, in the second and third years of the reigns of our sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jerusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the faith, Arch-Dukes of Austria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millain and Brabant; Counts of Hapsburg, Flanders, and Tyrol; between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter of Ratcliffe, oar-maker of Stebunbeath, of the other part; witnesseth, That the said Marcellus Hall hath demised, granted, and to farm lett unto the said John Carter, that his wharf lying in Ratcliff, where late the mill stood, called Ratcliff-mill, adjoining on the West upon the East side of the mill-ditch, alias the mill-dam, reaching from thence Eastward 30 foot; and from the North-East corner of the said mill-dam, Southward to the River of Thames, 20 foot; to have and to hold, all and whole the said wharf, as is before specified, with all commodities and profits belonging to the same, to the said John Carter, to his heirs, executors, and assigns, from the feast of St. Mary the Virgin, immediately following the date of these presents, until the end and term of 30 years.

L. C. J. This lease was read the last time.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Yes, it was so, my Lord.

Clerk reads.] — to be fully compleat and ended, yielding and paying therefore for the same, unto the said Marcellus Hall, his heirs, executors, and assigns, ten shillings of lawful money of England, yearly; that is to say, at the feast of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin. And if it happen the said rent to be behind and unpaid at the said feast, in part or in all, by the space of one fortnight, and lawfully asked of the said John Carter, his executors, and assigns, then it shall be lawful to the said Marcellus Hall, his heirs, executors, and assigns, to distrain for his said rent so being behind, and the distress so taken, to keep until such time as the said rent with the arrearages, be fully satisfied and paid.—

L. C. J.

L. C. J. For how many years is that?

Mr. Att. Gen. Thirty years.

L. C. J. What is demised by this lease?

Mr. Att. Gen. Read the Particulars again.

Sir J. Trevor. My Lord, we would gladly know where they had this lease, that so it may appear whence it came; for we know they have an excellent art at finding out of Deeds.

L. J. C. Ay, come, shew where you had it. Let me see it.

Mr. Att. Gen. We did produce it at the last trial, and at the first too.

L. C. J. But that this Jury knows nothing of, and they call for some account of it on the other side.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Knowles, do you know any thing of that Deed? When did you first see it?

Mr. Williams. And where had you it?

Knowles. My Lord, I had it in a garret, in a kind of a nook, about six foot long, and three foot and an half wide, in my own house, in the garret among other writings.

L. C. J. How came you to have them?

Knowles. As I was Executor to Winterburn.

Mr. Powis. Pray Mr. Knowles, will you tell upon what occasion you looked there and found them?

Mr. Serj. Pemb. Ay, pray give an account of the whole.

Knowles. My Lord, upon the 2d of August, 1682, was the first time I ever saw my Lady Ivy to my knowledge; and she was informed by one Mr. Vicarar, that I had several writings of Winterburn's: I told her I had so, and my Lady desired me to search among them, if there were any writings that concerned Stepkins's estate; I told her it would take up a month's time to look them all over, for there was a great quantity of them. She said, I would do her a great kindness, if I would look; I promised her I would: And upon the fourth of September, I think I found the Deed.

L. C. J. How was Winterburn concerned?

Mr. Att. Gen. They have shewn that he was owner of the land once.

Mr. Williams. Did you ever read over that lease?

L. C. J. I ask you again, how was Winterburn concerned?

Knowles. He was partner with Wright, who sold the estate to Mr. Neale.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Wright sold it to Neale, Winterburn died, and this man was his Executor, and so he came to the writings.

Mr. Att. Gen. But pray, Mr. Knowles, tell us, were these writings ever shewn to Mr. Neale?

Knowles. In the year 1669, when Mr. Neale bought this Estate of my Uncle Wright, the writings were all to be looked over; and upon Mr. Neale's request, all the writings were sent to his counsel, a Gentleman in Gray's-Inn, one Cage, I think his name was, or something like it; and there they were left three months, and I believe in my soul that Deed was among them.

Mr. Att. Gen. Were they brought back again?

Knowles. There were two hampers brought back.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had you any discourse with Mr. Neale about this business?

Knowles. I was arrested upon his account in an action of 2000*l.* and he presently after came and got me off from that action, and told me, Mr. Knowles, I am sorry you were arrested upon my account. So am I too, Sir, said I; said he, I do believe really you found that Deed; I did so, Sir, said I: But says he, pray will you answer me one question seriously? That I will, two or three, if I can, Sir, said I. Says he, did not my Lady Ivy, or Banister, foist the Deed into your house? No, said I, for before ever I saw either of them, I had seen that Deed. Then I am undone, said he.

Mr. Williams. Who was by, pray, when this discourse past between you and Mr. Neale?

Knowles. There was none but he and I.

Mr. Williams. It was at the tavern; Mr. Neale, I suppose, will not deny this.

L. J. C. Will he not? Will you take his word for it?

Knowles. I do say, I found that Deed there.

L. C. J. Read it; read the demise. But, Mr. Knowles, let me ask you a question or two: As I understood, you said my Lady Ivy desired you to look among Winterburn's writings, for deeds that concerned Stepkins's Estate?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. J. C. Where was that?

Knowles. That was at her house.

L. C. J. And when did you find this deed?

Knowles. I found the deed in September, before any body came to look with me, or was in the place with me.

L. C. J. Was there any body with you, when you found the deed?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Then you found it yourself.

Knowles. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you read it?

Knowles. I did the outside; what was I concerned further?

L. C. J. Nay, do not be angry; when thou art most calm, thou speakest so fast a man can scarce understand thee; answer my question fairly: you say you read it, what part was it you read?

Knowles. The backside, the outside.

Mr. Williams. There is nothing writ upon the outside.

L. C. J. How did you gather by reading the outside, that it concerned my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. I only read Stepkins's name.

L. C. J. Stepkins's name, you say?

Knowles. What deed do you ask me upon?

L. C. J. That deed, the only deed you have seen here. What is your christian name?

Knowles. Stephen Knowles.

L. C. J. If I mistook you, I beg your pardon; our question is concerning this very deed now shewn to you.

Knowles. I thought you had meant the lease of 128 years.

L. C. J. Well then, let that pass for a mistake; I would know of you now something concerning this deed. Look upon it—(which he did)—upon your oath, when saw you that deed first?

Knowles. I cannot say what day it was.

L. C. J. But, look you, if I mistook you not (if I did, I ask your pardon again) did not you say you found that very deed among a great many other writings of Winterburn's, in a room, so many foot long, and so many foot wide, in your garret? Did not you say, that in time you saw my Lady Ivy first, upon the 2d of August, 82, that you found that deed in September following? And did not you tell us, that you did believe in your conscience, that in the year 1669, Mr. Neale had this writing among others, sent to the chamber of such a Gentleman in Grays-Inn; that they remained there three months, months, and then were brought back again to you ; and you believe in your conscience this was one of them ? And did not you say, when I asked you, how you came to know this belonged to my Lady Ivy ; you said, because my Lady Ivy had spoke to you, to look if there was any thing belonging to Stepkins, and you read the outside of the deed, and found Stepkins's name, and so you knew it to concern her ? Did not you say all this ?

Knowles. I believe I did.

L. C. J. Now tell me then by the outside of that deed, how thou canst tell that it belonged to Stepkins ; for if thou canst, thou art more crafty than any body here, I believe.

Knowles. I thought it had been the long lease, for that has Stepkins on the outside.

L. C. J. Well, let that pass for a mistake ; we must now begin again upon a new matter. When first saw you that deed ?

Knowles. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. How do you know that ?

Knowles. I put my hand to it.

L. C. J. Did you read the inside of that deed ?

Knowles. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Look you then, we ask you how you came to know it was a deed belonging to Stepkins ?

Knowles. I read the backside, and put my hand to it.

L. C. J. How came you to put your hand to this deed as belonging to Stepkins, when you never looked into the deed ?

Knowles. When I found this deed to have written upon it, Marcellus Hall, I did believe it was something that concerned the Stepkins's.

L. C. J. Let us see the deed now—(which was done)—You say that was the reason upon your oath ?

Knowles. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Then look upon it again, and do not be surprized ; but let us have the truth come out, in God's name. Was that the reason ?

Knowles. It was, my Lord.

L. C. J. I would fain see Mr. Sutton, I have a question to ask him.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is here, my Lord.

L. C. J. Give Mr. Sutton his oath—(which was done)—Look upon the outside of that deed, and upon your oath tell us whose hand-writing that is.

Sutton. All but the word (Lease) is my hand-writing.

L. C. J. Are not the words Marcellus Hall all of your hand-writing ?

Sutton. It is.

L. C. J. Then how couldst thou know this to belong to the Stepkins's by the words Marcellus Hall, when you first discovered this deed in September, 1682 ; and you found it by yourself, and put your hand to it ; and yet that Marcellus Hall be written by Mr. Sutton, which must be after that time ?

Mr. Att. Gen. He says he knows it, because he put his hand to it ; I suppose he read somewhat of the inside.

L. C. J. He said the backside, the outside ; he did not read the inside.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, I desire our evidence may not be anticipated.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I would not anticipate your evidence ; but I must tell you by the way, your evidence anticipate themselves : And this fellow Knowles, without any more ado, has proved himself an errant notorious knave. And if your evidence will blunder and spoil themselves, I cannot tell how to help it. I knew, as soon as I saw the deed, that that was Sutton's hand ; I know his hand, as well as that you are Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray, my Lord, give me leave to ask him a question, which I hope may clear all this matter, for it is plain the man is mistaken.

L. C. J. Mistaken ! Yes, I assure you very grossly. Ask him what questions you will ; but if he should swear as long as Sir Jahn Falskaffe fought, I would never believe a word he says.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you look into the middle of one of the deeds ?

Knowles. Yes, I did.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Can you tell which you looked into the inside of, and which you did not ?

Knowles. The lease and some others I did, but I cannot particularly tell.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then, my Lord, here is the case : Here are multitudes of deeds, and a man looks on the inside of some, and the outside of others ; is it possible for a man to speak positively to all the particular deeds, without being liable to mistake ?

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, you say well ; if he had said, I looked upon the outside of some, and the inside of others, and wherever I saw either on the outside, or in the inside, the name of Stepkins, or Marcellus Hall, I laid them by, and thought they might concern my Lady Ivy ; that had been something. But when he comes to be asked about this particular deed, and he upon his oath shall declare that to be the reason why he thought it belonged to Stepkins, because of the name of Marcellus Hall on the outside, and never read any part of the inside, when Sutton swears Marcellus Hall was written by him, what would you have a man say ?

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I have but this to say ; if there were never a deed delivered by Knowles to my Lady Ivy, or Sutton, where Marcellus Hall's name was written on the backside of it, but by Mr. Sutton ; I confess it were a strong objection. But where there are other deeds, and a great many, a man may easily be mistaken. It is impossible for any man in a multitude of deeds that he finds among a great parcel, and delivers many of them out, to take it upon his memory particularly, which he looked on the inside of, and which he looked on the backside or outside of.

L. C. J. Did not he give it as a particular reason of his knowledge, that they belonged to my Lady Ivy : For wherever he saw Marcellus Hall, or Stepkins, he thought that belonged to her.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Wherever he saw those names, that is, either in the inside or outside.

L. C. J. Under favour, Sir, he did not say so ; but positively said, he knew it by that name. And you shall never argue me into a belief, that it is impossible for a man to give a true reason, if he have one, for his remembrance of a thing.

Mr. Sol. Gen. I beg your pardon, my Lord ; as I apprehend him, he swore he looked into the inside of some, and the outside of others, and there were a great many of them.

L. C. J. And I beg your pardon, Mr. Solicitor, I know what he swore as well as any body else ; if indeed he had sworn cautiously, and with care, it might have been taken for a slip, or a mistake.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we must leave it upon its own weight ; but we are not come to our title yet : I have the deed in my hand, which is a very old one, and therefore needs not such exact proof.

He

He is mistaken, we do own it; and I must appeal to the Court, whether a man may not be mistaken in a great multitude of deeds.

L. C. J. Well now, after all this is done, let him give an account how he came to know this to belong to Stepkins, or my Lady Ivy, if he can. I speak it not to prejudice your cause, but only to have the truth come out. But for the witness that swears, it may affect him, I assure you. Give him the deed, and let him look upon it—Look upon the inside, and look upon the outside too.

Knowles, I believe, my Lord, upon better consideration, I have read this deed before now.

L. C. J. Very well; and yet you swore the contrary just now.

Knowles. I was in a maze, my Lord.

L. C. J. I am sure thou swore wildly.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray what deed did you take it to be at first?

Knowles. The lease of 128 Years.

L. C. J. Pr'ythee read it now to us.

Knowles. Reads.—This Indenture made the 22d day of Dec.—

L. C. J. Between whom?

Knowles. Reads.—Between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter, oar-maker, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said Marcellus Hall hath demised, granted, and to farm letten to the said John Carter, all that wharf lying in Ratcliff, where late a mill stood, called Ratcliff-mill.—

L. C. J. Can you say you ever read so much before?

Knowles. I believe I did.

L. C. J. When was it?

Knowles. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. Then you read it before you shewed it to my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. And you found what the contents were by reading?

Knowles. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did you read it through?

Knowles. No, I did not, I believe.

L. C. J. How far do you think you read?

Knowles. As far as I have read now.

L. C. J. Did you find any thing there of the name of Stepkins?

Knowles. No, not in that I did not.

L. C. J. I would desire to know of you, who it was that came to my Lady Ivy, to inform her you had such and such writings?

Knowles. It was one Mr. Vicar, about a trial that was to have been two or three years ago, at the bar of the Court of King's-Bench here; but the cause did not then go on: After that, Mr. Vicar did tell my Lady, that one Knowles had a great company of writings that were Winterburn's; and she desired him that he would please to talk with me, to see if I could do her any kindness or service in any of those deeds. The first time that I saw her was the 2d of August, as near as I can remember, and then I told her, I was Executor to Winterburn, and had a great many writings; said she, do you know the hand of Stepkins? if you do, and can find any writings that relate to Stepkins, you will do me a great kindness.

L. C. J. Did she name any body else to you?

Knowles. She named one Lun, and one Barker, and one Holder, and several others; I do not remember all.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of one Collet?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Was there of one Donne?

Knowles. Of one Lun there was.

L. C. J. Of one Fecknam?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Of one May?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Of one Joan Hall?

Knowles. No.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of any Hall?

Knowles. Yes, there was.

L. J. C. What Hall did she speak of?

Knowles. I am not certain whether any Hall was named or no.

Mr. Att. Gen. He says, he is sure there was of Stepkins, and several others, but not of any Hall.

L. C. J. He does so, Mr. Attorney. But now I would ask him this question; If there were no mention of any Hall, how came you to find out that this lease from Marcellus Hall to Carter should affect Stepkins, or my Lady Ivy?

Knowles. My Lord, I will give you an account of that.

L. J. C. Ay, do if you can.

Knowles. This was at the first time that I saw my Lady Ivy, that this discourse was between us; upon another discourse at another time, Hall was mentioned to me.

L. C. J. How many names did she tell you of at first?

Knowles. I cannot remember them all.

L. C. J. He remembers as punctually as can be the 2d of August to be the first time that ever he saw my Lady Ivy; and then she spoke to him of looking for writings that concerned Stepkins, and Lun, and Barker; and he remembers such a day, the fourth of Sept. 1682. he found the deeds; but he will not give any account how he came to know by Hall's name, that this belonged to Stepkins. I would fain know when you first heard of the name of the Halls?

Knowles. It was all within a month's time.

L. C. J. Who was it first spoke to you to enquire about the Halls?

Knowles. My Lady Ivy spoke to me about Hall when I gave her account of some deeds I had found.

L. C. J. How often did you look over the writings?

Knowles. Several times.

L. C. J. The first time did you give my Lady Ivy an account that you had found any thing?

Knowles. Yes, I gave her an account of the lease of 128 years.

L. C. J. Did you find nothing else but that?

Knowles. Yes.

L. J. C. What did you find else?

Knowles. Several: I cannot give an account of all.

L. C. J. Did you find that lease, or this deed first?

Knowles. The lease.

L. C. J. When did you first find this deed?

Knowles. The 4th of September I found the lease, and within fourteen or fifteen days after I found the rest.

L. C. J. How many deeds did you find out?

Knowles. Half a score.

L. C. J. Who was by when you found the deeds the second time.

Knowles.

Knowles. When I had found the lease for 128 years, I laid it by, and looked further for other things, and found a mortgage which concerned myself, and that made me more eager to look for what might concern me besides; that I was not so careful as I should have been of the lease of 128 years, but mixed it among the writings again: but I told my Lady I had found such a deed, and she ordered Mr. Banister to help me to find it again.

L. C. J. Prythee answer me once more? Who first put you in mind of looking after the Halls?

Knowles. My Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Was any body by, when she spoke to you to look after the Halls?

Knowles. Yes Mr. Banister was by.

L. C. J. Who else?

Knowles. Several of my Lady's servants.

L. C. J. Name some of them that were by.

Knowles. There was Mr. Banister's wife and his daughter by.

L. C. J. What day was it my Lady Ivy first spoke to you to look after the Halls?

Knowles. Within a week after I first saw her.

L. C. J. Was it before you found the lease, you speak of?

Knowles. Yes, it was before.

L. C. J. How comes it to pass then, that you did not find it at the first looking, which was the 4th of September, when you found that lease, you say?

Mr. Att. Gen. We must lay aside the testimony of this man.

L. C. J. Ay, so you had need.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray leave the deed in Court, we shall have Mr. Neale too busy with it else.

Mr. Att. Gen. We shall desire your Lordship to consider all the use we make of this deed is to prove, that the mill was removed to another place.

L. C. J. I do not know what it proves, but if you had kept your witness Knowles, in the mill, I think you had done better than brought him hither.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Banister and Mr. Clerk. (which was done.)

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you examine that with the Roll, Sir? (shewing him a paper.)

Mr. Clerk. Yes Sir, I did examine that with the Book that Mr. Northy shewed me; I think they say he is steward of the manor of Stepney; he read in the book, and I read the copy; and it is a true copy of a survey of that manor, taken 25 Eliz.

Mr. Att. Gen. I heard say you have the books of the manor here, pray let them be produced.

Mr. Williams. You are merry Mr. Attorney, if it is a true copy, pray let it be read.

Clerk reads.] The Dean of St Paul's holds freely of fee or field, containing by estimation—

L. C. J. Who is Lord of the manor of Stepney now?

Mr. Powis. My Lady Wentworth is Lady of the manor.

Clerk reads.] The Dean of St. Paul's holds—

L. C. J. This bounds it on the East, on the Dean and Chapter of Paul's lands, and so doth you no good.

Mr. Williams. Let them go on, my Lord.

Mr. Att. Gen. With submission, these are our exact boundaries.

L. C. J. Well go on.

Mr. Att. Gen. We shall go on; and with submission these bounds exactly agree with the bounds that are set by the Act of Parliament for draining the marsh. Here is nothing that we can see that they can claim but a mill and bake-house, and they are all bounded on the West by Wall Marsh; and the Lynches are bounded in part upon the North, and in part upon the West; and there was a little part of the marsh did run into the North bounds. But now we shall come to our evidence; and first we shall shew the Act of Parliament.

VOL. VII.

Which being Anno 22, H. 8. was read.

Mr. Att. Gen. Next we shall shew Richard Hill's conveyance by mortgage, to Vivold and Salvago.

Which Indenture of Mortgage was read.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the eighth day of November, in the 32d year of our sovereign Lord King Henry the eighth, between Richard Hill citizen and mercer of London, on the one party, and Anthony Vivold, and Henry Salvago, Merchants. of the other party; witnesseth, That where the said Richard before time was indebted unto the said Anthony Vivold, and H. Salvago in the sum of 560 l. of lawful money of England, whereof they are of their free will have pardoned 280 l.

The said Richard Hill by these presents

All that moiety of marsh ground being 130 acres, lying and being that is to say, from Ratcliffe mill, that joins to the Hilly Lynch to Ratcliffe Town, on the party of the East; to Grass Mill by the Hermitage, on the party of the West; on the high-way, leading from London to Ratcliffe on the part of the North; and on the river of Thames, on the party of the South given and assured to the said Richard Hill, by authority of Parliament in the 27th year of the most noble Reign to have and to hold—

Mr. Att. Gen. This doth vest the lands in question, with others, in Vivold and Salvago, as a security for their money.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now we shall shew a lease from Hill to Marcellus Hall.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the eleventh day of November, in the thirty seventh year of the Reign of Henry the eighth; between Richard Hill, citizen and mercer of London, of the one party, and Marcellus Hall of Ratcliffe, miller, of the other party; witnesseth, that the said Richard Hill, for the sum of six pounds of lawful money of England, to him in hand paid, at the enfealing and delivery hereof, whereof the said Richard Hill hereby acknowledgeth himself to be fully satisfied, contented and paid; and whereof he doth clearly acquit and discharge the said Marcellus Hall, his Executors and Administrators by these presents, hath demised, granted, and to farm letten, and by these presents doth demise, grant, and to farm let unto the said Marcellus Hall, a parcel of marsh-ground, lying and being at the East end of the marsh that butts on Ratcliffe hilly marsh wall-bank, or wall belonging and the well Shadwell, containing by estimation eleven acres and a half, more or less, abutting on Thames Wall, on the party of the South; to the lands called the Dean's Lynches, on the party of the North; and on the wall that reaches from the Lynches to the Island, by the pond on the West; with all the foreland and soil. All which marsh-land is in the Parish of Steubunbeath to have and to hold the the marsh-land foreland and soil to the said Marcellus Hall, from the feast of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin next coming, for thirty and four years—

Mr. Att. Gen. This was a lease made to their miller, and contains eleven acres and half an acre, which we shall shew is just exactly the contents of our land. Next then we shall come to the conveyance made to Thomas Stepkins, which will bring us to our title.

L. C. J. Read the reservation of that lease.

Clerk reads.] Yielding and paying therefore yearly, and every year unto the said Richard Hill, his Executors and Assigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, at four terms of the year, that is to say, the feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Michael the Archangel, the Birth of our Lord, and the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Pray, my Lord, we desire they may give some account of this lease, where they had it and how they came by it.

Mr. Att. Gen. You have had it in your hands, you see what it is.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Yes, and therefore we desire to know something about it, because we find Knowles's hand to it.

Mr. Att. Gen. We can give you a better account of it than you think for, but that will let you into an hour's wrangle more, which is all you have to say for your selves. We have it, disprove it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You have it we see; but remember you will give no account where you had it. But then we desire to ask Mr. Knowles a question, Whether my Lady Ivy was with him—

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we desire we may go on and give our evidence intire; they would fain break in upon us, and take up another hour in quarrelling with our witness. When we hear them in their time offer to impeach the validity of the deed, then will be our time to justify it; and I doubt not but we shall give a satisfactory account of it. Pray will you give an account of the deed you snap'd up the last time.

L. C. J. Nay, nay, Gentlemen, we cannot take up our time in your dialogues and little heats. Do you not hinder them, and we shall see they shall not hinder you when it comes to your turn.

Clerk. This deed hath been read for the Plaintiff and Defendant, and is marked so.

Mr. Att. Gen. It has been twice read before.

L. C. J. Well, will you go on, Gentlemen?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then we shall shew this deed-poll next.

Clerk. This is also marked to have been read twice. (Reads) This is dated 16 Apr. in the 6th year of King Edward the 6th.

To all faithful People to whom this present writing shall come, I Richard Hill, citizen and mercer of London, send greeting in our Lord God everlasting. Know ye that I the said Richard Hill, for the sum of one hundred and thirty pounds of lawful money of England, by Thomas Stepkins, alias Stipkin, of the Parish of St. Mary Matfellow alias Whitechappel, in the County of Middlesex, beer-brewer, unto me the said Richard Hill in hand paid, wherewith I confess myself to be well and truly satisfied.

L. C. J. Upon whose account is it that my brother Gregory comes here?

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, Mr. Baron Gre- gory was desired by the Plaintiff to be here; and as soon as we come to our reply, we shall ask him some questions; if he please to stay, we will dispatch him so soon as we can.

Mr. Att. Gen. Nay rather than trouble Mr. Baron to stay, we yield he should be examined now.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I am not in so much haste, my Lord, but I can stay a while, and not break in upon the middle of an evidence for me.

L. C. J. If you please, they consent you may be examined, and they may be long.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I would not interrupt the course of evidence.

L. C. J. Nay, we will take you at your word; but if it be long, pray remember we would have cased you, but you complimented yourself out of it; now you are like to abide by it a while, I assure you, brother. Go on.

Clerk reads.] And do therefore acquit and exonerate the said Thomas Stepkins alias Stipkin, his have given, enfeoffed, sold, granted, and by this my present writing confirmed, all those my four and twenty acres and a half of marsh-land, measured by the rod or pole, lying in Wapping-marsh

Three acres of which are lying adjoining on the West side of the mill that butts upon the hilly bank, or way leading to Ratcliff Town, called Ratcliff-mill, with the bank or wall thereunto belonging, and the well adjoining to the way that goeth up to the Lynches, called Shadwell, lying in the East end of the marsh, and all the next piece West adjoining to the same, containing by estimation one acre, and the pond and two acres adjoining on the West side, six acres lying in the bottom of the hilly Lynches, adjoining North-west on the wall that reaches from the Lynches to the Island by the pond. All which eleven acres and a half of marsh-land, are in the holding of Marcellus Hall, miller, and also the bank, or wall-flood, or pond, adjoining west on the said eleven acres and a half, containing by estimation of measure, two acres; and also all that parcel late divided into two, and now late in the tenure of Richard Hill, butcher, containing by estimation of measure, six acres; and also all that parcel west, adjoining to the six acres, which I the said Richard Hill hold in my own hand; and also that is to say, all that parcel with the bank or wall

Island and Pond, containing by estimation of measure, five acres; which last thirteen acres I bought of, and had conveyed to me and my heirs, from one John St.

All which four and twenty acres and a half, more or less of marsh-land, abutteth on the Thames wall, on the part of the South; to the lands of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, called the Lynches, on the part of the North; on the aforesaid mill, on the part of the East; and on twenty acres of the said Thomas Stipkin, on the part of the west. And also all the Thames bank or wall, belonging to the said four and twenty acres and an half of marsh-land; which said piece or parcel of wall, doth abut on the south end of the said on part of the east, and on the bank or wall in the occupying of William Knevet, on the part of the west. All which marsh-land, bank or wall are in the east end of Wapping marsh, abutting on the aforesaid mill, and hilly bank aforesaid, in the way leading to the Town of Ratcliff aforesaid. And which four and twenty acres are part and parcel of one hundred and thirty acres which was was heretofore continually for the most part overflowed and drowned, with the water of the River of Thames; and all and singular messuages, cottages, houses, edifices, orchards, tofts foreland and soil, which were the said Thomas Stepkins's before the overflowing and all and singular messuages, edifices, cottages cellars, solars, orchards woods and underwoods, and all other the rest of my hereditaments whatsoever, in the Parish and Manor of Stepney, in the County of Middlesex.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we shall produce a lease from Stepkins to Marcellus Hall.

Mr. Serj. Pemberton. I hope they will give some account of this deed first.

Mr. Att. Gen. When you say any thing against it, Mr. Serjeant, we will; but we desire now to go on with our evidence. Read that deed.

Clerk reads.] This has been read before, and is marked.

This Indenture made the twentieth day of April, in the sixth year of the Reign of our sovereign Lord King Edward the Sixth, by the Grace of God King of England, France, and Ireland; betwixt Thomas Stepkins, otherwise Stipkin, of the Parish of St. Mary Matfellow, in the County of Middlesex, without Aldgate beer-brewer, of the one part; and Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the other part; witnesseth, That the said Thomas Stepkins, otherwise Stipkin, for the sum of 50 l. of lawful money of England, to the said Thomas Stepkins, otherwise Stipkin, by the said Marcellus Hall at the enfealing hereof, well and truly paid and satisfied, and of the same doth clearly acquit and discharge the said Marcellus Hall his Executors and Assigns, and every of them, by these presents hath demised, granted, betaken, and to farm letten; and by these presents doth demise, grant, betake, and to farm lett unto the said Marcellus Hall all those his parcels of marsh-land lying and joyning on the west side of hilly bank, or way called Ratcliff-way and the well adjoining to the way that goeth up to the Lynches, called Shadwell, lying in the east end of the marsh, containing by estimation of measure, three acres and a half, and all the next piece west, adjoining to the same, containing by estimation of measure, six acres and the pond; and two acres adjoining on the west side of the six acres, lying on the bottom of the hilly Lynches, adjoining north-west on the wall, which reacheth from the Lynches to the Island by the pond; all which eleven acres and a half, little more or less, abutteth on the Thames wall on the party of the south; to the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, called the Lynches, on the party of the North; and on the wall by the pond on the party of the west; and also all the Thames wall belonging to the said eleven acres and a half of meadow or marsh-land: which said piece or parcel of bank or wall, doth abut on the south end of the aforesaid billy Bank, or way reaching to the east side of it, which leadeth to Ratcliff Town on the party of the East, and on the wall in the occupation of John Everard, on the party of the west; and also all the foreland and soil down to the low-water-mark of the River Thames belonging to the premises; all which in the east end of Wapping marsh, abutting on the aforesaid mill, and the billy Bank, or way leading as aforesaid in the Parish and Manor of Stepbunbeath, otherwise Stepney, in the County of Middlesex, and now in the holding of the said Marcellus Hall, to have and to hold all the said parcels of marsh-land, foreland and soil, and every part and parcel thereof, to the said Marcellus Hall, his Executors and assigns, from the feast of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin, before the date hereof, to the end and term of one hundred twenty eight years, thence next ensuing, yielding—

Mr. Sol. Gen. Read the Proviso.

L. C. J. Read the reservation of the rent.

Clerk reads.] Yielding and paying therefore yearly for the same, to the said Thomas Stepkins, his heirs and assigns, one pepper-corn, at the feast of the Annunciation—

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now read the Proviso.

Clerk reads.] And the said Marcellus Hall for himself, his executors, and assigns covenanteth and granteth to and with the said Thomas Stepkins, his Heirs and Assigns; that he the said Marcellus Hall, his Executors and Assigns, shall and will bear all manner of charges—And it is further covenanted, granted, and agreed between the said parties, that it shall not be lawful for the said Marcellus Hall, his Executors or Assigns, to alienate or assign this present term of years, or any part thereof, without the special licence and consent of the said Thomas Stepkins, his Heirs and Assigns—

Mr. Williams. Pray, my Lord, will you give me leave to ask a question of Mr. Banister?

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, he has not been examined yet, they cannot, under favour, ask him any questions.

Mr. Williams. You have sworn him, and so he is under an oath, and we may doubtless examine him as your witness to this deed that you have read. Is that your name, Sir? showing the deed of 16 April.

Banister. This is my name, written by my own hand.

Mr. Williams. When did you write your hand there, Mr. Banister?

Banister. The 16th of April, 1682.

Mr. Williams. Pray Sir look upon it again.

Banister. This is my hand, and I writ it my self when the deed was found; I writ a paper of such deeds as were found at the same instant of time.

Mr. Williams. And you writ it when you found it?

Banister. I writ that name at that instant of time.

Mr. S. Pemberton. When was it, do you say?

Banister. The 16th of Sept. 1682.

Mr. Williams. Are you sure of it?

Banister. Yes I am sure of it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Just now it was April.

Banister. It was in September, 1682. I writ this paper at the same time.

L. C. J. Where did you write this name to this deed?

Banister. At Mr. Knowles's house.

L. C. J. When was the first time that you saw that deed?

Banister. The very same day that I writ my name on this paper.

L. C. J. Did he find the deed or you? Let me see it. (which was done.)

Banister. He had found that deed before, but had mislaid it, and desired my assistance to find it again.

L. C. J. Where did you find it?

Banister. In a garret in Mr. Knowles's house.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Were there not a great many deeds there?

Banister. Yes, there were a great many.

L. C. J. Prythee look upon it again, and consider what thou say'st.

Banister. This is my name.

L. C. J. Very well; and how came thy name there?

Banister. This is the very deed I looked upon at that time.

L. C. J. Where did you first see that deed?

Banister. I was at the finding of it in a garret at Mr. Knowles's house.

L. C. J. That was in Sept. 1682. you say.

Banister. Yes, in Sept. 1682. I never saw it before.

L. C. J. Pray who are parties to that deed?

Mr. Williams. My Lord, it is the purchase of the Inheritance.

L. C. J. It is so; and how should that come to be in the possession of Knowles?

Banister. I never saw it before that time.

L. C. J. Read it again.

Clerk reads.]—This is dated the 16th of April, in the sixth year of Edward the sixth. To all faithful—

Mr. Sol. Gen. Certainly, my Lord, he is under a mistake.

L. C. J. Ay, so is he sure enough, but a very foul one upon my word: But let us see if we can bring him out of it. Mr. Banister, let me ask you a question.

Banister. Yes, my Lord, if you please.

L. C. J. Then pray mind what I say, and consider of it. The 16th of September, 1682, was the time that you went on purpose to look for deeds at Mr. Knowles's house?

Banister. I was there on the seventh day of September, and that was the first day that ever I came into Mr. Knowles's house in my life.

L. C. J. There were some deeds, it seems, that Mr. Knowles had found before?

Banister. So Mr. Knowles said.

L. C. J. What became of those deeds he had found before?

Banister. As he told me he had mislaid them.

L. C. J. And when did you come to have an account that he had found those deeds first?

Banister. It was after I had paid him 3*l.* for water.

L. C. J. When was the first time that he spoke of it?

Banister. It was the fifth or fourth of September.

L. C. J. And when did you first go thither?

Banister. On the 7th of September, he desired me to come and help him, and assist him in finding out the deeds that he had mislaid.

L. C. J. What do you know of this deed?

Banister. We found one deed—

L. C. J. Look upon that carefully, is that your hand?

Banister. That is my hand.

L. C. J. Do you remember when you put your hand to that deed?

Banister. The paper I have in my hand was written at the same time.

L. C. J. Look upon that paper, and consider it well; and now tell us whether you found that deed first, or Mr. Knowles.

Banister. Mr. Knowles.

L. C. J. Now look upon it, and look upon it carefully, when was it?

Banister. This deed came into my hands the same day that I writ this note.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, we desire we may go on with our evidence, and not have them break in upon us to examine any such thing till their time comes; if they have any thing to object against our witnesses, let them take their time.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Mr. Attorney, we are very regular sure in what we do; you produce a deed, and we desire an account how you came by that deed; and finding Mr. Banister's name, who is your witness, and sworn by you, we would know of him what he knows of it.

L. C. J. Ay ay, let truth come out in God's name. Look upon it, M. Banister, once more. What say you to it?

Banister. This is the same deed, and my hand.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Sir, when did you first see that deed?

Banister. This deed I saw the 7th of Sept. 1682.

L. C. J. Where?

Banister. in the garret at Mr. Knowles's house.

L. C. J. Did you find it first, or Mr. Knowles?

Banister. I cannot tell, it may be I might.

L. C. J. Are you sure you then put your name to that deed?

Banister. I did put my hand upon this same deed the 7th of Sept. 1682.

L. C. J. Prythee look upon it again, and look very carefully upon it. [which he did for a good while together.]

L. C. J. Now look upon your note again.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray do so, and peruse it carefully, and see whether that Deed be in your note.

L. C. J. Nay, good Mr. Attorney, let us have no directions. What say you?

Banister. I set my hand to several deeds that I found there, to some writings on the 7th of September, and to others on the 16th.

L. C. J. Now tell us, which of them it was that thou didst put thy hand upon this deed?

Banister. I believe it might be the 7th.

L. C. J. Didst thou not see that deed before the 7th of September, 1682, upon thy oath?

Banister. No, never.

L. C. J. Who was with you when you first found that deed?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray my Lord let this note be read, and that will clear all.

L. C. J. No, by no means Mr. Attorney; he may make use of what notes he pleases, to refresh his own memory; but we will never support or prop up a perjury at that rate, I assure you, by a note. Was Mr. Knowles with you when you found that deed?

Banister. He was.

L. C. J. Do you take it upon your oath that that deed was found the 7th of September, 1682, in the garret at Mr. Knowles's house?

Banister. I cannot tell which of the two it was, the seventh or the sixteenth.

L. C. J. Was it one of the two, upon your oath?

Banister. It was one of the two.

L. C. J. Now call Mr. Knowles again.

Mr. Williams. There he is, my Lord; if your Lordship please to look upon the deed—Knowles's name was to it likewise, but scraped out.

L. C. J. Well, we will ask him about it. But Mr. Banister positively swears he was at the finding of this deed. What say you, Knowles?

Knowles. I know nothing of it, my name is not to it.

Mr. Williams. Was your name ever to it, or not?

Knowles. No, never.

Mr. Dobbins. But it was to it at the trial in Michaelmas term.

L. C. J. Did you set your name to all the deeds you found in the garret?

Knowles. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Upon your Oath, Banister, did you set your name to any deeds that he did not, that were found there?

Banister. I believe I might do so, I would not swear punctually to it.

L. C. J. Was he with you?

Banister. He was with me in the very same chamber.

Knowles. I do not know that ever I put my hand to that deed in my life.

L. C. J. Did you ever see that deed?

Knowles. I cannot say I did, I remember nothing of it.

L. C. J. I ask you once again, when you found this deed, was he with you?

Banister. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. You, Knowles, did you ever trust him to look and search any deeds in your garret, but when you were by yourself?

Knowles. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then I would ask you upon your oath, because you are the persons that had these deeds in your custody; was there any deeds delivered out of your hand that you did not set your hand to?

Knowles. I believe there was never an one.

L. C. J. How came this deed which he swears was found there, not to have your hand to it?

Knowles. I do not know that ever I saw it.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did Mr. Knowles say he was looking for deeds of his own concern when he found the first deed?

Banister. He did say he had looked before, and had found some of these deeds, and then mislaid them, and desired my assistance to find them again.

L. C. J. What did he say to you at first?

Banister. He said he had been spoken unto by my Lady Ivy, to look for deeds that might concern her ancestors; and he had found some: But finding some also that concerned himself, he had mislaid my Lady's, and desired me to help him to find them again.

L. C. J. What employment have you under my Lady Ivy?

Banister. I am her rent-gatherer.

L. C. J. Her bailiff, I suppose: But now you speak of what my Lady Ivy desired of Knowles, I would ask you a question, lest it slip out of my memory. Were you present at any time when my Lady Ivy spoke to Mr. Knowles, to look after any deeds?

Banister. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Pray tell us whose deeds she desired him to look?

Banister. The deeds he said he had mislaid.

L. C. J. What were they?

Banister. The deed of Richard Hill, and the deeds belonging to Stepney and Shadwell.

L. C. J. What names did he mention to him, that she would have looked after?

Banister. She did mention some.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, did she mention any deeds made by Dr. Donne Dean of St. Paul's?

Banister. No.

L. C. J. By one May, Dean of St. Paul's?

Banister. No.

L. C. J. Was one Lun named?

Banister. No.

L. C. J. Or one Holder?

Banister. Not that I know of.

L. C. J. Did she mention one Joan Hall?

Banister. I do not know that my Lady Ivy gave particular order for any of these names.

L. C. J. Did she upon your oath, name Marcellus Hall to you?

Banister. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Knowles, was not he by when my Lady named Marcellus Hall to you?

Knowles. He was my Lord.

Banister. I did not hear my Lady name that name at all.

L. C. J. No; he heard her give order for no particular deeds, neither for Holder, nor Lun, nor Marcellus Hall, but only concerning Stepney and Shadwell.

Sir Edw. Herbert. Banister, did he say he had before found them, and mislaid them?

Banister. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Upon your oath, what deed do you take that to be, which is produced?

Mr. Powis. Can you read it, yea, or no?

L. C. J. Mr. Powis, do you think my Lady Ivy sent Banister to look after deeds that he could not read? that were very pretty.

Mr. Att. Gen. What deed do you take it to be?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Let me ask you one question, Mr. Banister; Did you ever set your hand to any deeds that were not found at Mr. Knowles's?

Banister. Yes I have.

Mr. Lutwich. Upon what occasion did you put your hand to them?

Banister. Because they were ancient deeds, and I was to look out where the hands were that they did concern.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray now answer my question; look upon it, and tell me what deed do you take it to be?

Banister. It is a deed of sale to Stepkins.

L. C. J. It is so, you are in the right of it; and now upon your oath, where did you find that deed of sale?

Banister. My hand is to it; and this is one of the deeds; I take it to be so, that was found in the garret at Mr. Knowles's house.

L. C. J. He has said so; I know not how often.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is not himself.

L. C. J. How can I help that, Mr. Attorney? But what he says, is plain.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray read over the note you have in your hand to yourself, and remember all the deeds that are particularly therein contained.

L. C. J. Let him read his note, (which he did) and now ask him what you will.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is there any deed of the 16th of April, 6 Edw. 6. from Hill to Stepkins, in that note?

L. C. J. That is no fair question, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. With you favour, my Lord, I conceive it is; for that will make it plain that he is mistaken.

L. C. J. I believe he is; but with your favour, it is not a fair question; you are only to ask him whether that deed given in evidence be there?

Mr. Sol. Gen. I would ask him one short question, my Lord, and I think it is a fair one.

L. C. J. Ay, in God's name ask what fair questions you will, but no leading ones.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Your witness is drunk, Madam—
(To my Lady Ivy.)

Mr. S. Lutwich. My Lord he does not understand what he says, that is plain.

L. C. J. Brother, all knaves are fools in one kind too.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Have you read the date of that deed?

Banister. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, if you please, we will go on with our other evidence a while, and let him recollect himself and consider of it.

L. C. J. With all my heart; but I think the more he considers, the worse he is; and so he will be to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Att. Gen. They have called to us, my Lord, for an account of this deed; we shall now prove that Mr. Neale knew of this deed before. Swear Mr. Butler; (which was done.)

L. C. J. What is your name?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, will you tell the Court and the Jury, what discourse you had with Mr. Neale, and what he said about a deed, and when?

Butler. I never saw the lease; but as I was here at the last trial, when there was a verdict for this Estate to be my Lady Ivy's; and afterwards, the 22d of December last, I had an opportunity of being with Mr. Neale, he being with Mr. Bryan, my Lady's husband, since dead, at the King's-Head tavern, with whom I had some business. Mr. Brian was there first, (I suppose it was by appointment they met) and in half an hour Mr. Neale came up stairs. After they had changed two or three compliments, they came to talk about meeting at Mr. Attorney-General's chambers in the Temple, to treat about their controversy. Says Mr. Neale, let there be a forfeiture upon it of 50*l.* to be paid by him that fails. No, says Mr. Bryan, I will make no forfeiture, but I will certainly meet there. Says Mr. Neale again; And I question not but to give such satisfaction, as whereby to convince you and my Lady, that this is not her Estate. I should be glad to hear that, says Mr. Bryan: why I hope you do not think the deeds are forged? No, says Mr. Neale, I do not think they are forged. Mr. Knowles offered me a long time ago, to shew me that deed, and I might have had it in my possession; but I would not: for if I had, I should have been the aptest man in the world to burn it. This is all I can say.

L. C. J. And what is this to the purpose, Gentlemen? Alack-a-day, this is very thin; a slight discourse in a tavern: How can any answer be given to such an evidence? tho' indeed it does not need any. Pray let not our time be taken up with such trifling stories of a cock and a bull; go on to that which is material.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we shall produce a lease from Marcellus Hall to one Roper, of part of this eleven acres and an half.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 13th day of November, in the 2d and 3d years of the reigns of our sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the grace of God King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jerusalem, and Ireland; Defenders of the faith, Arch-Dukes of Austria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millan, and Brabant; Countess of Hapsburg, Flanders and Tyrole; between Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one party, and Richard Roper, citizen and salter of London, of the other party, witnesseth, that the said Marcellus Hall, for the sum of six pounds of good and lawful money of England, to him by the said Richard Roper in hand paid; whereof the said Marcellus Hall clearly acquitteth and dischargeeth the said Richard Roper, his executors and assigns, and every of them, by these presents; hath granted, demised, and to farm letten, and by these presents granteth, demiseth, and to farm-letteth, to the said Richard Roper, a parcel of marsh-ground, lying and being in Wapping marsh, at the east end of the marsh, beginning at the west side of the well, which lieth by the way that leadeth up to the Lynches, called Shadwell, measured by a strait line from the Lynches, by the west side of the well, to the Thames wall, and reacheth west to the way that leadeth up into Ratcliff high way, containing by estimation of measure, seven acres, little more or less, and the pond; all which marsh-land abutteth north upon the Lynches of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, and south upon the Thames wall; and also all the Thames wall belonging to the seven acres, with the foreland and soil, down to the low-water-mark of the River of Thames: All which marsh-lands are lying in the parish and manor of Stebunbeatb, alias Stepney, in the County of Middlesex. To have and to hold the said parcel of marsh-ground, wall, foreland and soil, with the appurtenances, to the said Richard Roper, his executors and assigns, from the feast of the Annunciation of our blessed Lady St. Mary the Virgin, next coming, unto the end and term of four and twenty years from thence next ensuing, and fully to be compleated and ended; yielding and paying therefore yearly, during the said term, to the said Marcellus Hall, his executors and assigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, as four terms of the year.—

L. C. J. What date is that deed of?

Clerk. The 13th of November, in the 2d and 3d years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we shall read Stepkins's licence to Hall, to alien his term.

Clerk reads.] To all manner of people to whom this present writing shall come; I Thomas Stepkins alias Stipkins, of the parish of Stebunbeatb alias Stepney, in the County of Middlesex, beer-brewer, send greeting in our Lord God everlasting. Whereas I the said Thomas Stepkins on the 16th of April, in the sixth year of Edward the sixth, have betaken eleven acres and a half of marsh-land with all the bank with the foreland and soil, down to the low-water mark of the River of Thames that he should not alien or assign the said lease or term of years, without the special licence or consent

Now know ye, That I the said Thomas Stepkins, for divers good-causes give leave and licence to the said Marcellus Hall, to the right worshipful Mr. Dean of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul with the wall, foreland or soil under such covenants, as is reserved and contained—

Mr. Williams. I would ask Mr. Banister something about this deed; look upon it, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. We have not done with him yet. Pray take that deed out of his hand.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You will let him give some account of it first, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. You would fain confound him.

M. S. Pemberton. He is confounded enough already.

Mr.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now Mr. Banister you have considered of it, pray once more look upon the deed gain—(which he did.)—Was that deed one that you signed then or no?

Banister. This is my name, but I cannot find the date of this deed in my paper. I cannot tell now whether it be one I found then or no.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you set your hand to any deeds that were found there, which you did not set down in your paper?

Banister. No, nor that I know of, I do not know I did.

L. C. J. Prithee where didst thou set thy hand to that deed?

Banister. I set my hand to the deeds that were found there, at the house.

L. C. J. Did you set your hand to none else but what were found there?

Banister. I have set my hand to divers deeds beside, but they are none of those deeds that are in my paper.

L. C. J. Where did you set your hand to any deeds besides?

Banister. To divers deeds I have set my hand at home.

L. C. J. Have you to any relating to the lands in question?

Banister. I do not know that I have set my hand to any deeds relating to the lands in question, but at Mr. Knowles's.

L. C. J. To what purpose did you set your hand and name to the deeds you found at Knowles's?

Banister. To the same intent to testify that I was at the finding of them.

L. C. J. To what end did you set your hand to any other deeds?

Banister. To the intent that I knew better where the lands did lie than she did, and when my Lady found any deeds, I set my hand to them, and then found the places where the lands lay.

L. C. J. Thou hast had a fair time to consider of that deed; canst thou see here to what place that deed relates, by this mark?

Banister. I cannot find the date of the deed in my paper.

L. C. J. But where do you think you did put your name to that deed?

Banister. I cannot tell whether I did it at that time or no, but this is my name.

L. C. J. I know thy name is there, man; I read it two hours ago: but did you put your hand to that as one of the deeds that you found in September, 1682, when you were at Mr. Knowles's, or not?

Banister. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Dost thou believe thou didst not?

Banister. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Canst thou tell the reason why thou didst set thy hand to it?

Banister. Certainly because I was at the finding of it; I know no otherwise.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Now pray look upon this deed (showing him another.)—and see whether that be your name or not.

Banister. Yes, My Lord, I will.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Is that your name?

Banister. Yes, it is; this is one of the deeds that was found at Mr. Knowles's.

Mr. S. Pemberton. You said so as to the other two.

Mr. Att. Gen. But he was not so positive in it.

Banister. This is rat-eaten, and so I know it. again; and there is a rat-eaten deed set down in my paper.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. Let him be as positive as he will, he has been forsworn five times.

Mr. Sol. Gen. He was confounded with a mistake of the deeds, he having set his hand to so many.

L. C. J. They are perjured both of them plainly, that is the truth of the matter.

Mr. Att. Gen. I hope the folly of our witnesses in such circumstances, shall not rob us of our own land; and that it appears to be plainly.

L. C. J. God forbid but you should have your own land; but by the Grace of God, if I can help it, you shall never have a foot of land by forswearing and perjury.

Mr. Williams. When did you find that deed?

Banister. The 16th of September.

Mr. Williams. Where?

Banister. In the garret at Mr. Knowles's.

Mr. Williams. Are you sure of it?

Banister. Yes, I am sure of that deed, because it is rat-eaten.

Mr. Williams. Knowles, pray do you look upon it, what say you to that deed?

Knowles. This is my hand, and this is one of the deeds that was found there at that time.

Mr. Williams. Pray read the date of that deed there.

Clerk reads.] This indenture made the 13th day of November, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary.

Mr. S. Pemberton. That is a deed from Marcellus Hall to Roper; how should that come to be at Knowles's?

L. C. J. They have sworn it.

Mr. Att. Gen. They go about to blemish our deeds by the folly of our witnesses, which we cannot help. We however leave the deeds to the Jury, and let them see if those seals and other things look like counterfeit.

L. C. J. Well, go on, the Jury will have the deeds with them.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord we did before produce a conveyance from Richard Hill to Stepkins. It rested not there, that conveyance had no legal execution, thereupon there was a fine and recovery by the heir of Hill; and what was the occasion of that, will appear by the deed.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the twelfth day of November, in the 5th and 6th years of the Reigns of our sovereign Lord and Lady, Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jerusalem and Ireland, Defenders of the faith; Arch-Dukes of Austria, Dukes of Burgundy, Milan and Brabant; Counts of Hapsburg, Flanders, and Tyrol: between Jasper Hill, son and heir of Richard Hill, late citizen and mercer of London, of the one party; and Macbeline Stepkins, late wife and executrix of the last will and testament of Thomas Stepkins, and John Stepkins, son and heir apparent of the said Thomas, of the other party, witnesseth, That whereas the said Richard Hill, father of the said Jasper amounting in the whole to the sum of 2000 by the said Macbeline And where variance concerning all that parcel of marsh-land unto

St. Katherine's, which the said Richard Hill bought of Cornelius Vanderdelf for the affuring all that Wapping-marsh, the said Richard Hill itands, stands bound in an obligation of which condition, that he should make by a certain day, a good, sure, sufficient, indefeasible of and in all those parcels of marsh-land, lying in Wapping-marsh, that is to say, all that with six acres of marsh, now in the tenure or occupation of one Knevett, or his assigns, and all those lying in the East and in the tenure of one Miller; that is to say, all the bank, containing by estimation three acres and an half; and all those next adjoining, by measure six acres or more and two acres by estimation of measure, lying in the bottom of the Lynches, and reacheth from the Lynches to the Island by the pond; and also all that parcel divided into twain six acres; and also that holds in his own hands, that is to say, all that parcel with the island and pond, containing by estimation of measure, five acres and of, and in all those parcels lying on the west side of the pond, containing in the whole sixteen acres by measure; all which said sixteen acres to Gravel-lane, the said Richard Hill had in his own occupation reaching to Gravel-lane, sometime plowed and sown by one Richard Clayton, and now in the occupation of one Cooper, butcher, and lying on the east side of Gravel-lane towards London fields, which was conveyed to him from one Richard Tyrrell; and also all that marsh in the tenure of one Clayton, butcher, one William Cound, butcher, seventeen acres and of Edward Ash, four acres; and also all the lands, tenements, rents, houses, ponds, fishings, mills, to the low-water-mark of the River of Thames, and all trees

For the appeasing all variances and suits, the said parties to this Indenture have fully condescended and agreed in form following; that is to say, the said Jasper Hill, for the sum of 1200 l. of lawful money of England, in which he acknowledgeth himself to be truly indebted to the said Macbeline and John Stepkins, doth give, grant, bargain, sell to the said Macbeline and John Stepkins all the said marsh-ground lying in Wapping-marsh, with all manner of lands, tenements forelands, ways, trees to the low-water mark with the appurtenances lying and without or elsewhere within their heirs and assigns being in the parishes together with all evidences and writings discharged of all former charges, incumbrances by the said Jasper Hill —

Mr. Att. Gen. Next we shall shew that Marcellus Hall, that had this long lease, and had demised the seven acres down from Shadwell to Roper, doth on the 14th of November, in the 5th and 6th years of Philip and Mary, surrender the remaining four acres to Thomas Stepkins; and then we shall shew it was demised to Fox, who was the first builder and made Fox's-lane.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Your Lordship doth observe, that the licence was to assign the whole eleven acres and an half, but he did assign but seven.

Clerk reads.] This is dated on the 14th of November, in the 5th and 6th years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

To all to whom this present writing shall come, I Marcellus Hall of Ratcliff, miller, send greeting in our lord God everlasting. Whereas Thomas Stepkins hath by his Indenture dated the 20th day of April, in the 6th year of King Edward VI. let to me the said Marcellus Hall on the west side with the Thames wall thereto belonging, with the foreland and soil for one hundred and twenty and eight years: know ye that I the said Marcellus Hall, for the sum of 30 l. of good and lawful money of England in hand paid have by these presents remised, released, and absolutely confirmed, to the said John Stepkins, his heirs, executors and assigns, all such estate, right, title, interest, term of years, estate, property, claim and demand, which I, or any person to my use, have, or ought to have, or at any time shall to have in, or to four acres of marsh-ground, abutting east on the green bank, or way through, six acres leading up to Ratcliff way, which way, adjoineth to the west side of the lands in the occupying of Roper; which said lands was made over with the leave and licence of the said Thomas Stepkins, to the right worshipful for the term of ninety three years; and west on the field, in the occupying of John north on the Lynches, and south of, in, or to the Thames wall abutting east on the south-west way, as afore said down to the low-water mark of the River of Thames

So that neither I, my executors or assigns, any right claim, demand or any part thereof but from all shall be utterly excluded and debarred for ever—

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is a fine levied, Quin' Trin' 3 Eliz. they had best ask where that was found too: Is not that forged?

The Fine was read.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Here is a recovery also, and a deed to lead the uses: in which recovery the tenants vouch Jasper Hill, who voucheth over the common vouchee.

The Recovery was read.

L. C. J. Read your deed to lead the uses.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 12th day of May, in the fourth year of the reign of our sovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France and Ireland; Defender of the faith, &c. between Macbeline Stepkins of the one party and Edward Buggin

Where it was concluded, fully condescended and agreed between the parties to this Indenture, that they the said Edward Buggin should in the term of the holy Trinity recover to them by writ of Entry sur Disseisin in le Poss. to be had against the said Macbeline and John, before the Queen's Majesty's Justices of the Common-Pleas at Westminster, for that time, being according to the use of former recoveries one hundred acres of fresh marsh, within the parishes, towns, fields

And it was fully agreed between the said parties, that the said recovery should be to the uses—

Mr. Williams. Mr. Banister, pray Sir, look upon this deed, and see whether your name be to that deed or no. (Shewing him the surrender of Hall.)

Banister. This is my name.

Mr. Williams. Was Mr. Knowles's hand to that deed?

Banister. I cannot tell.

Mr.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Did not he and you put your hands together to it?

Banister. I did not make it, I did not forge it.

Mr. S. Pemberton. No, I do not think you did, you have not brains to do it.

Mr. Williams. Where did you find that deed?

Mr. S. Pemberton. How came you to put your hand to it?

L. C. J. Is it one of the deeds of purchase?

Mr. S. Pemberton. Yes, it is; and therefore we would know, since Mr. Knowles's name is to it, how it came there.

L. C. J. Is it the surrender made by Marcellus Hall to John Stepkins?

Mr. Williams. Yes, my Lord, it is.

L. C. J. Let me see it—His name, I believe, has been there.

Mr. Williams. Do you know any thing of the raising of it out?

Banister. No, not I.

Mr. Williams. You Knowles, were you at the finding of that deed?

Knowles. I set my hand to none but what I found.

L. C. J. But what do you say to that deed?

Knowles. I do not remember this deed at all; I cannot say any thing to it.

L. C. J. Was your name to it?

Knowles. Here is my name, but I do not know who put it there.

L. C. J. Is that your writing, Banister?

Banister. That on the backside is.

Mr. Williams. Look into your note, that you may not out-run your self. Why did you set your hand to it?

Banister. I suppose it was one of the deeds found there.

Mr. Williams. How should it come there? it belonged to the purchaser.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we shall go to matter of record again. Richard Hill, it seems, before the lease made to Marcellus Hall, entered into a Recognizance in 4 Eliz. this is extended, and that will shew it to be Richard Hill's estate.

Mr. Powis. Can you object any forgery of Records, pray?

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray Sir, look upon that (to the Witness) where did you examine that?

Witness. I examined this at the Rolls.

Mr. Williams. Is it a true copy, upon your oath?

Witness. It is.

L. C. J. Read it.

Clerk. This is tested at Westminster, 17 Jan. 4 Eliz. And here is an inquisition taken the 6th of April, in the same year.

Mr. Att. Gen. We will read that part of the Inquisition that concerns our question; for the east bound is only in question now. (It was read.)

Mr. Att. Gen. Was this produced at the former trial, the first trial?

Sutton. No, I think not in Michaelmas Term.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then we shall shew an Inquisition upon a commission of sewers.

Mr. Att. Gen. The land in question is every foot of it in the marsh; and that they must acknowledge they have no title to.

Mr. Williams. This is an inquisition which they produce, taken before a commission of sewers. I desire to know how that comes to lie in a private hand, for it is the original Inquisition, and ought to remain with the officer.

Mr. Att. Gen. The whole interest of the marsh was ours, therefore it might well be left with us.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Under favour, good Mr. Attorney, such things should be kept by the Clerk to the Commissioners.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many trials has this been produced at?

Mr. S. Pemberton. With submission, my Lord, this that they produce being an Original, may very well come under great suspicion, in regard it ought to be brought in by the officer, in whose custody it ought to remain.

Mr. Williams. It is not a thing of bare interest between party and party, but a thing that concerns the publick, and therefore should be brought in the officer's custody.

L. C. J. Read it de bene esse, let us see what it is.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, I would ask Mr. Sutton, was not this produced and read before the trial in Michaelmas-Term last?

Sutton. It was produced in Court twelve years ago.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was it allowed as evidence?

Sutton. Yes, constantly.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray read it.

Mr. Williams. Pray who has had it in keeping all this while?

Sutton. My Lady Ivy brought it to me among her writings at first.

L. C. J. Read it.

Clerk reads.] The verdict and presentment of us the Jurors, as well of all defects, annoyances, within the limits or bounds of Wapping, and Wapping marsh, from Grass mill to the mill at Ratcliff, that is to say, the 20th of December, Anno Dom. 1572, and in the 14th year of the Queen's Majesty's Reign that now is.

The names of the Free-holders within Wapping-marsh, and the number of acres contained within the same marsh, with all the names of the occupiers thereof.

First, John Stepkins Gent. Freeholder, for a parcel containing twenty two acres, in the tenure of Richard Ew Benedi Gent.

Mr. Att. Gen. You may skip over a great deal, and read only that which conduces to the question.

Clerk. No one can read it very well, I think. (Reads) On the west side of Gravel-lane, containing 68 acres—Is that it?

Mr. Att. Gen. No, go to the east side.

Clerk reads.] —Freeholders; one parcel containing ten acres, in the tenure of John Hodges and John Gee, John Stepkins, Gent. two parcels, containing twenty acres, in the tenure of John Cooper, and John Harding, John Stepkins, Gent. One parcel, containing four acres, in the tenure of John Stepkins. One parcel, containing twelve acres, in the tenure of John Roger James, Freeholder.

Two parcels, containing six acres, Robert Hemmings and John Stepkins. One parcel, containing one acre and an half, Richard Roper. One parcel, containing six acres, in the tenure of Richard Roper.

All which parcels be on the east part of Gravel-lane, containing sixty acres—Then here is somewhat interlined and struck out again.

Mr. Williams. This doth not concern the Church.

Mr. Att. Gen. No more it doth not, as you say, indeed; for they cannot claim any of the marsh. Now we shall shew a warrant three years after, from the Commissioners to survey.

Clerk reads.] —This is dated the 18th of July, in the 17th year of the most prosperous Reign of our

our sovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God
&c. And it is directed

To our well-beloved John Stepkin and John Osborn, Surveyors. Whereas, the Queen's Majesty by a commission of sewers, bearing date the 23d day of April, in the year of her Reign; hath authorized us to survey and view from Buttolphs-Wbarf by St. Katherine's, near the Tower of London unto Ratcliff-mill not only to consider of the decays and ruines of the same, but also to take order for the speedy repairing as to our discretions shall seem good

We therefore sufficiently informed of your wisdom and discretion, appoint you surveyors willing and commanding you, by virtue of the said commission to see whether the work be accomplished according to such ordinances and decrees as we have appointed, and from time to time shall make and appoint; and to see who we have made expeditor for such sums of money for the payment of workmen may by your warrant be disbursed and payed accordingly; and further, we give you power and authority to give to provide for a competent and salary, at reasonable prices, all workmen boats, lighters, carts, carriages, trees, pales as to your good discretion shall seem meet; and for your so doing, this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Mr. Att. Gen. We shall now go a step farther, as I opened in the beginning, and shew that this was mortgaged by Stepkins to the Queen, and a fine was levied upon that mortgage.

Clerk reads.] This Indenture made the 4th day of June, in the 15th year of the Reign of our sovereign Lady Elizabeth, &c. between the right honourable Sir William Cecil, Knight, Lord Burleigh, and Lord High Treasurer of England; the right honourable and one of her Highness's most honourable privy-council; Sir Gilbert Gerard, Knight, her Majesty's Attorney-General, for and on the behalf of the Queen's Majesty, and to her use, of the one party, and John Stepkins

Whereas William Pat one of the tellers at and upon the determination of his account, made and ended at the 25th day of December is indebted in the sum of 7928 l. 7 s. and 11 d. ob.

And whereas our said sovereign Lady the Queen the 16th day of June, in the 9th year of her Reign, hath commanded the said Sir William Cecil Sir Gilbert Gerard, and Sir Thomas Bromley to take order from time to time with so many of the debts owing, or that after should be owing and for the sure payment and contentation of the said sum of 7928 l. 7 s. 11 d. ob. covenanteth with them the said that he the said John Stepkins, his heirs, executors shall and will not only satisfy and pay the said sum into the receipt aforesaid but also for the better settlement shall and will make and cause to be made by one fine in good form of law of, and in one clofe within the parish manor of Kewel; and one great garden And of, and in one tenement, with the appurtenances in now in the occupation of John Stout; and 19 acres of meadow in Wapping marsh, parcel of the said manor Richard Roper.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where is the copy of the fine?

Sutton. Here.

Clerk reads.] This is the final Concord, &c. Mens. Mich. 14 Eliz.

Mr. Sol. Gen. This was afterwards regranted from the Crown; and there is the Regrant.

Which being under the Great Seal, and tested 6 Julii, Anno 7 Jacobi Regis, was read.

Mr. Att. Gen. Part of this marsh was by our ancestor conveyed to one East.

L. C. J. Ay, I have the note of such a conveyance in my notes of the last trial.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Sutton, is that a true copy?

Sutton. Yes, it is.

Mr. Williams. A copy of what? where did you examine it, Sir?

Sutton. At the Rolls Chapel.

Mr. Att. Gen. It is a deed enrolled, and I hope you do not think the Record is forged, Mr. Williams.

Mr. Williams. I know not what you forge or do not forge; pray read it, let us see what it is.

The copy of a deed enrolled, dated 27 July, 3 Eliz. was read.

L. C. J. Then the next thing that you produced, was a bond dated the 25th of January, 4 Eliz. wherein Stepkins was bound to Spinola, who was Administrator of Vivold and Savago, upon the recognizance of Hill to them.

Mr. Att. Gen. We did so, my Lord; but that we cannot now readily find, I think: Here however is Spinola's discharge.

Clerk. This is signed by me Benedict Spinola, and dated the 25th of Feb. 1561.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is the bond, read the condition of it, though it is not material.

L. C. J. That is true; but it was read the last time, I find by my notes.

Clerk. This is a bond of 300 l. The condition of this obligation is such, That whereas one Recognizance, made and entred into by Richard Hill 3 Dec. in the 32d year of the late King Henry VIII. taken and acknowledged—

Mr. Att. Gen. There is enough, for it makes not at all to the purpose, but to confirm the belief of our purchase. Here is also Jasper Hill's receipt of the purchase-money.

Clerk reads.] This is dated the 28 of January, in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth. Be it known unto all men by these presents, that I Jasper Hill of Wormley have had before the enfealing hereof, of Macheline and John Stepkins for the discharge of a certain Statute the full sum of 1338 l. of lawful money of England, in full satisfaction and payment of all such purchase-moneys.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then the 16th of August, 13 Jacobi, Fox conveyed to John Stepkins; but that is left at home.

L. C. J. Well, then there is an end of that; what do you do next?

Mr. Att. Gen. We have done with our evidence by Deeds and by Records, and now we shall come to our evidence by witnesses, Viva Voce. And first we shall begin with Mr. Knowles; who will prove the value of the land by the rents, and particularly what the rents are of Derrick Hills.

L. C. J. Prove what you will.

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. Mr. Knowles, have you received the Dean's rents?

Knowles. For the use of Mr. Neale, I have.

Mr. Att. Gen. What are the rents of the east side of Cock-bill?

Knowles. About 100*l.* a year.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What are they?

Knowles. Houses.

Mr. Att. Gen. All houses?

Knowles. Some houses, some ground-rents.

Mr. Att. Gen. What is the rack rent?

Knowles. About 100*l.* a year.

Mr. Williams. Which houses do you speak of, Mr. Knowles?

Knowles. On the east side of Cock-bill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know the Lynches?

Knowles. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who receives the rents of that ground?

Knowles. Mr. Neale did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you received the rents of the twenty acres?

Knowles. Yes, for Mr. Neale I have.

Mr. Att. Gen. These three together, what are they all?

Knowles. About 2000*l.* a year.

Mr. Att. Gen. All this the Church of Paul's has, besides the lands in question.

Mr. Williams. You say that part is worth 100*l.* a year.

Knowles. Yes.

Mr. S. Stringer. How much land might it contain?

Knowles. It is a matter of the length of the hall.

L. C. J. And how broad is it?

Knowles. Not very broad.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now then to come to the lands in question; Do you know Mariner's-street?

Knowles. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Who is in possession of that, and receives the rents of it?

Knowles. Mr. Neale.

Mr. Att. Gen. What say you to Griffin's-alley?

Knowles. Some of it is in mortgage; Mr. Barington had it, but for Mr. Neale's use.

Mr. Att. Gen. What say you to the water-house?

Knowles. That Mr. Neale himself has.

Mr. Att. Gen. These are the things in question; do you know that which is called New—?

Knowles. That is Mr. Neale's too.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Our lease of 128 years expired but in the year 1680; and we could not come at it till then, and we had it not till 1682; and that answereth their possession.

Mr. Att. Gen. Now we shall call our witnesses to prove it marsh-ground. Swear Thomas Hughes, (which was done)—Do you know Wapping marsh?

Hughes. Yes.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Do you know the houses in question?

Hughes. Which houses?

Mr. Sol. Gen. The houses now in suit for?

Hughes. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known them?

Hughes. There was no houses when I knew it first.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Cock-bill?

Hughes. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes; I did know it before it was built.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the houses that lay on the east side of Foxe's-lane?

Hughes. What houses there?

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know any houses there formerly?

Hughes. I know not what you mean.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you again, do you know Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes, it was a bank before it was built.

Mr. Powis. Do you know the Lynches?

Mr. Att. Gen. Nay, let us ask but one at once, pray. I will ask you a plain question; Did you know the marsh before it was built upon?

Hughes. Yes, Sir, that I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far did the marsh-ground go?

Hughes. To Cock-bill Eastward, as far as the broad bridge; Westward, as far as Foxes-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was all that marsh-ground?

Hughes. The River of Thames did flow round about it, and there were boggs, trees and bushes, and such things.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did you know the place where Ratcliff-mill stood?

Hughes. According to report I did.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Ay, where was that?

Hughes. Just at Bell-wharf.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Upon which side of Cock-bill?

Hughes. In Shadwell Hamlet.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is right.

Mr. Powis. Was that like the other end of the marsh?

Hughes. The River came in there wholly.

Mr. S. Lutwich. At high flood does the water come in there at this time?

Hughes. It did at every tide high and low formerly, now it is dam'd up.

L. C. J. Did the tide come up to that you call Foxes-lane?

Hughes. Yes.

L. C. J. Then that makes an end of the question: It cannot be as you say.

Mr. Att. Gen. How so, my Lord?

L. C. J. How could it be an overshot-mill? how could the mill be turned but with the tide?

Mr. Att. Gen. Their evidence makes it appear such by the leaden trough, which is an instrument belonging only to an overshot-mill?

L. C. J. Tell not me of the leaden trough, Mr. Attorney; look you upon the survey you produced, and take notice of the last paragraph, and there you will find the words, Prox' adjacent' cuidam tenemento, &c. What make you of that?

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, my Lord, let it be read.

L. C. J. I will in the mean time ask your witness a question. Friend, thou seemest to be a man that understands something. Thou sayst Foxes-lane was a bank before it was built, and the tide before that time came up to that bank, both high and low. Now suppose there had been a mill in that ground, how should it have been driven?

Hughes. I will tell your honour: My Lord, by report, and I suppose it may be true, the mill stood all the tide of flood, and when the flood was at high water, there was a dam which kept it in, and it went out again at ebb-tide, and so the mill was drove.

L. C. J. There is your overshot-mill gone then, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Att. Gen. If ever seven or eight acres of ground can be the appurtenances of a mill, I should much wonder.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I can tell you of a mill over against this place, which I myself, and we all can remember. All the estate about it was in the

Traps

Traps family, he was a Gentleman of our house; all the water that drives that Mill, and two or three Mills that serve that side of the river, is taken in as the tide comes in, and is pent in as he says by a dam; and when they open that, the Mill turns back again. For I would fain have all these things, that seem to be dark, cleared by the way as they go. I will suppose all the Records you have read to be right, and that it is called Ratcliff Mill, and then there is the Mill-bank, and the Hilly-bank, and the Hilly-way; it is plain then there was a Mill bank, or a Hilly-bank, or whatever you call it. It so falls out that the thing now in question is made plain upon your own evidence, there was really ponds and gutters, and those things that were to satisfy the Mill. This Mill comes to be plucked down, and the ponds and all the sluices come now to be built upon: this is not like your Marsh-ground that is on the western part of the bank, but it is a parcel of meare or marsh, as the pond and the rest stilled up by those things, that till such time as the Mill was taken away were receptacles for to pen up the water that came in with the tide. What is the meaning of those words in the survey that I spoke of before, and the several tenements and orchards, and ponds, and sewers, &c. and all those things? Would you have it that this should all point to the site of the Mill, as though all the boundaries should extend to the east-end of the Mill?

Mr. S. Stringer. That was the reason why I asked but now, how big the whole was.

L. C. J. And will what you would have, Mr. Attorney, a ditch or two, ever answer the words in the survey?

Mr. Att. Gen. Nor will all their words amount to divers closes of ground, as this must make in the whole.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Their twenty acres elsewhere answers all they can claim.

L. C. J. But this you yourself say, is the Dericks-bills, in the survey; and you do take it as soon as the Mill was pulled down in one place, it was set up in another.

Mr. Att. Gen. After he had taken our long lease he erected one, we say, upon our ground; for he had pulled down the old Mill, and let that to Carter.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, it is plain that the old Mill and the new Mill were not upon the same ground, from Carter's lease.

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, you indeed agree among yourselves that it is plain, but alas the fact is quite contrary.

Mr. S. Maynard. My Lord, we do make our argument for the Defendant's title as your Lordship does apprehend it. The boundaries towards the east is made the Mill and Ratcliff-Town. This place that contains seven acres, though it had passages for the water, is not the Mill, and it can never be, that so much ground can be reckon'd to be lands belonging to the Mill: it is the Mill itself that is the east bound.

L. C. J. No, it is the Mill and the Mill-bank, brother.

Mr. S. Maynard. With submission, my Lord, it is Ratcliff-Mill.

L. C. J. Is there no Mill-bank in any of the deeds?

Mr. S. Maynard. Not that I remember.

L. C. J. At the peril of my discretion be that, brother.

Mr. S. Maynard. Take it to be so as your Lordship says, that there is mention of a Mill-bank, that cannot lie east, for it lieth in a little pond—

L. C. J. Good brother, let us not puzzle that which is as plain as that the sun shines. The controversy is about all the west part of Foxes-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. No, it is the east bound that we contend for.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, if you will mistake the point, I cannot help it, I assure you I do not. Pray take notice of it, it is called 130 acres in your Act of Parliament.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, 130 acres.

L. C. J. Now then the east of your land by your own shewing is Mill bank; the east of Mill-bank is the Mill, whereas the west part is St. Katherine's, so all your deeds and records say; but the east part of the land is Mill-bank.

Mr. S. Maynard. No, my Lord, Ratcliff Mill.

L. C. J. But I say, ay, brother. Then how broad doth Foxes-lane extend?

Mr. Att. Gen. 'Tis reckoned 30 foot in Carter's lease, I think.

L. C. J. That is a lease that I perceive there is some controversy about, therefore I do not so much mind that: it is a perch of land I think in some of your evidences.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where Foxes-lane is, is the four acres that were surrender'd; now that being the west bound of the eleven acres, where then are the other seven?

L. C. J. Read the deed poll again, the particulars and bounds only.

Clerk [Reads.] All those my four and twenty acres and an half—

Mr. Att. Gen. The east bound your Lordship fees is the Mill: now your Lordship makes an objection, that if it were as we say, an overshot Mill, it could not have been driven—

L. C. J. Do not, pray, make any silly objection for me, and then think to answer it. I tell you I do say, that it is impossible there could be any Mill there, but a Tide-Mill: the thing is as plain, Mr. Attorney, as any thing in the world can be; go on with your evidence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Pray Swear John Somerly—
[Which was done]—How long have you known the place in question?

Somerly. I have known it about 27 or 28 years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know where the Mill stood, or was reported to stand?

Somerly. I know where it was reported to stand, but I never knew the Mill myself, it was demolished before my time.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was it reported to stand?

Somerly. As it was reported, it stood about half the length of the hall off the bank, rather leaning to the river of Thames than the highway.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was the way to the Mill?

Somerly. At Cock-bill.

L. C. J. That your own evidence say, was on the west-side of the Mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Shadwell?

Somerly. I know that that is called Shadwell. Do you mean the well?

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes; how far is the well from Cock-bill?

Somerly. Half the length of the hall.

Mr. Williams. How far is it east of Foxes-lane?

Somerly. Truly, I cannot well tell.

L. C. J.

L. C. J. The question is, whether that be the well that is mentioned in the evidences?

Somerly. I never knew any other well; I paid for filling of it up.

Mr. Williams. What was it? Was it not a pond formerly?

Somerly. It was a well.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was it called?

Somerly. Shadwell it was called, I knew no other name it had; and that well was wharfed about, and there was a piece of wood about six foot long put into it, and it was on the side of the hill; a Cooper had it in his possession, and he us'd to put his hoops into it—

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember the ditch that run under the Lynches?

Somerly. I remember there was a ditch that run a long way, there were three or four bridges over it.

Mr. Williams. Was that a wide ditch?

Somerly. It had planks to go over, and it was a deep ditch?

Mr. Att. Gen. When you knew it, did cattle feed there?

Somerly. Not in my time.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When you first knew that well, was it reputed an ancient well?

Somerly. I knew it not till I came to buy it.

Mr. Att. Gen. What do you know of the raising of Fox's-lane?

Somerly. I lived there 26 years ago, and in the time since I lived in it, it is raised the length of my stick and more: for when the tide came in strong, it used to drive stones and planks in at the windows. There was a Waterhouse erected upon Wapping-wall, and they went to lay pipes along the street, but they could not lay them there, for they found great pieces of timber, and other things in the ground that hindered it; and upon that they raised the ground.

Mr. Williams. Was not there a dam made at the end of Fox's-lane to keep out the tide?

Somerly. I never knew of any.

L. C. J. Was not Fox's-lane reputed an ancient way?

Somerly. I suppose they were continually paving it to raise it higher and higher.

Mr. Att. Gen. When you knew it first, was it higher than the marsh?

Somerly. It was all built when I came thither. It is six yards higher at one end than the other.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear John Holmes—[Which was done.]—Do you know the houses in question, between Fox's-lane and Cock-bill?

Holmes. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known it?

Holmes. I have known the place a matter of 28 years or more.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know it before it was built?

Holmes. No, I did not take notice of it, to say notice.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know that place that is called Shadwell?

Holmes. No.

Mr. Sol. Gen. What do you know of the raising of Fox's-lane?

Holmes. I never did know of raising the lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Not at all?

L. C. J. Was it not all the time you knew it a common passage?

Holmes. Yes, a common highway.

L. C. J. Shew, if you can, that there was any highway from North to South, but Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Cock-bill?

Holmes. That is quite off from it.

L. C. J. Let me ask you a question. Suppose you were to go for the purpose from Shadwell down to the river of Thames, would you go to Cock-bill or Fox's-lane?

Holmes. If I had occasion to go down to Pelican-stairs, then I would go to Fox's-Lane; but if I were to go to Bell-wharf, I would go to Cock-bill.

L. C. J. That is quite another way.

Mr. Sol. Gen. It is southward of Cock-bill, where the Mill stood.

Mr. Att. Gen. That adjoined just upon the way.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Doth not Cock-bill lead to the Thames?

Holmes. Cock-bill is the first beginning of the going down to Bell-wharf.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Swear Eleanor Barefoot and Mary Day. [Eleanor Barefoot was sworn.] Do you know Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes, I know it very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long have you known it?

Barefoot. Threescore and almost six years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then you knew it before it was built?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the old Mill?

Barefoot. Who, Sir?

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember who first built there?

Barefoot. I cannot tell.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray, when you knew it first, what was it, and whose?

Barefoot. It was a Marsh-ground from Cock-bill to Fenner's-field; it was counted and known to be Mr. Stepkins's; he was a great Freeholder, and Owner of all the ground up to East-Smithfield.

L. C. J. How? Why is not the Lynches between Cock-bill and St. Katherine's?

Barefoot. The upper ground was only belonging to the Dean of Sr. Paul's.

L. C. J. Do you remember that which is now called Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes.

L. C. J. Was it a lane at that time?

Barefoot. Yes, it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you remember how the water came in there?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it come up to the bank?

Barefoot. At high tides it came over, so that none could pass.

L. C. J. But at common tides?

Barefoot. It came at common tides till it was raised.

L. C. J. But it was an usual passage for Carts and Carriages?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How was the Mill driven that was there?

Barefoot. There was a Mill in my time, that went with the tide, and all the water that came down from that Mill, came into a pond, and so to the Mill-dam, and so drove this Mill.

L. C. J. Which Mill dost thou speak of? Didst thou know Ratcliff-Mill?

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know Cock-bill-Mill?

Barefoot. Yes, that I speak of.

L. C. J. And how was it driven, dost thou say?

Bare-

Barefoot. It was driven by the water that came from the river in a sluice.

L. C. J. It came out of the Thames?

Barefoot. Yes; with the tide.

L. C. J. How did it run?

Barefoot. It had a great huge sluice.

Mr. Williams. Was that in the Lynch-ditch, or other way?

Barefoot. It ran into a pond.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did that pond stand?

Barefoot. In New Gravel-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where was the head of the pond?

Barefoot. It went out with the tide.

Mr. Williams. Where?

Barefoot. Between the street and the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. How near was the pond to Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. A quarter of a mile off.

Mr. Williams. West of Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know Green-bank?

Barefoot. Yes.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far is that from Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. Half a mile off.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the well called Shadwell?

Barefoot. Yes I did.

Mr. Sol. Gen. On which side of Fox's-lane did Shadwell stand?

Barefoot. It was between the mill and Broad-bridge; eastward of Broad-bridge.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far was it from the mill?

Barefoot. A pretty way.

Mr. Att. Gen. How far do you think?

Barefoot. About 40 or 60 foot: the well was between the mill, I say, and Broad-Bridge; Fox's-lane stood west.

L. C. J. When you knew Fox's-lane first, what was it between the Lynches on the north, and the Thames on the south?

Barefoot. A place for Carts and Horses to go.

Mr. Att. Gen. And you say it was all marsh-ground from Cock-bill to St. Katherine's?

Barefoot. Yes, it was all a low ground.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whose ground was it counted to be?

Barefoot. Mr. Stepkins's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Had the Dean ever any thing to do there?

Barefoot. The upper-ground was the Dean of Pau's, but the lower-ground was Mr. Stepkins's.

Mr. Williams. Was there a bridge over the Lynch ditch at the end of Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. There was a bridge and a cart-way.

L. C. J. Do you know it was marsh ground on the east-side of Fox's-lane? Did it ever lie under water?

Barefoot. At high tides and such as that it was over-flowed.

L. C. J. But at common tides did it use to go over Fox's-lane?

Barefoot. I cannot tell that truly, it is now raised very high, it was much lower; but I am sure the tide sometimes came beyond.

Mr. Att. Gen. When the water was in the great pond, did not it come by the Lynch ditch?

Barefoot. It came out of the Thames.

L. C. J. Do you remember any way that led up to the Lynches by the well?

Barefoot. The Lynches did not belong to Mr. Stepkins; there was the mill.

L. C. J. But answer me, was there any way that went up to the Lynches by the well?

Barefoot. There was no passage to go through, but at Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a way at Cock-bill?

L. C. J. That is farther east than the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Shadwell is the bounds of our land.

L. C. J. But where is that? That is the question, Mr. Attorney. I remember what the woman said indeed the last time, if there were as many wells as there were panes in the glass-window here, that was the right well. But that will not decide the controversy.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Austin Cope—[Which was done.]—Do you know Cock-bill?

Cope. Yes, I do.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you not know a mill that was at Ratcliff?

Cope. There was one at Bell-wharf.

L. C. J. How long ago is it, that you remember it?

Cope. Threescore years ago.

L. C. J. How was that mill driven?

Cope. With the tide.

Mr. Att. Gen. Where did the tide come in?

Cope. At Frying-pan-stairs.

Mr. Att. Gen. Whither did it go?

Cope. It went into the Dam, and so drove the mill. There was an iron-mill built by one White twenty years after.

L. C. J. How far did the tide go up from Ratcliff-mill westward?

Mr. Att. Gen. As near as you can remember, what was it that stopped the tide?

L. C. J. Ay, how far did the tide go before it stopped?

Cope. Almost as far as New Gravel-lane.

L. C. J. Did the tide come up as far as Fox's-lane?

Cope. It flowed over at some tides.

L. C. J. What did it at usual and common and ordinary tides?

Cope. It never came so high.

Mr. Att. Gen. How high did it come then?

Cope. Hard by it came.

Mr. Att. Gen. How near?

Cope. Within forty foot upon reasonable tides.

Mr. Att. Gen. And did that help to turn this mill?

Cope. Yes; it went to the Dam, and so it drove it.

L. C. J. Where was your way from north to south?

Cope. At Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there a bridge there, over which the carts went into the lane, under which the water did run?

Cope. Yes, there was.

L. C. J. What is it that lies beyond the mill?

Cope. Ratcliff-Town.

L. C. J. Which was further eastward, Cock-Hill or the mill?

Cope. Cock-bill.

L. C. J. So it is by your own map; and then where can the mill bank be but Fox's-lane?

Mr. Att. Gen. Shadwell is our bounds.

L. C. J.

L. C. J. Robin Hood upon Greendale stood; therefore this must be your land: that is all the argument I can make of it. Your boundaries do make it as plain as the nose in a man's face.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Holwell——[Which was done.]——How long have you known this place, the lands in question?

Holwell. Not above a year.

L. C. J. He is your Surveyor, I think.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is so, my Lord. Pray you, Cope, which way did the water go?

Cope. Westward.

L. C. J. But which way did you use to go to the river from the Lynches?

Cope. We sometimes went the lower way, and sometimes the higher way.

L. C. J. Which was the higher way?

Cope. Ratcliff-Highway.

L. C. J. And which was the lower way?

Cope. Through Wapping and Shadwell: Shadwell is the lower way.

L. C. J. Thou talkest of the north-west way; but if you were to go directly from north to south, which way would you have gone?

Cope. Down Cock-bill, or down Broad-bridge.

L. C. J. Where is that?

Cope. Beyond Cock-bill.

L. C. J. Whereabouts is it?

Cope. Within a little of Fox's-lane.

L. C. J. When you went down Cock-bill, upon which hand did you leave the mill?

Cope. If I went the lower way, I left the mill on the left-hand.

L. C. J. But when you went the higher way down Cock-bill?

Cope. Then we left the mill behind us.

L. C. J. What dost thou mean by behind thee?

Cope. I left it north.

L. C. J. That could never be, man.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, he is right.

L. C. J. But I say he is not right, Mr. Attorney, for Cock-bill is north of the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Cope, do you know Fox's-lane?

Cope. Yes, very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. Is it raised?

Cope. Yes; eight or nine foot.

Mr. Att. Gen. What was the reason of its being raised?

Cope. It was not fitting for carts to go over.

L. C. J. Why so?

Cope. The water came upon it.

Mr. Att. Gen. And then to come to the admeasurement, taking in the place in question, it makes just 130 acres, which is our number, and no more.

L. C. J. Then you will leave the Dean nothing.

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, he has 2000*l.* a year.

L. C. J. Where?

Mr. Att. Gen. In the east, beyond this place.

L. C. J. Why, would you have any of the land that belongs to the mill?

Mr. Att. Gen. We claim this as marsh-land; which they have nothing to do with, and the number of acres will not be answered without it. Mr. Holwell, have you admeasured the marsh?

Holwell. Yes; I have, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. From whence did you begin?

Holwell. From Hermitage-Dock.

Mr. Att. Gen. Within what bounds?

Holwell. That which they call the Lynches and the marsh to St. Katherine's from the well?

Mr. Att. Gen. And how much doth it make?

VOL. VII.

Holwell. Besides the well and the Lynches, I find it something above 130 acres.

L. C. J. Somewhat above, how much pry'thee?

Holwell. Not an acre above.

Mr. Williams. Pray, Sir, how many acres lies east of Gravel-lane?

Holwell. Besides the well and the Lynches, I can make but fifty acres and an half.

L. C. J. Where did you reckon up the whole?

Mr. Att. Gen. To make up the 130 acres, he took in the mill and all.

L. C. J. That is very well.

Mr. Att. Gen. Why, my Lord, it is no more than 130 acres, and so much we must have.

L. C. J. Look into the survey that you produced, and see what that says; Besides all——

Mr. Att. Gen. Those lie eastward of the mill.

L. C. J. Pray did you measure the wall?

Holwell. Wapping wall is 20 acres.

Mr. Att. Gen. If they will consent, the Jury shall have the survey with them.

Mr. Williams. With all our hearts, let them have it.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, both sides consent, you shall have the survey with you; but without that consent you could not have had it, it not being under seal.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then we desire our last verdict may be read. Mr. Sutton, was it a verdict upon full evidence?

Sutton. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many hours did it last?

Sutton. Five or Six.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there a view in it?

Sutton. There was so.

L. C. J. Read it——[Which was done.]——Mr. Holwell, how much pray, is the land between Fox's-lane and the mill?

Holwell. Below the Lynches I find it to be seven acres and an half.

L. C. J. Can you expect then that all those words of gardens, orchards, &c. should be answered under seven acres and an half? Besides, the first and ancient reservation of rent was 10*l.* a year; after, it was increased to 16*l.* a year, and it doth appear the mill turned to so little account, that it was pulled down, and so the land was to answer the rent; which, for a ground-rent upon a Church-lease, in those days, was very great. Have you done now?

Mr. Att. Gen. We have done for the present, my Lord.

L. C. J. What say you to it then for the Plaintiff, Gentlemen?

Mr. S. Stringer. May it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; if we should give no further evidence at all than what we have already given, but leave it upon this, I dare affirm it plainly appears that they have no title at all to this land. As to their last piece of evidence I would first give an answer to that, and that is their verdict; and that which I would observe upon it, and say to it, is this; it was a verdict obtained upon forged Deeds: Deeds found, as is pretended, and as you have heard from their two special witnesses, in a very extraordinary manner, found in a garret. But by what art prepared, and that they are forged, I question not but we shall give you satisfaction. But besides, as to their admeasurement, it seems as they would have it, 130 acres is the question about the extent of the marsh. So much they claim, and we shall bring two Surveyors that will give you an account upon their oaths, that between Fox's-lane, which we say is the west boundary of our land, and the east of theirs, and Hermitage Dock, where the marsh ends, there is above 130 acres; and so they do not want their number. For all the evidence that they have given out of Records, we agree them to be as they say; and by that agreement shall do ourselves no harm at all, for they all do confirm our assertion. They place the eastern bound of the marsh at Ratcliff-Town; now at Fox's-lane doth Ratcliff Town begin. The art has been to confound the Cause by puzzling boundaries, when it is a plain apparent mistake they run upon; and indeed I may very well say, a wilful one too. They would have us confine all to a mill and a little ditch, when there are at least seven acres always enjoyed with it, and all called the mill; which had a pond, gardens, orchards, tenements, &c. And now there are very large drains necessarily made, to keep the water from annoying the Inhabitants, and to carry it away. But for a further evidence of our title, we shall first prove, that upon a Bill exhibited in the Exchequer by Mr. Attorney General, against Stepkins their ancestor, to know what incroachments had been made, what belonged to the Dean of Paul's, and what to Mr. Stepkins, are fully set out. There it is proved, that the bounds of the marsh were Wapping-wall, alias Fox's-lane. The marsh was continually overflowed with water; but now in our ground there was a great many ditches and places to keep the water for the service of the mill. When we came to build upon our ground, which was 15 Jacobi, (then it began) then he brought an action, and did pretend that we did incroach the wall somewhat into the marsh; there we had a verdict upon a view, and after a non-suit upon full evidence. There was likewise a Bill exhibited in Chancery against Stepkins the father; wherein the bounds are set forth, and he in his answer particularly enumerates the boundaries. And it has been constantly the reputation of the Place, that this was the Dean's lands, surveyed as the Dean's lands, sold in the late times of usurpation as the Dean's lands. The first thing, my Lord, which they produced, and that we did then, and do now controvert, is Carter's lease: This, they say, was found in the garret; and they bring two witnesses for it: But how they have behaved themselves! What confusion there is in their evidence! You see—

L. C. J. Brother Stringer, if you have any evidence to give, pray give that first, and leave your remarks till the last; you shall then say what you will, but first give your evidence.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, we shall pursue your direction: We say, upon Fox's building, Stepkins furnishing that the wall belonged to him, comes and brings an action of ejectment against Fox's tenants, for this wall, and upon trial the verdict went against him. Then there was another action brought, and he was non suited upon that. Afterwards there was a bill preferred against him, and in his answer he confesseth that his wall-marsh bounded upon Fox's-lane. Here are the bill and answer.

Which were read.

As likewise copies of two Records, one in the Common Pleas; the other in the King's Bench.

Hill. 12 Jacobi Ejectment; George Boswell, Plaintiff, against Tho. Fox, Defendant; not guilty, pleaded, a verdict for the Defendant.

Mich. 14 Jacobi Ejectment; William Sorrel,

Plaintiff, against Tho. Fox; Not-guilty pleaded, and the Plaintiff became Nonsuit.

Sir John Trevor. My Lord, we have this further piece of evidence; we have here a lease made by Stepkins, of seven acres of lands, westward of Fox's-lane, which divides the marsh from the mill ditches, and there is a covenant, that if he recover any part of the wall, marsh-wall, the tenant shall have the advantage of it, and increase his rent.

Which Lease, bearing date, 16 Aug. 13 Jac. Anno Dom. 1615, was read.

Mr. Williams. This was in time between the non-suit and the verdict.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, as I did open it, there was an information exhibited by Mr. Attorney Gen. Noy, 7 Car. I. against our tenants and theirs, and upon that information there were examinations of witnesses, and all the bounds of both parties particularly set out; which make it all as plain and clear as can be. This cannot be set up to serve a turn; it was in 7 Car. I. so long ago; and when that shews the wall to be the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's, it answers all their pretence of a lease—

L. C. J. Look you, brother, that cannot be given in evidence, and I will tell you why; if it were an information against Stepkins himself, he being the party under whom they claim, no doubt it were evidence. But it is against the tenants of the one, and the tenants of the other; who only could support their own tenancies, but they could not know their landlords particular titles; and then this cannot be evidence to bind their inheritance.

Mr. S. Stringer. We submit it to you, my Lord: Then we shall offer you a survey. In the year 1649, this was exposed to sale as Church-lands, and a survey taken, and found to be the inheritance of the Church of Paul's; and as such sold for 9500 l. and enjoyed by the purchasers till the restoration.

Mr. Williams. Yes, and to that very person sold from whom they say they had these leases, which they have produced: That is, to Winterburn, whose Executor Knowles was, as he says; and if he had such a lease, which had then been forty years in being, would he have given so much money, or ventured to purchase it as the inheritance of the Church?

Mr. S. Stringer. Here is the survey then taken.

Mr. Att. Gen. We oppose the reading of your survey, because it had not any authority to warrant it.

L. C. J. Nay, Mr. Attorney, though there was no sufficient authority, yet such things have always been allowed as evidence. You cannot but remember it was done in the case of Finsbury Rotten-Row, as they called it White-cross-street.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then let them read the commission it was made upon.

Mr. S. Pemberton. We have none; there were many things done then of this nature, without commission under seal.

L. C. J. Ay, they did them by orders from Committees. Read it.

It was read, dated Dec. An. 1649.

Mr. S. Stringer. Now we will shew the deeds of purchase, which was by deed enrolled.

*Dated 22 Nov. An. 1650. for 9540 *l.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, because they pretend this to be an overshot-mill, as they call it; though it be plain it could not be by the place, yet we have three tide millers that we would trouble you with a little: but first here are some others, Bland, Marr, and and Leburn, who will give an account of it—(They were sworn)—Bland, do you know the houses in question?

Bland. Yes.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known them?

Bland. Thirty years.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Pray what is the common reputation whose the lands were?

Bland. It was always taken to be the Dean's lands.

Mr. Williams. Who were the tenants?

Bland. Mr. Whitwick and Mr. Winterburn.

L. C. J. Prithee canst thou tell what was taken to be the east boundary of Wapping-marsh?

Bland. Fox's-lane.

L. C. J. Was that the reputation upon your oath, in all your time?

Bland. Yes, ever since I knew it.

Mr. Williams. Bland, pray do you know the pond?

Bland. The ponds were filled up; but there were ditches in my time.

L. C. J. How near were the ditches to Fox's-lane?

Bland. Within ten foot.

Mr. Williams. What was the use of those ditches?

Bland. The water came in at Bell-wharf, and filled up the ditches with the tide, and so it went back again.

Mr. S. Stringer. Can you tell who purchased these lands of the State in the late times?

Bland. Whitwick and Winterburn.

Sir John Trevor. Swear William Kemp and Curtlett. (which was done)

Mr. Williams. Hark you, Mr. Curtlett, we would ask you a question. My Lord, your Lordship observes, there is a well called Shadwell, that is at the east end of their marsh. We shall shew where that well is: there was a well very lately just by wall-marsh, hard by the place where the Church is now built, which was called Shadwell, and from which the Church has its name. Curtlett, do you know Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. Yes, I do.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known it?

Curtlett. I have known it sixty years.

Mr. Williams. When you first knew it, whose land was it?

Curtlett. I am ignorant of the original title, or the derivative title, I know not whose it was, or is.

Mr. S. Pemberton. But whose was it reputed to be, that we mean.

Curtlett. Sometimes it was reputed Mrs. Moor's, sometimes Winterburn's, sometimes one's, sometimes another's.

Mr. Williams. Do you remember the mill that was in this ground in question?

Curtlett. Yes, very well.

Mr. Williams. How was that mill driven?

Curtlett. The water came in at Bell-wharf, eastward, out of the Thames into the pond, and so run beyond Broad-bridge, and vented it self into divers ditches; and when the tide went out, it returned back again, and employed the mill.

Mr. Williams. How far went the ditches?

Curtlett. Some of them to Fox's-lane; and one principal ditch turned up half way the lane, that people were forced to have boards and planks to go over it.

L. C. J. The thing is very plain; had it been as they say, an overshot mill, this provision that was made of water for it, for aught I see, would have drowned all the ground round about it.

VOL. VII.

Curtlett. When I was a Boy we used to swim in that place that was near Shadwell, in the eddy; there I have seen the water as it went out, and the mill wrought with it as it went back again.

L. C. J. Was there not a way, when you knew it first, from North to South?

Curtlett. I cannot well tell.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a way from Ratcliff high-way at Cock-bill, to the river of Thames?

Curtlett. There was a common way for carts and horses down to the Ballast-wharf, and there was a great vacant place—

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray let me ask you, did you ever hear these lands reputed to be Stepkins's when you knew them first?

Curtlett. We have heard talk of that Gentleman.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long ago?

Curtlett. I have not heard of him this twenty Years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Have you above twenty years ago?

Curtlett. If I did hear of him, I do not believe then it was in his possession; I cannot tell whose title is best: You have, I suppose, both of you better witnesses than I; conveyances and deeds.

Mr. Att. Gen. He is a wise witness, he will not swear whose it is.

L. C. J. He is so, Mr. Attorney; I wish yours were so too.

Mr. Williams. Pray what was it beyond Shadwell, and how near was Shadwell to Marsh-wall?

Curtlett. Shadwell was on the further side, near Fox's-lane.

Mr. Williams. To the East or West of Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. To the West.

Mr. Williams. Did you know the well that is called Shadwell?

Curtlett. I know there was such a small spring.

L. C. J. Did it lie East of Fox's-lane, or West, do you say?

Curtlett. West, it lay.

Mr. Williams. Pray did the place where you used to swim, come up as far as the wall?

Curtlett. Oh, no.

L. C. J. I believe that was within the Thames only.

Mr. Williams. How near have you swam to Fox's-lane?

Curtlett. It was in the Thames, in an eddy, there the water went underneath the mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. In whose ground was that well that you call Shadwell?

Curtlett. I cannot tell in whose ground it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was it in the Lynches, or in the marsh ground, upon your oath?

Curtlett. I cannot tell indeed whose ground it was in.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did it rise very high?

Curtlett. It was out of the high ground where the Church is built.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did you ever hear of any well but what lay between Fox's-lane and the mill?

Curtlett. Sir, I can only give an account where that well lies that was called Shadwell, where the Church is now.

Mr. Att. Gen. How many wells have you known?

Curtlett. None but that, Sir.

L. C. J. He does not know as many as there are panes of glass in the window, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. Williams. And this, he says, lay West of Fox's-lane, and there is your Shadwell bounds for you.

Mr. Att. Gen. I ask you again, that spring which you mentioned, did it lie in the Dean and Chapter's Lynches, or no?

Curtlett. I tell you I know not whose the ground was; the Church stands there now.

Mr. S. Lutwich. Did it lie in upper Shadwell?

L. C. J. He answers as plain as any man can, it was where the Church now is.

Mr. Williams. Where is Kemp? Do you know the houses in question.

Kemp. The houses in Shadwell I do know, between Bell-wharf and Fox's-lane; I knew them before they were built as they are now; there were some small houses built here and there all along. There was a pond and ditches to receive the water of the tide; but at Broad-bridge especially, there were houses along to the northward; among the rest, Mr. Craven's house who had a large orchard and garden.

L. C. J. Where was that?

Kemp. Eastward of Fox's-lane, and several other houses there were.

Mr. Williams. Whose Inheritance was it?

Kemp. Mrs. Moor was my master's landlady, and Shadwell was reputed her land and ground.

Mr. Williams. She was Lessee under the Church.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Did you know the cuts and ditches in that ground?

Kemp. Yes, Sir.

Mr. S. Pemberton. How far went they westward?

Kemp. The ditch ran all in one till it came to Broad-bridge, where it parted to the northward and the westward.

L. C. J. How near Fox's-lane?

Kemp. Within a dozen, or twenty yards of Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. What sort of ground was it? was it not marsh-ground?

Kemp. A man that built boats, in winter-time put his shallops into the pond, otherwise it was very good ground to the northward; there were very many good houses built, and since Mr. Neale had to do with Shadwell, they have built in Mr. Craven's, and built a water-house, and two other houses there.

L. C. J. Read the survey again, that mentions Craven's house there.

(Which was done.)

Kemp. That was bending northward that way.

Mr. Williams. It is part of the seven acres now in question.

L. C. J. Do not you contend for the brew-house?

Mr. Att. Gen. For the water-house we do.

L. C. J. Is not the water-house built upon part of Craven's ground?

Kemp. Yes my Lord, it is.

Mr. Williams. When did you know this first?

Kemp. Fifty years ago.

Mr. Williams. Was this ground orchards or gardens then?

Kemp. Several places of it were gardens and orchards; some places had houses, chiefly to the northward, some good houses and orchards, especially Mr. Craven's.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you speak of the hilly or the low ground?

Kemp. The middle ground, chiefly that that lay northward.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the Lynches, the hilly ground?

Kemp. Up higher to Ratcliff high-way, I did.

Mr. Att. Gen. Did you know the ditch that came under the bottom of the Lynches?

Kemp. The stream did run in several places, but the ground was good ground, northward specially.

Mr. Att. Gen. Were there any houses built on the south side of that ditch?

Kemp. There were a great many built between the ditch and the Thames, between Bell-wharf and Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. What, fifty years ago?

L. C. J. Your own survey says so.

Mr. Williams. Call Daniel Hams—Swear him. (which was done.)—Do you know the mill and lands in question?

Hams. I knew it when it was a mill.

L. C. J. How long is it since you first knew it?

Hams. Forty years.

L. C. J. Prithee what kind of a mill was it?

Hams. A ground-shot mill; she took in water at Bell-wharf and it ran towards the west to Fox's-lane, in several branches and ditches.

L. C. J. How! A ground-shot mill, sayst thou? why these Gentlemen say it was an overshot mill.

Hams. My Lord, it could be no overshot mill, for the water will not rise high enough to drive such a mill; it ran in several ditches to preserve it from rising to overflow the ground. Besides, my father, who was a mill-wright himself, told me he had known it threescore years, and knew it always a ground-shot mill: He told me of all the mills about London, what they were.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray how old was your father when he told you so?

Hams. He had known them, he said, sixty years, and he has been dead twenty years.

Mr. Att. Gen. Why the mill was removed; he could not know it so long.

L. C. J. I know no proof of it but your deeds.

Hams. My Lord, there it was, he said.

Mr. Att. Gen. Was there not a pond and ditches?

Hams. There must be ditches to receive the water as it came in; but still the more the tide came in, that filled up the ponds; and as it went back again, it drove the mill.

Mr. Williams. What profession are you of, pray?

Hams. I am a mill-wright.

Mr. Att. Gen. Pray do they make use of a trough in such a mill?

Hams. They do for an overshot mill.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here is a trough of lead in their lease. Do not they use a trough in an undershot mill?

Hams. No, if it be by the tide, a ground-shot mill, there is no necessity of a trough.

Mr. Williams. We have a great many witnesses to this point. Swear Grindy—(which was done.)—Are you a mill-wright?

Grindy. I am only a miller.

Mr. Williams. Did you know the mill in question?

Grindy. I cannot remember it, Sir.

L. C. J. How long have you known the place?

Grindy. Thirty or forty years: But I had no acquaintance with that mill they speak of; but I know it is impossible for any overshot mill to be there: For I keep part of a tide-mill my self, and have done so this forty years; and I know the water must rise at least, ten, twelve, or fourteen foot higher than it needs in a tide-mill. For we take in our water as the tide comes in, and we have a pair of gates that are hung with hinges at the top, which open open as the tide comes in, but the water as it goeth out, shuts it again, and that keeps the water to stand three or four hours in some mills, and then we have only guts that belong to the wheel, and when we draw up the gates, the water goes out. We have no water that comes above the shaft, which is half the height of the wheel, which is sixteen foot high. To talk of an overshot-mill, the water must rise so high as to go over the whole marsh.

L. C. J. And must drown all the town and country too. It is plainly so, Mr. Attorney, talk as long as you will.

Mr. Att. Gen. Friend, I ask you but one short, plain question: I would know, can they use a leaden trough with those Tide-mills, as you call them?

Grindy. We can use none, nor do we make any such thing.

Mr. Att. Gen. Would not the springs in the Lynches carry an overshot-mill?

Grindy. Sir, I have seen the place all about many times, and I will lay any man 20*l.* to 20*s.* that all the springs thereabouts shall not produce a quarter enough water.

Mr. Williams. Where is George Care? Swear him—[Which was done.—] Do you know Fox's-lane?

Care. Very well.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known it?

Care. Eight and Fifty years.

Mr. Williams. Did you know Shadwell, the well so called?

Care. That I did, Sir.

Mr. Williams. Where stood it, pray?

Care. At the upper-end of Fox's-lane as we go westward, and just at the side of the Church-yard, there is one now, and brick'd over head, where they used to fetch water: I never knew any other.

Mr. Williams. Was that called Shadwell?

Care. I never knew any other but what I tell you of.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray what was usually taken to be the east bound of Wapping-marsh?

Care. The west-side of Fox's-lane was called Marsh-wall, or Wall marsh, and that was the boundary to Stepkins's lands; and eastward was always the lands of the Dean of Paul's, and I have known it this eight and fifty years; nay, I was the first that ever built an house in Fox's-lane.

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know the Lynches, or the high ground northward?

Care. I know it not by that name.

Mr. Att. Gen. This well you speak of, did it not rise out of that ground?

Care. It was by the Church-yard that is now.

Mr. Att. Gen. You have claim'd the Inheritance of it.

Mr. Williams. Sir, we hope we shall not need to be taught which is our Inheritance; where is Mr. Marr? We shall now, my Lord, answer the admeasurement made by her Surveyor Holwell. Pray will you, Mr. Marr, tell the Court how many acres it is?

Marr. The land which is counted Wapping-marsh, which is bounded on Fox's-lane east, on the Dean's land west, upon Grass-mill, Well close, Nightingale-lane, &c. if we take it to the upper ground, doth contain 130 acres; but take in that which is in question too, and it makes 141 acres.

Mr. Williams. Did you measure it too, Mr. Leyburn?

Leyburn. I did so too, Sir, and it is as he says.

L. C. J. How much is it?

Leyburn. I took the whole from St. Katherine's to Fox's-lane, and it makes 130 acres besides the upland and foreland, and the like between Grass-mill and Wall-marsh-wall: it is at least so much; it is, I think, somewhat more, the ditches being undetermined.

L. C. J. Well, what is it all this while you keep my brother Gregory for?

Mr. Williams. If your Lordship please, we have only a short question to ask Mr. Baron Gregory; if he please to be sworn—[Which was done—] Where is Mr. Knowles? Sir, you were pleased to say that the writings were carried to Mr. Neale's Counsel in Gray's-Inn, and that that writing was among them.

Knowles. They were so, and I believe it was among them.

Mr. Williams. My Lord, Mr. Baron Gregory had the perusal of the writings.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Williams, my brother Gregory was not named to be the Counsellor in Gray's-Inn.

Knowles. No, one Gage, or some such name.

L. C. J. I suppose it was to Mr. Cage's chamber, that married Okey's widow.

Mr. S. Stringer. I believe it was, and I am sorry we have kept Mr. Baron Gregory so long. Knowles, pray did you know they were with Mr. Baron Gregory?

L. C. J. Did you know they were with my brother Gregory?

Knowles. No, my Lord, that I remember.

L. C. J. Well, brother, we cannot help your staying now, but remember you had an offer made you at first, and you are punished for refusing it. Go on, brother Stringer.

Mr. S. Pemberton. My Lord, that which we were surprized with the last Trial, was the newness of these Deeds to us. It look'd to us to be so strange a thing, so amazing a thing to us, that we knew not how to give an answer to it. We have since considered of these things, and your Lordship doth see what account they themselves have given of them; and what an improbability it is, that these deeds should be found, as they say. Here was a possession which we have proved under the Dean of Paul's lease for so long, this they would strip us of, these Deeds they have trumped up. It made us look into it more warily, and we cannot conceive it probable, or any thing likely, that the Deed of Purchase, whereby this land is pretended to be purchased into the family of the Stepkins's, should be found in the hands of the Dean of Paul's Lessee, who likewise purchased it of the state, as the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's. How could the Deed of Purchase from Hill be in our Lessee's House?

Mr. Att. Gen. It was not, that is a mistake.

Mr. S. Pemberton. Good Mr. Attorney, do not interrupt me. We must rely upon it, that they swore it the last time, and that the Deed of Inheritance was made four days before our Deed, on purpose to warrant the trick. Here is likewise a surrender made between Hall and Stepkins produced. How should the Dean's Lessees come to have that Deed of surrender? But to satisfy your Lordship in this matter, we shall give a full and fair evidence that these Deeds are forged.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, we have had a violent suspicion, that these Deeds were forged. But we suspect it now no longer, for we have detected it, and will will shew as palpable self-evident forgery upon the face of these deeds as ever was. I desire to see the Deed of the 13th of November, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary from Marcellus Hall to Roper: and that of the 22d of December, in the same years, from Marcellus Hall to Carter, I desire to see too. Your Lordship sees the use of these Deeds. The one is grafted upon our lease from Dean Fecknam, where it is recited, that the mill is demolished, and a new one erected in another place (says their Deed;) and upon that they set up the notion of an overshot-mill, and all the puzzling matter brought into this cause. But I dare undertake to prove them plainly forged.

Mr. Att. Gen. That is an undertaking indeed.

Mr. Bradbury. It is an undertaking indeed to detect the Defendant's artifice; but I will venture upon it, and shall demonstrate it so evidently, that Mr. Attorney himself shall be convinced they are forged.

Mr. Att. Gen. Come on, let us see this demonstration.

Mr. Bradbury. The Deeds have brought that evidence upon their own faces, that is 1000 witnesses.

Mr. Williams. Pristee open the Exception.

Mr. Bradbury. If your Lordship please to look upon them, the stile of the King and Queen in both run thus. The one is, This Indenture made the 13th day of November, in the second and third years of the reigns of our sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Archdukes of Austria, Dukes of Burgundy, Millain and Brabant, Counts of Hasburg, Flanders and Tyroll. The other is, This Indenture made the 22d day of December in the same year. Now in November and December, second and third of Philip and Mary, it was impossible for any man in the world to draw a Deed in this form that those two writings are—

Mr. Att. Gen. Is that your demonstration?

L. C. J. Pray let him go on, methinks it is very ingenious.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, I had the hint from my Lord Coke in his first Institutes; not as to this particular stile, for I know he is mistaken there, but for the detecting of forgeries in general.

L. C. J. It is very well, pray go on.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, at that time King Philip and Queen Mary, were, among other Stiles, stiled King and Queen of Naples, Princes of Spain and Sicily; they never were called King and Queen of Spain, and both the Sicilies then. And lastly, Burgundy was never put before Millain. Now to prove all this that I say, I have here all the Records of that time, which will prove their stile to be otherwise. First, We shall shew the Acts of Parliament of that time. The sitting began the 21st of October, in that year, which was before their Deeds, and ended the 9th of December after. We shall first read the titles of the Acts of Parliament; and you will find them just as I have opened them. Read the Statute-Book.

Clerk reads.] Acts made at a Parliament, begun and holden at Westminster, the one and twentieth day of October, in the second and third years of the reign of our most gracious sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain and Sicily, Archdukes of Austria, Dukes of Millain, Burgundy and Brabant, Counts of Hasburg, Flanders and Tyroll: and there continued and kept until the dissolution of the same, being the ninth day of December then next ensuing.

Mr. Bradbury. Here in the Acts made by the publick Council of the Kingdom, the stile is in the ancient manner. And your Lordship observes these no small differences. Here first Spain is left out in the enumeration of the Kingdoms, and so Sicily and Naples is instead of them. In the Deeds, Spain is put in before France; and the Sicilies made a Kingdom too. Secondly, Here in the stile of the Act they are called but Princes of Spain and Sicily, that in the Deeds is quite left out. And then in the Acts of Parliament, Millain is put before Burgundy, in the Deeds Burgundy before Millain. And how this great alteration of the stile should come to be put in a Miller's lease, is strange. We have next an account of all the fines of Hillary Term, which was the next Term following; for their first Deeds happen to be in Michaelmas Term, and then the Parliament sate too.

Many of which were read.

Mr. Bradbury. Here are likewise the Fines of Easter-Term following, which shew that still the old stile continued in all the publick Records. And if we could as easily have brought all the enrolments of Deeds, that would prove the same.

The Fines of Easter-Term read.

Mr. Bradbury. Now, my Lord, we shall shew when the stile turned, that was in Trinity-Term after.

The Fines read.

Mr. Bradbury. But I cannot see how these Deeds could be truly made at that time, when they stand single, and none like them can be shewn, except they come from the same forge that these do. I cannot believe the Miller alone, or he that drew his leases for him, could so long before prophesy what manner of stile should hereafter be used.

Mr. Williams. Your Lordship has heard our Deed of the 10th of December, in the same year, read already; but we having here the Ledger Book of the Church of St. Paul's, which cannot be made for a turn, but was written at that time; we desire the stile may be read there—[Which was done.]

—But to go a little further, to satisfy your Lordship that they are very likely to be forged, we shall give some evidence that this is not an unusual thing with some people concerned in this cause. The witnesses will name them to you, and give you an account of it. Swear this Lady and Sir Charles Cotterel. (Which was done.)

L. C. J. Well, what is it you call these persons to?

Sir John Trevor. To speak plain, my Lord, we call them to give an account of my Lady Ivy's forging a Mortgage from one Sir William Salkbill for 1500*l.* of a house in St. Martin's-lane, to which forgery Mr. Duffet, that Lady's husband was privy, and what benefit he should have by it, you will hear. Sir Charles Cotterel, pray will you tell what you know of my Lady Ivy in this matter.

Sir Charles Cotterel. My Lord, that which I have to say is this; my Lord, I am tenant to my Lady Salkbill, Sir William Salkbill's widow, in a house in St. Martin's-lane, and was so to her husband a year and a half before he died. The house hath been built backward, and the garden side they kept to themselves; but all the house that was first built, I took, and have it still. My Lord, my Lady Lady Ivy did come to the house about three months before Sir William died, parting from her husband Sir Thomas Ivy: she came thither as a refuge; where she had been before, and was received very kindly. He died, as I said, about three months after, and my Lady then desired to know how accounts stood between Sir William and her about moneys he had lent her, and supplied her with. And upon the account she appeared to owe Sir William 96*l.* she then took 4*l.* more out of my Lady Salkbill's money, and told her, now Madam, I owe you 100*l.* She had been entertained as a guest there without paying any thing for it, and at his death she continued with my Lady Salkbill three quarters of a year after. And being there (as she pretended) in great kindness to me, she persuaded my Lady and me, that the lease of my Lady's house should be turned over to me, in trust for a debt of fourscore pounds that was owing to me by Sir William Salkbill. Said I to my Lady Salkbill, Madam, I am in no doubt of my money, I pay as much rent as this in a year and more, I can pay myself that way; pray let me not meddle with any such thing, Mr. Duffett will be persuaded I intend to cheat them if I should. But still my Lady Ivy was at it, and prevailed upon my Lady Salkbill to press me to it. At last, upon their importunity, said I, if it be necessary for my Lady's service, let it be done what you think fit. She therefore gave direction to Mr. Sutton, and he came to me, and I directed him to draw a writing to turn over the house to me as a security. He asked me how much my debt was; fourscore pounds, said I. Said he, I should see my Lord of Salisbury's lease to my Lady, for he must take out some things to draw this by. He did see it, and took as much by note out of it as he thought fit, to make the other by. Then a writing was drawn, this was in June 1670, or 1671. I am not certain particularly which, but she brings this writing, and my Lady Salkbill signed it by her desire; and my Lady Ivy and Mr. Sutton were both witnesses to it. About a year after I heard that she set on foot a Mortgage of her own upon this house from Sir William Salkbill. I wondred at it, because when the account was made up, she appeared to be in Sir William's debt; and I told those that told me of it, I would believe it when I did see it. I was then informed the writing was at Malmesbury. She after went out of town, and comes back again in a little while, and this writing, as I heard, was shewn to several persons of my acquaintance, that came to me and told me they had seen it; but said I, so have not I, but when I see it I will believe it. At last Serjeant West, who was a relation of mine, I married his aunt, one day brought over this writing to me; and told me he had got this writing at last, and leave from my Lady Ivy to let me see it. I looked upon it, and there I did see at the bottom, where the Seal was, William Salkbill, and then I turned to look upon the witnesses names. No, says he, you must not see that, who are witnesses to the Deed; for my Lady Ivy made me promise, before she let me have it to shew you, that you should not see the witnesses names. Then said I again, I have seen enough to give me satisfaction: I was a little the more confirmed that the thing was not a reality but fiction, and so I told him. My Lady saw that would not pass, she offered, provided Mrs. Duffett, my Lady's daughter, might have the advantage of the house, to release the matter.

L. C. J. Pray Sir, for how much was the pretended Mortgage?

Sir Charles Cotterel. For 1500*l.* that Sir William Salkbill owed her; which I thought somewhat strange, seeing, as I said, she owed Sir William so much at his death. At last I came to produce my writing, (for she told me I might give Mrs. Duffett a right to the house.) Now I had not read over the writing made me, but now when I came to look upon it, instead of a Mortgage for securing my debt, mine was a Deed of Sale from my Lady Salkbill, whereby the house and the lease from my Lord of Salisbury were sold me for fourscore pound; at which I was a little amazed. My Lady then was pleased to say I was a cheat, tho' I had no hand in it, nor indeed would have had any thing at all done; but upon my Lady Ivy's importunity, and my Lady Salkbill's, I gave direction only for a Mortgage.

L. C. J. What was it that Sutton took out of my Lord of Salisbury's lease?

Sir Charles Cotterel. He was to take notes to draw a Mortgage of that lease by.

L. C. J. He got the notes tho', for aught I perceive, to draw another Mortgage by. A very trick, it smells rank of the Knave.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray, Sir Charles, did you ever pay any money by my Lady's order.

Sir Charles Cotterel. I did lend my Lady Ivy 50*l.* she being in distress for money, afterwards it was made up 100*l.* About February 1671, it was made up 1250*l.* and by agreement among them my Lady Ivy did relinquish that said Mortgage she had thus set on foot: and there was a Deed Tripartite made between me of the first, my Lady Ivy of the second part, and some Trustees for Mrs. Duffett of the third part, whereby the reversion was given to Mrs. Duffett, and my Lady confirm'd it, and gave my Lady Salkbill a Bond of 1000*l.* in which Colonel Gravener was bound for her, that she should not trouble my Lady about the house; yet notwithstanding did she afterwards write to Mr. Duffett, as I have heard, that she would set it on foot again, and she should have half of what she had recovered.

L. C. J. The Inheritance of the house, it seems, is in my Lord of Salisbury.

Sir Charles Cotterel. Yes, my Lord, Sir William Salkbill had the original lease from my Lord of Salisbury.

L. C. J. What direction did you give Sutton about it?

Sir Charles Cotterel. To make a Mortgage only to secure fourscore pound.

L. C. J. And what did he make?

Sir Charles Cotterel. An absolute Deed of Sale.

L. C. J. Was there no proviso in it, to be void upon payment of money?

Sir Charles Cotterel. No, nothing but an actual Sale for so much money.

L. C. J. You say my Lady Ivy afterwards did relinquish her pretended Mortgage, pray had she nothing for it?

Sir Charles Cotterel. Nothing that I know of; she joined in that Deed Tripartite.

Mr. Williams. What should dispose her to give Mrs. Duffett 1500*l.* if it were really owing her?

L. C. J. Is that Mortgage here among your writings, Mr. Attorney?

Lady Ivy. Indeed, my Lord, I would have brought it, if they had given the least notice of what they now talk of.

Mr.

Mr. Att. Gen. Sir Charles Cotterel, do you know that my Lady Ivy forged that Deed?

Sir Charles Cotterel. Not I, but it did appear to me to be no true Deed, upon what I found and knew.

Lady Ivy. You must give an account for what you have said here—

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, pray do not be in a passion: he has sworn what he has said here.

Lady Ivy. If he doth swear it, he is forsworn.

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, you must be more moderate in the Court?

Mr. Williams. My Lady thinks she has occasion to be angry, but it may be we shall give her more exercise for her passion before we have done. Pray swear that Lady, Mrs. Duffett. Will you acquaint my Lord and the Jury what you know has been done by my Lady Ivy, or by her direction, in making and altering of Deeds.

Mrs. Duffett. My Lord, I did see Mr. Duffett forge and counterfeit several Deeds for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Do you hear what she says, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. Yes, my Lord, we shall give an account of her anon.

L. C. J. Truly, I hope I mistook her, and did not hear right what she said. Pray, Mistress, speak it over again, and consider well what you say.

Mrs. Duffett. I say, my Lord, I did see Mr. Duffett forge and counterfeit several Deeds for my Lady Ivy. The first thing that I do remember was in the Trial between her husband and she; Mr. Duffett did by her order counterfeit a bond from him to some third person for 1000*l.* and several letters pretended to be written from Sir Thomas to my Lady Ivy were counterfeit. The next thing that I remember: Mr. Duffett was writing upon a parchment; I asked him what he was writing? He answered me, he was counterfeiting one Glover's lease, by which my Lady would get many hundreds of pounds, and for which he should have 500*l.* I desired him to consider what he did, for before that time he had been accounted a very honest man. Some time after that, my Lady Ivy did upon a pique to my mother, my Lady Salkbill, set a-foot a Mortgage she pretended to have of the house in St. Martin's-lane for 1500*l.* from my father. She did once tell me she had such a Mortgage, as she pretended real, but that it was drowned in a trunk of writings coming from Malmesbury. Said I, my mother and Sir Charles Cotterel will not believe it, if you do not let them see it. I am satisfied as to my concern in it, and would not have you proceed in it, for she pretended she did it for my advantage. But afterwards Mr. Duffett and she did agree to make a writing, in my sight, of a Mortgage.

L. C. J. Was my Lady Ivy by, when the writing was made as you say?

Mrs. Duffett. She was by, giving him order how to make it, and what Ink he should use to make it look old; and they forced me to make the Ink, and to fetch saffron to put in it to make it look old.

Mr. S. Stringer. Now will be the time to shew my Lady's letters.

L. C. J. Mistress, I would ask you one question by the way, whether while these things were doing at any time, any body did come in and give you any interruption?

Mrs. Duffett. My Lord, Mr. Duffett and my Lady made me oftentimes stand at the door (for we were but lodgers) that no one might come and disturb them, and I never remember any that came in thither but one Mr. Sutton an Attorney, my Lady's Attorney.

L. C. J. Did he see any of this done?

Mrs. Duffett. I cannot say he helped to do any thing, for when he came in, they sometimes sent me out to see that no body should come upon them; and so what he did, I cannot say. But he was let in when Mr. Duffett was counterfeiting for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. When was this, about what time?

Mrs. Duffett. Of the day, my Lord?

L. C. J. No, how long ago is it?

Mrs. Duffett. It might be about 70, or 71.

L. C. J. You are my Lady Salkbill's daughter, I think, and married Duffett.

Mrs. Duffett. I did so, my Lord, I am her daughter.

Mr. S. Stringer. Pray what did they do to the Deeds they made, to make them look like ancient true Deeds?

Mrs. Duffett. For the making of the outsidés look old and dirty, they used to rub them on windows that were very dusty, and wear them in their pockets to crease them, for some weeks together, according as they intended to make use of them.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, as it happens we have that Deed she talks of, called Glover's lease here.

L. C. J. Ay, I suppose you have such a Deed; it is a famous Deed in Westminster-hall.

Mr. Att. Gen. Here it is, we desire she may look upon it. [Which she did.]

Mrs. Duffett. As for this Deed, I cannot swear this is the Deed, there have been so many made by them. But he did counterfeit a Deed that he told me was one Glover's lease.

Mr. Williams. Mistress, you were going on to tell how they did use their Deeds they made. Pray tell us how they used to lay them in the Balconies, and all you know of the art.

L. C. J. Ay, how was it?

Mrs. Duffett. When they had been rubbed upon the window to make them look dirty, and they were to pass for Deeds of a great many Years standing; it was used to lay them in a balcony, or any open place, for the rain to come upon them and wet them, and then the next sun-shine day they were exposed to the sun, or a fire made to dry them hastily, that they might be shrivelled.

L. C. J. Is your husband dead or alive?

Mrs. Duffett. Dead, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. How long has he been dead?

Mrs. Duffett. I was not at his death with him, he died beyond sea.

L. C. J. Was your husband alive when Mr. Johnson's Business was?

Mrs. Duffett. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Yes, I know he was in Court; tho' I asked the question, I remember all that business.

Mrs. Duffett. I was subpoena'd in at that time, but my Lady Ivy would not let me swear.

L. C. J. Pray Mistress, what had your husband for his pains?

Mr. Williams. Had he any share of the money lent by Sir Charles Cotterel?

Mrs. Duffett. My Lady Ivy gave him in my sight 200*l.* of Sir Charles Cotterel's money.

Mr. Williams. Do you know any body else that had any of that money?

Mrs.

Mrs. Duffett. The Attorney had 2col. of the same money too.

L. C. J. What Attorney do you mean?

Mrs. Duffett. Mr. Sutton.

L. C. J. Had he so, how came he to deserve it?

Mr. Dobbins. Pray, Madam, what do you know of counterfeiting any seals?

Mrs. Duffett. Mr. Duffett once had the impression of a seal in his hand, with which he said he was going to one Mr. Dryden, to have it counterfeited; but I do not remember what the seal was.

Mr. Williams. When the deeds were written, how did he use to put the names to them?

Mrs. Duffett. I have seen my Lady herself write some great Letters of the names first upon other papers, which Mr. Duffett could not so well hit, and he has writ the rest.

Mr. Williams. Can you tell the names?

Mrs. Duffett. Truly, I do not remember what names.

Mr. Williams. We have another witness who will give you an account of some Letters of my Lady's, which we shall desire to be read. Swear Mrs. Elizabeth Rycott. (which was done.)

Mr. Att. Gen. She talks of Glover's lease.—

L. C. J. She says, she doth not know whether that be the deed, there were so many forged, Mr. Attorney. But she swears thus, my husband did forge a writing he called Glover's lease.

Mrs. Duffett. She had two or three mortgages forged.

Mr. Williams. Come Mistress, where had you these Letters?

Mrs. Rycott. I had these Letters from Mr. Duffett.

Mr. Williams. Pray where had you these bottles?

Mrs. Rycott. This is the ink I saw Mr. Duffett write for my Lady Ivy with, at Mrs. Lee's house, at the table in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Who did he write for?

Mrs. Rycott. For my Lady Ivy; I did not know what they were that were written, but he said they were forged; and with ink out of these bottles he said he could make new-written writings look like old ones very soon.

Mr. Williams. Did you ever speak with my Lady Ivy? Do you know her hand?

Mrs. Rycott. I do not know these Letters to be her hand; but Mr. Duffett gave me them as her Letters.

Mr. Williams. Sir Charles Cotterel, pray will you look upon them; you know my Lady Ivy's hand.

Sir Charles Cotterel. I do so—they are all of a hand, and I think they are my Lady's: I believe it truly.

Clerk reads.] This is signed T. I.

All the Letters were read.

Mr. Williams. Your Lordship sees one of these Letters tells Mr. Duffett, she intends to set Sir William Salkbill's mortgage on foot, and he should have half what she recovered. If it were a true mortgage, why should she give him half?

L. C. J. They were very great together, that is plain, they were very familiar. What were Mr. Duffett's merits towards my Lady, I cannot tell. Will you go on? it is late.

Mr. Williams. This is all we shall offer at present, 'till we have occasion further from them.

L. C. J. Well, what say you to this, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Att. Gen. If they have done—

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. They have, they say.

Mr. Att. Gen. Then may it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I shall begin to answer their evidence about the first. They have produced some argumentative evidence out of many Records, to convict our deeds of forgery. In truth, if they had not bragg'd of this very thing, it had been a shrewd objection, because we could not have been prepared to have given an answer to what we could not have foreseen we should have been accused of. But upon their boasts they have put us upon the search as well as they, and we can give as good an account of it. They tell you, they had their hint from my Lord Coke; but that hint has led them into a great error; for he is mistaken himself in the computation of this time, as he is in a great many other things.

Mr. Bradbury. I know he is mistaken; but I depend not upon his remarks of that time. I said only, I had the general hint about detecting forgeries from thence.

Mr. Att. Gen. But yet for all your confidence of the demonstration, your foundation fails: For, my Lord, to settle the fact, we shall shew that the King of Spain, Charles V. who was likewise Emperor, resigned his Crown the 25th of October, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary. It is true, the Parliament-Rolls, in the title of them relating to the first day of the session, there the stile that was used at first could not be altered. But the fact of their being the King and Queen of Spain, was so notorious to all the World, that we shall shew you in multitudes of the Rolls of that year, the stile was as in our deeds; so that the use might be various: But that will not prove our deeds forged. It may be, the Courts of Law might not take notice of it, as to alter the stile 'till Trinity Term; though we have not searched so far among them, but in the common conveyances which are upon Record in the Rolls, there it is altered. And as to the time of their becoming King and Queen of Spain, we have an History that tells you the very day when the King resigned, which was the 25th of October.

L. C. J. I tell you, Gentlemen, methinks Mr. Attorney has been very fortunate to-day, in giving very satisfactory answers to two objections: First, they would quite destroy Mr. Neale's title to this land, by a piece of evidence that they had never had, but that Mr. Neale had bragged of it; and that was the survey, which with much confidence of the victory was produced: and yet, when it was so, to me it seemed the stabbingest enemy the defendant's Cause had; but that you are to have with you, and must judge upon it. Now he tells you again, Mr. Neale has been a blab of his tongue, and could not keep the secret to himself, but must brag that the deeds were forged, for the stile of the Queen's reign is changed; and by this bragging they have smoked the business, and can shew Records for it. But now instead of Records, the upshot is a little lousy History. Can that be an answer to those great numbers of Records brought by the other side? Is a printed History, written by I know not who, an evidence in a Court of Law?

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, besides that, which we must submit to your Judgment, whether upon such a point of fact in a foreign Country to be done such a day, a foreigner's History, not printed for this purpose, shall be a sort of evidence; but I say, besides that, here is a Gentleman Mr. Clerk, that searched the Roll, and he will tell you what they are in this point.

Mr. Clerk. I did search in the Rolls, and find many in that year like these. And my Lord Coke is utterly mistaken; he says it was not altered 'till the 4th and 5th years of Phil. and Mary.

L. C. J. I care not what my Lord Coke says; but what the Records say, let us see them.

Mr. Clerk. I saw a great many in that year.

L. C. J. Lord, Gentlemen, what do you make of us, to keep us here with I do not know what! Mr. Attorney, he tells us that Mr. Neale was so great a blockhead to brag of this, and so we were prepared for an answer; but all the answer is, my Lord Coke is mistaken, and there are many records, but we have none of them, Præmoniti, Præmuniti. If he did brag so, and you knew it, and would not bring records to wipe off the objection, it is ten times worse than if it had been answered only with the unexpectedness of it.

Mr. Bradbury. My Lord, I dare affirm that there are none of the Rolls of that year so, 'till after Easter-Term—

L. C. J. Lord, Sir, you must be cackling too; we told you, your objection was very ingenious, but that must not make you troublesome; you cannot lay an egg, but you must be cackling over it. The objection is now upon them, let them answer it if they can. Have you any of the Records here?

Mr. Sol. Gen. We have not, it seems, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then this must pass unanswered, and must be left to the Jury.

Mr. Sol. Gen. But, my Lord, they have gone a little farther in this case, and indeed farther than becomes them, I think, to lay aspersions upon my Lady Ivy, as if she were frequently guilty of forgery. And for that Sir Charles Cotterel swears, that she did pretend she had a mortgage of a house in St. Martin's-lane for 1500*l.* and this mortgage he says he was told of by some that did see it; whereupon he did likewise desire to see it, and without seeing of it, he declared, he would never be satisfied of the reality of the thing: and thereupon Mr. Serjeant West brought it him, and he saw it, but was not permitted to see the witnesses names, and thereupon he was more dissatisfied than before about it. But if Sir Charles Cotterel had given any the least intimation of such a thing, now we would have gratified them with a sight of it in Court, where he should have had his full view; for my Lady has it still, and it is a true mortgage, and for a real consideration. But he says this is released, and she did that, as is supposed, to suppress any inquiry after it. But with reverence to Sir Charles Cotterel, the fact is otherwise. My Lady Salkbill pretended to a debt from my Lady Ivy, for nine years diet for four Persons; and the reckoning being made according to my Lady Ivy's quality, was made so high, that it paid off the mortgage: But she has the deed still—

L. C. J. But what say you to the deed of sale and my friend Sutton's notes out of the lease; and the debt of 96*l.* and 4*l.* but a little before acknowledged by my Lady Ivy—

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, in answer to that, we say, he has been pleased to give it a great deal of garniture; and as he is master of the ceremonies, to adorn the story with abundance of flourishes of his own kindness and interests—

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, you are not to judge of that, whether it be flourish only or substance; the Court and the Jury are the Judges of that, and truly I think it very material to the Cause. I assure you I do, let the dirt be taken off as it can, it sticks very much; I must speak my mind.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When I am over-ruled, I acquiesce in the Judgment of the Court.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, apply yourself to answer the evidence.

Mr. Sol. Gen. So I do, my Lord, as well as I can. The next witness is this Gentlewoman, Mrs. Duffett; she swears, that she saw her husband Mr. Duffett, counterfeit many deeds, she does not particularize them: And here have been likewise several Letters read, that did import a transaction and correspondence between my Lady Ivy and him.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Solicitor, remember the swears she saw that lease of Salkbill's, and that called Glover's lease.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, this witness that swears this, is not only a Person unfit to be believed, but is contradicted by a Record; and for that, my Lord, it stands thus: Mr. Johnson, as is well known, had his trial for the matter about which she now swears; for Mr. Johnson, on the behalf of Alderman Iretton, undertook to pay 500*l.* to Mr. Duffett, to procure somebody to swear the deed, called Glover's lease, to be forged. Upon this there was an information exhibited in this Court against Mr. Johnson, for subornation; and upon full evidence Johnson was convicted for his endeavour. And the Record of that conviction we have here, and desire to have produced and read.

L. C. J. And I tell you, Mr. Solicitor, that is no evidence in this Case.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Why, pray, good my Lord, did not they here just now swear her?

L. C. J. But the Information put in by Mr. Attorney Noy, pray remember, was not suffered to be read, because not against any of the Parties but third Persons.

Mr. Sol. Gen. But pray, my Lord, give me leave to apply it to the objection here made in our Case, to the credit of our deeds. They say it is suspicious, because my Lady Ivy used to forge deeds; and particularly Duffett, they say, did once forge for her Glover's lease. Now to answer that, we come to shew that my Lady Ivy did not forge Glover's lease; but there was indeed an art used to persuade Duffett to swear it forged, when indeed it was not; for which trick, Johnson, that was the agent, or instrument, was convicted; and that conviction is, I think, a good evidence that it was not forged.

L. C. J. None in the world, Mr. Solicitor; and that from the very evidence that has been given in this Cause this day: For it is plain, if you will believe this woman, (and I yet see no Cause to the contrary) that she was coming into the Court to have sworn the truth, which would have perhaps cleared Johnson; but my Lady Ivy would needs keep her away. Now if Duffett were so great a rogue as to forge, he would not stick to swear, to protect that forgery: And then how easy a thing was it, had Johnson been the greatest Saint in the World, to have got him convicted upon what Duffett came to swear against him? though had she come then in, Duffett would have appeared one not at all fit to be credited.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I have then one thing more to offer; I cannot tell indeed whether it be material, for it seems I have been so unhappy as to offer some things that have not been thought material—

L. C. J.

L. C. J. You have so indeed, Mr. Solicitor, I must speak the truth; there have been several things offered as evidence, which in another Cause and Place, would not, I am sure, have been offered.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I submit what I offer for my Client, to the judgment of the Court. But that which I would say now, is this: We have here the husband's oath concerning this matter, that this woman who now takes upon her to swear these forgeries and things, told him she could have 500 l. if she would swear against my Lady Ivy.

L. C. 7. Is that evidence against the wife?

Mr. Solicitor. He is now dead, it seems; but here is his oath.

L. C. J. Pray consider with yourself, could the husband have been a witness against the wife about what she told him upon an information for that offence of subornation?

Mr. Sol. Gen. No, my Lord, I think not.

L.C. 7. Could the wife be an evidence against the husband for the forgery?

Mr. Sol. Gen. No, my Lord, she could not; and yet she swears it upon him here.

L. C. J. That is not against him, man; he is out of the case, but against my Lady Ivy; and how can the oath of the husband be evidence here.

Mr. Att. Gen. Cryer, call Mr. Gibson; to give an account of this Gentlewoman.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Suppose, my Lord, that both husband and wife were brought as evidence against my Lady Ivy, were that good?

L. C. J. Certainly that were very good.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Why then, my Lord, one of them says, that she saw such and such things done by Lady Ivy, and by him for her; and the other says, such things were not done, but she confessed she could have 500 l. to swear they were done: Shall not this evidence be admitted to contradict the other?

L. C. 7. Why, good Lord! Gentlemen, is the philosophy of this so witty, that it need be so confidently urged? Is it good Logick, that because they both were good witnesses against my Lady Joy, therefore either of them is a good witness against the other? Shall the husband's oath be read against the wife, to fix a crime upon her? Sure you do not intend this shall pass for argument, but to spend time.

Cryer. Here is Gibson now, Sir.

Mr. Att. Gen. Swear him. (Which was done).

Mr. Sol. Gen. We are not now, my Lord, examining what Duffett swore about forgery or not forgery; but is not this confession of hers an argument against the credit of her testimony, who now says, she saw my Lady Ivy do so and so, when she has confessed she could have money to swear against my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Solicitor, if you will not apprehend the question, I cannot help it; is it not the husband that swears against the wife?

Mr. Att. Gen. Do you know that Gentlewoman there, Gibson?

Gibson. I have heard of her.

L. C. J. Nay, be not angry, Mr. Solicitor; for if you be, we cannot help that neither. The Law is the Law for you as well as me.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, I must take the Rule from you now.

L. C. J. And so you shall, Sir, from the Court, as long as I sit here; and so shall every body else, by the Grace of God. I assure you I care not whether it please or displease; we must not have our time taken up with impertinent things; for I must say, there have been as many offered in this Cause to-day, as ever were in any Cause that ever I heard; and if all be not as some would have it, then they must be in passion presently. The Court gives all due respects, and expects them.

Gibson. I have seen her a great while ago.

Mr. At. Gen. What do you know of her? what reputation is she of?

Gibson. I know nothing of her reputation; I know she was Mr. Duffett's wife.

L. C. J. And so do we, she tells us so: What then?

Gibson. I have seen her a-bed with Mr. Frogmorton, and she told me she had then a frog in her belly.

Mr. Williams. It seems then by having this Gentleman so ready, they were aware of this too: I suppose Mr. Neale bragg'd of this too, or else the guilty conscience put them upon preparing for it: But yet I think they do us no great harm by it.

Mr. Att. Gen. You will give our evidence an answer I suppose by and by : But we will go on to the rest of yours. As to the bill and answer in the year 1629, in that of John Stepkins, it is said, he makes the bounds eastward to be Fox's-lane. But it is plain, he that gives in that answer was not acquainted with the transactions of the Estate before his own time. And if you consider the time of that answer, there was near fourscore years then past since the lease made, and so long it had been out of the family, rendering a pepper-corn rent; and so the profitable interest was only the four acres surrendered to him, by the tenant, before the licence to aliene: and it appears not that he had any notice of the reversion. But I observe in the answer there is one passage remarkable; that there was a way, time out of mind, that did part this land; and that which was reputed the Dean and Chapter's land. Now that doth not tie it up to make Fox's-lane that same way, but only says generally, there was an old way, which must be understood of the way down from Cockbill to Bell-wharf: So that I take it, that this is no conclusion upon us. Nor upon the same ground is that lease made 13 Jacobi, by John Stepkins, where he abutts his land upon that wall which is called Wall-marsh wall, and covenants to have the rent increased, if any thing beyond that be recovered; for there was near threescore years to come then of this lease, and he had no pretence of title to contest it at that time; and so the verdicts are all answered that way, the lease expired not till the year 1680.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Then, my Lord, for the survey that they produce of the late times, by order of the Committee of Parliament for sale of Church-lands, how that should give a title, I do not understand. It is the first time I ever heard of a particular of Dean and Chapter's lands to be an evidence, where at that time there was no Dean and Chapter. But that which is a clear answer to it is this: Winterburn who had the lease from the Church, did also claim under Marcellus Hall, who had a lease for ninety years: that in time expired in the year 1640. That interest being then determined, he gets these put into the survey (which it was his interest to do) as the inheritance of the Church, which would gain him a fee-simple upon his purchase; he concealing the long lease, and they being so long in possession; H h h h 2 whereas whereas otherwise he could only have an Estate for years: and it appears all the deeds were in his custody at that time. For the other witnesses that speak to the Wall, that we must leave to the Jury's consideration, upon the ballance of the evidence. For, with submission, my Lord, taking the evidence as it stands together, if that lease of Marcellus Hall be a good lease, these several conveyances we produce are supported and do explain that: He surrenders four acres, which are the lands that are afterwards conveyed to Fox, which is mentioned in the deed of his surrender to be the green Hilly-Bank, and that was the boundary of the four acres; but what becomes of the other seven acres and an half? they have given no account of it hitherto. But surely, my Lord, upon that first survey, I take it, there is a strong evidence concurring with our assertion: For that faith, the south boundary of the Dean's Lynches is Wall-marsh. Now then, if there be seven acres to go forward from thence, that just reacheth up to Cock-bill; and all the other bounds plainly concur with ours: and upon the perusal of the survey, which it is consented to on both sides the Jury shall have with them, I believe they will be satisfied our bounds and that agree. Upon the whole evidence I submit it for the Defendant. We have done, my Lord.

Mr. Att. Gen. Only I would ask Mr. Sutton a question; whether the bill and answer now given in evidence, were not given in evidence at the last trial?

Sutton. Yes, it was.

Mr. Att. Gen. And yet the verdict went for us then, as I hope it will now.

L. C. J. Have you all done, Gentlemen? Will you say any thing for the Plaintiff?

Mr. Williams. No, my Lord, we will leave it to your Lordship and the Jury.

L. C. J. Then, Gentlemen of the Jury, this evidence has been very long: I think the trial has held us as long as any cause that ever happened in Westminster-hall, of this nature; I mean, except one, these many years. I think we meet with but one in all our Books, that held near so long: That indeed was rather something longer, the famous Cause of Colt, in this Court; but besides that, I never heard of a Cause of this length before.

But, Gentlemen, it is a Cause of value, and a Cause of great weight and consideration: It hath depended in the evidence of it, upon abundance of circumstances, so that it may be impossible for me to remember all the evidence that hath been given. But as near as I can, I will give you what assistance I am able, in recollecting what has been said on both sides. Some of you I have observed have taken notes, and that will save me and you some trouble: I will give you a scheme fairly of that which is the question. And it will be very much more easy to you, because you have had a view of the matter, than can be thought I can make it by any direction of mine.

The question in short is, Whether seven acres and a-half of land, now built upon to a very great value, as the witnesses say, 2000 l. a year, lying on the east side of the lane, that is called by the name of Fox's-lane, betwixt that and the mill, called Ratcliff-mill, be part of the marsh that formerly belonged to the Family of the Stepkins's; or whether or no that be not part of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's Inheritance. If it belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, then the issue is with the Lessor of the Plaintiff: but if it be the Inheritance of the Stepkins's, and part of the marsh-land, and was so according to the ancient boundaries, then the issue is with the Defendant.

The Plaintiff comes and shews for his title, first, that this was all along enjoyed under the Church of Paul's leases. Knowles, who formerly did receive the rents of the very thing in question, till (77) before this question, says, in his testimony, he received them in the right, and on the behalf of Mr. Neale, who claims by lease from the Dean of St. Paul's.

That is not sufficient to maintain his title, but they come and shew the original; and in point of time 5 H. 8. they say that one Dean Collet made a lease of the lands in question, for 45 years. And to prove this, a Book is produced to you, wherein there is a short Entry made, which takes no notice at all of any thing more, but that there was such a lease of a mill in Shadwell, with the appurtenances. But upon their producing that Writing, it is found to be a paper Writing; and there was an objection, and a material one, made upon the face of the thing itself: For there were two places that seemed to be suspicious, as made directly to humour an evidence of such a lease in 5 H. 8. having Dr. Collet's name inserted, who happened to be Dean of Paul's at that time: Whereas Nowell was originally the name that was set there, with the same hand that the other part of the Writing was. Thereupon it came to be enquired into, how it came to pass that Nowell's name was struck out, and Collet's put in. That seemed to insinuate, as if this was contrived on purpose to shoar up an evidence, and humour the time. For it could not be imagined that Nowell should come to be Dean when that lease was made, who was not Dean till so long after, in Queen Elizabeth's time, as I take it. Now had this objection met with this Book alone, it would have made the evidence lame, and they would have been thought to have set an ill leg forwards. But to take off that, they come after and shew a parchment scroll, which takes notice likewise of such a lease: And their Officer, Spencer, says he has seen that scroll many years, and so it could not be a new thing for this purpose. It is an old rental, or some such thing, in time, in some short time after, where is mention made of a lease by Dean Collet, 5 H. 8. for 45 years; which humours the time exactly, and supports the credit of the other evidence. This is that they give as an answer to that objection. It might be a mistake as to the name, but this will shew that it was not a contrived matter for this purpose.

The next piece of evidence they go to, is 5 Ed. 6. and for that time they come and produce leases, those that are at least in law evidences of leases; and those are the Church-Books, ancient Books that have been always read and allowed for evidence. And thereby they shew that one Dr. May, then Dean of St. Paul's, viz. 23 Feb. 5 Ed. 6. did let the lands in question to Joan Hall and Marcellus Hall; and he let it as the Dean and Chapter of Paul's lands, for 45 years, at the rent of 10 l. a year.

Then they tell you in the 2d and 3d of Phil. and Mar. 10 Dec. one Dean Fecknam takes notice of the former leases, and lets it to Marcellus Hall, and that is for 90 years; wherein there is the old rent taken notice of, and some increase made: And there is in that lease a covenant to repair the mill, and that has given a rise to something that makes part of the present question, which they that are for the the Defendant, call a licence to remove the mill. You, Gentlemen, will have the Deeds with you, and are to judge of them.

The leases from 5 H. 8. to this Dean Fecknam, are only leases made for years; and by reason of these leases for years, and the long lease which they pretend to, the Defendant's Counsel insist upon it, that they could not be let in to controvert the Plaintiff's title; for the last lease for 128 years, from Stepkins to Hall, expired in time but in the year 1680.

Now say the Plaintiff's Counsel, (and they produce that which is very material in the Case) 5 Aug. 1636, this was then let to one Mary More, the relict of one Adrian More, formerly the assignee of the lease that came from Dean Fecknam to Marcellus Hall. And there, instead of continuing it a lease for years, he lets to Mary More, in consideration of the former leases, and turns it into an Estate for three Lives. So far then was the Dean of Paul's from apprehending himself to be but Lessee for years, that he takes upon him to create freeholds, which only he that has the inheritance can do.

They go on further, and tell you, that in 1640, the same Dean of St. Paul's, she having sold her interest to one Whitwick and Winterburn, there is a new Estate made to them for three Lives. These continue in possession under that lease, till Mr. Neale purchased in their interest: and his Grace of Canterbury, then Dean Sancroft, he made another lease to the said Mr. Neale for three lives; and there is a great increase of rent, 80 l. during the life of one of the former surviving Lives, and then to 100 l. Then comes the lease made to the now Lessors of the Plaintiff, by this reverend Divine that is here, now Dr. Stillingfleet, the present Dean of St. Paul's at yearly 240 l. And this is the substance of the evidence first given by the Plaintiff, for his title which is underneath that last lease of Dean Stillingfleet, which they say is a good title; and in case it doth appear that the lands are the inheritance of the Dean of Paul's, it is not controverted by the Defendants, but that the Plaintiff must have a verdict for him.

But say they which are for the Defendants, this is not their inheritance, but the Defendant's; and to prove their objection, they produce abundance of deeds, of which, as well as I can, I will give you a punctual and particular account. For with all the faith and fidelity I can, I will give you the substance of what has been said on both sides.

First, It is not to be doubted, for it is beyond all contradiction plain, there were 130 acres of marsh-lands, lands covered with water, which one Vanderdelf, a Dutchman, undertook to drein, and had an Act of Parliament made, anno 27 H. 8. to encourage him for his endeavours to drein it, giving him the one half. That Act of Parliament is produced, and it is there said to be 130 acres.

Now you are to take notice of the boundaries of this marsh-land, as making the state of this question. The Act of Parliament bounds the marsh upon the Hermitage, or such a mill called Grash-mill, upon the West. It is bounded on the high-way leading to Ratcliff, on the North, which is called Ratcliff high-way to this day: It is bounded to the river Thames on the south; and it is bounded upon the Town of Ratcliff towards the east.

Afterwards, in H. 8th's time, comes in Richard Hill, who was owner of some part of this marsh, (Vanderdelf's moiety) and he in time, 23 H. 8. became indebted to one Salvago and another, and there he comes and acknowledges a Statute to them for their debt. And (because I would have you have all things before your view, that were done at one time) in the same year there is a mortgage made of the lands of Richard Hill, (among which, they for the Defendant apprehend, are comprized the lands in question, as marsh-land, to Salvago, for the payment of their money;) and in that mortgage the same words are made use of for the boundaries, as are in the dreining Act. This, to derive their title, they produce to shew, that there was such an ownership, and such a mortgage.

Then they tell you, that in 37 H. 8. the same Richard Hill, he goes and divides some part of these lands, that is to say, eleven acres and an half, and that he conveys away by lease for 34 years, to Marcellus Hall; whom I name the more particularly, because it is a name that has been much canvassed, and gives a countenance to the title on both sides. Now in that deed, whereby this is thus conveyed to Marcellus Hall, there is no notice taken particularly of the eastern boundary to be the mill, or the mill-bank, or the hilly-bank. Now, say they, the mill was just upon the point, hard by that place that is called now by the name of Cock-bill; and so that boundary doth take in the thing in question, the seven acres and a half, because that deed takes notice of the mill, hilly-bank or way.

In the next place, they offer you this for evidence, that in 6 Ed. VI. the same Richard Hill, for 130 l. sells his land to Thomas Stepkins. And when it comes to convey the inheritance to him, it is laid to be under the same boundaries as are mentioned there, bounded on the hilly-bank, or mill-bank, eastward. Now say they, that sheweth plainly, that still the mill was the thing that was intended to be the boundary; and there being seven acres and an half of land between the mill and the western bounds those seven acres cannot be construed to extend to a mill with the appurtenances, but rather it is to bound upon the mill and include the lands, than to have the lands go with the mill.

They proceed further and say, that Thomas Stepkins, the same year, did for 50 l. let this to Marcellus Hall, for 128 years, at a pepper-corn rent, which lease expired but in 1680, and till now we could not come to litigate that matter, because he had made such a lease. But then I am to take notice by the way, and so must you into the bargain; there is another boundary made there, abutting on the well there, called Shadwell, and the way leading from Shadwell to the Lynches.

After this they come to tell you further, that Marcellus Hall, 22 Dec. 2 and 3 Pbil. and Mar. let a lease to Carter, and that was for 20 years. Now you are to take notice, that in this lease of Carter's, there is notice taken of a mill, and about an acre of land thereunto belonging, very carefully put in. And that, say they, sheweth that your boundary could not extend to so much as seven acres.

And to back that evidence, they shew you a certain survey, taken in Queen Elizabeth's time, concerning the manor of Stepney, which you are by consent to have with you; and you will do well to consider it well in your perusal of it.

And now comes the main deed. Say the Defendants Counsel, it falls out that you are but Lessee under Marcellus Hall, who was Lessee under us, and was obliged in a particular covenant, that he should not let any part of this land without the licence of our ancestor Stepkins, who made him such a long lease. But it happened he had a mind to let some part of this land to the Dean of Paul's, from whom he had a lease of the mill. And accordingly he had a licence from Stepkins so to do; which, say they, is the reason why they come to lay claim to our land. This they take notice to be in time, 16 Nov. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. when I must tell you by the way, that the first lease, pretended by them to be made to Marcellus Hall, is the long one, 6 Ed. 6. by Thomas Stepkins; so that Marcellus Hall came to be Lessee under the Dean and Chapter, before he had any authority or interest from Stepkins, nay, before he had any lease from Hill.

Mr. Att. Gen. My Lord, if your Lordship pleases to remember, Marcellus Hall did first take by lease from Richard Hill, in 37 H. 8.

L. C. J. Pardon me, Mr. Attorney, I did not mis-repeat it; I say, he first had a lease from the Dean and Chapter.

Mr. Att. Gen. That was of the mill only—

L. C. J. That is contested, and the very gift of the question; Mr. Attorney, how much is comprehended in that lease?

But to go on with the Defendant's evidence. Then in Nov. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. is the deed to Roper, of which I shall have occasion to say more anon.

In 5 and 6 Phil. and Mar. comes Jasper Hill the Son of Richard Hill, (the first owner of the land, and that entered into the Statute to Salvago) he makes a conveyance to Macheline Stepkins, Thomas's widow, and John Stepkins, his heir, mother and son; upon which, afterwards there is a surrender made by Marcellus Hall to John Stepkins, son and heir of Thomas, of four acres; which say they, was not assigned with the other seven to the Dean of Paul's.

Then in 3 Elizabeth, pursuant to the conveyance made by Jasper Hill to the Stepkins's, there is a fine and recovery suffered; and 4 Elizabeth, a deed to lead the uses of that fine which are to John Stepkins and his mother, and the heirs of John. But still in all these deeds and conveyances, there is mention made of the mill, mill-bank, or hilly-bank, or hilly-way, to be the boundaries; and likewise of Shadwell.

After that, they produced a bond, wherein Spinola is bound to Stepkins, to take off the Statute entred into 32 H. 8. by Richard Hill.

Then 14 Elizabeth, they produce a commission of sewers, where notice is taken of the several land-holders of Wapping-marsh, who were liable to make satisfaction for any want of repairs or defects in the marsh. There Roper is taken notice of as a tenant, and one James and Stepkins too: and they do infer from hence, that James and Roper's land is part of this, and was under Stepkins, and is enjoyed to this day under the title of the Stepkins's.

They go on further, and tell you, that 15 Eliz. Stepkins became indebted to the Crown, by taking a teller's debt upon him, and had a mind to secure the debt, and therefore conveys his land to the then Treasurer, Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, to secure a great sum of money; and this land they would have to pass among the rest.

Afterwards, 17 Eliz. the commissioners sit again, and there is a Return made of all those that were land-holders, the same named before.

Then 7 Jacobi, was there a re-grant out of the Crown made to Stepkins of all his land. Wherein, generally speaking, the bounds of the lands belonging to Stepkins, are called the Mill-bank, &c. This must, say they, of necessity take in the lands in question, otherwise it is impossible that should be the boundary. And they make use of this further argument: Say they, we have taken a survey of all the lands, those in question and the other marsh-lands, from Hermitage-dock, alias St. Katherine's, even to this mill; and it doth just humour the number of acres in the Act for dreining Wapping-marsh; that is to say, it makes just 130 acres. All which, they say, plainly belongs to the Stepkins's.

They then come to examine their living witnesses, and they have produced them in this order as I name them: their witnesses have been as they are in my paper. One Hughs, and Somerly, and Holmes, and Barefoot, and Cope, and Holewell. And the substance of what they say is this: The old woman, Barefoot, says. She has known the place in question, these threescore and odd years; she remembers well the situation of it, and that the water drove another mill first, and did not come near to Fox's-lane by a quarter of a mile, but run more to the North. And this land, she says was always reckoned to be Stepkins's, and she never knew any one have any thing to do there but they. And in as much as there was some discourse concerning a well; she says, she doth remember there was a well between Fox's-lane and the mill, and that was half a mile off Fox's-lane, and was called Shadwell. She remembers it so well, that if there were as many wells as there are panes in the glass window before you, that was the right well, and there was no other well called Shadwell, but that.

Then Hughs tells you, he remembered the land before it was built upon, that at common ordinary tides, the water used to come up to Fox's-lane, and at high tides, over it; but the land has been raised much higher since that.

Then Cope, he gives an account of his knowing it above threescore years ago; and he in general says, he did not know how far westward the water went that drove the mill; but Fox's-lane, he says, was the way from North to South, westward of the mill, and he knew not any way eastward of the mill but Fox's-lane; for Cock-bill is eastward of the mill. And much like to this was the testimony of the other witnesses; which being done, they concluded with the evidence of the Surveyor Holewell, about the admeasurement. And this, as I remember, or can recollect, is the evidence of the Defendant's substance, before the Plaintiff's reply.

And then as to that which was offered by the Defendants, as evidence of the boundaries, the Plaintiffs give this answer; and it is that which will be the pinching question in this Cause to all eternity: Whether or no, Mill-bank, or Mill-bill or the Hilly way, or whatsoever else it is called in their old Deeds, be not that which is now called Fox's-lane.

Say they, First, by your own evidence, (that same ancient survey that you produced, and which, by consent, you Gentlemen of the Jury are to have with you;) there is notice taken of 130 acres that belongs to the marsh; there is notice taken of the Lynches, as belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's. But then in the last paragraph of the back-side of the leaf, (so we call the second side, for distinction sake) you will find this taken notice of, which which said marsh doth bound un the lands hereafter mentioned on the east. And what are the lands thereafter mentioned? These you will find; Item, holden by the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, one messuage, called Derrick-bills, another tenement called so and so, and several orchards, gardens, ponds, &c. and a water-mill thereunto belonging. So that there was on the East part of the marsh-land, orchards, gardens, a messuage, a tenement, waters, ponds, fishings, and a mill, and several other things. Now if in case the Eastern boundaries of the marsh came up to the mill you speak of, how comes it to pass, that you yourself in your own survey, make the Eastern bounds to be upon these lands, and all these belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's. And when they come to read the particulars of what belonged to the Dean and Chapter, that survey bounds to the Dean and Chapter's land upon the marsh-land. You that have been upon the view, may the better understand it; and you see the Eastern part of the mill was the waste ground, and made a lane to carry down ballast; as the witnesses say. This doth just humour all the old boundaries.

Nay, to shew that this is really so, they say, that in time, in the year 1615, there was an action commenced before my Lord Chief Justice Coke, when he sat in this Court, wherein this controversy arose. Fox; who was as well tenant to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, as he was to Stepkins; he comes, and he builds upon that old wall, called Wall-marsh-wall, which begot a contest betwixt Stepkins, who was the ancestor of my Lady Ivy, and this Fox; and upon that contest this was the question, Whether there had been any incroachment upon the marsh? Not but that the wall was reckoned, even by Stepkins, to be the boundary, though running; as Stepkins said, twenty foot into the East part of the marsh; and there Stepkins was non-suited. Afterwards it came into the Common-Pleas, and there there was a verdict, whereby it was settled, that the whole wall belonged to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

But afterwards Mrs. Moor, the Lessee of the Church, would not be quiet with this, but exhibits a bill against John Stepkins, and others, and to settle the boundaries, because he pretended incroachments upon his ground: they therefore require him to ascertain the matter upon his oath. He in his answer confesseth, he had heard of the verdict before-mentioned, but knew nothing of it himself; but when he comes to set forth the boundaries, he is so far from taking notice that the boundaries take in the lands in question, that he tells you there was an ancient bank, which was the ordinary bounds between his land and the land of the Church; and this is a high-way, a common high-way. But it was true, as he believed, they had incroached, though such a verdict and nonsuit were obtained by them. Not that ever he pretended to any thing on the Eastern part of that passage or bank, called Fox's-lane; but he pretended to twenty foot on the western part of it, as an incroachment.

They say further too, that notwithstanding all this, John Stepkins was not so confident of his title to even those twenty foot on the west part; but that he comes and makes a bargain with another man: I will let you this East part of the marsh-land, and if I recover any of the wall, you shall pay such a rent for it; but if not, you shall hold it as you did before. So jealous he was of his title, even to that which he thought was incroached upon.

And they fix it thus, to humour and explain the particulars mentioned of orchards, ponds, gardens, &c. for here were a great many sluices and cuts for the water to be received in, and so all may well be comprehended under the name of a mill with the appurtenances; and that they say goeth a great way in the question. You are to consider of it, Gentlemen.

Then they further shew, that whereas the other side surmise the boundary to be Shadwell, which they would have to be placed a great way higher, by the place called Cock-bill; here comes an old man that tells you, he knew the place sixty years ago and above, and there was no other well called Shadwell, but that which was where the Church now stands, and that is on the West part of Fox's-lane. Now I must tell you, upon the evidence it is pretty strong, because he gives such an account of it that it was bricked over, and a common well to all People, which must make the thing very notorious; and he never heard of any other well called Shadwell. It is true, there might be a spring on the one side of this ground in question, and the other; you have heard the evidence on both sides, I must leave it at large to you.

Then to make the thing more plain, they offer to you that this was a tide-mill, and not as the Defendant pretends, an overshot-mill; and that is notoriously plain it is so, and it is against sense it should be otherwise. Here was one that wrought at the mill, and his father before him, sixty years; nay, it appears that to have water to drive an overshot-mill in that place, must drown the whole level, because it must be raised so much higher than the wheel; and if so, that stands higher than the place, were it raised never so high, of late called Fox's-lane. But there were tides that came within twenty foot of it; and you must give me leave to tell you, I understand so much of it, that a tide-mill is never suffered to have the water just swim up and back again; but they have cuts to retain the water a while, that it may go the easier off. And so the great number and length of the cuts and ponds, and ditches here, were but only receptacles and basins to receive the tide, which did not rise (as they tell you it should not) above half the wheel. The nature of the thing it self speaks against what they would have it to be; and to strengthen the argument, they have called five or six, or more witnesses, that have known it all along so to be: And yet this I apprehend, the other side take to be their most material point to make it marsh-ground.

But the Counsel for the Plaintiff say this further to you: They have a survey taken in Oliver's time, which they produced, but were opposed by the Counsel of the other side; and I must confess I did wonder to hear the objection, that it was strange this should be surveyed as Dean and Chapter's lands, in a time when there were no Deans and Chapters; whereas it was surveyed as that which was so, while there were such things as Deans and Chapters, and it was in order to be sold as such. And upon my word, if the lands of the Dean and Chapter's Inheritance, were no bigger than the Defendant would have them, there was a good round sum paid to the State for the mill only. But alas! you have a witness that tells you (there being in the survey mention of one Craven) that there was a Craven on the East East part of the ground, that had a large orchard and garden, and ground. And upon this purchase made by Winterburn, who was Lessee of the Church, the Plaintiff's Counsel do raise a very considerable argument, that this was the Church's Inheritance: For, say they, Why should Winterburn, that had a lease in being, which would have continued him to be sure in possession, and that too before all these houses were built, (for they talk all the fine houses were built since the King came in) give 9500*l.* for the Inheritance under the title of the Dean and Chapter, if he knew (as he must if he had the long lease in his possession, and so Knowles swears he had) it was not theirs; and he himself had a lease for thirty years to come, under a trivial rent of a pepper-corn. Especially considering that those times sold lumping penny-worths of other Peoples lands.

But then they come to the last point of evidence, and that you must very narrowly observe and weigh. Say they, because you depend so much upon Carter's lease, which takes notice of such and such boundaries; and also that of Roper, which you pretend to be made at such a time, these we say, are forged. And for it they give this evidence.

The first part is a natural legal evidence, and a proper evidence in things of this nature, to detect a forgery; an evidence that we learn out of our Books of Law, and it is an argumentative one. If you produce deeds made in such a time, when, say you, such titles were used, and such prefaces made to them in their preambles, when indeed there were no such titles used at that time, that sheweth your deeds are counterfeit and forged, and not true deeds. And there is Digitus Dei, the finger of God in it; that though the design be laid deep, and the contrivance sculk, yet Truth and Justice will appear one time or another: and though they may put some gull upon Justice for a while, yet it will in time be discovered, to the confusion and shame of the Undertakers. Say they, you have taken wonderful care to have both deeds carry the same flourish at the top of each of them, you call Philip and Mary King and Queen of Spain, and both Sicilies; and you put Burgundy in the ducal stile, before Millan: This is the language of both deeds, but that sheweth them not to be true deeds, that carrieth forgery in the very face of it; for Philip and Mary never came to write themselves King and Queen of Spain and Sicily, till Trinity Term, in the second and third years of their Reigns; whereas your deeds bear date in November before. Till Trinity Term Naples was a Kingdom, and they were but Princes of Spain and Sicily. And besides, they used always before that time, to put Millan among the Dukedoms first before Burgundy.

For instances and proofs of this objection, they shew you the titles of the Acts of Parliament in that year, in October, November, and December; they shew you the fines levied in Hillary Term, and Easter-Term, and Trinity-Term; till which Term the Records of the Kingdom, of Fines and Recoveries, bore all the old stile; and so do the Conveyances enrolled and not enrolled of that time. And with great bravery they challenge the Defendant's Counsel to shew any one Conveyance or Record (except those of your own making) that is otherwise. And as a further evidence they say, we have some leases entered in our Books, and so not calculated for this purpose, which have no other than the old stile of the King and Queen.

And in truth this is a material evidence to prove these to be forged deeds: and it is made the more material by this circumstance, which Mr. Attorney was pleased to mention; and that is the notice they had from Mr. Neale's bragging of this very objection to their deeds, and yet they should not come prepared to give it an answer. And I must deal plainly with you, that very one thing makes it an objection of very great weight and moment.

But still, say they, besides all this evidence we shall go a step further, and evince the likelihood that these deeds should be forged; for your client, the Defendant, is apt to forge deeds. And to prove that, we produce this evidence.

First of all, Sir Charles Cotterel gives you an account of a long story which doth not only reach the Defendant, my Lady Ivy, but it looks very bad upon my Friend Sutton too; who, if Sir Charles Cotterel swears true, is a very knave. Now Sir Charles Cotterel, though he does not swear he saw her forge the mortgage she pretended to from Sir William Salkell, yet he gives a shrewd evidence to make it untowardly suspicious: For he tells you upon Sir William's death, my Lady Ivy was so far from pretending to any debt from Sir William, that upon accounts stated between my Lady and her, she was indebted to Sir William 96*l.* which upon her parting from her husband, and being under great want, Sir William had lent her, besides his relieving her otherways: And, says Sir Charles Cotterel, I was present when she took 4*l.* more of my Lady Salkell's money, and then acknowledged herself to owe my Lady 100*l.* After this, my Lady Ivy, without the seeking or intreaty of Sir Charles Cotterel, comes to him, and, says she, Does not my Lady Salkell owe you money? Yes, said he, she does, four-score pounds; but I live in her house, and can soon eat it out in rent. But, says my Lady Ivy, she has a mind you should have the house made as a security to you. Good now, how comes my Lady Ivy to be so concerned for Sir Charles Cotterel's security, when he was not concerned for himself? Nay, and why should she be so earnest to have him have a security upon that house, which, if it were true, was mortgaged before to her self. If her mortgage were a true one, this practice carrieth no great face of honesty or vertue in it, I must needs say; I must crave leave to make that observation by the way. Ay, but into the bargain, when Sir Charles Cotterel yielded to her importunities, Mr. Sutton is the man that must be intrusted to draw the Writing, and to that purpose must see my Lord of Salisbury's lease, who is the head landlord. What needed that? I suppose it was recited in my Lady Ivy's mortgage before: But he must take notes out of it, forsooth, to make over the lease and house as a security to Sir Charles Cotterel for 80*l.* and when it is brought as such, knowing no otherwise, Sir Charles Cotterel takes it; and they two, my Lady Ivy and Sutton, are witnesses to it. What it proved afterwards you hear, an absolute deed of sale; and yet all this while my Lady Ivy (who, as Sir Charles Cotterel understood it, was indebted 100*l.* to Sir William Salkell) has a debt of 1500*l.* owing from Sir William, by mortgage to her on the same house.

Sir Charles Cotterel. My Lord, I am ready to make it all good.

L. G. J. First of all, I say, it was not well done if there were such a security for 1500*l.* to persuade Sir Charles to accept the house as a security for his fourscore pounds, without telling him of the prior mortgage. Then it is strange, she should acknowledge ledge her self indebted 100*l.* upon her taking the four pounds from my Lady Salkell, if she had so great a sum owing her. And what a slovenly answer is that given by the Counsel for my Lady Ivy, that she and others were called upon for nine years diet? Whereas Sir Charles Cotterel swears, she owned her self upon the account indebted 100*l.* and there was no bartering for diet; but that she had gratis for three quarters of a year after Sir William's death, as she had it several times before.

And now, while it is in my memory, I would remind you of one thing more before we come to the other witnesses, there is a thing that to me cramps this business very home upon my Lady Ivy: How comes it to pass my Lady Ivy should be so wonderful kind to my Lady Salkell's daughter, as to part with 1500*l.* so secured, to have the house settled upon her, without any consideration in the World that I can hear of? That is such a melting piece of kindness, that they would do well to find out some flax to authorize it. It seems upon Sir Charles Cotterel's desire to see this pretended mortgage, and its being brought him by my brother West, who is now dead, she was wonderful careful that he should not see the witnesses to it, it was so precious and tender a thing: But, alas! it is all melted down and gone of a sudden, without any consideration at all whatsoever; and she can readily join with Sir Charles Cotterel to settle this upon Mrs. Duffett, the Lady Salkell's daughter, and enter into bond not to disturb the enjoyment.

Then there comes another evidence, and that is the Gentlewoman Mrs. Duffett, who it seems they would have to be a loose sort of creature; but methinks she has a good round oath upon her tongue: for she does directly swear that she was present, and saw Mr. Duffett her husband forge that very mortgage Sir Charles Cotterel speaks of; that my Lady Ivy directed it, and gave her order to put saffron in the ink to make it look old; that she saw him writing in a parchment, which he told her was Glover's lease, and other things, and all for my Lady Ivy. Nay, she tells you my Lady Ivy was so extraordinary an artist at the managing of such an affair, that this master workman, Duffett, was not so dextrous at it as she; for he could not write the first great Letters of the names that were to be put to the forged deeds, but she did that her self, and the rest he did. How far she is to be believed, I must leave to you; you hear what is objected against her about the frog in her belly, and I do not know what; whether that will take off the credibility of her testimony, I leave to you. She doth give a very free and large account how they used to order their matters to make the ink look old, (as I said) they put saffron in it; then they rubb'd the outsides of the deeds in dirty windows, and after that used to lay them in a balcony for the rain to come upon them in the nights, and to dry them in the sun, or by the fire, to shrivel them up. And this she says was their method, and process they used: All which the Plaintiff's Counsel urge, to shew the probability that these deeds of theirs are forged.

Then they tell you, which is yet somewhat more to strengthen her evidence, there is a woman, that tho' she speaks out of Mr. Duffett's mouth, and that can be no evidence against my Lady Ivy, yet says, she received from him a parcel of Letters, which are sworn by Sir Charles Cotterel to be all of my Lady Ivy's own hand-writing; which Letters have been read to you: and they shew a great familiarity between my Lady Ivy and Mr. Duffett, a great care and concern for the promotion of this Duffett, the Gentlewoman's husband; and of some deeds that were likely to be thought new and suspected. And she tells him at the latter end of one, that she is solicitous till the trouble be over: But she was resolved to set on foot Sir William Salkell's mortgage, and if that thing did go well, he should have half.

That supports the credibility of the woman's testimony: But besides that, there is another thing that looks very untoward, because Mrs. Duffett doth directly swear, that out of the 1000*l.* paid my Lady Ivy by Sir Charles Cotterel, 200*l.* was paid and given to her husband, and Mr. Sutton forsooth, had 200*l.* more: For what service, I wonder, must my Lady Ivy be so liberal to Mr. Sutton and Mr. Duffett? Let Mr. Sutton shuffle, and rouse himself as he pleaseth, it will stick upon him; and I must confess it looks untowardly, his getting my Lord of Salisbury's lease to pick notes out of it, and then to have such a mortgage trumped up in this manner. It is very rank, I assure you.

This is the substance of the evidence that has been offered by the Plaintiff, to prove, and induce you to believe these deeds forged.

Now in answer to this, they on the other side would offer, that Sir Charles Cotterel's evidence is a surprize upon them: They say they have such a Writing, and such and such deeds, Glover's lease, and Salkell's mortgage; but they are not prepared to give such an answer as they would have done, had they had notice. Here has been likewise great struggling and striving to have the verdict read to overthrow Mrs. Duffett's testimony; but that cannot be allowed to be given in evidence between these parties. Then they would have read her husband's oath, he being dead: but that is no point of evidence at all neither; for in case the man were alive, it would not be evidence what he should have heard his own wife say. If both of them indeed had been heard together, and testified against my Lady Ivy, it had been good evidence; or they both might have testified for her. But by the Law the husband cannot be a witness against his wife, nor a wife against her husband, to charge them with any thing criminal, except only in cases of high-treason. This is so known a common rule, that I thought it could never have born any question or debate.

This is the substance of the evidence on both sides, as near as I can recollect it; save only that which indeed I should have mentioned before, the Defendant had produced an exemplification of a verdict obtained the last Michaelmas-Term. To which they for the Plaintiff answer, We were not then prepared to answer your deeds, which were very new, surprizing and unexpected to us: We have now given new evidence that we never gave then, and it was a verdict obtained by surprize: We now shew our boundaries better than we could then; and so that they make to be the result of the whole matter.

Now upon the main, after this very long evidence, tho' the Case has been darkened as much as ever any Case could be endeavoured to be; and tho' the event of it be a matter of considerable value, yet the matter of fact is as clear as the sun at noon-day; and a plain point of fact it is, and must depend upon. If we do admit all their deeds to be good deeds, without any consideration of the forgery, pro or con, yet if the mill-ponds, ditches, orchards, gardens, gardens, &c. can be taken to be seven acres; then the boundaries upon the mill or hilly-bank, which may well be Fox's-lane, that will answer both the deeds of the Plaintiff and of the Defendant. And tho' never so many houses be built upon it, it will signify nothing in the Case. And that it is so, whereas the Defendant's surveyor swears, that 130 acres will not be made up without the lands in question; the Plaintiff has brought two surveyors, that swear there is full 130 acres, and more, without them. So you have two surveyors on the one side, and one on the other; and you yourselves have viewed it.

After this long evidence, Gentlemen, you have had as good an account of the substance of it, as I can by my notes and memory recollect. If any of the Gentlemen that are of the Counsel for the Plaintiff, or for the Defendant, do think I have omitted any thing that is material, on either side, they have free liberty to remind the Court of it. You are the Judges of this Fact, whether this land do of right belong to the Plaintiff or to the Defendant: And I leave it to your consideration.

After which, the Jury withdrew to consider of their Verdict, and the Court arose. That Evening the Jury gave in a private Verdict before a Judge; and appearing the next morning at the Bar, were called over, and demanded if they did abide by the Verdict they had given the night before; to which they answered, Yes: which being declared by the Secondary to be for the Plaintiff, the Jury were discharged.

Then a motion was made by the Plaintiff's Counsel, that several deeds produced by the Defendant, that were detected of forgery, might be left in Court, in order to have them pursued, and convicted of the forgery. The Court, upon debate of the matter, and the Plaintiff's Counsel declaring they would prosecute an Information of forgery, the deeds of the 13th of November, and the 22d of December, 2 and 3 Philip and Mary, were ordered to be left with the Clerk of the Crown till further Order, and in the mean time the Plaintiff to have Copies of them from the Clerk; and by Rule of Court a Trial at Bar is ordered in Michaelmas Term.

In Trinity-Term there was an Information against Lady Ivy for forging and publishing the said two Indentures, as follows.

Rex versus Ivy.

XXXVIII. The Trial of William Disney Esq; by the King's Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, held at the Marshalsea in Southwark, on Thursday, June 25. 1685. for High-Treason.

A SPECIAL Commission of Oyer and Terminer for the County of Surrey, being appointed for the trying of Mr. Disney, before the Lord Chief Justice of England, and other his Majesty's Justices; he was brought before the King's Commissioners at the Marshalsea, in Southwark, on June 21, in order to his Trial upon an Indictment for High-Treason: "For printing and publishing a most vile and traitorous Paper against his most sacred Majesty and his Government, intituled, The Declaration of James Duke of Monmouth; and the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others now in Arms, &c." And being arraign'd thereupon, he pleaded Not guilty, and desir'd he might have Counsel granted him, but was denied; the Court telling him it was not allowable in capital cases: yet upon his farther request, he had leave to make use of what Books he thought fit to prepare for his defence, and allow'd till the 25th.

On Thursday the 25th, he was brought to his Trial; when the Messenger deposed, that having a warrant for the apprehending of William Disney, Esq; he took some files of Musqueteers, and two or three Gentlemen to his assistance; when approaching to the house of one Tyrrell, a Gardener in the parish of Lambeth, on Monday June the 15th, 1685. between twelve and one of the clock in the morning, he broke into the apartment of Mr. Disney; where entering his chamber, he found the prisoner in his shirt, who crav'd his breeches; but the Messenger replied No, saying, if he had a Night-Gown he might put it on. Immediately after viewing his breeches, there was found a dagger in his pocket, and also some other things, likewise a brace of pistols, and a great hanger in the nature of a Scimeter.

His maid Mary Allett was supposed to be in bed with him, by reason her clothes were upon his bed: his daughter about eleven years of age or thereabouts was in another part of the room a-bed alone. The Messenger farther deposed, that getting into the Printing-house, he there found the Forms (as Printers call them) of the traitorous Declaration in the Printing-room, there being by computation about 750 of them printed on one side, and about five of the said traitorous Declarations perfect. Upon the Messenger's questioning how they came there, he pretended ignorance.

The evidence appearing very plain, and he making little or no defence for himself, was found guilty of High-Treason; sentenced to be drawn, hanged, and quarter'd; which was accordingly done at Kennington-Common in the county of Surrey, on Monday the 29th of June, 1685, and his quarters set upon the city-gates.

A true and full Account given by the Minister of St. George, concerning the Behaviour and last dying Speech of William Disney Esq; June 29th, 1685.

BETWEEN nine and ten of the clock in the morning, I was sent for by the High Sheriff of Surrey, to officiate as Ordinary at the execution of the prisoner at the Marshalsea. Before he was brought out, a neighbouring Minister and I (upon the Sheriff's motion) went into the room where he was; when the reverend Parson (having seen him the night before) ask'd him whether he had considered of those things which he had formerly offer'd him; and did very pathetically press him that he would give glory to God, by a full and ingenuous confession of his crime, intimating to him the fatal consequences that might have followed, if he had perfected that evil work: how many mens lives might have been lost in the quarrel; whose blood he was so far guilty of; as he contributed to the increase of the rebellion; by his printing the traitorous paper, (or words to the same effect.) To which the prisoner answer'd (with some signs of discontent) to this purpose; that he hoped (speaking to the Minister) he did not come to press him to unburden himself now: that he had nothing to say, that might bring any person into trouble, and his time was short, so he desired not to be troubled about any such matter; so that few words passed ere we parted. Finding him resolved not to make any discovery, I only told him, I did intend to meet him at the place of execution, and he thanked me.

When he came to the gallows, and was in the cart, I came to him and asked him, how he desired to improve those few moments of his life, that were yet to come; he answer'd, in prayer. I asked him, will you pray for yourself, or shall I pray for you? He answer'd, I will pray, and desire you to pray for me. Whilst the executioner was preparing the rope, I shewed him the Bible, saying, Sir, what comfortable sentence do you remember out of this word of God for your present use? He answer'd,

Iiii 2

Jesus

Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. And then he proceeded in general terms to acknowledge himself a great sinner against God; but affirm'd that he had made his peace with God, that he had confess'd his sins with humility and fervency, and had begg'd God's pardon; and did not doubt but God had for the merits of his son Jesus Christ pardon'd all his sins, and he was now under very comfortable hopes that he should soon be happy, not upon the account of his own merits, but the merits of Jesus Christ. I told him this was very good, if his hopes were well grounded. He replied, his hopes were grounded on the scriptures, which assured him that Christ died to save sinners. Whereupon I recounted to him some other gracious promises of God to true Penitents as that of Ezekiel, If the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness, and doth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his Soul alive, &c. After which he made his address to God in prayer, that he would forgive him all his sins, and sanctify this his affliction to him; and prayed God to bless the King, and that he may be merciful and kind to his subjects, as well as just to his enemies: he farther observed, how gracious God was to him in giving him this admonition, (as he call'd it) for God might have taken him off by some sudden death, or deprived him of his senses, and then (he said) it must have been worse with me, but now God hath given me time to bethink myself; so that, though the dolour and the shame of this death, having so many spectators (upon whom he look'd) may somewhat discompose me, yet I have peace and comfort within. Afterwards he desired me to pray with him, which I did briefly, according to his mind and present example: and closing with the Lord's Prayer, he answer'd every petition deliberately, and calmly: he declared that he lived in and did now die in the communion of the Church of England, which he repeated again in these words, the Protestant Church of England. After Prayer, I ask'd him, whether he would sing some part of a Psalm; he answer'd No. Then I ask'd him, whether he had any thing more to do or say; he answer'd, I have nothing more but to return you thanks for your care of me. And I pray God bless you and hear your prayers for me, and mine for you, and our Saviour Christ for us both. And so I left him going to his long home.

This according to the best recollection of my thoughts, is the sum, and, and as near as I can remember, the words that pass'd between Mr. Difney and me, Andrew Weston.

XXXIX. The Trial of Sir Edward Hales Bart. for neglecting to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, with his Plea thereto, upon the King's dispensing with the Stat. 25 Car. II. and the Opinion of the Judges thereupon. 1686.

Paschæ, 2 Jac. II. In the King's-Bench,

Arthur Godden Plaintiff, in an Action of debt of 500 l. grounded upon the Act of 25 Car II. for preventing Dangers from Popish Recusants.

Sir Edward Hales, Bart. Defendant.

TH E Plaintiff declares, That the Defendant after the first day of Easter Term 1673. sc. 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II. at Hackington in Kent, was admitted to the office of a Colonel of a Foot-Regiment:

That being a military office, and a place of trust under the King, and by authority from the King.

And the Defendant held that office by the space of three months, next after the 28 Nov. 1 Jac. II.

And from thence, till the time of this action begun, he was, and still is an inhabitant and resident of the parish of Hackington.

And the Plaintiff taking it by protestation, that the Defendant within three months next after his admission into the said office of Colonel, did not receive the sacrament in manner as the Act directs, but neglected to receive it;

Avers, that the Defendant did neglect to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, either in the Chancery, or in the King's-Bench, or at any Quarter-Sessions in Kent, or in the place where he was resident, either the next Term after his admission to his said office, or within three months after.

And that the Defendant after such neglect, sc. 10 Mar. 2 Jac. II. at Hackington in Kent, did exercise the said office, and still doth, contrary to the Statute of 25 Car. II. * for preventing dangers from Popish Recusants.

Where-

* 25 Car. II. cap. 2. An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants] For preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, and quieting the minds of his Majesty's good Subjects, be it enacted, &c. That every person that shall bear any office, civil or military, &c. or shall have command or place of trust from or under his Majesty, &c. within the Realm of England, &c. shall personally appear in the Court of Chancery, or of the King's-Bench, or at the Court of Quarter-

Whereupon the Defendant at Rochester, at the Assizes held 29th Mar. 2 Jac. II. was duly indicted for such his neglect, and for executing the said office contrary to the said Statute.

And thereupon duly convicted, as by the Record thereof appears; whereupon the Plaintiff became entitled to this 500 l. as forfeited by the Defendant.

The Defendant pleads, that the King within the three months, in the declaration mentioned, and before the next term or Quarter-Sessions, after his admittance to the said office, and before his suit began, sc. 9 Jan. 1 Jac. II. by his Letters Patent under the Great Seal, and here produced in Court, did dispense with, pardon, remit and discharge (among others) the Defendant from taking the said oaths, and from receiving the sacrament, and from subscribing the declaration against transubstantiation or tests in the Act of 25 Car. II. for preventing dangers from Popish Recusants, or in any other Act, and from all crimes, convictions, penalties, forfeitures, damages, disabilities; by him incurred by his exercising the office of Colonel:

Or by the Act intituled, An Act for the preserving of the King's Person and Government, by disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament: Or by the Acts made in the first or third years of King James I. or the Acts made 5 Eliz. or 23, or 29, or 35 Eliz.

And the King, by his Letters Patent, granted, that the Defendant should be enabled to hold that office in any place in England, or Wales, or Berwick, or in the Fleet, or in Jersey or Guernsey, and to receive his pay or wages;

Any clause in the said Acts, or in any other Act notwithstanding, & non obstante, that the Defendant was or should be a Recusant convict,

As by the said Letters Patent doth appear.

Whereupon the Defendant prays judgment of the Court, whether the Plaintiff ought to maintain this action.

The Plaintiff demurred generally to this Plea. The Defendant joined in demurrer.

The questions are two, 1. Whether the Defendant ought to have pleaded this pardon and dispensation to the indictment, or whether he may not plead it in bar to the action?

2. Admitting he may plead it to the action, whether it be a good bar, and whether the King by his prerogative may dispense with the Statute?

Mr. Northey, who argued for the Plaintiff, held that the Defendant may not be permitted to plead this matter in bar of the action, because he ought to have pleaded it to the indictment: and he having not pleaded it then, the Law will construe it to be waving of it, as the case in Brook's Abridgment, Charter of Pardon, 15. That in case of an indictment for murder, one that has pleaded Not guilty, cannot plead the pardon after, unless dated since this plea of not guilty. So 3 Crooke in a Fieri Facias, if the Defendant appears, and has a release, and does not plead it, he has lost the benefit of it, and shall not be released by Audita Querela: now the Defendant shall not be permitted to plead it against the Plaintiff, no more than he could have pleaded it against the King; for this action is in the nature of an execution upon a judgment, and may be likened to this case; an administrator de jure non, by 17 Car. II. is enabled to sue forth an execution upon a judgment, recovered by an executor of the first testator, and the Statute doth put the administrator in the same case as the executor was; and the Defendant in that case can alledge no other matter against the administrator, than he could have done against the executor, neither can he avoid this execution by any plea that he might have pleaded to the first action. And if this Defendant shall be received to plead this plea now, he will falsify the indictment, that was found against him; for if the offence be pardoned, he ought not to have been indicted: but admit this Defendant may well plead this plea, yet I hold it no bar to the Plaintiff's action.

I do allow that the King may dispense with several penal Laws in some cases, but that prerogative of the King is bounded, so that with some Statutes he cannot dispense, wherein the subject is interested, as in 4 Instit. (135) So the King cannot license a man to make a nuisance or commit a murder, as 11 Henry VII. 11, 12. And that this is an Act wherein all the subjects have an interest, I humbly submit to the Judgment of the Court.

The King cannot dispense with the Statute 31 of Eliz. chap. 6. against Simony, nor with the Statute 17 Edw. VI. 1. against buying and selling of offices, as appears by the 1 Instit. 12. a. 30. Instit. 154. 20. Crooke 385. Hobart 75. 1 Instit. 234. a. A man that is disabled by Law to take such an office, the King cannot capacitate him; as if the King should grant to one to sell an office, within the Statute Ed. VI. and to another to buy that office, these Grants would be void, as in Vaughan 534. in the case of Thomas and Sorrel, there are several cases put, wherein the King cannot dispense with a Statute.

Now by this Statute that we are upon, it is enacted, that every officer shall take the oaths, that every person that does neglect, shall be disabled to hold the said office; now this Act does not work upon the taking, but upon the holding; and if such conditions be not performed, he is thereby rendered incapable to hold his office, and the King can never enable a man whom the Law hath disabled, 3 Inst. 154. But I foresee the case in 18 Coke 18. will be objected against me, where it is said, that no Act of Parliament can bind the King from any prerogative which is solely and inseparably annexed to his person, but that he may dispense with it by a non obstante;

Quarter-Sessions in that County where he shall reside, within three Months next after his admittance into any of the said offices, and there in open Court, take the several Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and shall also receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, in some Parish-Church, upon some Lord's-day, immediately after Divine Service.

And every the person aforesaid, that doth or shall neglect or refuse to take the said Oaths and the Sacrament in the said Courts, and at the respective times aforesaid, shall be ipso facto adjudged incapable, and disabled in Law to all intents and purposes whatsoever, to have, occupy or enjoy, the said office or employment, and every such office and place shall be void, and is hereby adjudged void.

And every person that shall neglect or refuse to take the said Oaths or the Sacrament as aforesaid, and yet after such neglect or refusal, shall execute any of the said offices, after the said times expired, wherein he ought to have taken the same, and being thereupon lawfully convicted upon any information, &c. in any of the King's Courts at Westminster, or at the Assizes, every such person shall forfeit 500 l. to be recovered by him that shall sue for the same.

And at the same time when the persons concerned in this Act shall take the said Oaths, they shall likewise subscribe the declaration against the belief of Transubstantiation under the same penalties as by this Act is appointed.

obstante; and the Book doth instance in the case of Sheriffs, upon the Statute 23 Hen. VI. which does enact, that all Patents made or to be made of any office of a Sheriff, &c. for term of years, &c. within any County of England, &c. shall forfeit 200 l. Yet, says that Book, the King may dispense with that Statute, and cites 2 Hen. VII. 66. to be there so adjudged by all the Judges of England; and that this is the only authority that seems to countenance this case. But this is the opinion only of my Lord Coke, for the Book which he cites and depends upon was never adjudged, as appears by Brook 5 pt. 45. 109. and what was said in that case, was only said by one Judge, and never judicially determined, nor so much as spoken to by any other Judge; therefore the foundation that my Lord Coke has laid, failing, the superstructure must needs fall, and so with submission, that single opinion in 12 Coke, fol. 18. is not law. But admitting the case to be Law, that can be no rule to guide this case by, for that Statute was made, rather to deprive the King of his power of making Sheriffs, and so consequently commanding his Sheriffs not to serve him, than to disable the subject, and thereby restraining the King's prerogative, which is so inherent in him. But by the Statute 25 Car. II. 2. the prerogative of the King is not touched, for the King may grant the office to any of his subjects, and it is only a direction to the subject to qualify himself for the King's service; and if he be incapable to serve the King, 'tis through his own fault and neglect, and may be punishable for the same, as in the case of Sir John Reade in 27 and 28 Car. II. in the Exchequer he was made and sworn Sheriff of Hertfordshire, and neglected to take the oaths according to this Statute; by reason of which, the office became void, and afterwards there was an information exhibited against him upon this Statute we are now upon, for neglecting to take the said oaths, and executing his office, and upon this he was convicted and fined. And the Court was of opinion that no subject could put himself out of a capacity to serve the King, but for so doing he is punishable; and in the Law of the Sheriffs the dispensation is in the Patent, but in our case the dispensation is after the Patent, and so a difference between the two cases: and for these reasons, I pray your Lordships judgment for the Plaintiff.

Arguments for the Defendant.

Sir Thomas Powis the King's Solicitor, argued for the Defendant.

AS to the first point, that supposing the Defendant ought to have pleaded the dispensation to the Indictment, it does not appear by this Record, but that he did; for the declaration is, that he was Legitime Modo Convictus, and does not say whether he pleaded Not guilty, or how he pleaded, and for any thing that appears, he did plead it against the King, yet he may be admitted to plead it against the Plaintiff who is a stranger.

If they stand upon this as an estoppel, they ought to have relied upon it, and replied, that he had the dispensation at the time of the Indictment, and refused to plead it; for he that pleads an estoppel, must rely upon it, as the authorities are which treat of estopples. And therefore as to the first point, I think, with submission, we have very well pleaded the pardon and dispensation in bar of the action.

As to the second point, whether the King can dispense with the Statute or no; I humbly conceive, with submission, the King may very well dispense with the Statute; 'tis admitted that the King may in many cases dispense with an Act of Parliament, and let us consider why not this? It's well observed in 2 Instit. 496. that the King's prerogative is as much the Law of England as any other Law whatsoever; and the King may upon any cause moving him in respect of time, place, or person, by a *non obstant*e dispense with any particular person, and that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute, 7 Coke 36, 37. Vaughan 333. 347. Glanvil in his argument ante P. 205. doth admit a power in the King to dispense with Penal Laws, and yet he was no friend to the prerogative. Though the consent of the Lords and Commons be requisite to the making of the Act of Parliament, yet it is the King that gives the sanction to the said Laws, and most of the ancient Statutes began in form of Charters, as it appears in 8 Coke 19. and the intents and meanings of Acts of Parliament, are every day by the Judges extended and changed, according to a better rule of Reason and Justice than the words will bear, Hobart 229. and the Judges have an authority over the Statute-Laws, to mold them according to the truest and best sense, Hobart 346. and Statutes which have been made against common right, have been construed void, 8 Coke 118.

There is a distinction taken in our Books between Malum in se, and Malum prohibitum.

The former the King cannot dispense with, the latter he may; as where the Statute generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty, which was lawful before, (the Subject receiving no Injury by such a Dispensation) the King there may dispense with such an Act. Vaughan 343. Dyer 5. 2. The King granted a licence to carry Bell-metal out of the Realm, notwithstanding the Statute, Dyer 54. It was enacted by Statute, 4 Hobart 9. that none should convey wine into England out of Gascoigne, but in English ships; and the King granted a licence to a man, that he, his deputies and factors might convey, &c. in any ship, notwithstanding the Statute, 28 Coke 32. Vaughan 352, 353, 354. Now to apply the cases to the case in question, this is Malum Prohibitum, whether is the dispensation any damage to the subject; if it were any wrong, it were to the King himself, and sure the King may very well dispense with that, which only relates to himself.

I must distinguish between those Acts of Parliament which concern Property, and those which concern Government; Acts of Parliament which concern Property, the King cannot dispense with; but those which concern Government he may; and this for the great inconveniencies which may happen, or urgencies of state which may force him to it, and those unforeseen at the time of making the Law: for it may happen, by a vicissitude of times, those Laws that were made for the preservation of Government, should turn to the destruction of it, if the King could not dispense with them.

The Common Law in some cases does so very much respect the prerogative, that it leaves the private interest of the subject unregarded, and the King may dig in any of his subjects land for Saltpetre to make Gunpowder. Now this Statute 25 Car. II. was made to diminish the King's prerogative.

tive, but to secure him from his enemies, and for the preservation of the Government; and the King is best judge what will be most for his own security, and the Government's preservation. No Act of Parliament can discharge the subject from his allegiance which he owes to the King, every one is bound by his allegiance to serve his Prince when he shall be required. Therefore no Act of Parliament can disable any man to serve the King. But they object, that this Act doth make no one incapable, but at his own election.

If this were so, it would be in the election of some or all the subjects to incapacitate themselves to serve the King, and the King would be unserved: for if it were not in the power of the King to force the subject, he would not (it may be not) be served at all; as in the case of Sir John Read, cited by the other side; he neglected to take the oaths, and thereby the office became void; so that the next elected might refuse, and the next. In the mean time the King's service lies neglected, and no business of the County can proceed, for want of a Sheriff. To pardon murder, is a prerogative solely and inseparably incident to the King, who may dispense with Statutes restraining it, 12 Coke 18. He may dispense with non residente. Hobart 46. 3. Instit. 339. In 3 Instit. the Lord Coke speaking of Acts of Parliament that were made to restrain the King's power of pardoning murder, says, that such Acts are good for King's to follow, but not binding, Coke 18, 19. There are several Statutes cited, with which the King by his prerogative may dispense, as the Statute 36 Hen. VI. which does enact, that no man shall be Sheriff of one County two years together. Yet it was adjudged by all the Judges of England, says that Book, that the King may dispense with it; the Statute of 4 Hen. IV. 31. that no Welshman shall be Justice, or other Officer whatsoever in any part of Wales; and yet the King may dispense with it. The Statute 8 Rich. 22, and 33 Hen. VIII. 24. do enact, that none shall be Justice of the Assize in the County where he was born, and yet the King with a special non obstante may dispense with that Statute. And in Plowden 502. 13. the King may grant to a man to be an Escheator for life, notwithstanding that Statute.

To answer the Statutes which have been cited, which the King cannot dispense with: I say, as to the Statutes of Simony and Usury, the King cannot dispense with them; but what is that to the matter in hand? For there is no restriction of the subjects service, but the King may have the benefit notwithstanding. Then as to the Statute 5 Ed. VI. 16. against buying and selling of judicial offices, of which Statute, there is a clause in the 1st Instit. 134. that the King may not dispense with that Statute: There is a difference between that Statute and this, for that does enact, that if any person shall bargain and sell any office, &c. shall lose the office, &c. and all such bargains and contracts shall be void; and that he that shall give any sum of money, &c. for any such office, &c. shall be a disabled person in Law, to have, occupy, or enjoy the said office, &c.

Now the Statute doth disable the party upon doing such an act, to take the office; for the making the bargain is prior to taking the office, and thereby he is disabled to take it, so that he can never have the office legally vested on him, if the King cannot dispense with a conditional subsequent, and so that does not come near this. And for this reason I humbly pray Judgment for the Defendant.

Then the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert spake thus:

Chief-Justice. THIS is a case of great consequence, but of as little difficulty as ever any case was, that raised so great an expectation; for if the King cannot dispense with this Statute, he cannot dispense with any Penal Law whatsoever.

As to the first point, whether he shall be admitted to plead this dispensation, and pardon to this action of debt; (having not pleaded it to the Indictment) I think he may: for this Court shall not be bound by the finding of the Jury below, for he (for any thing that does appear) did plead it there, and the Jury might have gone against the direction of the Court, yet that shall not conclude us; but if the party has good matter to discharge himself, we may shew it: as if a man be convicted of an assault and battery against the Defendant, the Plaintiff may give the former conviction in evidence, but yet he must also prove the battery, or else he shall not recover.

And this being an estoppel, it shall not bind, because the Plaintiff was not party to the first suit.

As to the second point, whether the King can dispense with the Act or no, I think it a question of little difficulty. There is no Law whatsoever but may be dispensed with by the supreme Law-giver; as the Laws of God may be dispensed with by God himself; as it appears by God's command to Abraham, to offer up his son Isaac: So likewise the Law of man may be dispensed with by the Legislator, for a Law may either be too wide or too narrow, and there may be many cases which may be out of the conveniencies which did induce the Law to be made; for it is impossible for the wisest Law-maker to foresee all the cases that may be, or are to be remedied, and therefore there must be a power somewhere, able to dispense with these Laws. But as to the case of Simony, that is objected by the other side, that is against the Law of God, and a special offence, and therefore malum in se, which I do agree the King cannot dispense with. And as to the cases of Usury and Non-Residence, those cases do come in under that rule, that the King cannot dispense with them, because the subject has a benefit by them; for in case of Usury the Bond is made void by the Statute, and therefore if the King should dispense with it, the subject would lose the benefit of the avoiding the Bond. And as to the cases of buying and selling of offices, which are objected, there is no need of resolving, whether the King could dispense with that Statute or no, because the party was disabled to take any such office by the contract, and the disability was attacked by force before the office was vested, so that the King could not remove the disability: and so I do agree that it would have been in this case, if the Defendant had by his neglect or refusal to take the oaths, rendered himself incapable before he had taken the King's dispensation; for the King's dispensation coming before the disability attacked, it does prevent it.

The case of the Sheriff is much a stronger case than this, and comes up to it in every particular, for that Statute doth disable the party to take, and the King to grant; and there is also a clause in that Statute Statute, which says, that the Patent shall be void, notwithstanding any non obstante to the contrary; and there is a penalty of 200*l.* like to our Case: and yet by the Opinion of all the Judges of England, the King has a Power of dispensing with that Statute; yet that Statute does expressly say, the King shall not dispense with it by a non obstante: so if an Act of Parliament had a clause in it that it should never be repealed, yet without question, the same Power that made it, may repeal it. Besides, that Statute makes the Patents void at the time of granting them; but by this Statute the Patents are good at the time of granting them, and continue so 'till the neglect to take the oaths, for doing of which the Patentee has three months time. And if the case of the Sheriff be Law, as it hath been taken over since Hen. 7th's time, and is cited for good law in many of our books, and never 'till now questioned; for the common course and experience have been according to it: then I defy all the world to shew me any material difference between that and this, only that this is the stronger case of the two, in many particulars. But because the case has been denied by the Plaintiff's Counsel, it does concern us to take the opinion of our Brethren, it being a matter of so great consequence in the circuits; for if it be not law, then there are some sheriffs that be not lawful, and so have not power to return the Juries, and then we have no power to try and give Judgment upon any offenders; and it also concerns us who go into our countries, to take advice of it: for if that case is not law, our patents, which are non obstante's to 23 Hen. 8. 24. may not be good, and so we have no authorities to go the circuits; and therefore I will ask the opinion of all the judges, as well in that case as this *.

On Monday the 21st of June, after having consulted with all the Judges, his Lordship delivered their Opinions in open Court, thus:

"In the Case of Godwin and Hales, wherein the defendant pleads a dispensation from the King; it is doubted, whether or no the King had such a Prerogative? Truly, upon the argument before us, it appeared as clear a Case as ever came before this Court: But because men fancy I know not what difficulty, when really there is none, we were willing to give so much countenance to the Question in the Case, as to take the advice of all the Judges of England. They were all assembled at Serjeant's-Inn, and this case was put to them; and the great case of the Sheriffs was put, whether the dispensation in that case were legal? because upon that depended the execution of all the Law of the Nation: And I must tell you, that there were ten upon the place, that clearly delivered their opinions, That the Case of the Sheriffs was good Law; and that all the Attainders grounded upon Indictments found by Juries returned by such Sheriffs, were good, and not erroneous; and consequently that men need not have any fears or scruples about that matter. And in the next place, they did clearly declare, that there was no imaginable difference between that Case and this; unless it were, that this were the much clearer Case of the two, and liable to the fewer exceptions.

"My Brother Powel said, he was inclin'd to be of the same opinion; but he would rather have some more time to consider of it: But he has since sent by my Brother Holloway, to let us know, that he does concur with us. To these eleven Judges, there is one Dissenter, Brother Street; who yet continues his opinion, That the King cannot dispense in this Case: But that's the opinion of one single Judge, against the opinion of eleven. We were satisfied in our Judgments before, and having the concurrence of eleven out of twelve, we think we may very well declare the opinion of the Court to be, that the King may dispense in this Case: And the Judges go upon these grounds;

"1. That the Kings of England are sovereign Princes.

"2. That the laws of England are the king's laws.

"3. That therefore 'tis an inseparable Prerogative in the Kings of England, to dispense with penal Laws in particular Cases, and upon particular necessary Reasons.

"4. That of those reasons and those necessities, the king himself is sole judge: And then, which is consequent upon all,

"5. That this is not a trust invested in, or granted to the King by the People, but the ancient remains of the sovereign Power and Prerogative of the Kings of England; which never yet was taken from them, nor can be. And therefore such a Dispensation appearing upon Record to come time enough to save him from the forfeiture, Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant †, Quod querens nil capiat per billam.

This Judgment making a great noise, the Lord Chief-Justice, in justification of his opinion, published the following Vindication.

A Short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case: Written by Sir Edward Herbert, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, in vindication of himself.

HAVING been called to a place of Judicature in difficult times, and after my most sincere resolutions and uttermost endeavours of discharging the duty of that place, with a good conscience, having yet

* See Comberbach's Reports, page 21, & seq. where this Case is largely reported.

† Bishop Burnet, in his History of his own Time, Vol. I. pag. 669. says: Sir Edward Hales, a Gentleman of a noble Family in Kent, declared himself a Papist, tho' he had long disguised it; and had once to myself so solemnly denied it, that I was led from thence to see, there was no credit to be given to that sort of men, where their Church or Religion was concerned. He had an Employment, and not taking the Test, his coachman was set up to inform against him, and to claim the 500*l.* that the Law gave to the Informer: When this was to be brought to trial, the Judges were secretly asked their opinions; and such as were not clear to judge as the Court did direct, were turned out; and upon two or three canvassings, the half of them were dismissed, and others of more pliable and obedient understandings, were put in their places: Some of these were weak and ignorant to a scandal. The Suit went on in a feeble prosecution, and in Trinity-Term Judgment was given.

And in page 671. the Bishop says,

But Judges, who are before-hand determined how to give their opinions, will not be much moved, even by the strongest arguments. The ludicrous ones used on this occasion at the bar, were rather a farce, fitter for a mock-trial in a Play, than such as became men of Learning in so important a matter: Great expectations were raised, to hear with what arguments the Judges would maintain the Judgment that they should give; but they made nothing of it: and without any arguing gave Judgment for the Defendant, as if it had been in a Cause of course.

yet had the hard fortune to fall under the greatest infamy and reproach that is possible for any man to lie under, of perjury and breach of trust; in giving a Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's Case, contrary to Law, and contrary to my knowledge and opinion (for that only can make it criminal;) and which, they say, tends to the subversion of all our Laws, contrary to the oath that every Judge takes, and to that high trust reposed in him, to judge to the best of his understanding, according to Law: Although I cannot hope to wipe off that universal ill impression that the malice of some people, who understand the nature of this Case very well, has made upon most men who do not understand it; yet in order to clear myself to all just and disinterested persons who are only my enemies by mistake, I think myself obliged to give some short account of that Judgment, and the grounds upon which it was given: and this I will do, not by making an elaborate and legal argument, to make out by reasons of my own, that the Judgment then given is consonant to Law; which whether it be or no, is like to be considered in Parliament, and to whose determination, I shall as entirely and cheerfully submit as any other person in the Nation. But I shall set down, not all the variety of Cases that we meet with in our Books, touching the King's power of dispensing with Acts of Parliament; for that would swell this Paper to an unreasonable length, and discourage many from reading any part of it; but only some few of the chiefest and plainest authorities in Law, upon which the resolution in the Case of Sir Edward Hales was grounded. I shall not only cite the Books and Pages where those Cases are to be found, but transcribe the very words, that every body may be convinced, that if we were in a mistake, it was no wilful mistake, but that we had the authority of former Judgments given by great men that went before us (and for which they were never questioned) to lead us into it.

The Case (for I must state it upon my memory, not having any Copy of the Record by me) was shortly this.

An action popular was brought against Sir Edward Hales, upon the Statute 25 Car. 2. c. 2. for the penalty of 500 l. wherein the Plaintiff declares, that whereas it was provided by the Statute, &c. (setting forth the Statute:) Notwithstanding which, the Defendant having a commission to serve the King as a Colonel of Foot, and not having received the Sacrament, nor taken the oaths and tests, &c. within the times prescribed by the Act, and after the times expired wherein he ought to have received the Sacrament and taken the oaths and tests as aforesaid, he did execute the said Office, and continued to act by colour of the said commission; of which he was indicted and convicted at the Assizes in Kent, &c. whereby the action accrues to the Plaintiff for the penalty of 500 l. the Defendant pleads, that before the time expired, &c. he had a dispensation under the broad seal, to act, non obstante that Statute.

To which the Plaintiff demurs.

And Judgment was given for the Defendant, that his Plea was good.

And first it will be necessary to shew what this dispensing Power is, which is warranted by our Judgment; and that will best appear by the definition of it which is given in the 11th Report of my Lord Coke, page 88. in the Case of Monopolies; Dispensatio mali prohibiti est de jure Domino Regi concessa propter impossibilitatem prævidendi de omnibus particularibus; & dispensatio est mali prohibiti pro-vida relaxatio, utilitate seu necessitate pensata. "For true it is (says the Book) that in as much as an Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or only given to the King, may be inconvenient to divers particular persons, in respect of person, time, or place; for this purpose the Law gives a power to the King to dispense with particular persons." And in the 7th Rep. p. 63. in the Case of penal Statutes, which was the opinion of all the Judges of England, 2 Jacobi, it is resolved, That the King may dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute, tho' it be an Act made pro bono publico; and that this is a trust and confidence inseparably annexed to the royal person of the King. I cite these two first Cases, chiefly to shew, that a Dispensation in its nature is particular, and given to particular persons by name; which is all the power that is attributed to the King by our Judgment. And this I mention, because of an unreasonable mistake of most People that talk of the dispensing Power, as though the King's declaration of Liberty of Conscience, whereby all the Laws that concern Religion, are at once totally suspended and laid asleep, were warranted by it: Let that declaration stand or fall upon its own bottom, I am sure the Case I am now speaking of, has nothing to do with it. And having by these cases cleared the nature of all dispensations, which are always granted to particular persons (as Sir Edward Hales's was in our Case, who was the first, and I think the only person who then had such a Dispensation) I shall now cite some of the chief authorities upon which our Judgment was given in that case: And the first and great case that I cite, wherein the King's dispensing Power is described and limited, is in the year-book of Hen. 7. fol. 11. & H. 7. fol. 12. in these words; "There is a diversity (says the Book) between malum prohibitum, and malum in se, as a Statute forbids any man to coin money, and if he does he shall be hanged; this is malum prohibitum; for before the Statute, coining money was lawful, but now it is not so, and therefore the King can dispense with it. So if a man ship wool in any place but Calais, it is malum prohibitum; because it is prohibited by Act of Parliament, and the King can dispense with it, and so in like cases: But that which is malum in se, the King, nor no other person can dispense with; as if the King would give a man power to kill another, or license one to make a nuisance in a high-way, this were void; and yet the King can pardon these things when they are done." These are the very words of that Book; and my Lord Vaughan discoursing of, and explaining this case in the Case of Thomas and Sorrell, in his Rep. p. 333. first shews, how a Dispensation differs from a Pardon. For a Dispensation does ius dare, and makes the thing prohibited (to all others) lawful to be done by him that has it. And therefore the King cannot dispense with mala in se, because they never were, and can never be made lawful: But even these, (says the Year-book) may be pardoned after they are done.

From these Cases results this plain Syllogism; Whatever is not prohibited by the Law of God, but was lawful before any Act of Parliament made to forbid it, the King, by his Dispensation, granted to a particular person, may make lawful again; to that person who has such Dispensation, though it continues unlawful to every body else.

But to execute any office without taking the oaths and the tests antecedent to any Acts of Parliament made to forbid it, was lawful.

Therefore the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hales, did make it lawful for him to do so, though it continued unlawful for any body else.

In this argument the premises are none of our own, we have them out of our law-books; and the authority of those books have never yet been questioned. I appeal then to any indifferent person, whether it can be criminal in Judges, to draw a necessary conclusion from premises and book-cases that have been taken for Law for so many ages together.

The next great Case, is the Resolution of all the Judges of England, in 2 Hen. 7. in the Exchequer-chamber, upon the King's Power of dispensing with the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. cap. 8. That no man should be Sheriff for above one year. The recital in the preamble, and the whole purview, if compared with our Statute of 25 Car. 2. cap. 2. equals it in every particular, and in some goes beyond it: for the mischiefs recited in this latter Statute, are only in these words, For preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, and quieting the minds of his Majesty's good Subjects. The Cause of making the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. is for preventing the imputable damage of the King and his People, perjury, manslaughter and great oppression. The Purview enacts,

1. That no man shall be Sheriff for above a year.
2. That all Letters Patent made for years or lives, shall be void.
3. That no Non obstante shall make them good; (which shews that the Parliament thought the King could otherwise have dispensed with this Act by a Non obstante).
4. Whoever acts by colour of such Letters Patent, shall forfeit 200 l.
5. He shall be utterly disabled to bear the office of Sheriff in any County of England.
6. That every Pardon for such offence shall be void.

Notwithstanding all this, it was adjudged in that Case before-cited by all the Judges of England, (who were at that time as learned as ever sat upon the Bench;) I say it was adjudged by all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, that the King's Dispensation with that Statute was good.

Having then this Case before us, if we should have judged the Dispensation not good in Sir Edward Hales's Case, it must have been upon one of these two grounds: that is, either, 1. In the first place, we must have found some difference between the King's power in that case and in this, which I confess, after the wisest inquiry does not appear to me, and I wish any man would shew me any such difference if he can: or else, 2. We must have adjudged that solemn resolution given in the Exchequer-chamber by all the Judges of England so long ago, and which has been taken for good Law ever since, we must adjudge no Law: whereas the known rule is, that after any point of Law has been solemnly settled in the Exchequer-chamber by all the Judges, we never suffer it to be disputed or drawn in question again.

But our enemies seeing the force of this argument have had the confidence to say, that that point is not resolved in that case; they might with as much modesty affirm, Thou shalt not bear false Witness against thy Neighbour, to be none of the ten Commandments; we can only reply in this case as in that, that if we have eyes to read, and common sense to judge, it is there resolved. Indeed there is another point about the Sheriff's passing his accounts, which the Judges were divided in; but in the point of the dispensation they all agreed: or else, that other point could never have come in question.

But to put this beyond all controversy, we have two things to offer.

First, That it has been cited as adjudged in several books of great authority.

Secondly, It has been the constant practice to have such dispensations in all Kings reigns ever since that resolution.

As to the first, though I might cite many books, yet I will only cite three or four of the clearest and greatest authorities: and the first shall be Fitzherbert, in his abridgment of this very case, Tit. Grant. 33. who lived near this time, and could not easily be mistaken in the sense of the Year-book: The patent, says he, was adjudged good by all the Justices; but the Statute says expressly it shall be void; therefore it is only made good by the King's dispensing.

2. Next to him shall be Plowden, who, as all Lawyers will confess, is as little like to be mistaken in the sense of the Year-books, as any reporter we have; and he in his Commentaries, p. 502. in the case between Greenon and the Bishop of Lincoln, after citing the case both out of the Year-book, and out of Fitzherbert's abridgment, has these words where the Statute was, That the King's grant to any man to be Sheriff of any County for longer time than a year shall be void, notwithstanding any clause of non obstante to be put into the patent: There it is held, that the King's grant to the Earl of Northumberland, to be Sheriff during life must have a clause of Non obstante, because of the precise words of the Statute before-mentioned; and with such a clause of Non obstante, the patent to the Earl was good.

3. Next is my Lord Coke, who asserts the King's prerogative touching this matter in much higher terms than we would presume to do, in giving Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's case: for in his twelfth report, page 18, he has these words; No Act can bind the King from any Prerogative which is sole and inseparable to his person, but that he may dispense with it by a Non obstante, as a sovereign power to command any of his subjects to serve him for the publick weal; and this solely and inseparably is annexed to his person: and his royal power cannot be restrained by any Act of Parliament, neither in Thesis nor in Hypothesis, but that the King by his royal Prerogative may dispense with it: For upon the Commandment of the King, and Obedience of the subject does his Government consist; as is provided by the Statute of 23 Hen. 6. cap. 8. That all Patents made or to be made of any office of Sheriff, &c. for term of years, for life, in fee-simple or in tail, are void and of none effect, any clause or parol de non obstante, put or to be put into such patents to be made notwithstanding. And further, whosoever shall take upon him or them, to accept or occupy such office of Sheriff, by virtue of such grants or patents, shall stand perpetually disabled to be or bear the office of Sheriff within any county of England, by the same authority; and notwithstanding that by this Act, First, The Patent is made void. Secondly, The King is restrained to grant non obstante. Thirdly, The grantee disabled to take the office: yet the King by his royal sovereign power of commanding, may command by his patent (for such causes, as he in his wisdom doth think meet and profitable for himself and the common commonwealth, of which he himself is solely Judge) to serve him and the weal publick as Sheriff of such a county for years, or for life, &c. And so it was resolved by all the Justices of England in the Exchequer-chamber, 2 H. 7. And after some other cases to this point of the King's prerogative, he has this farther (says he) see 4 Hen. 4. cap. 31. in which it is ordained that no Welchman be Justice, Chamberlain, Treasurer, Sheriff, Steward, Constable of a castle, Escheator, Coroner, or chief Forester, nor other officer whatsoever, nor keeper of Records, &c. in any part of Wales, notwithstanding any patent made to the contrary, with clause of Non obstante licet sit Wallicus natus: and yet without question the King may grant with a Non obstante. Thus far that book, and I have transcribed the book at large, that every body may see that the King's power of dispensing with such Acts of Parliament as restrain his granting offices, stands upon a peculiar reason, besides the general one upon which his power of dispensing with other penal Laws is founded. And that if this be a pernicious opinion, we are not to suffer as the first authors of it. But lest it should be objected, that this is my Lord Coke's single opinion; or that the twelfth report is not of so great authority as the rest of his reports are; the same is resolved by all the Judges of England, (if my Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter) in Calvin's case in the seventh report, p. 14. in these words: Every subject is by his natural allegiance bound to serve and obey his sovereign, &c. It is enacted by the Parliament of 23 H. 6. That no man should serve the King as Sheriff of any county above one year, and that notwithstanding any clause of non obstante to the contrary; that is to say, Notwithstanding that the King should expressly dispense with the said Act; howbeit it is agreed 2 H. 7. that against the express purview of that Act, the King may by a special non obstante dispense with that Act. For that the Act could not bar the King of the service of his subject, which the law of nature did give unto him. This is reported (unless my Lord Coke had a mind to deceive the succeeding Judges, and draw them in, to give pernicious opinions) as the sense of all the Judges of England in King James's time, in the Exchequer-chamber.

And now I would ask, these cases thus solemnly resolved, are they Law? Or are they not? If it shall be said, that they are not Law, what foundations have the Judges to stand upon? or what certain measures can they take in giving Judgment, either between the King and his subjects, or between party and party; if so many solemn resolutions by all the Judges in England in the Exchequer-chamber, are not to be relied upon? If they are Law; then I appeal to all mankind, whether our ease does not come up in every tittle to the reason of those resolutions: whether the Act of 25 Car. 2. do not bar the King of the service of some of his subjects; and whether therefore for great reasons, and in particular cases, he may not dispense with it.

But besides the authority of this case, we have the constant practice, that this Statute of Sheriffs has been constantly dispensed with ever since it was made; and if those dispensations were not good, then all persons convicted upon Indictments found by grand Juries, returned by such Sheriffs, are illegally attainted; then all pannels of Juries returned and other Process executed in Civil Causes, by such Sheriffs, was altogether erroneous, and it is strange that no body in so long a time should hit that blot.

Obj. The only Objection, that I hear, is made to this, by eminent men of our profession, (who freely acknowledge the authority of these Cases, and the resolution in them, that no Act of Parliament can debar the King of the service of his subjects which the Law of nature gives him, to be good Law;) is this, that say they, It is not the Act of Parliament that debars the King of the service of his subjects in this case, but it is the default of those subjects, who will not qualify themselves for his service, by doing those things that the Statute requires. But for a full and plain answer to this, I say,

First, We are not now considering these Grants of Offices, as they are beneficial to the subjects, on whom they are conferred, but as the King has an interest in the service of those Subjects; and it is a known rule in Law, that among common persons, no man shall suffer by the default of another; much less shall the King be prejudic'd by the default of any of his people.

But secondly, Pray where is the difference between an Act of Parliament's barring the King directly of the service of his Subject, and doing of it by necessary and inevitable consequence? As, if an Act of Parliament were made, that no man that is lame or deaf should serve the King in any Office, though they were otherwise well qualified for it; the King were as effectually debarred of the service of such Subjects, as though they had been expressed by name. I know it will be said, that these are natural defects, which the Subjects cannot help; but the others are wilful Impediments, that may be removed, if they please.

But to prove that this is not so: I ask, whether when the Act requires Declarations and Subscriptions to be made, it should be done contrary to a Man's opinion, or according to it? Certainly, no Man will say, contrary to a Man's opinion, for that would be high Diffimulation, and more elude the ends of the Act, than not doing it all. If then it must be done according to a Man's opinion, it is no more in any Man's power to change his opinion, than to cure himself of Deafness or Lameness. Every man believes, not because he will, but because he must believe. Error is a disease of the mind, as much as those before-mentioned are of the body. It is true, a Man may seek for instruction, and use all means to be better informed; and so may a Man, in the other case, try all proper Remedies to cure his distempers; but proper Remedies do not always effect the cure, and often when they do, there is much time taken up in the operation: and the King, who is in no default at all, loses the service of his subject in the mean time. And if this Prerogative be, as my Lord Coke says, Proprium quarto modo, and that it belongs to our Kings, as he says, Omni, soli & semper; the King can be no more debarred of the service of his subject for a month, or a year, than he can be debarred of it for ever; especially since in that month or year may happen such occasions, which afterwards during the joint lives of the King that is to command, and of the subject to be commanded, may probably never happen again.

Many other cases of Acts of Parliament might be cited, as 8 R. 2. 2. That no Man should go Judge of Assize into his own country. And 10 E. 3. 3. That whoever has a pardon of Felony, shall find sureties of the good Behaviour, or his pardon shall be void; which Statutes have been constantly dispensed with ever since they were made. But I resolve not to heap up all the cases of dispensations, but to confine myself to those that were, as they are before cited, the principal ground of our giving Judgment in Sir E. Hales's case: only after I have answered some objections, I have two authorities more to offer, which I take to be of the greatest weight in this case; and that is, two Concessions of the Commons of England in Parliament, acknowledging this power of dispensing to be in the King.

But first, To answer an objection or two that I hear is made:

1. Obj. This Act was made pro bono publico, and in the case before cited, of 11 H. 7. the King cannot dispense with a common nuisance; and this case dispensed with, would be as bad as dispensing with a common nuisance.

Ans. Tho' this will receive an easy answer, yet I shall avoid giving it in words or reasons of my own, (as I do all along, because I know they would be suspected and misconstrued) but in the words of my Lord Vaughan; whom I cite the oftener, because every body remembers him, and it is very well known, he was never guilty of straining the King's prerogative too high. In Thomas and Sorrel's case; the chief Reason why the King can't dispense with a publick nuisance, is said by him to be, because every particular Person who has received damage by it, may have his action, which the King cannot bar. Nor see I any reason, says he, pag. 335. why the King may not dispense with those nuisances by which no Man has a right to a particular Action, as well as he may with any other offence against a penal Law, by which no third person has cause of Action: from whence it follows, That if an Act of Parliament call an offence a nuisance, from whence no particular damage can arise to a particular person to have his Action, the King may dispense with such a nominal nuisance.

Now to apply this to our case, for exercising an office without taking the test, no particular person can have an Action, because no particular person can have any damage by it, (for an Action, as an informer, is not meant, that being the case of all popular Statutes) and therefore the King may dispense with it, before the action brought; and in page 341. he explains this very well: No offence, says he, against a penal Law could be dispensed with, if the reason of not dispensing, were because the offence is contra bonum publicum, for all offences against penal Laws are such, p. 342. though such Laws are pro bono publico, they are not Laws pro bono singulorum populi, (which are the Laws that the King cannot dispense with, as will appear at large in the Concession of the Commons, 3 Caroli, which I will cite by and by) but pro bono Populi compliciti, as the King in his discretion shall think fit to order them for the good of the whole. In this notion the estate of every Pater-familias may be said to be pro bono communi of his Family, which yet is but at his discretion and management of it; and they have no interest in it, but have benefit by it.

Obj. 2. But it is again objected, that in Statutes that are pro bono publico, in a less degree, the King may dispense. But this Statute was so highly necessary for the publick, that it could not be dispensed with.

Ans. To which my Lord Vaughan answers in the case before cited, p. 344.

1. All penal Laws, when made, and in force, are equally necessary; and in things necessary, there is no gradation of more or less necessary.

2. If any penal Laws were possibly less dispensible than others, those capitally penal, were less dispensible than those less penal. But it is not so: for coining Money of right alloy in imitation of the King's coin, is capitally penal without licence, but it may be licensed, &c. It is capital to multiply Gold or Silver by the Statute 5 Hen. 4. c. 4. but may be licensed, as was done to John Faceby, tempore H. 6. The dispensation with a Non obstante to that Statute may be seen, Coke, Placita Corone, fol. 74. cap. 20.

Obj. 3. But if the King have a power to dispense with one, he may dispense with twenty, with an hundred, and so the Statute may become of little force.

Ans. From the abuse of a thing to draw an Argument against the thing itself, is no consequence at all; it is, as is resolved in the cases above cited, a high trust reposed in the King, and if the King will violate his trust, there is never a one of his Prerogatives but may be abused, to the ruin of his people. To instance in one or two.

1. Every body will grant, that the King can pardon murder and robbery; yet if he should pardon every murder and every robbery that is committed, it were better to live with the Cannibals in America, than in our native country; and the human Laws that are made to punish those crimes, would be rendered of as small force and effect, as it is objected the Law in our case would be by frequent dispensations.

2. There is no doubt, but the King may create any man a Peer of England, and thereby give him a vote in Parliament; yet if the King should abuse his power so far as to create ten thousand Peers, or confer this Honour upon every body that asks it, no doubt it were a total destruction of the Legislative Power of the Nation. And yet in either of these cases, (or in any other branch of the King's Prerogative) if the Judges should judge the King had such a Prerogative, it were an unreasonable objection to say, These Prerogatives may be abused; Ergo, the Judges have given a pernicious Judgment.

When we were to give Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's case, we could neither know, nor hinder, if we did, any ill use the King might make of this Power; we were only to say upon our Oaths whether the King had such a Power or no, and for that we had the great authorities above-cited, and two much greater than those; I mean, two several clear Concessions of all the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, of this dispensing Power to be in the King; and that not in a submissive complying temper, but when they were in a high debate with the Crown (especially in the latter case) about the violation of other Laws.

And the first of these is Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 5. n. 15. and it is printed in Rolls's second Abridgment Tit. Prerogative 180. the Record is in these Words: The Commons pray that the Statutes for voiding of Aliens out of the Kingdom, may be kept and executed: To which the King agrees, saving his Prerogative, that he may dispense with whom he pleases. And upon this the Commons answered, that their intent was no other, nor never should be by the Grace of God. There were as great apprehensions of dangers and inconveniencies from Aliens then, as there is from Roman Catholicks now.

And afterwards, in the same Parliament, [Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. 5. n. 22.] when the commons pray'd that the Statutes of Provisors, Statutes of the same nature nature with this in our case; (for they were made against the Court of Rome's encroaching Jurisdiction in England); I say, when they made the like Prayer, that these may be put in execution, being admonished by the King's answer in the former case, they themselves insert in their very Prayer, a saving for this Prerogative of the King, and then the King agrees to it.

But the plainest Concession of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, was that 3 Caroli, upon a Debate between the two Houses, upon the Petition of Right; ante P. 204, 205. as it was delivered by Mr. Glanvil, in a full Committee of both Houses of Parliament, 23 May, 1628. in the painted Chamber: and that what he says as to this matter, may not pass for the single opinion of Mr. Glanvil, (tho' he was a learned Man) he in the presence of the Commons, addresses himself to the Lords in these words, p. 204. Having thus reduced to your Lordships memory the effects of your own reasons; I will now, with your Lordships favour, come to the points of our reply, wherein I most humbly beseech your Lordships, to weigh the reasons which I shall present, not as the sense of myself, the weakest Member of our House, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole House of Commons, conceived in a business debated there with the greatest Gravity and Solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of Opinions, and Unanimity, that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that House. And then coming to speak of the Point in question, he delivers the sense of the Commons in these words: (ante pag. 205.) There is a trust inseparably reposed in the persons of the Kings of England, but that Trust is regulated by Law; for example, when Statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties to accrue to the King, and to the Informers that shall sue for the breach of them: the Commons must, and ever will acknowledge a regal and sovereign Prerogative in the King, touching such Statutes, that it is in his Majesty's absolute and undoubted Power, to grant dispensations to particular persons, with the clauses of non obstante, to do as they might have done before those Statutes, wherein his Majesty conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others. But there is a difference between those Statutes and the Laws and Statutes whereon the petition is grounded: By those Statutes the subject has no interest in the Penalties, which are all the fruit such Statutes can produce (that is, to such Informer) until by Suit or Information commenced, he become entitled to the particular forfeitures, whereas the laws and statutes mentioned in our Petition are of another nature; there shall your Lordships find us to rely upon the good old Statute called Magna Charta, which declares and confirmeth the ancient common Laws of the Liberties of England. There shall your Lordships also find us to insist upon divers other most material Statutes, made in the time of King Edward 3. and King Edward 4. and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful Rights and Privileges belonging to the Subjects of this Realm: Laws not inflicting Penalties upon offenders in malis prohibitis, but Laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming ipso facto, an inherent right and interest of liberty and freedom in the subjects of this Realm, as their birthrights and inheritances descendable to their Heirs and Posterity: Statutes incorporate into the body of the common Law, over which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no trust in the King's sovereign power or prerogative royal, to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his subjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the common Law and of these Statutes.

I have the rather cited this at large, because it is a clear acknowledgment of the King's dispensing Power in as large a manner as we have adjudged it, and does at the same time vindicate it from one of the most clamorous, the most malicious, but withal, the weakest objections that ever was made against it. By this Judgment, say they, you have cancelled all our Laws, and given up our lives, liberties, and estates, to be disposed of at the king's pleasure. It is plain, that this is no consequence at all; for the commons here in parliament, at the same time that they expressly grant that the King has undoubted Power of dispensing with laws prohibiting things that are not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita; laws that are made, as my Lord Vaughan expresses it, pro bono populi complicati; yet they utterly deny, as they had good reason to do, that the king can dispense with one tittle of Magna Charta, or any of those other laws whereby the lives, the liberties, the interests of any of the subjects are conferred upon, or confirmed to them; for these are Laws pro bono singulorum populi, which the King can never dispense with. And as to this matter, I do not know whether it will be proper, but any man so sensibly touch'd in his reputation, may be provoked to commit some Indecencies. I must appeal to all men that have observed my actions and behaviour since I have had the honour to sit upon the Bench, whether I use to be guilty, in Laws of this kind, to strain the construction of them for the King's interest. First, in such Laws wherein the lives of men have been concerned, I confess, I have been scrupulous even to a fault; for in some cases upon Statutes that had been adjudged felony by wiser and better Judges than myself, and it was highly for the King's service they should be so; yet I could never give Judgment of Death, because I could not satisfy my own conscience that those Statutes were now in force. And in other cases wherein the rights of the subjects have been brought in question, how strictly I have kept to that substantial difference taken by the House of Commons, that though the King in Laws of Government, in penal Laws of a publick nature, has a power to dispense in particular cases; yet he cannot dispense with Laws which vest any the least right or property in any of his subjects; will appear by the opinion I gave in the case of Magdalen College, (for the truth of which, I appeal to all that know any thing of the transactions in that case) wherein, when the King's right against the college was endeavoured to be asserted by a dispensation granted by himself, I utterly denied that dispensation to be of any force at all, because there was a particular right and interest vested in the members of that college, as there is in the members of many other Corporations, of chusing their own head. So far have I been from giving up all Mens lives, liberties and properties to the King's pleasure.

I had forgot to take notice of two or three objections more that are usually made, Obj. First, here is a disability, and the King cannot dispense with a disability. As the Statute against buying offices, the King, say they, cannot dispense with for that reason.

Ans. There is the same disability in the case of Sheriffs, and yet resolved that the King can dispense in that case; and the reason in the Statute of buying offices, or sitting in Parliament without taking the

the oaths, is because there is a disability actually incurred; and when any person is actually disabled, he cannot have his disability taken off but by Act of Parliament. But in the Statute dispensed with, in the case of Sir E. Hales, there is no disability actually laid upon any man; but certain things are required to be done, and as a penalty for disobeying the said Act, and omitting the doing those things required by it, the disability with the other forfeitures are to be incurr'd after conviction. Now the nature of dispensations being, as was shewed before, to make the thing lawful to him who has it, which is unlawful to every body else; it does plainly prevent the committing any offence by that person, and consequently the incurring any penalty or disability at all. But in the case of buying offices, the person is disabled before the dispensation comes; for he is disabled ipso facto by contracting or dealing for the office. So the true difference between the case of Sheriffs, and the case of buying offices, is this, That the King in the one case can prevent the incurring a disability, but cannot purge it in the other after it is incurred. To illustrate this by a case of the like nature, The King may prevent an attainder, but he cannot purge an attainder. If a man has committed Treason or Felony, the King by granting his pardon may infallibly prevent the Offender's ever being attainted; but after he is once actually attainted, the King can by no means take off that attainder, or purge the corruption of blood, but by Act of Parliament; provided the Judgment by which he is attainted be not erroneous.

Obj. But it is objected, that these Laws were made for the interest of Religion, and all offences against Religion are mala in se, and therefore not to be dispensed with.

Ans. I answer, that true it is, all offences that are directly against Religion, as it is constituted such by the divine Law, are mala in se, and not to be dispensed with, and in this case the Parliament is bound as well as the King; for an Act of Parliament made against Religion in that sense is utterly void, as is instanced in Doctor and Student, of an Act, That should forbid the giving of Alms upon any occasion, &c. But human and politick Constitutions, though made for the interest of Religion, as they had a beginning, so they are alterable by the same power that made them; and therefore the breaches of them are in their nature mala prohibita, as was resolved in the great case of dispensations, in 11 H. 7. above cited, and instances given; as the King may dispense with a priest holding of two Benefices, though the Laws against pluralities were made for the interest of Religion, and the better edification of the people. So the King may dispense with a Bastard's entering into Priest's orders, &c. These instances are taken for Law in that Year-book.

But to all this I know it is said, that these high trusts and prerogatives might be always safe, and sometimes useful in a protestant prince's hands, who would faithfully discharge the duty of one that ought to be custos utriusque tabulae; but when these prerogatives are asserted to a Prince who is of a contrary religion to that established by Law, there would be always danger of their being abused to the prejudice or destruction of the established Religion.

To which I answer, that it cannot be forgotten, that the promoters of the Bill of Exclusion used the same argument: If you leave him King, say they, he will have all the prerogatives of a King, and those prerogatives may be made instrumental to the ruin of your religion; which could not be denied by the gentlemen on the other side, who opposed that Bill. Their only reply was, fiat justitia, ruat cælum, it is his right, and we must not do evil that good may come; we must not do wrong, no not to promote the interest of religion itself. The same argument that weighed with them to assert the right of succession to the Crown of England, and consequently to all the prerogatives together, was the rule we had to guide us in giving Judgment in this case concerning a particular branch of them. We must not break our oath, nor give Judgment contrary to what seemed to us to be Law, let the consequence be what it will.

But it has been farther objected to me, by some of my friends, that, though I could not in conscience have given Judgment against the King, being of the opinion that I was, yet I should rather have parted with my place, than to have given a Judgment even according to Law, which might be so prejudicial to that excellent religion that I profess; and of which when I cease to be, let me cease to be at all.

I answer, that neither in prudence nor in conscience I could have taken that course.

First, Not in prudence; for I confess, that saying, Omnia dat, qui Jussa negat; had great weight with me in the case: and that I was of opinion, since an incroachment of Jurisdiction was feared, there could not be a greater, nor more dangerous provocation to it, than for protestant Judges to refuse to give Judgment for a prince of a different persuasion, in that which we could not deny to be his right.

And next, in conscience I could not decline giving Judgment in this case; for by our oaths we are as much obliged to give judgment one way or other, as we are to give what we think a righteous Judgment in all cases that come before us.

It has been objected, that all this was a contrivance, an informer set up, and all but a feigned action.

As to this matter, I can truly say that I don't remember that I ever heard of this Action, 'till after it was actually brought; but in this there seems to be no hurt or inconvenience at all. The Law is as well tried and settled in a feign'd Action, as in a true. There are feigned Actions directed every day out of Chancery to this very purpose, that great and difficult points of Law may be settled by them; and why the king might not direct such an Action to be brought to satisfy himself whether he had such a power, and if he had, that the people might be satisfied, and acquiesce in it; I confess I see no difference at all. If there were indirect means used for procuring opinions, or the like, I have nothing to say to it. I stand upon my innocence, and challenge all the world to lay any thing of that kind to my charge. My part was only to give my own opinion, in which, if either by misunderstanding the books that I have cited, or by drawing weak conclusions from them, I have erred in the Judgment that I gave; how can I for this be charged as a criminal? The law neither supposes, nor requires an infallibility in any of his Majesty's Courts of Justice; it were very uneasy sitting in them, if it did. We can but judge according to the books that lie before us, and according to the measure of our understanding of these books:

we

we have not always so much light to guide us, as we thought we had in this case. We often meet with cases new and rare, and very ill settled by former Judgments, where we are forced to dig truth as it were out of the mine, to compare and distinguish, to screen and sift, and gather the sense of the Law out of the confusion of disagreeing, and very often contradictory opinions, as well as we can: and if after all our labour and our pains, we happen to be mistaken, it was never yet imputed as a crime. The Judgment is reversed in a writ of error, not only without any accusation, but without the least reflection upon him that gave it. Nor can a mistake in Judgment be more criminal in a matter of a greater concernment, than it is in matters of the least consequence: It would be very mischievous and very dangerous, if it should. For if in questions of Prerogative, any mistake shall be made capital on the one hand, when Judgment is given for the King; why succeeding Princes may not be as angry at any mistakes on the other hand, I cannot imagine. And when once affairs are come to that pass, there will be great encouragement for any man, that can make the least shift to live without it, to undertake those very necessary, but very difficult, and very troublesome employments; great freedom for men to give Judgment according to their opinion and their conscience; and great reliance upon the resolutions of those, who know they shall be sure to pay with their lives and fortunes for any mistake of theirs, either to the King or the People, as either of them shall happen to get the upper hand. For my own part, I thank God, I can say these two things: First, that for these ten years together, wherein (with very little intermission) I have sat as a Judge in several Courts, though I may be justly accused of many weaknesses and mistakes, yet I have never given Judgment in any one Case against the clear dictates of my reason and my conscience. And the second thing is, that I never gave Judgment in any controverted Point, wherein I had to many, and so great authorities to warrant it, as I have to warrant that Judgment which was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case. And this I say, not to set up that opinion again in a Pamphlet, which was so ill relished in a Court of Justice, nor to oppose my Sense to the Judgment of the Nation; for I think it is very fit that this dark Learning (as my Lord Vaughan calls it) of Dispensations, should receive some light from a determination in Parliament; that Judges for the time to come, may judge by more certain Rules, which Acts of Parliament the King may, and which he may not dispense with. But I have cited those authorities at this time in my own defence, and for these particular purposes; in the first place, to shew,

1. That we are not the first inventors of this dispensing Power, but that it has been allowed without controversy, to the Kings of England in all ages, that they might dispense with many Acts of Parliament.

2. That if our Judgment was erroneous, and that the King could not dispense with that Act of Parliament; yet that error was but an error in that single Case, and had no such large and mischievous consequences as is pretended. For that, because we judged that the King could dispense with that Statute, for others to conclude from thence, that therefore he had a Power to dispense with all other Statutes; especially such as confer, or vest in any of the subjects any manner of interest whatsoever, in their lives, liberties, or estates; or that, because the King may dispense with a penal law, wherein a disability is annexed to the breach of it as a penalty, and that penalty not to be incurred before a legal conviction, and where the King's dispensation makes the thing dispensed with lawful, and consequently prevents any conviction or penalty at all: For others to conclude from thence, that therefore the King may dispense with such Statutes, where a precedent disability is actually laid upon any man, as there is upon the members of both houses, till they have taken the oaths and tests prescribed; and therefore without question, is not in the King's power to dispense: I say, these are consequences which may flow from the heated imaginations of angry men, but have no warrant or foundation at all from the Judgment given by us.

I have one thing more to say in my justification, which is, that if I have been guilty of so heinous offences as I am accused of, where is the temptation or the reward? If it was to keep in my Judge's place, which otherwise I might have lost, I can only answer, That if that were the case, I then became the worst man in the world, only to keep that, which it is pretty well known, I was with much difficulty, with the persuasion of my friends, prevailed with to accept: and for any other reward, whoever is acquainted with the circumstances of my fortune, will, I am confident, notwithstanding the false and idle reports, of I know not what great reversions lately fallen to me, as easily acquit me of having been corrupted by the King, to give a pernicious Judgment in this Case, as of having enriched my self by taking bribes in cases between party and party.

All that I have to add more, is, that howsoever this that I have said in my defence, may happen to be understood at present, yet I could not deny my self the satisfaction of having put in a Plea of Innocence at least; that whatsoever shall happen to me now, may perhaps meet with a more equal Judgment in after-times; since it ought to be much less uneasy to me to lose my life, if any body be very fond of taking it, than to let the aspersions that are every day cast upon me, to pass in silence; or suffer my self to be transmitted to posterity under the character of a betrayer of my Religion, or a subverter of the laws and liberties of my country.

Sir Robert Atkins, at the End of his Enquiry into the the Power of dispensing with Penal Statutes, makes the following short Argument upon the Pleadings of the afore-mentioned Case of Sir Edward Hales.

THE first Point argued by the Plaintiff's Counsel, was, That it appears by the Declaration, and it is now confessed by the Defendant's joining demurrer, that the Defendant had been indicted for this offence, in exercising the Office of a Colonel without having taken the Tests.

And upon the Indictment he either did plead this Dispensation, or might have pleaded it. And he is now convicted, according to the direction of the Act of 25 Car. 2. so that he now comes too late to plead it to this Action: For he cannot falsify the conviction, nor aver any thing against the Record of it, and bring the fact to be tried over again in this Action; but is concluded and estopped in Law to say any thing to the contrary of that Record, by which he is found guilty of the offence against this Act of Parliament.

The Defendant either did plead this Dispensation or Pardon to the Indictment, in discharge of the Indictment, and it hath been over-ruled by the Judges at the Assizes (as by Law it ought to be, being no good Plea :) Or he might have pleaded it, if he had been advised it had been a good Plea. And not having done it, he had elaps'd his time, and now comes too late to plead it, being convict of the crime.

To this it was objected (as I hear) that the Plaintiff, if he will take the advantage of an Estoppel, ought to have it set forth by way of replication to the Defendant's Plea, and to have relied upon it.

For the Rule is, That he that pleads an Estoppel, must rely upon it as an Estoppel.

It is true, if a man will plead an Estoppel, he must rely upon it.

But in this Case the Plaintiff does not plead the Estoppel, but the Estoppel appears by the Declaration, and the Defendant's own Plea together: so that there was no need for the Plaintiff to set that forth by way of replication, which doth sufficiently appear by the Defendant's own Plea, viz. That he did not take the tests within the time limited by the Act, and the conviction is confessed by his Plea, and joining in demurrer.

If a man recover a debt upon a bond, and before execution dies, if his Executor sue a Scire facias upon that Judgment, the Defendant cannot plead any Plea that he might have pleaded before, as non est factum, or by Duress, or the like: for he is concluded by the Judgment.

In Jason and Kete's Case, in Syderfin's Rep. fol. 43. by Bridgeman, Chief-Justice, a man shall never help himself by Audita Querela (tho' that is an equitable suit at Law) for any matter that he might have pleaded before.

There is no estoppel in this Case, for the Conviction is upon an Indictment, which is the King suit: and this is the suit of another, viz. the now Plaintiffs, and so they are two distinct suits.

The conviction upon the Indictment is an estoppel against the Defendant himself, of which any man may take the advantage, and he himself shall never be admitted to aver against it: As in Maynye's Case, in Leonard's first part, fol. 3.

An attainder for treason is an universal Estoppel; of which any stranger may take the advantage, not only against the Party attainted, but against his wife too, if she sue for dower. And it does not run in privacy: By Manw. Cb. Bar.

Where a man is attainted by his own confession of a felony, a stranger is not estopped to say he was not guilty*: But if A. commit felony, and after enfeoff J. S. of his land; and after A. is attaint of this felony by verdict, there J. S. is estopped, and may not aver that A. was not guilty, because he claims under him: much less shall A. himself aver against the verdict, that he is not guilty†.

If a man be acquitted of felony, all the World, says Grevil, in Keilway Rep. 81. b. is estopped to say the contrary‡. So vice versa, if he be convict, by the same reason§.

As to that which is objected, that the conviction is upon an Indictment (which is the King's suit) but this is another suit, and therefore the verdict shall not conclude the Defendant in this suit:

This is not another suit, but in effect an execution upon the conviction, and grounded upon that Record, and therefore not merely a new suit, but a dependant action; as a Writ of error, or an Audita Querela, or a Scire Facias upon a Record, are dependant suits, or an action of debt upon a Judgment.

The Act of 25 Car. 2. c. 2. hath made it criminal in any person, after his neglect of taking the two Oaths, or of the Sacrament, by the times limited, to execute any such office or place of trust; and for such offence hath made him indictable at the assizes: and upon a conviction the offender incurs (among other penalties) the forfeiture of 500 l. and gives it to any one that will sue for it in an action of debt.

So the Statute hath directed the method of trying the offence, and of convicting the offender, by Indictment at the Assizes.

And if he that sues for the forfeiture shall be driven to prove the offence over again, then the conviction at the assizes serves for nothing, but was all in vain. And such construction defeats the intention of the Law-makers; for they intended this for the only trial, and not to have several trials: For suppose it should be tried again in this action, and a verdict pass for the Defendant, here shall be trial against trial, and verdict against verdict: and such construction ought to be made of Acts of Parliament, as may not elude, but agree with the intent of the law-makers; and so as that no words, clause or sentence, shall be altogether idle and insignificant.

And this conviction upon the Indictment is the very ground of the action of debt brought by the now Plaintiff; for the words of the Act are, And being thereupon lawfully convicted upon any Indictment, every such person shall from thenceforth forfeit 500 l.

So that till there be such a conviction, there is no forfeiture incurred of 500 l. nor no action can be brought for the 500 l. The offence must be proved and determined before any action can be brought; and therefore the proof of the offence, whereof the Defendant is convict, must not be made in this action over again: if it must, what serves the conviction for?

Suppose the Plaintiff here had brought this action, after the neglect of the Defendant of taking the Oaths, and of receiving the Sacrament, and his acting in his office after such neglects, and before any conviction upon Indictment, and had only aver'd, that the Defendant had so neglected, and yet acted; would this action have been well brought? Or, suppose there had been a conviction, but the Plaintiff had not set it forth in his declaration, but had only averr'd the offence committed, would this have been a good declaration? Surely it would not. This proves that the Record of the conviction is the very ground and foundation of this action, and the action would not lie without such conviction; so that it is not a meer new action, but a dependant action.

And the usual difference is where the action is a dependant action, depending upon a Record, and grounded upon it; and where it is a collateral suit, not depending upon that Record.

An

§ Dr. and Stud. 68. a. ad fin. § b.

‡ Rol.

An action against the Sheriff for an escape of one taken in execution; this is a dependant action, and is grounded upon the Record of the Judgment given against the party that escaped. The Sheriff cannot aver any thing against that Record, and examine it over again; nor can he take any advantage of error, or erroneous proceeding, in obtaining that Judgment. Saunders's Rep. 2 part. 101.

So in an action of debt grounded upon a Judgment, or in an Audita querela, to be relieved upon a Judgment.

And so in our Case, this action of debt for the 500 l. is grounded upon the conviction; which must stand for truth as long as it remains in force not avoided by error or attain:

A Writ of Error to reverse a Judgment, is a dependant action: In error, the Plaintiff may not aver any thing against the Record. Mullens versus Weldy, Syderfin's 1st part, 94. Error was sued in the King's-Bench to reverse a Judgment given in the Palace-Court: And the Plaintiff in error assigned for error, that the Duke of Ormond (who is principal Judge of that Court by Patent) was not there. It was agreed by the Court, that it might not be assigned for error; for it was contrary to the Record.

But per Cur. in an action of trespass, or false imprisonment, which, (says that Report) are collateral actions, he may falsify and assign that, if he be taken upon such Judgment:

So if a man be indicted and convicted of an assault and battery, and afterwards the person so assaulted brings his action for the battery, this hath no dependance upon the Indictment or Conviction; for it may be sued, though there were no Indictment, but is a distinct and collateral suit. The Indictment and Verdict is no estoppel, nor can so much as be given in evidence: as is held by the whole Court, in the Case of Sampson versus Yardley, and Totbill, 19 Car. 2. B. R. Keble's 2 part, 384. The like in an appeal of murder, Keble's 2 part, 223.

Another penalty upon the offender against this Statute of 25 Car. 2. is, that he shall be disabled to sue in any action. Now suppose a person convicted at the Assizes, sues an Action, may not the Defendant in that action take the advantage of that disability, and plead the conviction? As in case of an Outlawry pleaded in disability; there need not be set forth all the proceedings in that suit wherein the plaintiff was outlawed, but he may plead the Record of the Outlawry and rely upon it; and it shall not be examined whether there was any just cause to sue him to the Outlawry, or not.

The Indictment, the Defendant's Plea to it, and the Verdict upon it, have determined the matter of fact, that the Defendant is guilty of the offence against this Act of Parliament.

The Act it self hath pronounced the Judgment, which consists of many particulars; one whereof is, that the Defendant shall forfeit 500 l. to him that will sue for it; and the action of debt for the 500 l. brought by the Plaintiff, grounded upon all these, is in the nature of an execution.

And all these put together, are not several and distinct suits, but in effect all but one suit and process, one depending upon the other.

The second Point is, Whether the Dispensation pleaded by the Defendant, be a good barr to the action of debt? And this is properly called, The great Point of the Case:

VOL. VII.

For which the Reader is referred to Sir Robert Atkins's Large Pamphlet, of The Enquiry into the Power of dispensing with Penal Statutes.

Then Sir Robert adds a Postscript: Being some Animadversions upon a Book writ by Sir Edward Herbert, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, entituled A short Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Case.

[After a short Apology for making some Animadversions upon the said Book, he proceeds thus:]

THE Chief-Justice Herbert, ante pag. 617. gives us the definition of a dispensation out of Sir Edward Coke's 11th Rep. fol. 88. viz. Dispensatio mali prohibiti est de jure Domino Regi concessa, propter impossibilitatem praevidendi de omnibus particularibus.

And again, Dispensatio est mali prohibiti provida relaxatio utilitate seu necessitate pensata.

Upon the word Concessa, I would gladly be satisfied; when, or by whom that Power was ever granted to the King; where shall we find that Grant?

It is clear, that whoever hath the entire power of making a Law, may justly dispense with that Law. And therefore Almighty God; being the sole and supreme Law-giver, might dispense even with the moral Law; as he did with the sixth Commandment, when he commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac; and with the eighth Commandment, when he commanded the Israelites to borrow the jewels of the Egyptians, and to go away without restoring of them.

But it stands not with reason, that he who hath but a share with others in making of a Law, (as the King hath no more) should have the power, by himself alone to dispense with the law, unless that power were expressly intrusted with him by the rest of the law-makers; as sometimes hath been done.

Sir Edward Coke, in his 7th Rep. in the case of penal Statutes, fol. 36. towards the lower end, does affirm, that this dispensing Power is committed to the King, by all his subjects. So that it is not claimed Jure Divino, but by grant from the People. But where to find any such Grant we know not.

I have, as I conceive made it appear in my larger argument, p. 14. that the first invention of Dispensations with laws, began with the Pope, about the time of Innocent III. and by our King Henry III. in imitation, and by encouragement from the Pope; so that it was not by the Grant of the People, but ever exclaimed against by all good men, and generally by all the People; and ever fenced against by a multitude of Acts of Parliament.

It is true, the dispensing with laws hath ever since been practised; and they began at first here in England to be used only in Cases where the King alone was concerned, in Statutes made for his own profit, wherein he might have done what he pleased. But it is but of latter times that they have been stretched to Cases that concern the whole Realm. See my Argument, fol. 13. Hence it evidently appears, it cannot be a legal prerogative in the King; for that must ever be by prescription, and restrained to those cases that have been used time immemorial, and must not be extended to new cases.

Now there hath been no such usage as will warrant the dispensing with such an Act of Parliament as is now before us, that of 25 Car. 2. c. 2.

The Chief-Justice Herbert, from the definition before recited, and those two authorities of Sir Edward Coke, in his case of monopolies, and that other of penal Statutes, frames an argument to prove, that the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hales, was good in Law.

Because a Dispensation is properly and only in case of a Malum Prohibitum; he thence infers, that the King can dispense in all cases of mala prohibita.

Which is a wrong inference, and that which Logicians call, Fallacia à dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter. Because he can dispense with some, that therefore he can dispense with all, is no good consequence.

It appears by the late Chief-Justice Vaughan's Reports, in the Case of Thomas and Sorrel, (so often cited by the Chief-Justice Herbert) Vaughan's Rep. fol. 333. the fourth Paragraph, that his opinion is, That the King cannot dispense with every Malum Prohibitum; and he gives many instances of such Mala Prohibita, that are not dispensable, fol. 342. and 344. parag. 4.

Therefore the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert should, as I conceive, regularly first have given us the distinction of Mala Prohibita, into such as are dispensable, and such as are not dispensable; and then have shewn, that the Dispensation granted to Sir Edward Hales, fell under the first part: But that learned Reporter, the Chief-Justice Vaughan, (so often cited by our now Lord Chief-Justice) in the aforesaid case of Thomas and Sorrel, fol. 332. the last Paragraph save one, quarrels with the very distinction of Malum Prohibitum, and Malum in se, and says it is confounding.

From whence I would observe, and from the whole Report in Thomas and Sorrel's case, that the notion of dispensation is as yet but crude and undigested, and not fully shaped and formed by the Judges.

The Pope was the Inventor of it, our Kings have borrowed it from them; and the Judges from time to time have nursed and dressed it up, and given it countenance. And it is still upon the growth and encroaching, till it hath almost subverted all Law, and made the regal power absolute, if not dissolute.

I must agree, that our Books of late have run much upon a distinction, viz. Where the breach of a penal Statute is to the particular damage of any person, for which such person may have his Action against the breaker of that law; there, tho' it be but Malum Prohibitum, yet the King cannot dispense with that penal Law, according to the rule in Brañon:

Rex non potest gratiam facere cum injuriâ & damno alterius.

As for instance, there are several Statutes that prohibit one man from maintaining another's suit, though in a just cause. See Poulton de pace Regis & Regni, in his chap. of maintenance, fol. 55.

Now it is held, that the King cannot dispense with those laws, because it would be to the prejudice and damage of that particular person, against whom the suit is so maintained by another; for there can be no maintenance, but it is to the wrong of a particular person.

So of carrying a distress out of the Hundred.

But there are many other penal laws, where, by the transgressing of them, no subject can have any particular damage, and therefore no particular action for the breach of them.

As upon the Statute that prohibits the transportation of wool, under a penalty. By the breach of this law, that is, by the exportation of wool, no one particular man hath any damage, more than every other man hath, but it is only against the publick good.

And the breach of such a penal law is punishable only at the King's suit, by indictment or presentment.

And the like where such a penal Statute gives an action popular, to him that will sue for the penalty, who hath no right to it more than another, till his suit be commenced.

In these cases, it is commonly held, that the King may dispense with such penal Statutes, as to some particular persons, and for some limited time, (whereof they make the King the sole Judge;) because, as the reason is given in the Chief-Justice Vaughan's Reports, fol. 344. parag. 2. such offence wrongs none but the King. This is now the common received opinion and distinction. And the breach of such kind of Statutes, are said to be only the King's damage in his publick capacity, as supreme Governor, and wronging none but himself. Lord Vaugh. Rep. 342. parag. 3.

But if we will narrowly search into this distinction, and weigh the reasons so given, we shall find it is without any just ground.

The damage done to the particular person in the Cases past, in the first part of this distinction, are merely his own proper and peculiar damage; and he is intitled to his particular action for it, in his own proper personal right; and therefore if he discharge and dispense with them, it is no wrong to any other man: he may do what he will with his own.

But the Cases in the second part of this distinction, are where the King hath a right to the suit, and the offence and damage are said to be to him only.

But are they so (as the former) in his own personal right, as his Lands and other Revenues are? or are they to him but as a trustee for the publick, for which reason he is called Creditor Publicus? And may he therefore, upon the like reason, dispense with them, or dispose of them, as a subject may do with his own particular Interests?

Again, shall a publick damage and injury to the whole Nation, be more dispensable by the King, than the loss of one private man?

—suit hæc sapientia quondam
Publica privatis secernere—

And therefore in my apprehension, the King cannot in such cases of Dispensations, be truly said to wrong none but himself; and it is not agreeable to the definition before given, Utilitate Compensata, for the King wrongs the whole Realm by it. Whereas if he grants a dispensation with a Penal Law of the first sort of this distinction, he only wrongs some particular persons.

The cases and authorities for dispensations in our Books that were granted in ancient times, will generally be found to be only where the Penal Statutes were made for the King's own proper interest and bene-benefit: as his dispensing with the Statute of Mortmain. For in such cases it was to the King's own loss only, in cases where the King might by Law have given away his lands or services. So the King may in his Patent of grant of lands, dispense with the Statutes, 1 Hen. IV. cap. 6. that require there shall be mention of the true values of them. And by a non obstante to those Statutes (which is now generally used) the King doth in effect declare, that it is his pleasure to grant those lands, whatever the value of them be, more or less: and the Statute does by express words save a liberty to the King in that case.

The King is not a trustee for others in such cases, nor can these dispensations be said to be directly to the damage of the publick. And such Penal Laws as meerly concern the King's own revenue or profit, may justly be thought to be intended, to be made only to put the King's matters into an ordinary method and course, and so save the King a labour, as the Lord Hobart says; and so prevent the King's being surpriz'd or mis-inform'd, when Patents are gain'd from him, and not design'd to tie the King's hands, or to restrain his power: as out of all doubt was done and intended by the Law-makers in our Act of 25 Car. II.

But in all the late cases and authorities which we meet with in our Books concerning non obstante's, and dispensations, as in the time of King Hen. VII. and so downward to this day, we shall find them practising upon such Penal Statutes as meerly concern the publick good and benefit, and the Laws of such a nature, by the breach of which the whole Nation suffers: while some particular persons, it may be, by giving a large fine, or a yearly sum, obtain the favour to be dispens'd with and exempt from a Penal Law, while all others continue to be bound by it.

As for example; where a Statute forbids the exportation of Wool, or of Cloth undyed or undress'd, under a penalty; such a Law is greatly for the publick good, and it takes care that our own people shall have employment and maintenance. Yet this is such a Law, as according to the received distinction, the King may dispense with, there being no particular damage to one man more than to another, by breach of such a Law, although it be a mighty damage to the whole Nation: for by such a dispensation, the person so dispens'd with to export such white Cloth undyed, will have the sole trade, which before the making of that Penal Statute was equal and common to all. I wish the House of Commons would enquire what vast riches have been heretofore gotten by such as have obtain'd the dispensations with this Penal Statute, besides the sums they paid to the Crown for them. These are meer Monopolies.

In such a case it may rightly be applied, That sin taketh occasion by the Law. It had been better for the Nation, that such Laws were never made, being no better observ'd: For here again the dispensation is neither Utilitate, nor Necessitate pensata.

Look into the case of Thomas and Sorrell, and you will find few or no cases of dispensations cited out of our Books, but of the time of King Henry VII. and much more of very late times: so that the ill practice is still improving and stretching.

The Lord Chief-Justice Herbert, in the next place, page 618. proceeds to mention the great case of 2 Hen. VII. a resolution of all the Judges in the Vol. VII.

Exchequer-chamber, upon the King's dispensing with the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. cap. 8. That no man should be Sheriff above one year. This is the great leading case and authority, upon which the main stress is laid to justify the Judgment given in Sir Edward Hales's case.

I would avoid repeating what I have already so largely said to this authority, to which I must refer my Reader, by which I hope it is most evidently made out, that the King neither hath, nor never had any just right or power to elect Sheriffs: but the right of electing was anciently and originally belonging to the Freeholders of the several Counties: and since it was unjustly taken from them (as they have ever been on the losing hand; it hath been lodged in the great Officers of the Realm, as the Lord-Chancellor, Lord-Treasurer, Lord Privy-Seal, and the Judges, &c. as appears by the several Statutes.

And they are to make such choice every year in the Exchequer, on a day appointed by the Statute for that purpose. So that the Sheriffs are by those Statutes to continue in their offices for one year only; and the King cannot hinder such election.

Only by his Patent or Commission to the Sheriff, hath he used to signify to the Sheriff himself that is so chosen; and to publish to all others who the person is that is so chosen. This is all the use of the Patent; but it is the proper election of those great Officers that truly vests them in their office.

And it does as clearly appear, that when former Kings have dispens'd with a Sheriff's continuing in his Office for longer than one year, contrary to the several Statutes so forbidding it, the King hath so done it by virtue (not of his prerogative, but by a special Act of Parliament enabling him to do it, for some extraordinary occasions, and for some limited time only. See for this the Statute of 9 Hen. V. cap. 5. in the Statutes at large, and my larger argument, fol. 34.

The truth is, the power of dispensing is originally in the Legislators. He only can dispense with a Law, that can make a Law. The power is equal; and the Legislators can confer the same power upon the King or any others, for some convenient time, &c. as appears by the last instance of the Sheriff, and divers other like cases, mentioned in my foregoing argument, where I have also observed many other things upon that resolution of 2 Hen. VII. concerning Sheriffs.

The Chief-Justice Herbert supposes the mischief recited in the preamble of that Statute of 23 H. VI. cap. 8. concerning Sheriffs continuing in their offices longer than one year, to be equal, if not greater (as he judges) than the mischief recited in the Statute of 25 Car. II. by Papists being in offices. And from thence, I presume, would infer, that the case of Sir Edward Hales is not so fatal in the consequence, as the case of a Sheriff.

I may appeal to any ordinary judgment, and to the sad experience and trial we have so lately had, and to the danger we were so lately in (from which Almighty God, by no less than a miracle, hath in great mercy delivered the Nation) whether the mischief that could any way possibly arise from the dispensing with the former (I mean the Statute concerning Sheriffs) be comparable to the infinite mischief arising from putting Papists into office, and intrusting them with our Religion, and all our Civil Rights.

The Chief-Justice, upon those words of the Statute concerning Sheriffs, viz. That no Non obstante shall make them good, infers page 618. that those words do shew, that the Parliament which made that Act concerning Sheriffs, was of opinion, that had it not been for that clause, the King could otherwise have dispens'd with that Act by a non obstante.

Ans. This to me seems a strained inference; and that it is very far from shewing any such opinion in that Parliament. It rather signifies, that had not the Parliament inserted that clause into the Act, the King might have done again as he had frequently practis'd before, viz. granted dispensations upon that Statute: which ill practice they endeavoured to prevent for the future, nor approving the practice, nor owning the power of doing it. Ex malis moribus bonæ oriuntur leges. A good Law rather condemns a contrary practice before used.

I heartily desire my Reader (as I have done in my foregoing larger argument) carefully to observe and examine of what sort and nature those several cases are, which the resolution of the case of 2 H. VII. urges to warrant that resolution. As those cases concerning the true value of lands, which the King grants; and that concerning the shipping of wool to a certain staple, &c. and let the Reader judge how vast a difference there is between those Statutes in the nature, and import, and reason of them, and this weighty important Statute now before us; and how little that resolution of 2 Hen. VII. can be warranted by the cases there cited, being of so inferior and minute a consideration, in comparison of the principal case.

It is true, Sir Edward Coke (if the twelfth Report which goes by his name, be truly his) hath since that resolution given in 2 Hen. VII. found out new and different reasons, and arguments, which are not urged, and therefore I presume never so much as thought on, at that time by the twelve Judges, who gave the resolution in that case of 2 Hen. VII.

Thus says Sir Edward Sandys, in his relation of the Religion used in the west parts of the World: those of the Roman Religion made their greatness, wealth and honour, to be the very rule by which to square out the Canons of their Faith; and then did set Clerks on work to devise arguments to maintain them.

Sir Edward Coke seems to justify that resolution concerning Sheriffs, from this ground, viz. That the King hath a sovereign power, to command any of his subjects to serve him for the publick-weal. And this is (says he) solely and inseparably annexed to his person, and that this royal power cannot be restrained by any Act of Parliament, 12 Rep. fol. 18.

That it is not solely annexed to the King's person, appears by the several Acts of Parliament, which I have cited to this purpose in my larger argument, fol. 34. where the power of dispensing with some particular Acts, was given to the King by the Parliament, and by him accepted for some short time. And the whole Parliament have in divers cases themselves exercis'd this very power.

Judge of the weight of the reasons said to be given there by Sir Edward Coke, by that one instance of his in the case he puts of purveyance, 12 Rep. fol. 19. which (he says) cannot be taken from the King, no, not by Act of Parliament.

Yet we have lived to see it lately taken away by Act of Parliament; which in the judgment of a Parliament (which is of the highest authority in Law) may therefore be taken from the King.

And is the King in truth restrain'd from commanding his subjects to serve him for the publick-weal; either by those Statutes that disable Sheriffs to continue in their offices longer than one year, or by our Statute of 25 Car. II. that disables Popish Recusants to bear publick offices: because some very unfit, incapable, and dangerous persons are disabled to bear offices of trust and power (and this by the King's own consent to the Act, and by the advice of the great Council the Parliament) and indeed of the whole Realm?

Does the King by this (which the Judges mis-call a restraint) want for choice of fit persons to serve in offices? Doth the publick-weal suffer by this restraint? Is it not rather preserv'd by it? Hath not the King protestant subjects enough to bear offices? And are Popish Recusants (who account Protestants, Hereticks, and to be rooted out and destroy'd, and with whom they hold no faith is to be kept, and against whom they have been continually plotting mischief) are these the fittest to be intrusted with the defence of the Protestant Religion, and with our Lives and Estates, which are all concern'd, more or less, in every public office and trust?

And are those persons (the Papists) that have a dependance upon the See of Rome, and a foreign power, fit to be intrusted with the power of the Nation, with the Militia, and the Sea-ports?

Is not this to commit the Lamb to the custody of the Wolf?

This Act that disables Papists to bear offices, cannot be justly said to be a restraint upon the King; that expression sounds ill, and takes the matter by the wrong handle. It rather imports the King's declaration and resolution, by advice of his great Council, to employ none in offices and places of trust, but such as are most capable and fit, and will most faithfully answer the great ends for which they are so intrusted, that is, the preservation of the Protestant Religion, which is the true English Interest.

And this agrees with the rules of the Common Law, that if an office be granted to one that is Indignus, the Grant is void, though granted by the King himself. Of this I have treated more largely in my argument, fol. 37.

The Lord Chief-Justice Herbert, page 619. asks the question, whether so many solemn resolutions of all the Judges of England in the Exchequer-chamber, are not to be relied upon for Law? And I answer, that if they were ten times as many more, yet they are not to be relied on against many express positive Acts of Parliament directly to the contrary. For what words could the Parliament use more emphatical and express. and more to the purpose, than by saying, that a non obstante, or a dispensation, or a Grant of such a thing (prohibited by that Law) shall be absolutely void, and ipso facto adjudged void, and the person made incapable to take? And is not a Judgment in Parliament, and by Act of Parliament, of the highest authority?

But (says the Chief-Justice, fol. 619.) the constant practice hath been to dispense with the Statute of Sheriffs. I answer it hath also been a very frequent practice too for the King, to make such persons Sheriffs, as were none of the number nominated or chosen, as aforesaid by the Chancellor, Treasurer, Judges, and other great Officers; and it passes for current that he may so do, though it be a vulgar error: for it hath been resolved by all the twelve

twelve Judges, to be an error in the King. See Sir Edward Coke's 2 Instit. or Magna Charta, fol. 559. and yet it is practis'd to this very day.

The Chief-Justice, page 619. seems to excuse Popish Reculants, for not qualifying themselves for offices, by taking the oaths and the test, &c. for that no man (saith he) hath it in his power to change his opinion in Religion as he pleaseth, and therefore it is not their fault. It is an error of the mind, &c.

Ans. Here is no occasion taken to find fault with them for their opinion; let them keep their Religion still, if they like it so well, who hinders them? This Act of 25 Car. II. imposes no penalty upon them for their opinion. But is there any necessity of their being in offices? Must they needs be guardians of the Protestant Religion? The Penalty upon them by this Act, is not for their opinion, but for their presuming to undertake offices and trusts, for which they are by King and Parliament adjudg'd and declar'd unfit.

Page 620. The Chief-Justice Vaughan is brought in, arguing for the King's power of dispensing with (Nominal) nufances, (as he is pleas'd to call and distinguish nufances.) The word (Nominal,) as there understood, imports, that though a Parliament declares any thing to be a nufance, (as sometimes they do in Acts of Parliament, to render them indispensable) which yet in its proper nature would not otherwise be so conceiv'd to be; that such a nominal nufance (as he holds) may however be dispens'd with by the King, though regularly by Law the King may not dispense with any nufance.

Ans. Shall any single or particular person, though a Chief-Justice, presume to call that a meer nominal nufance, which a Parliament by a solemn Act and Law have adjudg'd and declared to be a real nufance? Are we not all concluded by what a Law says? This arrogance is the mischief now complain'd of.

The Chief Justice Herbert, page 620. says, that from the abuse of a thing, an argument cannot be drawn against the thing itself. I agree this is regularly true; yet we have an instance to the contrary in the Scripture, in that point of the Brazen Serpent. But in our case the abuse doth arise from the very nature of the thing itself, from the constitution of it.

For the King practises no more in dispensing, than what these resolutions of the Judges allow him to do by this pretended prerogative. The error is in the foundation.

They have made his power to be unlimited, either as to number of persons, or as to the time how long the dispensation shall continue. Sir Edward Coke says, and so the other Books, That the King is the sole Judge of these.

Nec metas Rerum, nec Tempora ponunt.

The Chief-Justice Herbert, fol. 620. cites two clear concessions (as he is pleas'd to call them) of all the Commons of England in Parliament, which he esteems much greater authorities, than the several resolutions or all the twelve Judges.

But how far these are from concessions, will easily appear to an indifferent Reader. They are no more than prudent and patient avoiding of disputes with the several Kings. And there are multitudes of the like in the old Parliament-Rolls.

It is but an humble clearing of themselves from any purpose in general, to abridge the King of any of his prerogatives, (which have always been touchy and tender things;) but it is no clear nor direct allowance of that dispensing there mention'd, to be any such prerogative in him.

However, I am glad to see an House of Commons to be in so great request with the Judges. It will be so at some times, more than at others.

Yet I do not remember, that in any argument I have hitherto met with, a vote, or order, or opinion of the House of Commons hath been cited for an authority in Law, before now. Will the House of Peers allow of this authority for Law?

It will be said, that this is but the acknowledgment of parties concern'd in Interest; which is allowed for a good testimony and strongest against themselves.

Ans. I do not like to have the King and his people to have divided interests. Prerogative and the peoples liberties, should not be look'd upon as opposites. The prerogative is given by Law to the King, the better to enable him to protect and preserve the subjects rights. Therefore, it truly concerns the people to maintain prerogative.

I could cite several Parliament-Records wherein the poor House of Commons have been forced to submit themselves, and humbly beg pardon of the King, for doing no more than their duty, meerly to avert his displeasure. See the case of Sir Thomas Haxley, whom the King adjudg'd a Traitor, for exhibiting a bill to the Commons for the avoiding of the outrageous expences of the King's house, 20 R. II. num. 14, 15, 16, 17, and 23, and the Commons were driven to discover his name to the King, and the whole House in a mournful manner craving pardon for their entertaining of that Bill.

No doubt, as good an authority against the Commons for so saucily meddling in a matter so sacred, and so far above them. Yet afterwards, 1 Hen. IV. num. 91. that Judgment against Sir Thomas Haxley was revers'd.

As for the distinction, page 622. of a disability actually incur'd before the meddling in an office, and where the disability is prevented by the coming of a dispensation; I answer, that its being so prevented, is but Petitio Principii, and a begging of the question. And to this distinction I have (I think) fully spoken in my larger argument, fol. 40.

The late Parliament, in making this Act of 25 Car. II. had, no doubt, a prospect that probably the Crown would descend upon a Popish Successor; and they levelled this act against the dangers that might then befall our Religion and Liberties, and they thought it a good security: but it is all vanished and come to nothing, by occasion of this Judgment in the case of Sir Edward Hales. And that must be justified by a Fiat Justitia.

As to the objection that the Chief-Justice fancies might have been made against him, or advice given him that he should rather have parted with his place, than to have given a Judgment so prejudicial to the Religion he professes, pag. 622.

This, I say, that for my part I should never have advis'd him to have parted with his place, much less to have given a Judgment against his own opinion. But let his opinion be what it was, yet seeing the clear intention of the makers of the Law, contrary to that his opinion, and knowing the desperate effects and consequences that would follow upon the dispensing with that Act, (for we were upon the brink of destruction by it) and taking notice (as this Chief-Justice and the rest of the Judges needs must) that the King had first endeavour'd to have gain'd a dispensing power in this matter from both Houses (which was the fair and legal course) and that yet that very Parliament which out of too great a compliance with those times, had over-look'd so many grievances, and conniv'd at the King's taking and collecting of the Customs, (tho' in truth the Collectors, and all that had any hand in the receiving of them, incur'd a Præmunire by it) not to mention the ill artifice used in gaining the Excise; yet that Parliament of the King's, boggled at the dispensing with the Act of 25 Car. II. knowing the mighty importance of it.

And though they could not but take notice that so many Judges at once had been remov'd, because they could not swallow this Bitter Pill; and others brought into their places, as might be justly suspected to serve a turn, and the King's learned Counsel could not at first find out this prerogative to do his work with, till so many ways had been attempted, and all prov'd ineffectual; sure in such circumstances it had been prudence, nay the duty of the Judges to have referr'd the determination of it to a Parliament; and the rather, because it was to expound a Law newly made, and the consequences so dreadful, and the intent of the Law-makers so evident.

And this hath been frequently practis'd by Judges, in cases of far less difficulty and concernment. This I have also enlarg'd upon in my large argument, pag 26.

Object. But it might have been a long time before any Parliament had been called.

Ans. We ought to have Parliaments once a year, and oftner if need be; and eadem præsumitur esse mens Regis, quæ Legis; and we then stood in great need of a Parliament even for the sake of this very case.

And these hasty Judgments are one ill cause why Parliaments meet no oftner; the work of Parliaments is taken out of their hands by the Judges. And it is the interest of some great Officers, that Parliaments should not be called, or else be hastily prorogu'd or adjourn'd.

As to the point of the feigned action, which the Lord Chief-Justice seems to justify, I conceive he mistakes the force of the objection. Feigned actions may be useful; but this action against Sir Edward Hales, is suspected not only to have been feign'd and brought by Covin between him and his servant and friend, but it was feignedly and faintly prosecuted, and not heartily and stoutly defended.

This solemn resolution was given upon a few short arguments at the Bar, and without any at the Bench, and upon other reasons (as I have heard) which were then made use of, are now given by the Chief-Justice; but the times will not bear them.

After all, I intend not by this to do the office of an accuser, nor to charge it as a crime. But as I think myself bound in duty, on the behalf of the whole Nation, of myself, (though a small part and member of it) and of my friends, I humbly propose, that the Judgment given in Sir Edward Hales's case, may, after a due examination, (if there be found cause) be legally revers'd by the House of Lords, and that reversal approv'd of and confirm'd by a special act of Parliament.

But as that Judgment of the Lord Chief-Justice's was of the utmost consequence, and his Vindication far from satisfying the People; Mr. Atwood, a very considerable man in his profession, at that time, undertook the answering the Chief-Justice: Therefore to set the whole matter in a true light, and to observe an exact impartiality, Mr. Atwood's Examination of the Chief-Justice's Account, is here inserted; as follows.

The Lord Chief-Justice Herbert's Account examin'd, by William Atwood Esq; Barrister at Law, wherein is shewn, That those Authorities in Law, whereby he would excuse the Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's case, are very unfairly cited, and as ill applied.

WERE it not the reproach of our times, to have had men advanc'd to Courts of Judicature, for other merits, besides Integrity and Learning in the Laws of their country; it might seem a great piece of vanity in me, to answer a Book stamp'd with the name and authority of a Chief-Justice.

Yet, perhaps, I might be thought not without cause to take this as my more immediate Province; having been the first of the profession who ventur'd in publick companies to shew, how wofully that innocent Book-case 2 Hen. VII. in relation to Sheriffs, has been mistook, or wrested to serve for colour to that hasty Judgment in Sir Edward Hales's feigned case.

Wherefore, how needful soever the Chief-Justice may find it, to make protestations of his sincerity, vid. Account p. 616. this may supercede any such from me. Nor would I willingly call his a protestation contrary to apparent fact (especially considering that weakness of Judgment manifested by this defence) did he not give too great occasion for it. 1. From the large steps which he took to precipitate, and, as I am well assured, to sollicit that resolution, 2d. The manner in which he delivered it, widely differing from what he now prints. 3. The unfairness of his present quotations. And, 4. The unhappiness, not to say worse, of those instances which, he is pleas'd to give of his sincerity.

I shall not dispute, or repeat his Lordship's state of the case: but the question upon it being, Whether the King may by his prerogative dispense with the Statute, 25 Car. II. cap. 2. requiring all persons in any office under the King, to take the test against Popery, I shall enquire,

1. Whether those Books, which he relies on as authorities for his Judgment, give any colour to it.

2. Whether, admit they did, they would countenance the resolution as he delivered it.

3. Whether those Instances which he offers of his sincerity, may reasonably be taken for such.

4. Whether he in any measure clears himself from the imputation of being highly criminal.

His Lordship, like a master-disputant, begins, as he thinks, with a definition of a dispensation, which he says, Account, p. 617. is given by the Lord Coke: Dispensatio mali prohibiti est de jure Domino Regi concessa, propter impossibilitatem prævedendi de omnibus; & dispensatio est mali prohibiti provida relaxatio, utilitate, seu necessitate pensata.

Where, I must say, he very unlearnedly clogs the definition of a dispensing power, with the person son in whom 'tis supposed to be lodged: nay, and the reason too why it should be so, which neither the Lord Coke, nor common sense, gives him any warrant to bring into the definition. However, it seems, according to this, a dispensing Power, in some case or other, is vested in the King; which yet is far from proving any thing to his purpose: for either the King may in all cases dispense as to particular persons, and then his distinction of malum prohibitum, v. p. 617. and malum in se, falls to the ground; or else it reaches only to those cases, in which the judgment or flattery of Judges have ascribed it to him.

He adds out of the Lord Coke (p. 617.) 11 Rep. f. 88. as an enlargement upon what he calls the definition, Inasmuch as an Act of Parliament, which generally prohibits any thing upon a penalty that is popular, or only given to the King, may be inconvenient to divers particular persons, in respect of person, time, or place; for this purpose the Law gives a Power to the King to dispense with particular persons. Where the Lord Coke manifestly restrains the penalty, to such as is given the King as Head of the People, upon which account only he calls it popular: nor, indeed, can be thought to take in what is granted to any subject that will inform; it being mentioned without distinction, whether before or after an Information commenced:

And that the Lord Coke's words here, 7 Rep. f. 36. ought not to be restrained farther, is yet more evident, from the case of Penal Statutes, on which Sir Edward Herbert's mis-representations will occasion my more particular Remarks.

As Sir Edward, considering what interest he has serv'd; may be presumed something conversant with Priests and Jesuits, he might, among others of less use, have consulted the learned *Suarez, who after the definition; which he makes to be Legis humane relaxatio, in a distinct Chapter shews, with whom the ordinary power of dispensing (which he distinguishes from that which is delegated) is lodged, where he says, ib. t. 14. f. 395. Certum est eum habere ordinariam potestatem dispensandi, qui legem tulit: And he gives the reason, Quia ab ejus voluntate & potentia pendet. So that none can have this power; but he, or they who are vested with the legislative exclusive of others, or such as have it delegated from thence. That the King has not the legislative exclusive of others, is what I have formerly proved at large†; and it lies on the other side to shew, that the dispensing power has been delegated to him: Yet thus much be said on the contrary.

First, That the King could not in law be presumed to have exercised such a power by himself; for that the ancient law provided, that he should have a Council chose in Parliament, who (as the Charter affirm'd to be declaratory of the ancient law, and sworn at the coronation of Hen. 3. has it ‡) were sworn quod negotia Domini Regis & Regni fideliter tractabunt, & sine acceptatione personarum omnibus justitiam exhibebunt: and that it was accounted the Law long after that, appears by the impeachment of Roger Mortimer, 4 E. 3. part of which was, that Whereas it was ordained in the Parliament next after the King's Coronation, that four Bishops, four Earls, and four Barons, should stand by the King, Pur luy Counseiller; without whose assent Nul gros Bufaign ne se Feust: nevertheless Mortimer would undertake to manage all by himself, accroaching royal Power ||: And it is easily to be shewn, that such a Counsel was in use, or continually insisted on, as the right of the Kingdom, from the time of the Charter, confirm'd 28 Hen. 3. till the end of the Reign of Hen. 6.

2. A Power to grant non obstante's to Statutes, could not have been a right in the Crown at common law; for we have clear proofs of its odious and condemned beginning from the sulphureous fountain of Rome, as an honest popish lawyer confess'd with a deep sigh. 35 Hen. 3. This non obstante Matthew Paris calls, a detestable addition against all Reason and Justice: And when, the year after, King Henry urged the example of the Pope for non obstante's, the Prior of Jerusalem says, God forbid you should use this unpleasant and absurd word; as long as you observe Justice you may be King, and as soon as you violate it, you will cease to be King; which shews how little foundation in law it then was thought to have; and what the whole Nation thought of the Pope's use of it, may be seen at large in Matthew Paris, and Mr. Prynne's Animadversions on the 4th Institute §.

Farther, the reasons given why the King ought to have this power, fail here upon many accounts.

1. In that the interest of the whole, of which the Legislators are the best Judges, when they make the law without exception, ought to outweigh all private inconveniences.

2. The Law has provided a more certain and equal remedy; having taken as sufficient care for the meeting of Parliaments, once a year at least, and I may say,  sitting too, as it has for the sitting of the common Courts of Justice; as appears from the several Statutes in print, and others in the Rolls; which avoid the common cavil upon the words, ostner if need be.

And these were, like the famous triennial Act, provisions for the greater certainty of meeting so often at least, but no recessions from the old law; which, as appears both by the Mirror, and the life of King Alfred ††, was for the great Council to meet twice a year at London.

3. The great reason assigned in the Latin quotation from the Lord Coke, propter impossibilitatem prœvidendi de omnibus particularibus, which is after distinguished, as to person, time, and place, can by no means be applied to the case in question: For, 1. The law was made but very few years before their Lordships resolution, and not grown more inconvenient by length of time, to any par-particular person, than it was at the making of the Act. 2. The law-makers had in their immediate prospect every particular person of the Romish communion; and the time when, and place where the danger would happen, if any such were committed.

Let us now see what help he can have from his second quotation from the Lord Coke, which is 7 Rep. fol. 73. But he intends, I suppose, fol. 37. and would have it believed, that it was the opinion of all the Judges in England, 2 Jac. 1. that the King may dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of the Statute, tho' it be an act made pro bono publico; and that this is a trust and confidence inseparably annexed to the royal person of the King, Account, p. 617. In which 1. He again overthrows his distinction of malum in se, and prohibitum, making that power at large, in relation to any Statute pro bono publico. 2. He manifestly perverts the Lord Coke's sense, whose words are, 7 Rep. fol. 36. When a Statute is made pro bono publico, and the King, as head of the Commonwealth, and the fountain of Justice and Mercy, is by all the Realm trusted with it; this is a trust and confidence inseparably adjoined and annexed to his royal person, in which a point of Sovereignty, that he cannot transfer it to the disposition or power of any private person, or to any private use; for this was committed to the King, by all his subjects, for the publick good, &c. But true it is, that the King can upon any cause moving him, in respect of time, place, or person, &c. make a non obstante to dispense with any particular person, that he shall not incur the penalty of this Statute.

Where the sole question was, of transferring over a penalty granted to the King, as entrusted by all the Realm to see the Statute put in execution, by inflicting the penalty. This trust is adjudged inseparable, and not to be transferred over; but that however the King may dispense with the penalty granted to himself: upon which, I must say, our Chief-Justice has made a very foul stretch; for what is this to the informer's part, concerning which the question before him was? But surely there is a mighty difference between these two propositions: "Where the subjects have entrusted the King with a Statute made for the publick good, this trust is inseparable, and cannot be transferred to another: but the Statute so entrusted, may be dispensed with;" which is all that is to be gathered from my Lord Coke: And this, "Tho' an Act be made for the publick good, yet the King may dispense with it, and this is a trust and confidence inseparably annexed to the royal person of the King;" which is Sir Edward Herbert's perverse comment. In short, Lord Coke says, Where the King is entrusted with the execution of a Statute made for the publick good, he may dispense with that Statute. Sir Edward Herbert says, he may dispense with any Statute made for the publick good. Upon which 'tis to be observed, that the question in the Lord Coke, was not of dispensing, but granting over the penalty; which penalty, he says, is not to be transferred over: the other would make it of dispensing, and that that power is inseparable, and not to be transferred; so apparently changes the state of the question.

His next step is to the Year-book of H. 7. f. 11, § 12. in which he leaves us to seek the year, which is 11. This he calls the first, and great case which he cites; wherein the King's dispensing power is described and limited.

"There is a diversity, says the Book Account, (p. 617.) between malum prohibitum, and malum in se; as a Statute forbids any man to coin money, and if he does, he shall be hanged; this is malum prohibitum: For before the Statute, coining money was lawful, but now it is not so, and therefore the King can dispense with it. So if a man ship wool in any place but Calais, it is malum prohibitum, because it is prohibited by Act of Parliament. But that which is malum in se, the King, nor no other person can dispense with: as if the King would give a man power to kill another; or license one to make a nuisance in the high-way, they were void, and yet the King can pardon these things when they are done." Upon this case 'tis observable, that the power of dispensing is here asserted in relation to things, and not persons: wherefore according to this, taken in Sir Edward Herbert's latitude, the King may grant dispensations to all in general, where the matter is only malum prohibitum: Whereas he himself owns, that the nature of a dispensation is particular, and given to particular persons by name. 2. Many things in Magna Charta, nay the most, are but malum prohibitum: and so Magna Charta itself may be dispensed with: when he himself owns, that the King cannot dispense with one tittle of Magna Charta: And methinks he could not but observe this contradiction. Wherefore the rule there, admit it were a Judgment in law, as it was not, being only spoken obiter, by one of the Judges*, can be applied only to such cases as are there cited. The first is that of coining money, which goes upon the ground in Moor's Reports†, where 'tis said, that such Statutes as give a Prerogative may be dispensed with: And that of shipping wool at Calais, the King's Staple, is of the same nature; and both sufficiently shew the distinction of malum prohibitum from malum in se, to relate barely to such things as become evil by accident, as they are against an accidental prerogative: which no way interferes with the rights of the subjects in general, or particular.

And I much wonder that Sir Edward Herbert should cite my Lord Vaughan, in the case of Thomas and Sorrel, as confirming what he would infer from the Year-book, when Lord Vaughan says, fol. 332. That old Rule has more confounded mens Judgments on the subject, than rectified them; and fol. 333. himself denies that the King can dispense with every malum prohibitum by Statute, tho' prohibited by Statute only.

Oh, but my Lord Vaughan shews, that a Dispensation does jus dare; and makes the thing prohibited to all others, lawful to be done by him that has it. Does he say this of every malum prohibitum? By no means: Wherefore we must apply it to the case then in question, which concerned wine-licences; about which the King had a Prerogative by statute law: and the dispensing with that, falls within the rule in Moor‡, agreeing with the Lord Coke, in the case of penal Statutes§. Yet even thus much was a point gained by the Prerogative, since the 1st of H. 7. for it is then made a doubt before all the the Judges of England, in the Exchequer-Chamber, and adjourned over for the difficulty*, Whether the King could license the shipping wools elsewhere than at Calais; one of the very instances which Sir Edward Herbert relies on: And Chief-Justice Hufsey was positive, that the King could not license; tho' indeed the Chief-Baron, and some others, held as Finex did afterwards. Wherefore no body of less assurance than our Chief-Justice can say, from these Cases results this plain syllogism:

Whatever is not prohibited by the Law of God, but was lawful before any Act of Parliament made to forbid it, the King by his dispensation may make lawful again, to that person who has such dispensation, tho' it continues unlawful to any body else, &c. Acc. p. 617. In which, if we grant his major, I will own, the conclusion to bring it to Sir Edward Hales's case, is not criminal. Yet the proposition is so pernicious, striking at the very foundation of our Government, that if there were a resolution, instead of an extrajudicial opinion, giving that countenance which even that loose opinion does not; yet it ought to be rejected: For if all Acts of Parliament contrary to Magna Charta are void, as some have held, I am sure much more so would such Resolutions of Judges be. And that such an one would be contrary to that Great Charter, is evident: for no man can say, that all things prohibited by Magna Charta, are prohibited by the law of God.

To come to Sir Edward's next great case, as he calls it, Acc. p. 618. but indeed the only one which has coloured the resolution to the world; which is that 2 H. 7. Notwithstanding his promise, he, p. 617. has not been so fair to give the words of that case, or so much of them as is material, lest every body might judge of how little use it would be to him; nay, lest men should be for satisfying their own eyes, he has not directed to the folio.

The Englisb of the material part is thus †: "In the Exchequer-Chamber all the Justices were shewn for the King, how King Edward the fourth, by his Letters Patent, had constituted the Earl of N—— Sheriff of the same County; and had granted the said Earl the office of Sheriff of the said County for the term of his life, with all the other offices tended, thereto belonging; rendering to the King at his Exchequer, annually, 100 l. without any account, or any other thing to be given for it, &c.

"Now, 1. Whether this Patent was good? And also, 2. How this Patent shall be intended? were the points in question. And as to the first point, the Justices held the Patent good; for it is a thing which may well be granted for term of life or inheritance: as divers Counties have a Sheriff by inheritance; and this commenced by a Grant of the King. Then was shewn a Resumption: and then was shewn a Proviso for H. Earl of N. so that the Patent remains in its force. Radcliff shews the Statute of 28 E. 3. c. 7. and 24 E. 3. c. 5. That no Sheriff shall be more than one year, &c. altho' he had a non obstante. And notwithstanding this, that the King shall always have his Prerogative, as of the value and certainty of the land, and other things granted by the King, and of wools shipped, and of Charters of murder, and many other cases where the Statutes are, That Patents that want these things shall be void; yet the Patents are good with a non obstante: But without a non obstante the Patents are void, by reason of the Statutes. So here the Patent, with a non obstante, &c."

This is all that is said in the Book upon the first point, upon which it is observable,

1. By the Book it would seem, that this Radcliff was but a Serjeant at Law; for at the end of the case Brian Justice demands of Brian Radcliff, &c. Yet indeed I find upon search, that he was a Baron of the Exchequer.

2. What Radcliff says, is after the resolution of the Judges is over, and no way influenced that.

3. Whereas Sir Edward Herbert says, the resolution was upon 23 H. 6. c. 1. Radcliff, who should better know the subject of debate, discourges only concerning the Statutes, 28 E. 3. c. 7. ‡ and 12 E. 3. c. 5. which are barely prohibitory, without any mention of non obstante's, or any avoiding or disabling clause. Indeed Radcliff, it being upon a sudden discourse, as the Book shews, mistakes the Statutes, as if they had such clauses; and Brook§, who cites part of the Patent, which it seems he had seen, says, there was in it a non obstante to the Statutes 28 E. 3. c. 7. and 12 E. 3. c. 9.

Fitzherbert indeed says, R. objected the 23 H. 6. but for that sit liber judex.

4. But above all, tho' our Chief Justice calls them the Judges enemies, Acc. p. 618. who say, the point of non obstante is not resolved in this case, which he calls confidence; and that they may as well deny one of the ten Commandments: 'Tis manifest beyond contradiction, that the resolution ended at issint que le Patent demurr en sa force: after which comes Radcliff's discourse, and the resolution went upon two grounds.

1. That this was a thing grantable for inheritance, or for life; which if it were, it could not be presumed to be touched by the prohibitory Statutes: And besides, if the question had been upon the other, the case had been an exception out of the Statute; for the § Statute excepts such Counties in which divers of the King's Liege People be inheritable to the office of Sheriff at the making of the Statute; and also such persons who have Estate of freehold in the office of Sheriff, at the making of the Letters Patent made to them of the office of Sheriffs, &c. Now whether this were really a County so inheritable, or of an Estate of freehold, at the time, or no, is not so very material; being at least it was so look'd upon by the Judges, nay, and by the Parliament too, as will appear by their second ground.

But that this County was such an one, I take to be also true in fact: for it is to be considered, that this was the County of Northumberland ††, which was a Palatinate; upon which reason this, with other Counties under it, was left out of the Survey in Doomsday-Book, as being penfitionibus liberi: This Palatinate comprized Cumberland and Westmorland, among other Counties; in the last of which, the Sheriffwick is at this day enjoyed in fee. Indeed Northumberland came soon into the Crown, as early as the time of William the Second, upon the rebellion of Mowbray, constituted Earl thereof in the time of William the First: But the authority in law is much clearer, that this Sheriffwick, if ever held in fee, would remain in the Crown as an inheritance in gross, and was not merged, than any Sir Edward Herbert has produced on his side: for which we may observe the rule taken in the Case of the Abbot of Strata Mercella, 9 Rep. f. 25. b. which is this: "When a Liberty, Franchise, or Jurisdiction was at the beginning erected and created by the King, and there was no such Flower in the Crown before; there by the accession of them again to the Crown, they are not extinct."

Where instances are given of the cases of Markets, Hundreds, and Earldoms; nor can any one say, that Sheriffwicks are ancient Flowers of the Crown: But more directly to our case, is that between Sir Robert Atkins and *Robert Holford, which, tho' not in our Books, is well known. The Case was of the Grant of the Seven Hundreds of Cirencester, with the returns of Writs to the Abbot and Convent of Cirencester: This came to the Crown by the dissolution of Monasteries, 31 H. 8. but yet that it was not merged thereby, but remained as an inheritance in gross, without the help of any Statute, was the opinion of the Great Hales, then Chief-Baron, and of two other Barons, Windham and Turner. Part of Hales's words, as I find them excellently well reported, and full to this point, are:

"Such Hundreds as were anciently sever'd from the Counties, and come again to the Crown by escheat or forfeiture, were sometimes, but rarely committed to the Sheriff, and rejoined to the County, but for the most part kept as distinct: Ret. Brevium, and the Hundred to which it was annexed, without an actual and special re-annexion to the County, remains in the King in gross; for the Ret. Brevium is a thing created de novo. Suppose it were a Court of Jurisdiction merely created by the King, and the Hundred itself, tho' ancient, yet by return to the Crown it is not merged or annexed: This I know in the case of the Courts belonging to the Honours of Gloucester and Hereford, that came to H. 5. by marriage of a co-heir, it is still in esse."

This were enough to shew, that the Judges resolution 2 H. 7. had a better legal foundation than what Sir Edward Herbert would suggest.

2. But then, besides that, there was another ground mentioned in the Book, which was, That a resumption was shewn before the Judges; and then was shewn a Proviso for H. Earl of N. and so (says the Book) the Patent remains in its force. This resumption was an Act of Resumption 1 H. 7. and if this Act provided for that Earl's Grant, as the Judges it seems thought it did, who can doubt but the Grant was good? The Act of Resumption is to be seen upon Record, Rot. Parl. 1 H. 7. part 2. It is a resumption of Grants made by Edward the Fourth; and among others of the Yests, that is, Gifts of offices: The Proviso runs thus:

"Provided always, that this Act of Resumption, or any other Act made or to be made in this present Parliament, be not in any wise prejudicial or hurtful to the several Grants and Letters Patents made to Henry Earl of Northumberland, &c." Which indeed does not make good any void Grant, but supposes all the Grants to him to be good in Law; nor would the Judges dispute their supposal.

I admit with him, Acc. p. 618. that Fitzberbert says, and that truly, that the Patent was adjudged good; but the reason he gives agrees with what I have shewn: his words are, for such a thing may be grantable for Inheritance, or for Life. And then I am sure that the Statute does not say expressly, the Patent shall be void, tho' Sir Edward affirms that it does. Vid. Acc. p. 618.

Obj. It may be objected, that the exception in the Statute relates to estates in the subject; but if this were an interest in gross in the King, that it could not be taken from him without express words, cannot be denied me.

What he cites from Plowden, Acc. p. 618. can be of no more service; for he only says, there it is held, and I agree it is held by Radcliff, Acc. p. 618. with a mistake of the Statute, That the King can grant a Sheriffwick for more than a year: Yet whereas he magnifies this as cited by Plowden, who, as he supposes, well understood the sense of the Year-book:

It does not appear that it was Plowden, but one who was of Counsel in the case for the Defendant, who mentions this.

2. He mentions it only as a Case in Fitzberbert, Plowden, f. 502. without referring to the Book, 2 H. 7.

But the second point raised before the Judges, 2 H. 7. which occasioned the main debate in that case, as appears by the Book, shews, that the resolution could not be upon the point of Prerogative; for they questioned whether the King could dispense with his own profit: And all the Judges, except Brian and Catesby, held, that the Patentee shall account for the green wax, and other things, notwithstanding the clause of absque reddendo computum: But the debate concerning other things arising upon that second point, was adjourned; the first resolved upon the grounds above.

Tho' hitherto there is no Proof, that any one of authority in the Law has taken the Book, 2 H. 7. in Sir Edward Herbert's sense, which yet would be of no moment, if they were express, being the Book is to be seen, and clearly otherwise; yet he thinks my Lord Coke will bear him out, and to this purpose he cites two places: one, where he supposes that the Lord Coke not only authorizes this sense of the case, but asserts the Prerogative, Acc. p. 618. in much higher terms than they would presume to do: and by the second he would have it believed, that if the Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter, all the Judges of England took that case in the same sense.

The first is the case of customs, 24 Eliz. which is pregnant with many objections against its being of any force in this case.

1. The Book, 12 Rep. f. 17. is of suspected authority, being printed in the late times, and what the Lord Coke never owned, or thought fit to print in his life-time.

2. This comes foisted in among cases in the time of King James, without any parallel case which might occasion the placing of it there.

3. It was when the Lord Coke was but a young Reporter, it being ten years before he was King's Solicitor §.

4. It is not only no point in question relating to the case where 'tis cited, and so extrajudicial, but wholly foreign to it: For the question was, Whether goods sold before they were landed, were to pay pay custom within the Statute 1 Eliz. c. 11. Wherefore being barely a memorandum of a young Reporter, no way occasioned by what went before, it cannot possible have any weight.

5. The fancy'd reason here given why the King may dispense with the Statute of Sheriffs, is none at all: for whereas it says, 12 Rep. f. 18. That the King has a sovereign Power to command any of his Subjects to serve him for the publick weal, and this solely and inseparably annexed to his person; and this royal power cannot be restrained by any Act of Parliament: There is no authority cited for this, but the case 2 H. 7. which, as appears to any body that reads it, neither has that reason been mentioned so much as by any one Judge, nor in the least goes upon the point of the prerogative. Besides, if the King can command any subject to serve him for the publick weal, either he is to be Judge, or the Laws: If the latter, then no person not qualified by law is obliged to act; nor tho' qualified, to do any thing forbid by the laws: If the former, as the words imply, then the King's commands may be pleaded to justify any ill minister who has rendered himself obnoxious to the laws. But that this cannot be, is sufficiently evinced by necessary examples in all ages. And this, by the way, may shew how false, as well as pernicious, that doctrine is which tells us, that ἐξουσία in the New Testament, always signifies the authority of a Person, not of a Law. Or, as another has it to the same purpose, By higher Powers, it is evident, we are to understand the persons of sovereign Princes, or Governors, not the Laws and Constitutions, as our Republican Doctors pretend.

Of the same batch is another memorable position, That the King's most illegal Acts, tho' they have not the authority of the Law (for indeed, to say they have, would be a blunder with a witness) yet they have the authority of sovereign Power. Some will say, that this is qualified by what follows, Which is irresistible and unaccountable: as if the King had this power only so far as it is irresistible and unaccountable. Whereas it is evident the proposition is entire before, being the medium whereby he would prove, that the King's illegal Acts are not inauthoritative; in proof of which medium, he afterwards affirms, that the sovereign Power which made the laws, and can repeal and dispense with them, is inseparable from the Person of the Prince.

Reduc'd to a Syllogism, it runs thus; The authority of sovereign Power is irresistible and unaccountable; but the King's most illegal Acts have the authority of sovereign Power. This is an entire proposition, upon which he concludes, Ergo, the King's most illegal acts are irresistible and unaccountable. This assumption he goes on to prove from the supposition, that such a Sovereign Power as he describes, is inseparable from the person of the Prince; upon which, or the like Doctrine, another raises this comfortable use: In all sovereign Governments (and such he at large endeavours to shew England to be) Subjects must be Slaves as to this particular; they must trust their lives and liberties with their Sovereign.

But for the honour of our Gown, this may be said, That such hereticks never appeared among lawyers, till Divines began first to wrest the laws and scriptures to their own damnation. But as the former quotation out of the Lord Coke can do Sir Edward Herbert no service, upon the reasons above shewn; much less can the other, which is one of Sir

VOL. VII.

Edward's usual perversions: He tells us, Acc. ante p. 619. That it is resolved by all the Judges (if my Lord Coke be a faithful Reporter) that it is agreed 2 H. 7. that the King may, against the express provision of the Act 23 H. 6. dispense with that Act; for that the Act could not bar the King of the service of his subjects, which the law of nature did give unto him. He adds, This is reported (unless my Lord Coke had a mind to deceive the succeeding Judges, and draw them in to give pernicious opinions) as the sense of all the Judges of England, in King James's time, in the Exchequer-Chamber. Whereas the Lord Coke, on purpose to prevent such an abuse of his words, says in the beginning of the Case, 7 Rep. f. 4. "I shall give no just offence to any, if I challenge that which of right is due to every Reporter; that is, to reduce the sum and effect of all to such a method, as upon consideration had of all the arguments, he himself thinketh to be fittest and clearest for the right understanding of the true reasons and causes of the Judgment, and resolution of the case in question."

Upon which it is evident, that if any one of the Judges mentioned this, the Lord Coke is a faithful Reporter; but had he been silent as to this matter, no man could suppose, that such a tedious argument as that in Calvin's case was the resolution in which the Judges concurred in every expression.

But Sir Edward Herbert's own eyes might, and ought to have satisfied him, that the Judges 2 H. 7. gave no determination upon the 23 H. 6. nor does the Book say, that so much as any one person spoke to that Statute, or mentioned the reason devised in Calvin's case; For that the Act could not bar the King of the service of his Subject, which the Law of Nature did give unto him. Nor could Sir Edward chuse but know the absurdity of that ground: for according to that, all ought to be left in the state of nature, as it was before any law made; so that not only any person might act, tho' prohibited by subsequent laws, but he might act any thing forbid by any positive law; which would make a mad world. And this would come of a natural allegiance due to the person of a King, without respect to the laws of his Government*. And the resolution of the Judges in Calvin's case, is quite contrary to this supposal; for it is there resolved, That they who were born under King James's allegiance, before he had the Crown of England, were aliens here, notwithstanding that accession†.

But my Lord Coke is so far from giving any real countenance to such a resolution, as that in Sir Edward Hales's case, that he, in concurrence with all the Judges of England, is express to the contrary; for in relation to the Court of Admiralty, he and the rest of the Judges declare, 4 inst. f. 135. "That the Statutes of 13 R. 2. c. 3. 15 R. 2. c. 5. and 2 H. 4. c. 11. being Statutes declaring the jurisdiction of the Court of the Admiral, and wherein all the subjects of the Realm have interest, cannot be dispensed with by any non obstant te." Nay, he gives another resolution of Judges, tho' not so solemn as the former; yet what he says is warranted in the Books, and the resolution comes up to our case in terminis, 3 Inst. f. 154. his words are, "When an Act of Parliament is made, that disabled any person, or maketh any thing void, or tortious, for the good of the Church or Commonwealth; in that law all the King's subjects

"have an interest, and therefore the King cannot dispense therewith, no more than with the Common Law."

All the chimerical foundation of solemn resolutions being thus destroy'd, I need not concern myself with the vain airy superstructure, which must vanish in fumo; and instead of the Appeal, What may be relied upon, if such resolutions may not? Acc. ante p. 619. I appeal to all mankind, whether our senses are not sufficient Judges against these accidents, subsisting without any subject, meer transubstantiation nonsense! Such are reasons devis'd for a resolution which never was to be seen.

But we are told, That besides the authority of the case, we have constant practice that this Statute has been dispens'd with ever since; and if it were not so, the consequences would be dreadful, illegal Convictions, &c. Acc. ante p. 619. But to this I say,

1. A facto ad jus non valet argumentum, till there be legal determinations on the side of the fact.

2. The fact cannot be shewn, for any Sheriff to have enjoy'd the office for more than one year by the same patent.

3. However the consequences would not necessarily follow; for we know, even Laws made by Kings de facto, have always been look'd on as binding, and so have the admittances to Copy-hold estates, made by disseisors, and others without title. And tho' I love not to lay any great stress upon precedents of our own time, yet it may serve to Sir Edward; and we well know, that notwithstanding the late illegal choice of Sheriffs in the City of London, yet no challenges were allow'd, because they were Sheriffs de facto.

That I may not be here unnecessarily be detain'd, with what he says to real or fancied objections; I shall hasten to his other pretended authorities, and shall begin with his last, as having the most immediate reference to the cases above-cited, and which he seems to be most proud of: and that is Serjeant Glanvil's argument, delivered at a conference between the Lords and Commons; wherein he owns, that in such things as are only mala quia prohibita, Acc. ante p. 621. under certain forfeitures and penalties to the King, and the Informer, there the King may dispense. This indeed is more than appears from any case that Sir Edward Herbert has cited, as I have shewn above; yet is no more than what the Lord Coke saith elsewhere†, immediately after he had denied that power in things made void or tortious, for the good of the Church or Commonwealth; in which, he says, all the King's subjects have an Interest, and therefore the King cannot dispense therewith, no more than with the Common Law.

All that is more in Serjeant Glanvil, relates only to the nature of those Laws, which were then insisted upon; if he went further, it could no more be an evidence of the opinion of the House of Commons in that point, not being the point put to the question, than his quotation out of Calvin's case, is of the opinion of all the Judges. But the first part of his speech cannot be stretch'd farther than mala prohibita had formerly been taken, that is, in relation to new prerogatives, or at least things wherein the subjects in general have no interest vested in them; and he expressly restrains it to such cases, wherein his Majesty by conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others; Acc. p. as it is in my Lord Coke above, and in Moor, where 'tis held, that Statutes which give a prerogative, or restrain the prerogative, may be dispens'd with; but not such as give or dispose of Interests. And as to what restrains the prerogative, not coming within the mala prohibita, tho' it falls not under consideration here; yet we may observe the difference taken in Lord Hobart††, where a Statute is made to ease the Sovereign of labour, not to deprive him of power. In the first case the King may dispense, not in the other.

And I think no man can doubt but the Statute, 25 Car. II. cap. 2. which only requires officers to take the oaths, and test, to distinguish them from Papists, but disables them that do not take them within three months, vests an interest, not only in several particular persons, who may be reversioners, but in all the subjects in general; and is of the nature of those Statutes insisted on in the Petition of Right, and press'd for by Serjeant Glanvil, Acc. ante p. 621. "Not Laws inflicting penalties in malis prohibitis; but Laws declarative, or positive, conferring, or confirming ipso facto an inherent Right, and interest of liberty, and freedom in the subjects of this Realm, as their birthright, and inheritance descendable to their heirs and posterity." A freedom, I may add, from Popish slavery and tyranny; Statutes incorporate into the body of the Common Law, over which, with reverence be it spoken, there is no trust in the King's sovereign power or prerogative-royal, to enable him to dispense with them, or take from his subjects that birthright, or inheritance, which they have in their liberties, by virtue of the Common Law, and of these Statutes: I may say, this Statute.

And such a Statute it is, that no man that wishes well to the Protestant Interest, not only here, but thro' Christendom, would consent to the abrogating or impairing the force of it; without obtaining such Laws for restoring the ancient constitution, both for the choice of Sheriffs and Counsellors, among other things, as might more effectually keep out the Booted Apostles; than any other means, next to the glorious expedition of his Highness the Prince of Orange: whose miraculous successes are not only the subject of present admiration, but have been plainly foretold in past ages, and will be celebrated in all future.

But to return from this short digression: 'Tis manifest that Serjeant Glanvil speaks as well of such Laws as are positive, as those that are declarative; such as confer an inherent Right, as that confirm it; and of Statute, as well as common Law, not to be dispens'd with: so that he is manifestly on our side, and seems not in the least to have exceeded the Lord Coke, where he makes so express an exception of our case, from that dispensing power which he allows. By inherent, the Serjeant can mean no more, considering the import of confer, than actually vested, and inherent, and inseparable by any less power than that from which it was derived. Thus in relation to those prerogatives that have been counted inherent, and inseparable in relation to penalties, and the like|||, the true meaning can be only, that while they continue, they are not to be separated, and transferred over to another. Yet no thinking man man will doubt the power of a Parliament, in relation even to them; and if they cannot be receded from in particular, at least they may in gross; when a King does cedere imperio, or abdicare Regnum, which most prerogative-casuits† own may be, not only by actual cession from the Government, but by acts amounting to an Abdication, and shewing a fix'd intention no longer to treat his people as subjects. Nor perhaps could there be greater evidence of such intention, than the dispensing at a lump, not barely by retail to particular persons, with those Laws which were made by the united wisdom of the Nation to secure it, as much as they thought human means could, or at least, the Court would yield to, against those real dangers, which were in their immediate prospect. Nor in all probability had this enclosure been laid waste, if the dispensing Judges had not made the first gap.

As to Sir Edward's supposed clear concessions of this power from all the Commons of England, 1 H. V. Acc. ante p. 620. they are quite otherwise than he represents them, nor would be conclusive to his point however.

In the first, says Sir Edward, "The Commons pray, that the Statutes for voiding of Aliens out of the Kingdom, may be kept and executed; to which the King agrees, saving his prerogative, that he may dispense with whom he pleases; and upon this the Commons answered, that their intent was no other."

But the Record says, Sauvant a luy sa prerogative, "saving to him his prerogative." Whatever that was, they declare, they never intended to injure it. Then it goes on with the copulative and, which adds new matter, and is dishonestly left out by Sir Edward, Et qil purra dispenser ovesque cex queux luy plerra, "And that he may dispense with whom he pleases." Which is an additional grant or licence to that King; but that this saving is but a general saving of the prerogative, appears by the very next Record, which he cites of the same Parliament.

Sir Edward's words are, "In the same Parliament, when the Commons pray, That the Statutes of provisors, Statutes of the same nature with this in our case, (for they were made against the Court of Rome's encroaching jurisdiction in England) I say, when they make the like prayer, that these may be put in execution; being admonished by the King's answer in the former case, they themselves insert in their very prayer, a saving for this prerogative of the King's, and then the King agrees to it." Where he would insinuate, that this prerogative of dispensing with particular persons, is there sav'd; when the Record is express to the contrary: the words in English are,

"Also the Commons pray, for the good and profit of the Realm, that all the Statutes made against provisors, in the times of the most noble Kings E. III. R. II. H. IV. * your Father, whom God be merciful to; may stand in their force, and may be held, and executed in all

"points; and that no protection, nor other grant, to any person, by our Lord the King, working to the contrary, in forbearance of the execution of the said Statutes, be allowable or available to any person whatsoever in this matter. And if any thing be done to the contrary, let it be held for null, or void: saving all times the prerogative of the King."

The King answers, "Let the Statutes thereof made, be held and kept." Which is plainly meant according to their prayer, without the King's impeding the execution of them by any protection, or other grant to any person whatsoever; and if such grant be, that it shall be void. Is not this as much as to say, (Vid. Acc. ante p. 618.) That no non obstante shall make any such Grant good? Oh, but Sir Edward will tell us, That this shews that the Parliament thought the King could otherwise have dispens'd with those Acts. By no means; it only argues an abuse crept in (which Matthew Paris shews to have been as early as the time of H. III.) and likely to be allow'd of by the Judges; but the Parliament would prevent even that; and surely they would never provide, that a non obstante, or grant to a particular person, shall be void, if they thought the King had a prerogative to defeat this when he pleas'd: much less, when they expressly pray against such an abuse, can they be thought to contradict themselves, and in the same breath that they desire that no person whatever may be dispens'd with, yet leave the King a prerogative to dispense with whom he pleases. The absurdity of which reasoning, he might have seen in that excellent speech of Serjeant Glanvil‡, which he himself receives as the sense of the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament.

Wherefore the savings in both the Records, Acc. ante p. 621. can be but general savings, of such prerogative as the Kings had, whatever it were: which the Kings, as they began to encroach upon the people, or to be jealous of their encroachments, would have inserted out of abundant caution, before they would yield to several Acts. And these being Acts of Parliament, which could pass but as the King consented, the people were forced often to guild the pills with such savings; but 'twas otherwise of judgments in Parliaments to which no consent of the King was requisite.

Farther yet, admit the King had a prerogative of dispensing with particular persons, both as to Aliens, and Provisions; yet there could no general rule be taken from thence, because it would only argue, that the fondness for Aliens, and fear of displeasing the Court of Rome, had at first occasioned the reserving the power of easing some particular persons, without which the Kings would pass no Act against them. However it was, the frequent complaints of the Commons ||, and Acts made against both the one and the other, shews that those Laws were little regarded or executed, and yet that the King had not a prerogative allow'd him, any more for particular persons, than for all in general.

Sir Edward has five other trivial instances of the dispensing power, which however I shall not omit. One is the dispensing with the Statute 8 R. II. c. 2.

Account,

† Vid. Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis. Vid. Falkner's Christian Loyalty, p. 544, 545. speaking of the Parisian Massacre. &c. But if ever any such strange case as is proposed, should really happen in the World, I confess it would have its great difficulties. Grotius thinks that in this utmost extremity, the use of such defence, as a last refuge ultimo necessitatis presidio, is not to be condemned, provided the care of the common good be preserv'd. And if this be true, it must be upon this ground, that such attempts of ruining do ipso facto include a disclaiming the governing those persons as subjects, and consequently of being their Prince or King. Vid. Bishop Bilson, of Christian Subjection, Ed. 1586. p. 280. I never denied, that the People might preserve the foundation, freedom, and form of their Commonwealth, which they forepriz'd when they first consented to have a King.

‡ Vid. Serjeant Glanvil's Speech, art. 1: p. 202.

Acc. p. 619. which requires, that no man should go Judge of Assize into his own Country: but for this there is only practice, which has pass'd sub silentio, and so could be of no authority in Law. Besides, the Statute is barely prohibitory, and does not render the Patents void if otherwise; Yet I cannot say but an information would lie, tho' there were a non obstante in the case.

The second is of dispensing with the Statute 10 Ed. III. cap. 3. Acc. ante p. 619. which provides, That whoever has a pardon of felony, shall find sureties of the good behaviour: of which he says, as of the other, That it has been constantly dispens'd with ever since it was made. But if the practice had been so, which he does not prove, it would not avail, unless it had come in question judicially, whether the pardon would be valid to one who had not given, or at least tendered sureties. Indeed there is a case in our Books, where the Court did not require sureties, because of a particular clause in the pardon dispensing with it: but this was no earlier than 16 Car. I. * the Judges of which time paid sufficient deference to prerogative; but that case seems to be not only primæ impressionis, and without any reason given, but in effect condemned by the reporter, as he shews that the Court abus'd their discretion, if they had any in the matter: 'twas the case of Sir Matthew Mints, who appear'd to be guilty of several misdemeanors, for which he deserv'd to be bound to the good behaviour, committed after the time to which he was pardon'd.

The third and fourth instances, scatter'd from the rest, are of dispensing with pluralities, and bastards entering in Priest's orders; Acc. ante p. 622. which, if possible, will be less serviceable to him: For,

1. Such dispensations are never granted by the King †, but by the Archbishop; and the King only licences, or confirms, the Archbishop's dispensation in unusual cases.

2. that the King's licence or confirmation in cases unwont, as the Statute has it, is of any force, is owing to the Statute, 25 Hen. VIII. cap. 21.

3. Even in usual cases, where the Archbishop might dispense, tho' the King's confirmation be added, yet unless it come in due time, it will not prevent a lapse incurr'd upon the Statute 21 Hen. VIII. cap. 13. against pluralities; as was adjudg'd in Digby's case , tho' the dispensation came before induction. And this comes up fully to one of the points in Sir Edward Hales's case, which our Chief-Justice has not been so fair as in the least to mention to be a point in the case: nay, quite contrary, he supposes it to be a case, Acc. ante p. 623. where a disability is annex'd as a penalty, and that penalty is not to be incurr'd before legal conviction, and where the King's dispensation makes the thing dispens'd with lawful, and consequently prevents any conviction or penalty at all; forgetting, that in the very state of the case, he owns there was a conviction before the dispensation came. So that here was a disability actually incurr'd, and that upon Record, as appears in the pleadings; and while that Record remains, there is no falsifying of it, tho' in fact the conviction were before the three months given in the Statute to prevent a disability ††; and he had no other means, than either to plead no such Record, or to bring his Writ of Error. Wherefore this dispensation comes clearly within Digby's case, as being too late, supposing otherwise it were valid.

As Sir Edward shews that he has read Thomas and Sorrel's case, he might have known another reason of these two cases, viz. ¶¶ "That the King may dispense with a bastard to take Holy Orders, or with a Clerk to have two benefices with cure, which were mala prohibita by the Canon Law, and by the Council of Lateran, not by Act of Parliament;" which is most true. For these are mention'd in the Book of Hen. VII. before any Act made against pluralities.

There is another instance in that wild Annotation, upon the case of Customs in the 12 Rep. where 'tis said, "See (Acc. p. 619.) 4 Hen. IV. cap. 31. in which 'tis ordain'd, that no Welshman be Justice, &c. in any part of Wales, notwithstanding any patent to the contrary, with clause of non obstante licet sit Wallicus: and yet without question the King may grant with a non obstante." Nor do I question it neither, even before 21 Jac. I. cap. 38. when that Statute was repeal'd, provided the Welshman use not Welsh speech; and this by 27 H. VIII. cap. 26.

But as to these three last instances, it might be said further, that if they were stronger than they prove, yet they might fall under the difference receiv'd by him from Lord Vaughan, where he says, the King may dispense with Laws made pro bono populi complicati, but not with such as were made pro bono singulorum populi; in which the Lord Vaughan is not so absurd, as to mean, that tho' the King cannot dispense with a Law in which any man in particular is so far interested, as to be intitled to an action for himself alone, yet he may with those in which all the subjects are interested. But his meaning, to make him consistent with himself, must be restrain'd to Lord Coke's sense upon the Penal Statutes, which makes this power to be only where the King, as head of the Commonwealth, is trusted by all the Realm ; in which sense, he alone is to look after the interest of the populus complicatus under him as head. Thus Lord Vaughan, 1. Expressly Acc. p. 620. qualifies it, when he says, "They are pro bono populi complicati, as the King in his discretion shall think fit to order them for the good of the whole." 2. He illustrates it by the example of a Pater-familias †††; "Whose estate, he tells us, may be said to be pro bono communi of his family, which yet is but at his discretion, and management of it, and they have no interest in it, but have benefit by it." 3. Both he, and Sir Edward Herbert allow instances, where every particular man is not entitl'd to his action, and yet the Statutes are own'd to be pro bono singulorum populi, and not to be dispens'd with; Account, p. 620. and such are Magna Charta, and those other Laws mentioned by Serjeant Glanvil and Sir Edward. Acc. p. 620. And if some difference can be found between the interest singulorum populi in all those Statutes, and in ours, to use his words, I wish any man would shew me any such difference; or else we must say, that not only the former resolutions, but Lord Vaughan here, as well as where I before observ'd, is full against him; nay, he is even against himself:

himself: which I would be loth to think that Lord Vaughan is*, who owns, That the King cannot dispense in any case but with his own right, and not with the right of any other; which he confines not to individual persons, consider'd singly; for he says expressly†, “If the wisdom of the Parliament hath made an Act to restrain, pro bono publico, the importation of foreign manufactures, that the subjects of the Realm may apply themselves to the making of the said manufactures, for their support and livelihood, to grant to one or more the importation of such manufacture, without any limitation, non obstante the said Act, is a Monopoly and void.” For this I am sure, particular persons are not entitled to actions upon their own accounts. Indeed he supposes the King may license, limiting the quantity, and that for private uses‡, not by way of merchandize, as not being against the end of the Act. Wherefore in our case all subjects being interested as Protestants, their support and encouragement being provided for by the Act, and the letting Papists into the Government against the end of it, who can doubt but Lord Vaughan would be pronounc'd Sir Edward Hales's dispensation void?

And whereas our Judge pleads in his excuse, Account, p. 622. That tho' this Law was made for the interest of Religion, the offence is not directly against Religion, but against a politick Constitution, tho' made for the interest of Religion; he might not only have learnt from Lord Coke, that the subjects have such an interest as the King cannot dispense with, in what is made void or tortious, that is, unlawful, for the good of the Church; but Lord Vaughan shews††, that there are mala politica, not to be dispens'd with, and instances in some things, which are nuisances in specie.

Now, besides what already has been shewn, to disable these three last instances urg'd by Sir Edward; that they are not pro bono singulorum populi, as that rule is vindicated from misapplications, may appear, in that neither of them affect all the people in general. As to the Clergymen, they can only do injury in their respective parishes where they are benefic'd, and the Welshman in that part of Wales where he is an officer; nor besides, can the Clergymen be suppos'd much to prejudice the interest of Religion, being the Pluralist cannot supply his cure but by one qualified, and the bastard might be a good man, and good preacher. And yet even these would fall within Lord Vaughan's acceptation of his own rule‡‡; for he shews that laws made for the benefit of but part of the Kingdom, Artificers, and Husbandmen, cannot be dispens'd with to any one person, to frustrate the ends of the Statutes.

This leads to another flourish which he makes with the Lord Vaughan's authority, in answer to the objection, that the Law was made pro bono publico, Acc. p. 620. and it was highly necessary for the publick. Indeed Lord Vaughan will have it, that the sole reason why a Statute cannot be dispens'd with, is not, that the Law was made pro bono publico, because all Laws were made for publick good; and yet dispensations had been allow'd in some, nor was the degree of publick good that which alter'd the case; yet he shews that the extent of it does: and seems still to keep to Lord Coke's rule, where the People had entrusted the King with the Law, as head of the complicated body, there the trust was entirely in him; but when the law extended in interest not only to individual persons, but to a considerable part of the Nation, much more when to all, in either of which cases the Statute is pro bono singulorum populi, in neither of these can the King dispense. And that the Statute in question is of the largest extent, appears as the Nation is a Protestant Nation, this the religion establish'd by Law, and these provisions necessary means to preserve it; and therefore tho' the Papists have no benefit by it, they are not in Law, in this respect, any part of the people; for people always is taken for them that have legal interests. Thus when the Statute provides that the People of Counties shall choose their Sheriffs, it relates not to all the People in general, but only to Freeholders.

Secondly, Having thus shewn, that those grounds which our Judge pretends to have gone upon, afford no countenance even to his palliation of the Judgment, they will appear much less to countenance it as it was deliver'd; which to evince, I shall here set it down ipsis verbis, from that faithful reporter Mr. Blaney.

It was on that memorable day, when, as another mark of his sincerity, he directed the willing Jury, and concurr'd in the infamous sentence against that excellent Author Mr. Johnson; when the Jury was gone out, the Chief-Justice took occasion to inveigh against spreading of scandalous reports about cases depending in the Court; and to prevent any thing of that nature in the case of Sir Edward Hales, he thought fit to deliver the opinion of the Judges in this manner:

Chief-Justice. “In the case of Godwin and Hales, wherein the Defendant pleads a dispensation from the King, it is doubted, whether or no the King had such a prerogative? Truly, upon the argument before us, it appear'd as clear a case as ever came before this Court: But because men fancy I know not what difficulty, when really there is none, we were willing to give so much countenance to the question in the case, as to take the advice of all the Judges in England. They were all assembled at Serjeant's-Inn, and this case was put them, and the great case of the Sheriffs was put; whether the dispensation in that case were legal, because upon that depended the execution of all the Law of the Nation? And, I must tell you that there were then ten upon the place, that clearly deliver'd their opinions, that the case of the Sheriffs was good Law, and that all the Attainders grounded upon Indictments found by Juries return'd by such Sheriffs, were good, and not erroneous; and consequently, that men need not have any fears or scruples about that matter. And in the next place, they did clearly declare, that there was no imaginable difference between that case and this, unless it were, that this were the much clearer case of the two, and liable to the fewer exceptions. My brother Powel said, he was inclin'd to be of the same opinion, but he would rather have some more time to consider of it; but he has since sent by my brother Holloway, to let us know that he does concur with us. To these eleven Judges, there is one dissenter, brother Street, who yet continues his opinion, “that

 " him from the forfeiture, Judgment ought to be " given for the Defendant, quod querens nil capiat
 " per billam."

'Tis evident, that these propositions are very wide from any thing that he has, or could have urg'd from the Books, unless where a brand of infamy has been set upon the Judges. The examples of which, made in several ages, one would have thought,
 might have given sufficient caution; yet indeed, he might have had enough of this kind from those of the other gown, who, I think, are now pretty well asham'd of these notions. Whatever power of dispensing the King has, the Books suppose it to be entrusted by the people; but, according to this resolution, it came down from Heaven the Lord knows how. And as he goes upon the supposition of an absolute sovereignty in the King†, inseparable from his person, as such will have it, unless that be granted, all that he builds upon it are but castles in the air: for this we are to have recourse to our constitution, to see what that power in the Prince is;
 which the great Fortescue says, is, a populo effluxa,
 " derived from the people." But for that we have no occasion, from any so much as pretended proof of his assertions; nor can any be offer'd but from the resolution of the infamous Ship-money Judges, which seems to run parallel to this, but is indeed far short of it: for tho' they made the King the sole Judge of the Kingdom's necessity, yet they suppos'd it to be at a time when there was a real danger to be prevented by the exercise of this Judgment; whereas here it is abus'd to the bringing in what the Parliament labour'd to prevent.

But I must observe, vid. Account, p. 623. 1. That whereas Sir Edward Herbert owns the dispensing power to be of dark learning, and that it is very fit it should receive some light from a determination in Parliament, that Judges may judge by more certain rules, which Acts of Parliament the King may, and which he may not dispense with. Grant his premises, and there can be no darkness in it; for the power will extend to all cases, as far as the legislative does;

 and that he has determin'd positively in this point.
Account, p. 617. when he makes all things not forbid by God's Law, to be dispensable by the King. Nay, if he might dispense with every malum prohibitum, that is not malum in se, without such qualification as I have shewn ought to be, it would go farther, even as far as God's power ||, who never dispenses with more than his own positive Laws, not such as are founded upon eternal reasons: and thus the positive Laws of God and Man would be subject to the pleasure of the Prince. 2. He has taken it out of the power of the Parliament, to settle the bounds of this extravagant power: for, what he ascribes, he says, never was taken from the Crown, nor can be; because, forsooth, 'tis the ancient remains of the sovereign power and prerogative of the Kings of Eng- land. Wherein by the way, there is an implication contrary to what he would infer; for this implies, that 'tis but the remains of a power diminish'd and impair'd. 3. His printed and parol resolutions are not only very different, as is obvious by the comparison, but very contrary: Account, p. 623.
 One says, 'tis a dark learning; the other, the case is as clear as ever came before the Court.

Thirdly, Tho' his insincerity is sufficiently evident from every part of his defence, yet it may not be unprofitable for the publick, that he should be follow'd to those instances in which he glories; for which, 'tis not enough for him to shew some one Act wherein he is singular, if he follows the multitude to sin in others, even of the same kind; which if he does, he can no more acquit himself of Perjury and breach of Trust, Account, p. 616. than the rest of the tainted herd.

In matters of blood, Account, p. 621. he affects the reputation of great tenderness, and thinks he has been scrupulous even to a fault. For, says he, in some cases upon Statutes, that had been adjudg'd Felony by wiser and better Judges than myself, and it was highly for the King's service that it should be so, yet I would never give judgment of death, because I could not satisfy my conscience, that those Statutes were now in force. It is a fault, it seems, not to give judgment against his conscience, when the narrow inter-rest of the Court exacts it, and other Judges, influenc'd from thence, would countenance it: But we may observe, that those Statutes concerning Soldiers, of which he is to be understood, not only give no warrant for such judgment, as is obvious to the meanest capacity; but if they could admit of any question, the unbiass'd Judgment of the then Recorder of London, Sir John Holt, ought to outweigh the whole Bench.

But I wish our Chief-Justice could as well acquit himself in the case of Lord Brandon. The father's heroic merits of the Crown, too great to be rewarded; and the son's hereditary valour, dangerous to those who had reason to fear brave spirits, occasioned the rigorous prosecution of both. The father

father was obliged to change his soil, till it might become more equal, not unmindful of our Saviour's advice, or rather precept, When persecuted in one Country, to flee into another; that tho' he contemned Death, he might not provoke it. The son falling into their hands, both his life and honour, which the severest trials approved to be most valu'd by him, were designed for a sacrifice. In subserviency to which, our Chief Justice directed the willing Jury to find him guilty of high-treason, chiefly upon a suppos'd conspiracy to seize the Castle of Chester; which, if true, were but felony by a Statute*, as to that part, yet in force, and so could be no evidence of treason. Nor would he suffer the fact to be found specially, tho' he pretended not to answer the Cases and Records, which were cited to shew, that the matter alledged could not be treason: nor did the then Solicitor undertake the task, notwithstanding that shew of reasoning, with which he labour'd to set aside the authority of Lord Coke†, pleading expressly and unanswerably for that injur'd Hero, (of whom the Age was not worthy) the Lord Russel.

Nor was the proof in Lord Brandon's case less defective than the matter; for besides the scandalous Sexton, who swore to designs against another King, there was but one witness in the eye of the law: he indeed is so far legal, as that he might be heard, being an Approver‡; but no way credible, considering how far he had been drawn with his fetters about his heels, even to  contradict himself. The other by no means legal, being under an outlawry for high-treason, unrevers'd: For though the execution of that Judgment (for so in law it is) was pardoned by the King, yet the crime was by no means purged, to set him right as to fame; which tho' the Counsel offered to make good, they were not suffered to speak to it: and yet the point is very †† clear by ancient authorities, and confirmed by later, without any thing really to the contrary. Nay, farther, tho' besides all these things, another matter was urged in arrest of Judgment, upon which Judgment had ††† formerly been arrested; yet, without enquiring whether the fact were true, or the Book law, that, with the rest, was over-ruled, to come at the life of a person obnoxious to the Government, as some called themselves. Such was Sir Edward's great scrupulousness and tenderness where the life of man was concerned.

He adds a scruple in a case before himself, and the other usurpers of the high-commission Court; but his singularity therein, can be no excuse for his acting at all upon a commission apparently against the Statute; which took away not only the power of fining and imprisoning, which that Court illegally pretended to, but the spiritual authority which it really had: and such a commission it was, as never received countenance till the Act long since repealed; which not only made H. VIII. Head of the Church, but gave him power, which he afterwards delegated to Lord Cromwel, (v. 31 H. 8. c. 10.) to redress all errors, heresies and abuses, by spiritual authority.

VOL. VII.

Fourthly, I suppose it is by this time pretty evident, that Sir Edward's crime will admit of no extenuation; but the aggravations are many, it appearing,

1. That he (Acc. p. 623.) and his brethren were the inventors of this dispensing Power, in such extent as he contends for in the Print; but much more in his real resolution.

2. That the error (V. ib.) was an error in that single case, but of large and mischievous consequences: and if the King could dispense with that Statute, upon the reasons given, and circumstances appearing in Sir Edw. Hales's case, others may well conclude from thence, that therefore he has a power to dispense with all other Statutes, even such as confer or vest in any of the subjects any manner of interest whatsoever, in their lives, liberties, and estates, Acc. p. 623. And there being a conviction, and consequently a disability actually incurred before the dispensation, therefore by reason of this case, the King may dispense with such Statutes where a precedent disability is actually laid upon a man, as there is upon the members of both Houses, till they have taken the oaths and tests prescribed. These are not consequences which may flow from the heated imaginations of angry men, but such as have warrant and foundation from their Judgment.

3. His so far undervaluing the wisdom of the Nation, as to make the benefit of a law against the undue continuance of Sheriffs, equal, nay, go beyond what they could devise for the security of their religion; or rather, so to undervalue the holy religion, which I think he yet professes, when however it would not come up to the point, according to the differences which himself receives Acc. p. 618. speaking of the Statute 23 H. 6. c. 1. he says, The recital in the preamble, and the whole purview, if compared with our Statute of 25 Car. 2. c. 2. equals it in every particular; and in some goes beyond it: For the mischiefs recited in this latter Statute, are only in these words, "For preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, and quieting the minds of his Majesty's good subjects:" The other, "For preventing the importable damage of the King and his People, by perjury, manslaughter, and great oppression." Then he goes on to the purview, expresses against non obstante's, and creating a disability: but, according to his usual haste, he stays not here to make the comparison, but hastens to his sham resolution, as has been sufficiently evinced already.

already. The questions here will be, 1. Whether the mischiefs intended to be prevented are equal in both? 2. Admit they were equal in degree, whether they are in extent? which if they are not, still the resolution, if real, will fail him; according to the difference which he himself receives, of pro bono populi complicati, and singulorum populi.

1. For the first, I suppose he thinks the Epithet importable, gives the odds; as if Popery wanted an Epithet to represent it to Protestants, for what they ought to do their utmost to prevent; as if it did not carry in the belly of it, perjuries, man-slaughters, and great oppressions, by whole-sale; or that mischiefs more remote and accidental, as the continuance of Sheriffs, may habituate to corruption, and that occasion the other fatal train; could equal the more immediate and certain consequences, unless by good laws prevented, of French conversions, proceeding from fix'd principles. But then to give Judgment to frustrate this necessary law, at a time when the Papists had a King of their own superstition to head them, is to make the King as much above the law as our ancient lawyers tell us, the Law and his Court by way of eminence, that is, the great Council, or Parliament, are above him*.

2. As this proves the interest of the subject in the law about Sheriffs, to be neither equal, nor so immediate as in our Statute, there needs not many words to shew the difference of the extent: The peace only of particular Counties, and that by small insensible degrees, is there concerned. Nay, admit the King had this power, and should so violate that trust which Sir Edward will have to be reposed in him, (Acc. p. 620.) as to extend it to all Counties, where he puts in the Sheriffs, yet this could not affect all the People; because there might be a retreat to London, Middlesex, and Westmorland; in neither of which has it been pretended that the King had such a power, till the late violence of some, and treachery of others, gave that unhappy inlet of perjury, manslaughter, I may say murder and oppression; before which, London was a perfect Goshen in an Egyptian Kingdom.

4. But what can excuse our Chief-Justice's so apparent falsifying both Records and Law-books? or if not, at least, his shameful negligence in not going to the fountain-heads, but setting up the recitals of cases against the cases themselves; and the extrajudicial opinions or arguments of Judges, nay, the very annotations of Reporters, foreign to any matter in question, against solemn resolutions; which either wilful falsifications, or criminal negligence, has occasioned the answering objections with a case which never had a resolution, but what he and his brethren gave, when it was brought in by head and shoulders, only to be a leading case to this.

5. He could not but know, that the case was faintly argued against Sir Edward Hales; either he, or the late Empson and Dudley, having given the fees on both sides: wherefore 'twas comical for the Chief-Justice to say, that the Case appeared clear upon the argument. I am sure he is inexcusable, that when causes of less consequence, and of less dark learning, used to be argued twice at least; this was but once: And the learned Mr. Wallop, who could have set it in the truest light, was refused to be heard to it, tho' he required it.

6. Our Chief-Justice might easily have found, that the beginning of non obstante's was within time of memory, which would not be enough to entitle the King to a prerogative: For as 'tis in Plowden, every prerogative contains a prescription, for it rests in usage†; that is, such as are not derived from known Grants of the People. And he might have learnt from that great man, whom he would fain draw to his side, That Precedents are useful to decide Questions; but in such Cases as these, which depend upon fundamental principles, from which demonstrations may be drawn, millions of Precedents are to no purpose‡.

Time of legal memory is well known to extend to the Reign of R. 1. || And tho' non obstante's, as I observed above, are complained of within that time, as early as 35 H. 3. yet that diligent and faithful searcher into antiquity, Mr. Prynne, shews, That they were then made use of, only to revoke some indiscreet grants or privileges, but not to elude, subvert, or dispense with any penal Laws, or Acts of Parliament, till they were introduced by religious persons, after the Statute of Mortmain, 7 E. 1. to elude and frustrate the Act. And if this be true, I am sure thus far there is no colour for the late resolution; for they might have seen in Lord Vaughan, f. 356. that the King in that case dispenses only with his own right, and concludes not the mean Lords.

Tho' successive resolutions of Judges are but evidences of the law, and such as are to be examined and rectified by the constitution and fundamental maxims of the inherent rights and liberties of a freeborn People; yet if Sir Edward had had the diligence to read what might have occurred on this subject, or the honesty to hear it from others, he might have known, that it is far from being a settled point, that the King might dispense with particular persons, as to whatever is not prohibited by the law of God; and that his dispensation makes the thing prohibited lawful to be done by him that has it. The farther we look back since this power has come in question, the less does it seem allowed.

Edward III. †† with the assent of that Council, which, as I observ'd before, was chosen in Parliament, had granted to merchants denizens, for a time, the same liberty about staple commodities which merchants aliens had: tho' this was not by the King alone, and for the benefit of natives, yet the merchants fearing that they might be impeached in time to come for their merchandize which they had so passed by virtue of such grants, forasmuch as they were made out of Parliament, for their surety, obtained a ratification and confirmation in Parliament.

But the vexata questio * was about licensing the shipping of wool elsewhere than at Calais: that the King might do this, the pretence was specious. Calais was no part of the antient demesne of the Crown, but a new acquisition, whose interests the King seemed to have more absolutely at his disposal; according to the resolution of our Judges, anno 1667, before the House of Lords, who declared, That tho' the Canaries were the Dominion of the King of Spain †, they were no part of the Dominion of Spain. And if Sir Edward had taken notice of Lord Coke, where he is against, as well as where he seems to favour him, he ought to have observed, 3 Inst. f. 186. that one Lyons, a merchant, and Lord Latimer, were sentenced in Parliament, for procuring of Licences and Dispensations for transporting of wool. And this they laid to the destruction of the staple, and of the money of Calais, to the great damage of the King and Realm ‖. Indeed the year after the Lord Latimer's sentence is remitted at the request of the Commons, alledging that the charge against him was not true, not for defect of matter; 51 E. 3. n. 75. So that here is a Judgment of the House of Lords in point, against one of those very cases; upon which Court-Judges have since founded their distinction of malum prohibitum, and malum in se: Acc. p. 617. And it is an easy thing to know which ought to turn the scale.

After this, 37 H. 6. f. 4. it came to be a question before all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, Whether this offence, being pardoned, (which that the King might do after it was committed, has not been disputed) the pardon, before an information brought, would defeat the informer of his share? There the Court held, that if the suit were the party's, the pardon should not bar him: But the sole question was, Whether the party was entitled to any suit, being the advantage was given to the discoverer, which he might have by a suggestion in the Exchequer, but the Statute gives no action ‡? However this received no determination at that time.

But if the question had then been of a dispensation, and whether that would bar the Informer's action given by Statute, can any man doubt but that they would have adjudged it could not? when, notwithstanding a pardon, and that in a case where an action was not expressly given; yet it was so doubtful, that they would not determine against the Informer. But that the dispensation would not have availed with them; or at least, they would not have look'd upon it to authorize what was prohibited by any Statute, appears from other passages there: as where it is said,  That in a recognizance of the peace, (which is not confined to one entered into at the request of a subject) the King cannot pardon or release, till the peace is broken. And where a man ought to repair a bridge, the King can pardon only for the fine due to himself: But however the party shall be obliged to repair the bridge, because this is to the damage of all the People. And to the same purpose is that 3 H. 7. †† that tho' the King may pardon, or free from a pecuniary mulct before the occasion happen, yet he cannot pardon or discharge the trespass itself: an instance is given in voluntary escapes. So far were they from believing, that the King, in remitting the pecuniary mulct, could make the thing lawful: Nor could this in the least be inferred from the other, because, however, an Act may be made void or tortious. Indeed in the Reign of R. III. (2 R. 3. f. 12.) whose character blemishes the Judgments or his time; it was held by all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, that the King might license the shipping of wool elsewhere than at the staple; yet even they were not of opinion that the licence made the thing lawful, for then the discoverer could not have had his share, which they agreed that he ought to have, and so the licence was only as far as it concerned the King. They also settled the other point, which before was a doubt, ‖ That a pardon before an information brought, would defeat the informer. But then the authority of the first point is suspended by a doubt remaining before all the Judges, afterwards assembled upon a re-hearing of this cause, in a more settled time. Indeed they agreed the other, of an information after a pardon; but hitherto there is no manner of proof of any case, wherein the King by his dispensation could discharge the penalty given not only to himself, but also to an Informer, who has his action given by Statute. But for this we must take a leap downwards, as far as 13 Jac. 1. which we may ballance with the 7th of his Reign, when it is held by Lord Coke, 3 Inst. 154. that where a Statute concerns the benefit of the King alone, he may dispense with it by a non obstante: And by the Court, That where it concerns the benefit of the subject, the King cannot dispense. Roll's Ab. tit. Prer. f. 179.

VOL. VII.

7. Whereas our Chief-Justice thinks, that a Statute's providing against non obstante's, shews that the King could otherwise have dispensed with the Act by a non obstante, Acc. p. 618. it is not only unconvincing, because it might be no more than an argument of an abuse of the law; but turns very strong against him: For, admit the resolution of the Judges, 2 H. 7. were as he contends, yet he, who makes so much of a concession of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, Acc. p. 621. when he thinks it of his side, ought surely to yield, that the Judgment of King, Lords and Commons, is of uncontrollable authority. Wherefore, when not only one, but several Parliaments provide, that all non obstante's shall be void, is it not plain that their Judgment was, that such non obstante's could not be set up by any resolution of Judges? And for this we have the Judgment of King, Lords and Commons, and that of but late days, That even where a Grant is made to the King, where 'twill be said he is solely entrusted for the publick good, yet it may be out of his power to defeat it by a non obstante. This appears by the Statute 19 Car. 2. c. 8. †† which provides, That no Letters Patent granted to any person, of exemptions from subsidies, &c. shall free them from the charges of any sum granted by that Act: And all non obstante's in Letters Patent, made, or to be made in bar of any Act or Acts of Parliament, for the supply or assistance of his Majesty, are thereby declared to be void and of none effect.

And even where Statutes have not expressly provided against non obstante's, tho' the Statutes were such as restrain what many take to be the King's prerogative; yet if we receive the sense of Lords and Commons, the King has no prerogative warranting non obstante's to them, as appears by the articles against King Richard the second*; one of which is, For that the King, contrary to the Laws and Wills of the Justices, suffered Sheriffs to continue longer than one Year, &c.

This were enough to set aside all pretences taken from Calvin's case, tho', as Sir Edward Herbert pleasantly suggests, Acc. p. 619. it were resolved there, That that was resolved 2 H. 7. which was never mentioned till after the resolution. Here is the authority of Lords and Commons in competition with that of mercenary Judges: And, (Acc. p. 621.) if the concessions of the Commons, alone assembled in Parliament, are of weight with him, I know not why their denials ought not as well to be urged against him; which if we may do, not only the fictions and loose reasonings in Calvin's case†, but the main resolution there, may be justly called meer Court-law. Such I am sure it is, that the honest House of Commons, 4 Jac. 1. || would not bear it: and any one that reads the arguments of those learned men who managed the conference with the Lords upon the question of the union of the two Kingdoms, may easily see how inexcusable the Judges of that time were, to proceed to the Judgment in Calvin's case, after they had been so enlightened. Nor could they but know, that the then Parliament was broke up; because they were not so complying as the Judges shewed themselves both then and afterwards. But they secured their cushions by it, while Sir John Bennet, father of the present Lord Ossulston, lost his in the Prerogative-Court, and had a swinging fine imposed upon him into the bargain, several years after, upon pretence of extortion; but as I am well informed, the real ground was, his disrelishing speech in Parliament upon this subject. 'Tis well known, some Princes us'd to have good memories that way. Manet alia mente repositum, &c.

8. Non obstante's having no other foundation than in the encroachments of Princes, and servility of Judges, especially if we except cases concerning the King alone; they ought not to be strained to any new case. The advice of Bracton†† will rise up in judgment against such men, who tells them, If such things never happened before, and the Judgment is without light from former Cases, and difficult, let it be adjourn'd to the Great Court. According to which, adjournments to ensuing Parliaments have been frequent in former days, when there were more learned Judges; and that as often for the weightiness of the matter, as intricacy of the points.

9. But for the closing aggravation, Acc. p. 622.

whereas our Chief-Justice denies all indirect means for procuring opinions, and stands upon his innocence, challenging the world to lay any thing of that kind to his charge; I think, by this time, few will the less suspect him, because of his assurance: if either threats or solicitations can be proved upon him, the world will judge either of them indirect means; and I am much mis-inform'd, if both cannot be justly charged.

If after all, he can excuse himself with renouncing infallibility, Acc. p. 623. and making asseverations of keeping to the clear dictates of his conscience, I must say, Judges in former ages have had hard luck, and been made examples to little purpose. King Alfred would lose the reputation of his Justice, in hanging above thirty Judges‡; and Parliaments have been very barbarous to proceed against others as traitors, who yet, either were so ingenuous to confess their faults, or, at least, not so provoking as to justify them.

It is well known in story*, that six Judges, and two of the King's Counsel at law, suffered for treason, upon a Parliamentary prosecution, 11 R. 2. for delivering their opinions, That they were to be punished as traitors, who bindred the King from exercising his Sovereignty and Prerogative over a Statute, and an Ordinance and Commission made in the foregoing Parliament†††. The substance of their crime lay in ascribing to the King a power to defeat the provisions of the Parliament for the safety of the Nation; and is a direct precedent, at which our Judges ought to tremble. Nor can it avail them, that the express words of the Statute 25 E. 3. c. 2. do not condemn them, since that Act transmits common-law treasons to the Judgment of Parliament: and the Statute 1 Mar. c. 1. leaves that power untouched. And who can doubt but such a resolution, and that justified in print, and published to the world, is an overt-act of treason, as it tends to the subverting the fundamental rights of Parliaments: Nor can they have any colour for asking, with the Lord Strafford, Where is the Buoy? when they see so many shipwrecks to admonish them.

Nor ought Sir Edward to wonder at a treason against the Government, tho' not directly against the person of the King, his relatives, officers, or his coin; nor yet an actual levying of war within his Kingdom, or adhering to his enemies‡; for he may find among the Articles against the Lord Kimbolton, and others, exhibited Anno 1641, by his father, then Attorney-General,

"That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the very Rights and Beings of Parliaments."

But since Sir Edward pleads conscience for what he did, Acc. p. 623. and might have urged the authority of spiritual guides, who would make the scripture-notion of higher powers a sufficient warrant for such a Judgment; I shall conclude with the good Queen Elizabeth's doctrine of the famous Bilson, afterwards Bishop of Winchester ††.

" By superior powers ordain'd of God, we understand not only Princes, but all politick States and Regimens; some where the People, some where the Nobles have the same interest to the sword that Princes have in their Kingdoms:

XL. The Proceedings against Mr. SAMUEL JOHNSON; who was tried at the King's-Bench Bar, Westminster, for High-Misdemeanours; (and found guilty of writing and publishing two seditious and scandalous Libels against the Government;) on Monday the 21st of June, 1686. 2 Jac. II.

SAMUEL JOHNSON having been arraigned upon an Information for high misdemeanours, in writing, printing and publishing two scandalous and seditious Libels, &c. and thereto pleading Not guilty, was, by a rule of Court, brought again to the Court of King's-Bench, Westminster, on Monday, June the 21st, in order to take his trial: when, a Jury of Knights and Gentlemen of the County of Surry being sworn, the Information was read; the substance of which was, " That he, the Prisoner, had, in the Parish of St. George's, Southwark, on the 25th of May, in the second year of his Majesty's reign, maliciously and designedly published, two pernicious, scandalous and seditious libels, to raise and stir up sedition and rebellion in his Majesty's liege-subjects, &c." The title of one being, An humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in this present Army. Which is as follows.

An Humble and Hearty Address to all the English Protestants in this present Army.

Gentlemen,

NEXT to the duty which we owe to God, which ought to be the principal care of men of your profession especially, because you carry your lives in your hands, and often look death in the face: the second thing that deserves your consideration, is the service of your native Country, wherein you drew your first breath, and breathed a free English air. Now I would desire you to consider, how well you comply with these two main points, by engaging in this present service.

Is it in the name of God, and for his service, that you have joined yourselves with Papists; who will indeed fight for the mass-book, but burn the bible: and who seek to extirpate the Protestant Religion with your swords, because they cannot do it with their own? And will you be aiding and assisting to set up mass-houses, to erect that popish Kingdom of darkness and desolation amongst us, and to train up all our children in Popery? How can you do these things, and yet call yourselves Protestants.

And then what service can be done your Country by being under the command of French and Irish Papists, and by bringing the Nation under a foreign yoke? Will you help them to make forcible entry into the houses of your countrymen, under the name of Quartering, directly contrary to Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right? Will you be aiding and assisting to all the murders and outrages which they shall commit by their void commissions? which were declared illegal, and sufficiently blasted by both Houses of Parliament (if there had been any need of it) for it was very well known before, that a Papist cannot have a commission, but by the law is utterly disabled and disarmed. Will you exchange your birth-right of English laws and liberties for martial, or club-law; and help to destroy all others, only to be eaten last yourselves? If I know you well, as you are Englishmen, you hate and scorn these things. And therefore be not unequally yoked with idolatrous and bloody Papists: Be valiant for the truth, and shew yourselves men.

The same considerations are likewise humbly offered to all the English seamen, who have been the bulwark of this Nation against Popery and Slavery, ever since Eighty-Eight.

And the other, viz. The Opinion is this, That Resistance may be used, in case our Religion and Rights should be invaded: " Tending to withdraw them from their duty and allegiance, and to excite and stir up the soldiers, &c. to mutiny and rebellion, &c." After this, the Information was, by the King's Counsel, opened to the Jury, as to the nature and circumstances, together with the evil consequences that might attend such bold and dangerous attempts: which being rendered largely and exact-

* Glanvil. Prel. Bracon; v. l. 3. c. 9. Fleta, lib. 1. c. 17. Fortescue, c. 9. Mir p. 9.

† This is printed in Mr. Johnson's Works, p. 159, to 166. which being too long to insert here, the Reader is referred to it, exactly, as to the particulars mentioned in the said Information, wherewith the Prisoner was charged, they proceeded to call their witnesses to prove the fact.

And First, Mr. Belamy, at the Three Brufbes in Southwark, being sworn, gave evidence, That coming acquainted some time since with the Prisoner; and about a fortnight before Whitsuntide last, discoursing with him, the second of these Libels was mentioned: And soon after he sent him a box with some rheams of them in it, to be dispersed, and gave him notice, that he had a second Paper in the Press; and withal, a caution not to publish those he had sent before, till he had received that which proved to be the former Libel before-mentioned. And further, that about six or eight months before that, the Prisoner had sent him other Libels to disperse: and being shewed the Libels mentioned in the Information, he deposed they were the same that had been sent him. His man likewise gave evidence, That he had received a box nailed up, but could give no account of what was in it, as to particulars.

Ann Whitney, sometime servant to the Prisoner, being sworn, gave evidence, That by her master's or mistress's direction, she was not certain which, she took a porter, and caused him to carry a box, wherein one of the Libels mentioned, viz. the second, was inclosed to Mr. Belamy: And that she had, by the like order, carried other papers loose; some of which were the Address, &c. And being asked by the Prisoner, how she knew that? her reply was, That she knew it, inasmuch that she had read the title, and very well remembered it.

The Porter that carried the box gave evidence, That the maid had hired him to carry a box to the Three Brufbes, and that she went with him, and paid him according to agreement, and that he took it up in Spittle-fields. After this, the messenger who searched the Prisoner's lodging with the Right Honourable the Earl of Sunderland's warrant, being sworn, gave evidence, That he found a Paper in writing, upon a table or shelf, which appeared in Court to be part of the copy, or the same with the paper, entitled The Opinion, &c. he swearing, upon sight thereof, that it was the same he found in the Prisoner's lodging. Then was the Book of the Vestry, or Parish affairs of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, produced; wherein the Prisoner sometime past, had given an acquittance for money received, as an assistant curate, &c. which being compared with the paper, seemed not to differ in the hand. But no other evidence appeared in that case, than that the Book had been always kept in the vestry, and for the most part under lock and key, and it being put to the prisoner, he did not greatly deny it. When, for a further confirmation, John Darby, a printer, and his wife, were sworn: The former deposing, That he had printed a book for the prisoner from the manuscript, and that hand was very like that of the libel produced in Court: but he had never seen him write, and therefore could not be positive that that manuscript was his own hand.

As for his wife, her evidence was, that the prisoner paying her some money, she had given him an acquittance; but that, as she conceived, he wrote all but her name; for going up stairs, he soon returned with an acquittance, which she subscribed.

This being what materially was given in evidence for the King, the Prisoner had leave to make his defence: who, after some discourse, alledged, That he had been confined, and had not had opportunity to prepare for his defence, as not having leave to go to his Counsel. To which the Court replied, That he had leave upon the motion made on his behalf, to send for Counsel; and that they ought not to be refused coming to him. Then he urged several other matters, which being over-ruled by the Court, he proceeded to intimate, that he hoped, that seeing he was indicted for a seditious and scandalous Libel, &c. the Jury would consider whether those papers they had heard read, were so or no: But was told, that the Jury ought to consider it only, as to the matter of fact, whether he was guilty of writing or publishing them, &c. and that the rest lay in the breast of the Court to consider. Thereupon he urged, that though they might be sent, yet it was no publication, as it was laid in the indictment, because the box was nailed. But being fully answered in that point, and loose papers appearing likewise to be sent, the Counsel for the King summed up their evidence to the Jury, none appearing on the behalf of the prisoner.

After which, the Court gave the charge, putting the Prisoner, as well as the Jury, in mind of the great mischief that such libels might occasion: And minded him likewise, that it was within a small matter of high-treason; and might have been raised to that degree, were not the laws, and those who managed them, tender of life, &c.

After the charge was given, the Jury withdrew; and returning within a quarter of an hour, brought in the Prisoner guilty of the high misdemeanour.

Nov. 16, following, Mr. Johnson's sentence was pronounced by Sir Francis Withins, as follows; To pay 500 marks to the King, and to lie in prison till it was paid; to stand three times in the pillory, on the Monday following, in the Palace-yard, Westminster; on Wednesday, at Charing-Cross; and the Monday after at the Royal-Exchange; and to be whipt by the common Hangman from Newgate to *Tyburn.

After Sentence was past upon him, in order to load him with the greater ignominy, the Courtiers, on pretence of respect to the Church, moved, that before execution of the sentence, he should be degraded from the order of priesthood. This ought to have been done, according to the Canons, by his own Diocesan, the Bishop of London; but that Prelate was then under a suspension himself, because he would not obey the King's Orders to suspend Dr. Sbarr, now Archbishop of York, for preaching against Popery in his own Parish Church of St. Giles's in the Fields. Dr. Crew, Bishop of Durham; Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rockester, and Dr. White, Bishop of Peterborough; being then Commissioners for the diocese of London, in the place of the suspended Bishop,

* Mr. Johnson, 1683, was tried on an Information in the King's-Bench, for writing Julian the Apostate, and fined 500 marks, and committed Prisoner to the King's-Bench, till he should pay it; which they knew was the same with perpetual imprisonment, since he was not able to pay that sum. Thus he was condemned and committed, to the great Joy of the Papists; when in him they saw the Laws of England condemned by the Judges, who study'd more to oblige the Court than to do their duty. See some Memoirs of Mr. S. Johnson, p. 7. in his Works.

Bishop, were appointed to degrade Mr. Johnson; which they performed in the Chapter-house of St. Paul's, where Dr. Sherlock and other Clergymen attended: but Dr. Stillingfleet, then Dean of St. Paul's, refused to have any hand in it.

When they came to the formality of putting a Bible in his hand, and taking it from him again, he was much affected, and parted with it with difficulty, kissing it, and saying with tears, that they could not however deprive him of the use and benefit of that sacred Depositum. It happened that they were guilty of an omission, in not stripping him of his cassock; which, as slight a particular as it might seem render'd his degradation imperfect, and afterwards saved him his benefice.

On the 1st of December, 1686, the sentence was put in execution; which Mr. Johnson endured with as firm a courage, and as christian a behaviour as ever was discover'd on any such occasion: tho' at the same time he had a quick sense of every stripe which was given him, with a whip of nine cords knotted, to the number of 317.

In the first Parliament after the Revolution, when the House of Commons was preparing an Act of Indemnity, Mr. Johnson was advised by his friends to get a clause put into it, that he might have his remedy at law against such as had been his illegal oppressors. They seemed to be sensible that they were obnoxious, and could not justify what they had done. About that time the Lord Bishop of Durham gave Mr. Johnson and his lawyer a meeting, and made his peace with him, to their mutual satisfaction.

Sir Francis Witbins, who pronounced the Sentence against him, sent a relation of Mrs. Johnson's to tell him a feign'd story, that Sir Francis lay dangerously ill, and could not die in peace, unless Mr. Johnson would forgive him: To which he reply'd, That he heartily forgave him what injury he had done to him. Some few days after, the same person brought Sir Francis to Mr. Johnson, as he was walking in Westminster-hall; where Sir Francis saluted him, and told him, That his Christian and kind answer had prov'd a reviving Cordial to him. To which Mr. Johnson reply'd, That he heartily forgave the injury done to himself; but as he had been an enemy to his Country, he hoped he would be made accountable for it: it being a common saying with him, That he was obliged to forgive his own enemies, but not the enemies of his Country.

The Parliament taking Mr. Johnson's case into consideration, resolv'd, June 11, 1689. That the Judgment given against him in the King's-Bench, upon an information for a misdemeanor, was cruel and illegal.

A Committee was at the same time appointed to bring in a bill for reversing that Judgment: and being also ordered to enquire how Mr. Johnson came to be degraded, and by what authority it was done; Mr. Cbristy, the chairman, some days after, reported his case to this purpose:

"That in Trinity-Term, 1686, an information was exhibited against Mr. Johnson, in the name of Sir Robert Sawyer, Attorney-General, for writing and publishing a scandalous and seditious Libel, intitled, An humble and hearty Address, &c. That the same Term they forced him to plead, got a Jury to find him guilty, and Sir Francis Witbins pronounced the following Sentence upon him: To pay five hundred marks to the King, and to lie in prison till 'twas paid: To stand thrice in the pillory, in the Palace-yard, at Charing-cross, and at the Old-Exchange: and to be whipt by the Common Hangman from Newgate to Tyburn. That the Judges then in Court, were the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert, Sir Francis Witbins, Sir Robert Wright, and Sir Richard Holloway. That apprehending 'twould be a scandal to the Clergy to have so infamous a punishment inflicted on a Minister, they desired Mr. Johnson might be first degraded: in order to which, being a prisoner in the King's-Bench, in the diocese of the Bishop of Winchester, he was summoned to appear the 20th of November, in the convocation-house of St. Paul's, in the diocese of London, his Living being within that diocese, and brought thither by Habeas Corpus: where he found the Bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, Commissioners to exercise the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, during his suspension; with some Clergymen, and many Spectators. A Libel was exhibited against him, charging him with great mis-behaviours, tho' none were specified or proved. That Mr. Johnson demanded a copy of the Libel, and an advocate, both which the Bishops denied, and immediately proceeded to sentence, That he should be declar'd an infamous person, that he should be deprived of his Rectory, that he should be a meer Layman, and no Clerk, and be deprived of all right and privilege of Priesthood; that he should be degraded thereof, and of all vestments and habits of Priesthood. Against which proceedings Mr. Johnson protested, as being against law, and the 132d Canon; not being done by his own Diocesan. But his protestation was refused, as was also his appeal to the King in Chancery.

"After which, they proceeded to degrade him, by putting a square cap on his head, and then taking it off: by pulling off his gown and girdle, which he demanded as his proper goods, bought with his money, which they promised to send him, but he could not get them till he paid twenty shillings. Then they put a bible into his hands, which he not parting with readily, they took it from him by force. That on the 22d of November, the Judgment in the King's-Bench began to be executed with great rigour and cruelty: that Mr. Rouse, the Under-Sheriff, tore off his cassock on the pillory, and put a frize coat upon him: that he was whipp'd with a whip of nine cords, knotted, which was strewed to the committee. That Mrs. Johnson had also an Information exhibited against her, for the like matter as that against her husband.

"On all which, the Committee came to the following resolutions; which, on the report, were all agreed to by the House; That the Judgment against Mr. Johnson was illegal and cruel: That the Ecclesiastical Commission was illegal, and consequently the suspension of the Bishop of London, and the authority committed to the three Bishops, null and illegal. That Mr. Johnson not being degraded by his own Diocesan, if he had deserv'd it, was illegal: That a Bill be brought in, to reverse the Judgment, and to declare all the proceedings before the three Bishops null and illegal. And that an Address be made to his Majesty, to recommend Mr. Johnson to some ecclesiastical Preferment, suitable to his services and sufferings.

The House likewise ordered, That in the said bill the proceedings upon the Ecclesiastical Commission should be declared void.

The House presented two Addresses to the King in behalf of Mr. Johnson: But tho' his Majesty was inclinable enough to have complied with their request, Mr. Johnson could never obtain any Church-Preferment. Mr. Johnson however, being a man of such merit, did not pass altogether without a reward; for the King gave him three hundred pounds a year out of the Post-office, for his and his son's life; besides a thousand pounds in money, and likewise bestowed a place of about a hundred pounds a year on his son.

XLI. The Trial of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, Gent. (for murdering of Sir Charles Pymm, Bart.) at the Sessions held at the Old-Bailey, on Friday the first day of June, 1688. before the Right Honourable Sir John Shorter, Knt, Lord-Mayor of the City of London, and Sir Bartholomew Shower, Knt. Recorder of the same City; together with others his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the City of London, and County of Middlesex.

Clerk.  RYER, make proclamation.

Cryer. Oyes, Oyes, Oyes.

Clerk. Keeper of Newgate, bring the prisoners to the Bar. Which was done.

Clerk. You the prisoners at the Bar, those men whom you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to try between our sovereign Lord the King, and you who are arraigned, upon your several lives and death: if you shall except against any one of them, you must speak before they be sworn.

Clerk. Cryer, call Henry Dyer.

The Jurors sworn are as followeth:

Henry Dyer,	William Villiers,
Giles Baggs,	John Frith,
Matthew Ferman,	John Hill,
Timothy Waldoe,	Obadiab Hickman,
Richard Cbuse,	John Read,
Samuel Burgefs,	Francis Willis.

Who were all sworn.

Clerk. Cryer, count these, twelve good men and true.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation. Which was done.

Clerk. You Gentlemen of the Jury, look upon the prisoners at the bar, and hearken to their charge; they stand indicted by the names of Rowland Walters, Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, Gents. for that they not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being instigated and seduced by the Devil, and their own wicked Hearts, on the fourth Day of May, in the fourth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord King James II. in the Parish of St. Nicholas Cole-Abby, in and upon Sir Charles Pymm, Bart. feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice fore-thought, did make an assault; and that he the said Rowland Walters, having then and there in his right-hand, a certain Rapier made of iron and steel, of the value of about 5s. and him the said Sir Charles Pymm in and upon the right side of him the said Sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, did strike and thrust as aforesaid; giving him the said Sir Charles Pymm, a little above the right pap, one mortal wound of the breadth of one inch, of the depth of ten inches: and that they the said Dearing Bradshaw, and Ambrose Cave, were present, aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Rowland Walters, in the perpetration of the said wilful murder of him the said Sir Charles Pymm. So that they three, the prisoners at the bar, with malice fore-thought, did intentionally kill and destroy, and wilfully murder him the said Sir Charles Pymm, against the peace of our sovereign Lord the King, his Crown, and Dignity, and against the form of the Statute in that case made and provided. Upon this Indictment they have been arraigned, and have hereunto pleaded Not Guilty, and for their Trial, have put themselves upon God and their Country, which Country you are. Your business is to enquire, whether they or either of them committed this felony and murder as aforesaid; if you find them or either of them, guilty of the said wilful murder, you are to enquire what goods and chattels they, or either of them, had at the time of the committing of the said wilful murder; but if you find them not guilty, you are to say so; and bear your evidence.

Mr. Walters. My Lord, I humbly desire these Gentlemen may be tried before me.

Court. That cannot be, Mr. Walters, because you are all three put into one Indictment.

Counsel for the King. My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am here retained a Counsel for the King, against the prisoners at the bar, who all three stand indicted for the murder of Sir Charles Pymm, Bart. in the Parish of St. Nicholas Cole-Abby, thrusting him through the body near the right pap, giving him a mortal wound, of which he then and there instantly died. The other two prisoners stand in-indicted for aiding, abetting, and assisting him the said Walters in the said murder.

Another Council for the King. My Lords, this Murder fell out on the fourth day of May last, after this manner, viz. The said Sir Charles Pymm, one Mr. Mirriday, Mr. Neale, and Sir Thomas Middleton, and others, dined at the Swan-Tavern upon Fish-street-bill; after they were come into the house they went up stairs, after which the Prisoners at the bar came into the house, and took another room to dine of beef and other things. But one of Sir Charles's company desired to have a plate of it; upon which Mr. Cloudsley told them some Gentlemen had bespoke it for dinner, but he said he would get them a plate of it, which was sent up, and ordered to be reckoned into Mr. Walters the prisoner's bill. After dinner they drank their healths, and returned them thanks for their beef; and towards the evening Sir Charles Pymm and his friends came down stairs, and met the prisoners at the bottom, and Mr. Cave asked them how they liked the beef that was sent up? upon which one in the company answered, and told them, they did not send it, for they had paid for it. Upon which farther words arose, and Mr. Bradshaw drew his sword, and fell upon Sir Charles Pymm; but he got out into the street. After which Mr. Walters came forth, and plucked Sir Charles Pymm by the arms, and forced him to fight with him, saying, here is my hand, and here is my sword; and as soon as he was in the street, he received this mortal wound, and so fell down dead. After this, Mr. Walters took him by the nape of the neck, and dash'd his head upon the ground, and cried out, God damn you, you are dead: and said farther, let the sword alone in his body. My Lords, this shall be proved to be done, without any manner of provocation; and if so, I hope you, Gentlemen of the Jury, will find him guilty of wilful murder.

Clerk. Call Mr. Mirriday, Mr. Neale, Mr. Palms, and Mr. Bridges: who were sworn.

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, on the fourth day of May last, on a Friday, Sir Charles Pymm, myself, and these Gentlemen here in Court, came to dine at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fish-street. We asked for meat, and Mr. Cloudsley, the man of the house, told us, we might have fish, for he had no meat, but what was bespoke by Mr. Walters and his company. We desired him to help us to a plate of it, if it might be got, which we had brought up stairs; after dinner we drank the Gentlemen's health that sent it, and returned them thanks for it. A while after Sir Thomas Middleton went away, and about an hour after that, or thereabouts, Sir Charles Pymm and the rest of us came down to go away; and when we were in the entry, Mr. Cave met us, and asked Sir Charles how he liked the beef that was sent up; who answered, we did not know you sent it, for we have paid for it. Then the boy that kept the bar told us, that he did not reckon it in the bill; upon which Mr. Cave seemed to take it ill. But, my Lord, I cannot be positive whether Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Palms were at any words. Then I took Mr. Cave to one side into the entry, and he thought that I had a mind to fight him, but I did what I could to make an end of the quarrel. [Upon which, the Court highly commended Mr. Mirriday.]

Court. This was in the entry, but where was Sir Charles Pymm?

Mr. Mirriday. He was then in the entry.

VOL. VII.

Court. Where was Mr. Walters?

Mr. Mirriday. He was at the door, my Lord; but I cannot swear positively to any particular passage as to the murder; but Mr. Walters called Sir Charles Pymm rogue, and gave him very ill words, and I saw him take him by the neck, and forced his head downwards, and said, God damn him, he is dead, to the best of my remembrance, my Lord. Then, I took Sir Charles up in my arms, and pulled the sword out of his body, and then Mr. Walters said, God damn him, let it stay in his guts, or in his body, or words to that effect.

Court. Was Mr. Cave or Mr. Bradshaw at the place where Sir Charles fell?

Mr. Mirriday. No, my Lord, they were in the entry scuffling there.

Court. What came of Mr. Walters afterwards?

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, he stay'd a little till I had pulled the sword out of his body, then he ran away.

Court. Did they draw their swords in the entry?

Mr. Mirriday. I cannot tell that?

Court. Did you see them draw their swords?

Mr. Mirriday. I cannot say Sir Charles Pymm's sword was drawn, but I saw Mr. Walters draw his sword in the street.

Court. Do you know whether Mr. Walters was wounded or no?

Mr. Mirriday. I do not know that, for I did not see the wound given.

Court. Mr. Walters, will you ask him any questions?

Mr. Walters. Yes, my Lord: Mr. Mirriday, what did you say to Sir Charles Pymm in the Fishmonger's shop? Did you not say, go, and fight him, and I will be your Second?

Mr. Mirriday. My Lord, I do not remember one word of that?

Court. Mr. Mirriday, were you in any Fishmonger's shop?

Mr. Mirriday. Yes, my Lord, I was there; but I do not remember one word between Mr. Walters and Sir Charles, and, as I hope for salvation, I said no such thing; and that's all I have to say.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Neale.

Mr. Neale. My Lord, I went and met with these Gentlemen that dined with us at the aforesaid Tavern, and we had fish and two beef marrow-bones, and a plate of beef for dinner; and when we came down to go away, these Gentlemen met us, and said, God damn you, how did you like the beef? which raised a quarrel among us; but immediately, after I thought it was all over, I saw Mr. Walters run Sir Charles Pymm thorough.

Court. Was his sword drawn?

Mr. Neale. Yes, both of their swords were drawn?

Court. Where was Mr. Bradshaw?

Mr. Neale. I cannot tell where he was directly: but, my Lord, I heard Sir Charles Pymm say nothing to Mr. Walters.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Palms.

Mr. Palms. My Lord, after the reckoning was paid, we came down stairs, and called for a coach, and because it rained, there was none to be had; and these Gentlemen followed us into the entry, and so words to the same purpose as aforesaid passed between them; after which, I met Mr. Bradshaw, and we fell out in the Fishmonger's shop.

Court. Who began?

Mr. Palms. I know not, I cannot remember that.

Q o o o

Court.

Court. Were you not in drink?

Mr. Palms. My Lord, we drank nine or ten bottles among six of us; after which Mr. Bradshaw and I drew our swords, and then Mr. Mirriday came and took him away from me into the entry, and in the mean time, while we were talking in the entry, the business was done.

Court. Were your swords put up again?

Palms. I had put up mine.

Council for the King. Did you take notice of what passed between Mr. Walters and Sir Charles Pymm?

Mr. Palms. I heard nothing of high words.

Court. Yes, yes, it was all about the beef.

Clerk. Cryer, call for Mr. Prestland, the Bar-keeper.

Prestland. My Lord, I made the bill for the reckoning.

Court. Did you put the beef into the bill?

Prestland. No, I did not; when they came down stairs, the coach was fetch'd for them, viz. for Sir Charles Pymm and his company, and the reckoning was paid. When Sir Charles Pymm and the rest of his company came down into the entry, Mr. Walters came out of the room, &c. and I heard them argue about their dinner, and they came to me, and asked me what was to pay for beef, and I told them nothing.

Court. Did you see the man killed?

Prestland. My Lord, I did not see him killed, not I.

Court. Who was it that quarrelled with the coachman?

Prestland. My Lord, Mr. Neale quarrelled with the Coachman about his staying; the Coachman refused going with him, because his Horses were hot.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Brummidge.

Mr. Brummidge. My Lord, between eleven and twelve a-clock in the morning on the fourth of May last, Sir Charles Pymm came to Mr. Cloudsley's door in a coach, and asked him what he might have for dinner; who told him that he might have a mullet and some smelts, and I sold a mullet to Mr. Cloudsley: so Sir Charles went to the Exchange, and I saw no more of him till I saw him kill'd. While I was in the house, came in one Mr. Allen and others, to enquire for Sir Charles Pymm, and Mr. Cloudsley told them, that he had bespoke a dinner, and was gone to the Exchange, viz. a mullet and some smelts; but one of the Gentlemen desired a bit of the beef that was at the fire, so Mr. Cloudsley said he would get a plate for him. So I went to the door, and the Coachman came, and his horses being hot, he desired to go away because it rain'd; but Mr. Neale put his foot-boy into the coach, and the Coachman after pull'd his boy out of the coach, and drove away. And after that, I saw Mr. Cave and others come to the door, and jostled each other into the next shop, and were at very high words; and so afterwards they went into the entry again, and Sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters came out without the door, the latter of which said, Here is my band, and here is my sword; but they returned both in again into the Tavern, and within two minutes came out again, and I saw Mr. Walters thrust Sir Charles Pymm through his back.

Court. Did you see him do any thing to him after he was down?

Mr. Brummidge. No, my Lord, I did not.

Court. Did you not say, that Walters went over the kennel, and drew his sword, and stood upon his guard, and then you say, that you saw Sir Charles Pymm came out with his sword drawn; was his sword drawn?

Mr. Brummidge. I did not see him draw it; but it was drawn.

Court. Where did he receive his wound?

Brummidge. Within a foot of the kennel; I was but a little way off, but I did not see him beat his head against the ground.

Cryer. Cryer, call Mr. Fletcher.

Mr. Fletcher. My Lord, on Friday in the evening on the fourth of May, I was going by the Tavern-door about seven a-clock at night, and I heard a noise and a talking of going to the other end of the town to be merry: and turning myself back to hearken further, I saw Mr. Walters come out of the door and draw his sword, and Sir Charles Pymm came out, and drew his sword; and presently Mr. Walters's sword was through Sir Charles Pymm's body almost a foot; and he fell down crinkling immediately, and when he was down, I saw Mr. Walters hit him in the kennel, and take him by the nape of the neck, and after cried, God damn him, let the sword stick in his body; and afterwards I saw Mr. Mirriday pull the sword out of his body.

Court. Did you see Mr. Bradshaw there when Sir Charles fell?

Mr. Fletcher. No, my Lord, I saw none there but Mr. Walters and Sir Charles, they were out of doors, and the rest were in the entry.

Mary White and Sarah Webb were called, who could give little or no evidence as to matter of fact, as concerning the death of Sir Charles; and being timorous, could not see what they might have seen.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mr. Allen.

Mr. Allen. I know but very little of the matter, but that there was a plate of beef sent up to us, but we knew not from whence it came, till afterwards the Drawer brought us word that the Gentlemen below had sent it up; after which, we drank their healths and returned them thanks for it. After which, I went to the Coffee-house hard by, and sat about half an hour, and presently heard a cry of murder, and I came down, and saw Sir Charles Pymm lying with a wound in his body, and another in his head, but I did not know who it was, not then; but I asked who did this business, and exhorted the people to take them as soon as they could.

Court. I think you said that Mr. Bradshaw's sword was drawn?

Mr. Allen. Yes, it was, but I believe that he did not know that Sir Charles Pymm was kill'd.

Mrs. Sheepwash was call'd, but could depose nothing material.

Court. Mr. Walters, you have been here indicted, together with Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Cave, for the murder of Sir Charles Pymm, Knt. and Bart. you have heard what charge hath been laid against you, which hath been a very strong one, and now it behoves you to make your defence as well as you can.

Mr. Walters. My Lord, I was no way the occasion of the quarrel; when I came thither, I asked for some meat, and having not eaten all the day before, we had a piece of beef, of which Sir Charles Pymm and his company had some, who afterwards drank our healths, as I was informed. For my part, my Lord, I never saw the Gentleman before in my days: my Lord, I am very sorry it should be my misfortune to kill him in the quarrel. Sir Charles Pymm asked me saying, God damn you, Sir, what have you to do to meddle? I went presently, my Lord, to a Fishmonger's where Mr. Mirriday was, and Sir Charles Pymm came, and Mr. Mirriday said to him, Sir Charles, Damn you, Sir, go and fight him, and I will be your Second. And presently they came upon me, and I drew my sword in my own defence, and he ran me eight inches into the thigh, and at the same pass, I had the misfortune, my Lord, to run him into the body.

Court. Would you ask Mr. Mirriday any question?

Walters. Yes, my Lord. Mr. Mirriday, did you see me strike Sir Charles's head upon the ground?

Mirriday. No, Sir, I did not see that, neither did I say any such thing in the Fishmonger's shop, as to bid Sir Charles fight you.

Clerk. Cryer, call Mathew Perin.

Perin. My Lord all that I saw of the business was, that when the Coachman was called to the door, Mr. Neale came and threatened him if he did not stay; then Mr. Cave and Mr. Bradshaw were in the entry, and I heard them discourse about beef, and some of them said, You give us beef and make us pay for it; and there was answer made, they were Rascals that said so, for they did not. There was one of the Gentlemen in our shop hearing of it, said, Let me come to him, I will fight him.

Court. Do you know the man?

Perin. No, I do not know who it was.

Mr. Walters. I was wounded at the same time, my Lord.

Court. That is admitted of.

Mr. Walters. Let him be asked, whether I beat the head against the ground.

Perin. No, my Lord, I did not see him do that.

Court. He had a wound, the question is, how he came by it, whether he might not fall upon it himself, it was a slanting wound?

Mr. Walters. Pray, my Lord, let Sir Charles's sword be seen, all blood. [But that gave no satisfaction on either side.]

Court. Mr. Bradshaw, what have you to say for yourself?

Mr. Bradshaw. My Lord, I was there, but I know nothing of the death of Sir Charles Pymm, nor how he came by it; there were some words arose amongst us, and I desired them to cease, for fear a further quarrel should ensue upon it.

Court. Mr. Cave, what have you to say?

Mr. Cave. I know no more of the matter than this Gentleman saith: I saw not Sir Charles Pymm killed.

Clerk. Cryer, make proclamation.

Cryer. All people are commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Then Mr. Baron Jenner summ'd up the evidence as followeth:

Baron Jenner. Gentlemen of the Jury, you have three persons indicted, viz. Mr. Walters, Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Cave, for murdering Sir Charles Pymm, Bart. and have had several witnesses called for the King, against the prisoners at the bar; the first of which was Mr. Mirriday; and he gives you this account, and tis all that each and every one gives, and it agrees on all sides; and he tells you, that all those Gentlemen were to dine at Mr. Cloudsley's, at the Swan-Tavern in Old Fish-street; and that they were there at dinner, it is very plainly prov'd. And being there, it seems that some of those Gentlemen had bespoke a fish-dinner, some flesh, and had some, viz. a plate of beef; and he tells you also, that when dinner was over, some words did arise concerning the reckoning, and that one of the companies were got down stairs in the entry, where a further quarrel did arise. Mr. Mirriday tells you further, that Mr. Bradshaw and he quarrelled, so there was a scuffle in the entry; after which, things were pretty well quieted there: in comes Mr. Walters and Sir Charles Pymm, and while Mr. Mirriday was securing the first quarrel, they, viz. Sir Charles Pymm and Mr. Walters, were got out at the door, and Sir Charles was stooping down, and Mr. Walters was pushing upon his neck and throwing him down.

So said Mr. Mirriday, and when he went to take the sword out of his body, he saw him a dying man.

The next evidence was Mr. Neale, and he observes to you, that one of the Gentlemen did say, that the quarrel was not intended against them; and he gives an account of the story, how that it was about the beef; how that Sir Charles was run through by Walters, but he did not see him knock his head against the ground.

Mr. Palms gives the like account, and saith, that whilst they were a scuffling in the entry, Sir Charles was kill'd at the door.

The next evidence is the Drawer, who tells you of a squabble that Mr. Neale had with the Coachman at the door, and how that there was left four of the Gentlemen behind, and that the Coachman was unwilling to wait because it rained, his horses being hot, they might catch cold; whereupon he put his foot-boy into the coach, and threatened the Coachman if he went away: this was before they fell out about the meat.

The next evidence was one Mr. Brummidge the Fishmonger, he gives the same account, how that a quarrel was amongst them, and how that Mr. Walters was on one side of the kennel, and Sir Charles Pymm on the other side, and there they stood with their swords drawn; and as soon as they came close, they wounded each other, and Sir Charles Pymm was kill'd; but he did not see his head knock'd against the ground.

Comes Fletcher, my Lord Mayor's Officer, and he tells you, that he was going by the door home into Bread-street, and he sees a man that was wounded stooping down; and he swears that Mr. Walters took him by the nape of his neck, and knock'd his head against the ground, and heard him swear, let the sword stick in him. Sarah Webb and another woman speak it to be in the like manner; and one of them talks of Mr. Walters's pulling Sir Charles Pymm out of the entry before he would come out.

Last of all, Gentlemen, here was Mr. Allen, one of their company, who went away to the Coffee-house, and hearing murder cried out, he came and found Sir Charles Pymm kill'd and quite dead. This, Gentlemen, is the evidence that you have heard as near as I can give it you.

Now, for the prisoner Mr. Walters, he would have you believe, as if Sir Charles had struck him before he drew his sword; but he has not proved it: likewise speaks of Mr. Fletcher, but he does not remember that Sir Charles Pymm struck him before he drew: but so it was, Gentlemen, there was a quarrel, in which that honourable and worthy Gentleman, Sir Charles Pymm, lost his life.

Now for Mr. Bradshaw, he confesseth that there was a quarrel; but he saith, that he did not know when or how, Sir Charles Pymm was killed; and for Mr. Cave, I do not find any thing objected against him, nor either of them.

Now

Now, Gentlemen, I must tell you what the law is in this case: First of all, to begin with Mr. Walters, so as it fairs with Mr. Walters, so you may be guided to deal with the other two. Now it hath not been made appear by any of the evidence that you have heard, that there was any premeditated malice between them, for they were never in company before, and knew not each other; so that there could be no manner of malice from him in particular.

The next step, Gentlemen, is, here is nothing that can impute a general malice upon Mr. Walters, for if I had no design to kill a man, and kill another with whom I do not quarrel, that cannot be any premeditated malice; but I rather think that there was a little heat of wine amongst them: and this whole action was carried on by nothing else but by a hot and sudden frolick, and I am very sorry that it should fall upon such a worthy Gentleman as he was. And if there was no malice premeditated, then he can be found guilty of nothing but manslaughter; and as for the other two, they must be totally acquitted. If I have err'd in the summing up of these evidences, or mistaken myself in any point, here are my brothers to help me.

Then the Gentlemen of the Jury withdrew for about the space of half an hour, and returned into Court upon a scruple of conscience, one amongst them spoke to the Court as followeth;

Juryman. My Lord, we are not satisfied in our consciences concerning the death of Sir Charles Pymm; we find in it malice fore-thought; because after he had run the sword through his body, he was not satisfied with that, but must knock his head against the ground; so we do take it, that the said Sir Charles Pymm was maliciously murdered.

Mr. Justice Allibone. Gentlemen of the Jury, I shall endeavour to direct you in this case, and tell you what the Law saith, that it cannot reach a man's life, where no prepense malice is proved; that there it none proved, appears very plain to me, and I hope also to you, because it hath been proved that those Gentlemen, viz. the prisoners at the bar, and the deceased, had never been in company before.

Gentlemen, you are upon your oaths to serve the King as Jurymen; and I, as a Judge, am upon my oath to try the cause as well on the behalf of the living as the dead. So that upon the whole matter, Gentlemen, this can be called nothing else but a storm, an ungoverned storm that such men are subject to; so that it does not reach precedent malice, but subsequent passion; which sad passion was continued to that height, that Sir Charles Pymm in the midst of it lost his life.

Then the Jury went out again for about a quarter of an hour; and returning, brought in Mr. Walters guilty of manslaughter; but the other two were acquitted.
